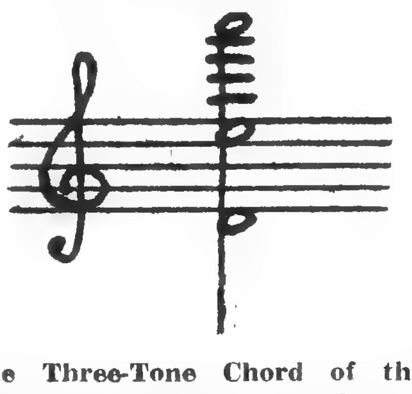
Every time that Stravinsky embarks on a new stylistic venture, he carefully avoids all distracting unconventionalities. In this he is the least sensational of all modern composers. In serving one definite purpose, he does not try to gain a point in another direction. Thus, when he was intent on the problem of musical economy, he worked miracles in instrumentation. He eliminated the violins and violas from the score of the Symphony of Psalms presumably to promote the more impersonal wood-winds, which he augmented in number. The elimination of the 'cello in the Rag-Time also may have been due to the desire to avoid the sensuous quality, rightly or wrongly associated with that instrument. In the Violin Concerto the orchestration is "normal." The small clarinet is the only supernumerary instrument in the score of the Concerto; there is an English horn which would stand in opposition to the practice of the Nineteenth Century symphony, but not necessarily of the early Eighteenth. The key of the Concerto is that of D, major or minor. The key of D, it will be remembered, is the most common (because the easiest for the strings) for all symphonies, concertos and overtures up to about 1800. In this instance Stravinsky is once more a conservative.

As far as the writing for the solo instrument is concerned, there is nothing particularly excruciating for a seasoned performer. The violin part of the "History of a Soldier" is without question the more complicated. Rhythmically, the Violin Concerto only in the final Presto presents any serious difficulty. Otherwise, the music proceeds smoothly, without constant changes of time-signature at one time associated with anything that is modern. Rhythm was not the problem to solve in the composition of this Concerto; it was not the item in the "notary's contract" between the composer and the commissioner, and the dazzling Presto, one is inclined to think, was either a spontaneous explosion, or a gift to the public. It took all the uncanny ingenuity of Stravinsky to graft it on to the Capriccio, to prepare it, as he did, with the dark gaps and falls of the immediately preceding music.

What then was the ultimate purpose underlying the composition of this Concerto? The answer may be simple: it was to write a Violin Concerto for Samuel Dushkin, the virtuoso. The work was commissioned and done according to the requirements of the commissioner. This honorable practice was responsible for many a masterpiece from Mozart and Beethoven; why should not Stravinsky do the like? In this he is only following a great tradition. A "notary's contract" here assumes a non-allegorical significance. What was the result of this contract? A masterpiece, which, in addition to its inherent qualities, is rich in demonstration of how a transient problem of style may be subordinated to a higher synthesis. In the Violin Concerto, as in no other composition, Stravinsky fused his various styles, and also the styles of various other composers, so solidly that the mixture appears monolytic. This may be a tribute to the composer's technical mastery, but it also may be a revelation of unity in seemingly disparate elements, a revelation of Stravinsky in the true Platonic sense, as one face of many facets.

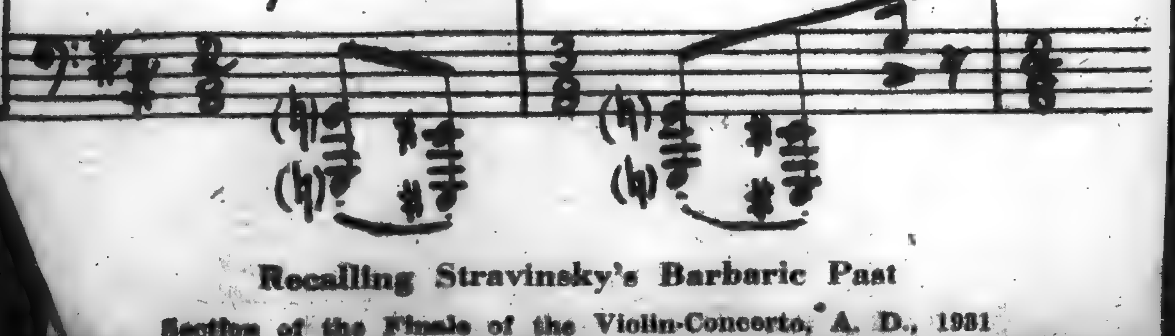
NICOLAS SLONIMSKY

The Leit-Accord



The Three-Tone Chord of the Violin with Which Every One of the Four Movements of Stravinsky's Concerto Begins.

Rhythmic Flash



Recalling Stravinsky's Barbaric Past

Section of the Finale of the Violin-Concerto, A. D., 1931

Glob MUSIC Dec 28

SYMPHONY HALL

Pension Fund Concert

Dr Koussevitzky, in selecting the program for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Pension Fund Concert yesterday afternoon, honored the memory of his illustrious compatriot Tchaikovsky. For the orchestra alone there were the early Fantasia, "Francesca Da Rimini," and the F minor Symphony. Roland Hayes was soloist in Lenski's principal aria from the opera "Eugen Onegin," and in "Don Juan's Serenade," a song with orchestral accompaniment.

These Pension Fund concerts are given to increase the pension fund of the orchestra, which provides financial aid for retired players. Yesterday's concert was the first such this season; for a second, to occur next Spring, Bach's B minor Mass has been announced.

The Fantasia has been played but rarely in Boston. According to record, it last appeared on a Boston Symphony program in 1910. Composed and orchestrated in the Summer and early Autumn of 1876, the work is based upon verses from Dante's "Inferno." The poet describes how, in the protecting company of Virgil, he found in what he called "the second circle" of Hades, a company of those whose eternal punishment it was to suffer for their carnal sins the torments of being buffeted about by strong winds, without hope of rest. Among the company were Francesca Da Rimini and her lover, Paolo (brother of her husband), who had been slain by Francesca's husband after the latter had discovered their unlawful love. Francesca tells the story of her tragedy to Dante.

"Francesca" is by no means among the Russian master's lesser works. Together with much of his music, it is poignant and tempestuous. It is more moving to one listener than the "Pathetic" Symphony and "Romeo and Juliet," for example. It also seems to be less marred than the latter pieces by the banality of thematic material and manipulation that is encountered here and there in many of Tchaikovsky's compositions.

Without benefit of an elaborate literary "program," the Fantasia furnishes an effective musical description of the winds of Hades, the cries of the tormented, and an unfolding of Francesca's unhappy tale.

Together with the Symphony on yesterday's program, "Francesca" also provides an interesting example of how extremely personal is Tchaikovsky's music. Both works, for all their storm and stress, and the latter for all its connection with a theme of universal application, are relatively small-scaled, predominantly expressions of Tchaikovsky's own character and feeling. There is no impression of epic breadth and grandeur such as no doubt there would have been had Wagner, for example, written symphonies in his maturity, and a tone poem upon this subject.

Mr Hayes sang the aria and the serenade with his unfailing good style and sensitive artistry. The great Negro tenor invariably gives consistently good interpretations, and is one of the greatest of present-day artists. Only in one respect could the aria and serenade have been improved, and that is a purely physical matter: they require a voice of more opulence than that of Mr Hayes.

After the concert the singer was presented by the Pension Fund committee, a silver bowl, inscribed with an expression of gratitude, in appreciation of Mr Hayes' generosity in giving his services by appearing as soloist yesterday. Max Kunze, as spokesman, made the presentation.

Dr Koussevitzky conducted, as he always does Tchaikovsky's music, with superb vigor and brilliance, yet with regard for nuance and orchestra detail. It seems unlikely that anyone could equal his performance of the Fourth Symphony.

MUSIC Dec 28

PENSION FUND CONCERT

For the Boston Symphony orchestra Pension Fund concert, given yesterd afternoon in Symphony hall, Dr. Kou sevitzky offered an all-Tchaikovsk program. The orchestral fantasi "Francesca da Rimini" (Op. 32), Len ski's air from "Eugen Onegin," th "Serenade of Don Juan," and th Fourth Symphony (Op. 36, in F minor were the works performed. Rolan Hayes, tenor, was the soloist. Th audience—one which responded wit enthusiasm to the qualities of the mus and the manner of its performance—filled the hall.

Poor though it is in genuine an solid musical ideas, "Francesca d Rimini" succeeds in being a remarkabl successful experiment in orchestra scene painting. The vividness wit which Tchaikovsky suggests the furiou winds, the bloodcurdling sounds an sights of that second circle of hell i which Dante found Francesca, remain impressive even in an age that is surfeited with the diabolical cleverness o innumerable major and minor master of orchestration. The orchestra, led b a Dr. Koussevitzky who has rarely s lavished himself, gave of the Fantasi a performance that was a miracle o powerful suggestion, of brilliant execution, of romantic warmth, of overwhelmingly passionate abandon.

To the Fourth Symphony, often made intolerably piangent and vociferous—never to be quite purged of these qualities, which are indeed inherent in the score (and please remember that poor Tchaikovsky had reason to weep)—Dr Koussevitzky brought a fine dignity, a controlled intensity, that raised its first movement from the level o hysterical self-pity toward that of high tragedy, that lent it something of classic poise and impersonality. Admirably sustained tempi, fine shading and phrasing, and climaxes carefully judged and dramatically achieved, were part of his secret, as usual. So exquisitely was the Andantino played that the audience could not refrain from applauding this movement. There was a delightful delicacy not only in the famous pizzicato passages of the Scherzo, but also in the section of the movement given over to the brass and drums, and a certain bucolic joviality in the theme for woodwinds; while the brilliant verve with which the finale was played compensated somewhat for its noisy triviality.

Mr. Hayes sang Lenski's air from "Eugen Onegin" in Italian and the "Serenade of Don Juan" (from the six songs published as Opus 38) in German. Since his was not a Russian audience and good English translations are hard to find, he was probably justified in using whatever language he found most convenient. What is important is that his singing displayed in generous measure those qualities of intelligence, sensitive musicianship, and emotional sincerity for which it is noted.

It is not in such music as this that the peculiar beauty of Mr. Hayes's voice is best revealed, but his creation of mood and emotion in the "Onegin" air, his rhythmic vivacity in the serenade, were wholly admirable and roused the audience to enthusiastic and prolonged applause.

Mr. Hayes, who had not only given his services in aid of the pension fund, but had come specially from Curryville, Ga., for the occasion, was after the concert privately presented by the pension fund committee with a silver inscribed with an expression of e. The presentation was per- by Mr. Max Kunze as spokesman committee. S. S.

84

Orchestra's Day At Symphony Hall

Variously It Distinguishes Itself Through Assorted Chaikovsky

Trans — Dec. 28

AT every concert for its Pension Fund the Symphony Orchestra should have first place. Twice in the musical year, conductor and even composers—should the order be reversed in the public mind?—may reasonably make room. Two conditions are essential: that the audience be numerous enough to insure a substantial addition to the fund; that the orchestra as such receive full meed of applause. Neither was lacking at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Though the wiseacres mistrusted a Sunday removed by only one day from Christmas; though the student public was taking its pleasures at home or in New York; though the rich and the smart had fled the town for week-ending, empty seats were few. Those who had doubted the drawing power of the program were manifestly mistaken. There was money in pocket for the Pension Fund; while subscriptions from the members of the orchestra paid the cost of the silver bowl with which, after the concert, it returned thanks to Mr. Hayes. Like many other distinguished singers, the tenor offered his voice and skill for a Pension-Fund Concert. More: to fit within a "Chaikovsky Program," he prepared for the occasion a melancholy soliloquy from "Eugen Onégin"—the composer's best opera—and a fugitive piece named "Don Juan's Serenade." Faith, says St. Paul, is best tested by works. So also is good will.

Nor was the audience slow to single out the orchestra as particular object of approval and regard. No sooner had Dr. Koussevitzky entered than the hall crackled with applause. On the instant he bade the orchestra rise and to it transferred still warmer plaudits. (It is such impulses that distinguish a conductor who is also man of the world from a conductor lacking that useful quality. They also release the loyalty, fine, warm and deep, that a leader should cherish toward those with whom he works at a common task). Applause ran full and eager after the performance of the fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini." The orchestra was again on its feet at the pause between the halves of the program. At each halt in the Symphony in F minor, the rule of more formal concerts was waived, and the audience clapped to heart's content. At the end it laid on and spared not.

By the precedent of many a Pension-Fund Concert the orchestra was also on its mettle. Time, change, and symphonic fashions have dealt unkindly with "Francesca da Rimini." These twenty years the fantasia has not been heard at the subscription concerts. What excitement it may now generate depends largely upon conductor and orchestra. Chaikovsky would conjure into tones the winds of the Inferno to which Francesca and Paolo are doomed. They blow empty, blatant and meaningless unless those that sound them, heat the audience with Chaikovsky's rhetoric. Once more Dr. Koussevitzky, and the players with him, gained that difficult end. Nor were Mr. Polatschek and Mr. Laurent and Mr. Gilet and Mr. Speyer at fault with the measures that sing—and wail—the apparition of the lovers. The strings and the horns completed the tale. "We read no more that afternoon." What musical life, what pictorial or emotional illusion still linger in "Francesca da Rimini," the performance brought forth.

Better Chaikovsky when he speaks of himself, as he does through this Fourth Symphony in F minor. The brass choir sounded full, deep and ominous the measures of fate. The succeeding harmonies were mysterious and suspensive. The strings oiled the irregular waltz-like measures. The whole orchestra wreaked itself upon the climactic passages in which Chaikovsky forgets his feverish waltz to loose his own agonies and despairs. To listen closely was to hear even the little figures that he threads into his pangs. . . . The long-drawn melody of the second movement, wistful, troubled, melancholy; the harmonies, the instrumental color that are inseparable and vitalizing parts, lost nothing in performance. . . . The plucked measures of the scherzo came as sustained tour de force from the string choir. They were dry, snapping, swift, again a music vitalized. The woodwinds worked as aptly the contrast of their intermezzo. . . . The finale was unsparing outburst of the Chaikovskian rhetoric, the Chaikovskian melodrama—symphonic theater, sure of its audience.

Only by a considerable and an unevenly sustained effort of the composing imagination could Chaikovsky enter into Dante's Inferno and Francesca and Paolo there encountered. But into the romantical melancholy of Lenski in "Eugen Onégin," the Lenski on the edge of a fated duel, he could deeply infuse himself. As a music that tensely accomplishes the desired ends, weaves the designed atmosphere, evokes the imagined and experienced emotions, this operatic air is worth a wilderness of "Francescas"; keeps pace with the Symphony in F minor at best; is far more finely wrought than either. For his part, Mr. Hayes sang it with equal sense of the Italianate phrasing and the brooding mood. He is no operatic singer in the conventional sense. But, given the opportunity, the fineness of operatic singing—and of operatic writing—does not escape him. Neither he nor, for that matter, Chaikovsky were as fortunate with "Don Juan's Serenade." Vivacious and sub-ironic gallantries are not their trade. Monsieur Berlioz had a surer hand for that sort of thing.

H. T. P.

The music of Mozart's

Y, DECEMBER 28,

SYMPHONY PENSION CONCERT

Post

Roland Hayes Soloist in Tschaikowsky Programme

Yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave its 64th concert in aid of the orchestra's Pension fund. Roland Hayes, tenor, was the assisting artist. Dr. Koussevitsky elected to perform an all Tschaikowsky programme and for the opening number selected the "Francesca da Rimini" orchestral fantasia after Dante. There followed a pair of numbers for voice and orchestra, the first of which was the air of Lenski, "Wohin, Wohin?" from "Eugene Onegin," followed by the "Serenade of Don Juan." The second half of the programme was given over to the Symphony No. 4 in F minor, Op. 36.

DAY OF VIRTUOSITY

Not for several seasons, if memory serves correctly, has the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented "Francesca da Rimini," either at a Pension Fund concert or within its regular series. Therefore, it was with considerable interest, no doubt, that the audience yesterday gave attentive ear to its performance. On the whole, it does not appear singularly "great" music, as we are accustomed to so designate music in our time, yet the score holds many thrilling measures which were brought forward in thrilling manner.

Although interested in details, one felt that Dr. Koussevitzky viewed the piece as an emotional complexity of integral parts, and thus worked up to a tempestuous climax which brought a roar of applause from the audience. But after all, it was in the Symphony No. 4 that the virtuosity of the orchestra was entirely revealed. Although the preliminary preparation is most rigorous, it nevertheless gives an assurance to both men and conductor without which climaxes could not be so surely built, attacks so instantaneous or phrasing so flexible. Was it by coincidence or design that this symphony was played almost a year to a day following the performance last year? It is safe to assume that performances like that of yesterday will continue to draw from the audiences the same spontaneous and enthusiastic plaudits, in response to which Dr. Koussevitzky "stood his men."

Since the programme was "ready made," Mr. Hayes must, of course, present Tschaikowsky numbers. One does not easily associate his art with operatic arias, but his performance yesterday fully justified him. As a matter of fact, Mr. Hayes sang extremely well throughout the afternoon. His tones were round and well domed, with a depth which has not always characterized his work. The aria was given a thoughtful interpretation, with no effort to bring to the concert platform an operatic performance, yet there was sufficient emotional content to make it satisfying. In "Don Juan," Mr. Hayes offered some extraordinarily fine singing—probably the best of the afternoon—and fully merited the enthusiasm of his audience.

Concert-Chronicle

About "Importance" Tran Dec 30

TO this department comes a note chiding Dr. Koussevitzky because he included Frid's Suite for Orchestra in the Symphony Concerts of last week, and chiding the reviewer for The Transcript because he approved the conductor's choice and praised the composer's piece. Frid's music, in the opinion of the correspondent, was neither "important in itself" nor "inspirational" in effect; neither "uplifting" nor "heart-warming." Similar complaints, though garnished with less ardent adjectives, could be heard, last Saturday, here and there in the corridors of Symphony Hall. This department quite agrees with its correspondent that the Suite was neither "important" nor "inspirational," though it is disposed to shy at the latter word because it has never been able to discover, even from those who use it most, exactly what it means. None the less there was sound reason to play Frid's music and no small pleasure to be gained from it. It is worth while indeed to look into the matter for a moment.

What, for example, is "important" music? To some it means anything that they like warmly. To others it implies anything that is signed by an illustrious name. To others still it connotes the few classics that by universal consent abide in greatness. Any one of these three notions would make symphonic program-making nearly impossible. If he agreed to the first, the conductor would be cumbered, for example, with far too frequent repetitions of symphonies by Franck, Dvorák and Chaikovsky. If he accepted the second, his programs would be littered with the pot-boilers, the journeyman stuff, the commissioned wares that nearly every composer, small or great, left plentifully behind him. If he followed the third, how ceaseless would be his repetitions, how rarefied would become the symphonic air! Or, if "important" is the label for works that have changed the face of music in their time, remember the bitter outcries when conductors first adventured Debussy, Strauss and Stravinsky.

How very little, moreover, in this world can possibly deserve so large and meaningful an adjective as "important." Most of us lead unimportant lives outside our immediate circle; busy ourselves with unimportant days; read unimportant books, see unimportant plays, look at unimportant pictures, pursue unimportant studies—hear unimportant music. We do so, because if we insisted upon importance, we should be reduced in all things to an impossible minimum. The human quest, especially in the arts, is less for importance than for interest. That interest, and human nature behind it, ask for diversity. Nobody may reasonably expect to be "inspired" every time he or she listens to symphonic music. Usually to be interested and informed, to be amused and entertained, is quite enough. Far too much vague prattle about the cultural influence, the "inspirational" value of symphonic music and of symphony concerts has spread a false notion of both. Likely enough they minister to the good of the soul. But they also pleasure the sensuous ear and entertain the susceptible mind. In the concert-hall, as everywhere else, we mortals live for the hour.

Frid's Suite—to return to the text—was not in the least an important music. It was only plentiful in interest and entertainment. Heard with open ears and an open mind, it was young, fresh, individual and alive. It sounded from keen-toned strings, edgey woodwinds, coloring "percussion" with the tang of our time which in these nineteen-thirties is pleasure to many a listener. Its dissonance was no more than the dissonance of music-making these twenty years. Here were orchestral instinct and orchestral skill that readily waxed into brilliance; fancy that in the slow movement could become fervor; at need the happy, biting turns of tonal wit. The Suite interested, pleasured, which is the function and the residue of nearly all the music heard in this world from the days of Bach to the days of Frid.

What, after all, was the Suite in B minor with which the concert began but music that Bach wrote to entertain the court-circle at Cöthen and to set off the virtuosi of his little orchestra? To those that heard its dance tunes it also had the tang of the immediate day; while in those same ears the harpsichord often tinkled out dissonance. In very truth, the old master's Suite from 1720 was surprising analogue to the young Hungarian's Suite of 1931. But Bach died in 1750 whereas Frid has an address in Amsterdam. Hallowed classic is Johann Sebastian; while Frid must make head against those that regard the symphonic present as an unexplainable and inadmissible impropriety.

Incidents and Prospects

Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, Sibelius's Fourth Symphony, Mahler's Ninth Symphony (at the Saturday matinée) and Frid's new Suite are all to have place on Dr. Koussevitzky's programs for the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra in New York next week.

At his concert in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Jan 17, Mr. Spalding will play Reger's Sonata in A minor for violin alone. Reger is a rare name nowadays on Bostonian programs. . . . Mme. Austral's concert, announced for Jan. 14 in Symphony Hall, is deferred to a later day.

H. T. P.

SECOND MONDAY CONCERT

Roland Hayes Soloist With Symphony Orchestra

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Within four days two distinguished singers have appeared with the Symphony Orchestra. At the concerts of last Friday and Saturday it was Mary Garden singing the soprano solo in Debussy's "The Blessed Damozel," while last evening, at the second concert of the Monday series, Roland Hayes sang to the orchestra's accompaniments a little-known concert aria of Mozart, "Tali e Cotani Sono," and "The Repose of the Holy Family" from Berlioz's "The Flight Into Egypt," which forms the second part of his sacred trilogy, "The Childhood of Christ."

SANG BUT TWICE

It was difficult to tell which to praise the most last evening, the singing of Mr. Hayes or the accompaniment of Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra. In both the music, first of Mozart and then of Berlioz, found the just and satisfying voice. Mozart's music had the gallant air which so befits it and the right suggestion of a piece intended for display in which there was, nevertheless, no suggestion of the trite or commonplace. And in the air of Berlioz, Mr. Hayes, and the orchestra with him, was tenderly rapturous. That Berlioz of the frequent extravagances should have written this delicate, spiritualized music is one of the paradoxes of the tonal art, but one might search far before there could be found another singer, conductor and orchestra to divine and reveal so perfectly its peculiar flavor. These two pieces from Mr. Hayes were all too short, and evidently the audience as a whole so decided. Time and again Mr. Hayes was returned to the stage, but if the more optimistic among the listeners imagined they would have a further taste of his artistry they were doomed to disappointment; there are no encores at Symphony concerts.

For the rest last evening's concert contained music already heard from the orchestra this season; the charming suite from Corelli, Brahms' Fourth Symphony and the second suite from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe." It was interesting to note that Dr. Koussevitzky's version of the Symphony last evening was in general much more vigorous and incisive, less mellow and reflective, than was that of a few weeks ago. Those who believe that music is independent of its interpreters might with profit have compared the two performances in which the same piece, with the same conductor and orchestra and within a brief period, made two such diverse impressions.

85

Trans Dec. 31 Pla

New Earmarks And Old Upon This Concerto

Guide for Listeners Through Stravinsky's Newest Piece for Violin

As all the world knows, Dr. Koussevitzky's first adventure for the New Year, at the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday, will be the American première of Stravinsky's new Concerto in D for Violin and Orchestra, with Samuel Dushkin as violinist. As the world and his brother also knows, that Concerto is grouped into four movements, entitled respectively by seventeenth-and-eighteenth-century captions: (1) Toccata; (2) Aria I; (3) Aria II; (4) Capriccio. As on previous occasions, Stravinsky has discarded Italian tempo-indications in favor of more accurate metronome markings. Thus the Toccata moves at a speed of metronome-mark 96 for quarter notes; Aria I at 116 for quarters; Aria II, the "slow movement," at 48 for eighth notes; the Capriccio at 120 for eighths. Curiously enough, for tempo modifications in the body of a movement Stravinsky reverts to the Italian designations together with metronome markings. Thus in the Coda which follows the Capriccio, he thrillingly speeds up a movement already rapid from the initial pace of 120 to the eighth note, "Subito piu mosso," to 152. This in turn gives way to the final exhilarating "Presto" at 200.

Key

Nicolas Slonimsky, in his article about the concerto printed in these columns last Saturday, refers to the key as "that of D, major or minor." It is interesting in this connection to note that a letter from the publishers' agents to Symphony Hall calls attention to the key as being the key of D, neither major nor minor; just D. One can only assume that this direction emanated originally from the composer. And it can only be considered as one more addition to the growing list of his cryptic utterances. For the Toccata is as definitely in the key of D major as any modern piece with free modulatory course is in the key of its opening and closing divisions. The modulatory course of the Toccata, by the way, leans strongly toward the Sub-dominant. Aria I is as definitely in D minor, with suggestions of D major in the principal episode. Aria II is in A major (the Dominant of D) with borrowings from D minor. The Capricco, like the Toccata, is in D major. As is well known, few, if any, symphonies, concertos, or sonatas since the time of Bach move entirely in one key. Conventionally the several movements of such a work now traverse a cycle of keys, taking the key designation from the first and the last movements. Conventionally, then, this piece would be labelled D major. Possibly in his key designation Stravinsky has in mind a "reform' in nomenclature by which the key-designation of a piece would refer to more than the Tonic sections of the first and the last movements of a cyclic composition. But even so, his D, "neither major nor minor," does not take into consideration Aria II in A major, unless Stravinsky wishes to consider this movement as merely fulfilling the functions of a huge Dominant-seventh chord in D—an analysis by no means impossible.

Solo-Part

Mr. Slonimsky also notes that the writing of the concerto was commissioned by Mr. Dushkin. In this connection be it said that the score contains the phrase "Violin part in collaboration with Samuel Dushkin." Most concertos have been impaled upon one of the horns of a dilemma. They have either been written by a virtuoso who was merely a "no-account" composer and thus have only negligible musical interest. Or they have been written by a real composer (who in most cases was not a virtuoso), with whom the making of a sufficiently brilliant or difficult solo-part was perpetual struggle, resulting too often in a solo-part none too well adapted to the instrument. Sometimes, it is true, composers have advised with virtuosi in the fashioning of solo-parts for concertos, as Brahms did with Joachim for his violin concerto. Stravinsky evidently went a step further. Solo-part "in collaboration with" the soloist who is to introduce the piece to the capitals of music. Real composer, real virtuoso, thus share equally in the making of a virtuoso-piece that shall have more than virtuoso-value. At first glance the violin-part appears to be bristling with difficulties. Closer analysis reveals these difficulties as lying "well under the hand" (as the phrase goes) of the violinist. They are true virtuoso's difficulties rather than difficulties which a composer unnecessarily makes.

That Chord

The Toccata begins with two measures which either wholly, in part, or in modified form, are introduction also to the other three movements. The chord, printed in last Saturday's Transcript as the "Leit-accord," is the opening chord of the solo-vionlin and the constant part of these varying introductory measures. Beneath these notes D, E, A, the orchestra has a chord D, G, D. F-sharp. The second measure continues with three chords in kind. Aria I begins with a literal repetition of these two meuasures. Aria II at its beginning modifies them considerably. The Capriccio has only the constant viloin-chord at the beginning of the passage-work. And the complete chord of the beginning of the Toccata, in a new position, and with the G resolved to an F-sharp, is also the chord with which the concerto ends. Precious thought: has it taken Stravinsky the course of a whole piece to resolve a single suspension?

Course and Contents

After the two introductory measures the orchestra launches the Toccata into its main theme. This theme in jauntily rhythmed thirds will probably be called jolly, or inconsequential, or happy-go-lucky, or trifling and unworthy according to the mood or the prejudice of the listener. Suffice it to say analytically that it is admirable basis for the various contrapuntal developments. Five times it shows its head in the course of the Toccata; many times leads to episodic developments, even as a Bach subject in fugue, prelude, or toccata, would thus lead. Then a contrast section of varying materials is introduced. Of the phrase with which this section is ushered in, more later. After the contrast section, there is almost literal repetition of the first section, (beyond even the custom of a Bach) and a short but brilliant Coda.

Aria I runs a similar course as far as the general constructive scheme is concerned. It is also tri-partite. The theme however is much more lyrical. The contrast begins with the orchestra "dolce tranquillo," while the solo violin disports itself in flute-like harmonics against the orchestral melody. An exceedingly complex contrapuntal development of many independent voices follows, after which a return to the beginning.

For chief structural feature of Aria II (the "slow movement"), the melodies, always sustained in character, are separated from each other by repetitions of the first measure, which, as already noted, is a modification of the introductory measures of the Toccata and Aria I. The main contrast section here is a broad melody for the G string of the solo-violin.

The Capriccio is likewise in three parts with the addition of a long and brilliant Coda. The principal theme, introduced after six measures of passage-work for the violin, is itself in two parts which follow close upon each other. The second of these two parts hints at jazz rhythms. The contrast-division is introduced, "piacevole," in a theme of skipping sevenths in the solo-violin. Through several sections this contrast-division runs, with music of as many varieties. Then follows restatement of the first, after which comes the brilliant Coda.

Perversities

Professional detractors of Stravinsky could do worse than spend some hours in study of the score. They would find a contrapuntal facture of high order. Probably they prefer to stumble over the several instances of what can only be called Stravinskian perversity. A single instance may be cited. It lies in the short passage which is introduction to the principal episode in the Toccata. Here the lower instruments of the orchestra descend F-sharp, E, D, C-sharp, B, A, G; while the solo-violin together with higher instruments descend F-sharp, E, D, C-natural, B, A, G. The writer knows of no process of musical reasoning, ancient or modern, to explain the clash between the C-sharp and the C-natural in such an otherwise simple passage. But of course the analyst, an avowed admirer of Stravinsky, is not one of the "elect" and understanding "three" mentioned by Mr. Slonimsky. In the preparatory lecture at the Public Library last Tuesday, Mr. R. G. Appel quoted aptly Browning's saying: "When I wrote that passage only God and I knew what it meant, but now, after a few years, I am afraid that only God knows." And we wonder if "after a few years" Stravinsky will not be forced to say the same about the above measures. After all, kindred perversities are rare in the Concerto, though they may explain, in part, some of the unfavorable criticism that it has already received.

Further, an eye-study of this music affirms unmistakably the unity of Stravinskian style and Stravinskian progress from "The Fire-Bird" onward. There is again the typical repetitive figure-develepoment prominent in "Petrushka," "Le Sacre" and, to skip mention of intervening works, especially prominent in the "Psalms-Symphony." There are the composer's favorite dissonances of the major seventh (or diminished octave) and of the minor ninth (or augmented octave) in close alternation over a bass moving by semi-tones. Such procedures, though they may be more distresisng to unreceptive ears than the example above cited, are by no means to be classed in the same category. They are really accepted, orthodox Stravinsky. And there are others moving in similar planes. But since such procedures were generally accepted in a work like "Le Sacre" (probably on account of the program), it is difficult to see why in this concerto they should be subject to as much criticism as they have already received at the hands of European reviewers. For if there is any principle fixed in musical criticism, it is that a program does not make bad music good. And if the typical Stravinskian procedures were really good with a program, they are also good by themselves.

And Inventions

Still further: in pure musical invention the Concerto is long advance over any of the early works. It has often been pointed out that the only actual melody in "The Fire-Bird' is not original with Stravinsky, but a folk-tune. Similarly "La Sacre"—chiefly a huge and in manifold harmonic and instrumental color—is in the main melodically poverty-stricken. In the new Concerto, however, one finds melodic inventiveness of a high order in both Arias, melodic figure-writing comparable to the best in "Petrushka" in the Toccata while the Capriccio in its scintillating texture suggests nothing so much as the texture of the recent Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra. In sum, an advance study of the score seems to indicate that as long as Stravinsky can write a "Concerto in D" he need not be alarmed over the opinions of those who believe that his genius has spent itself. A. H. M.

Concert-Chronicle

By and To d'Indy

Elsewhere on this page in his usual Thursday article A. H. M. examines Stravinsky's Violin-Concerto for the pleasure and profit of listeners at the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday. As the full program stands, after the Stravinsky of 1931 will follow the Stravinsky of 1911 in the Suite from the ballet, "Petrushka," repertory piece since Dr. Koussevitzky came first to Symphony Hall. D'Indy's Symphony in B-flat, unheard since 1925, fills the first half of the concerts, doubtless to mark once more the composer's recent death. "From Franck,' writes A. H. M., "sprang the idea of basing large cyclical works on one, two or three generative motivs from which the whole unfolds. His pupil, d'Indy, as heir to the Franckian theory and practice, as defender of the Franckian faith, developed and expanded the idea. He embodied it in this Symphony in B-flat, written in 1902-03, when there were still Franckians and anti-Franckians in the musical world of Paris. Their controversies have long been stilled. Whoever chooses to write music according to the formula of Franck and d'Indy may now do so unquestioned.

"As d'Indy applies it, his Symphony seems nowadays to move in regular enough course. There is an introduction, a first movement in sonata-form, a scherzo, a finale. The introduction at once announces two motivs, one in the bass, the other in the treble, from which much of the matter in the actual themes is developed. By this time such a unifying device is clear to every ear accustomed to follow music and quite undebatable if the composer chooses to use it. Better, then, to quote the warm, just words that Paul Rosenfeld wrote in his 'Musical Chronicle' about d'Indy at large:

" 'His music has the high grace of quality. It expresses a spirit perhaps neither very powerful nor fecund, but distinguished and upright and noble in essence. In all its parts, it gives again the fine cool breath of a dignified and fundamentally lofty nature. Manner not a whit less than matter is impregnated with it. What he has to bring, d'Indy offers us in nobly chased vessels. The compositions of no living musician come fashioned with greater richness and dexterity and purity of workmanship, than come those of the mature d'Indy. Their exquisite subtlety and firmness of detail, their hardness and precision and fulness, make them appear a little like pieces of superb goldsmithery executed in the fluid medium of tone; platters and basins and cups of precious metal whose simple perfection of line is accented rather than destroyed by the reliefs of fruit and leaf and flower fantasy graven upon them.

"And what the dish contains most oftentimes has a gravity and a largeness worthy of the ceremoniousness with which it is presented. D'Indy's power is no small craftsmanship; no application of exquisite scruples to trifles of art. His major works are generously conceived. They are spacious, moving things; long lines which circle and spiral in ample sweeps, and terminate in majestic chorale-like proclamations of the germinal ideas. . . . He has made music that pushes back the incrushing world from about us; and, in the space it clears for us, lets some sense of calm and beauty, without which we perish, rebuild itself within. The best of us is dead when we forget the beauty of quality. He makes dry streams to trickle and flow again. And so, his music carries within itself a preservative which promises to transport it, through years and weathers, in the august company of those things which are useful to the human being that would live.' "

Symphony Hall has received an important letter from Sibelius, the composer, about his new Symphony, the Eighth. It is completed, and the score will soon be on the way to Boston. Sibelius expressly intrusts the first performances—anywhere—to Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra. In all probability they will produce the Symphony well before the end of the season

This reward of merit from one of the most distinguished living composers has touched Dr. Koussevitzky. It does honor also to the orchestra and to Boston as a capital of music. The conductor hesitates only lest he give his audiences too much Sibelius in a single musical year. His scruples do him credit; but they are groundless. With Sibelius at Symphony Hall there is not a sign of surfeit. Never before has one of his Symphonies been produced outside European concert-halls.

86

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
DEC 1 - 1931

DR. CHAPMAN TO LECTURE AT LIBRARY ON SUNDAY

Monday Morning Musical Club Sponsoring Talk on Hub Symphony.

The Monday Morning Musical Club announces the second in the series of free lectures by Dr. W. Louis Chapman, music critic of the Providence Journal, on the programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, ~~to be~~ given Sunday afternoon at 4 o'clock in the Providence Public Library.

Dr. Chapman will speak on the program arranged by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky for next Tuesday's concert, illustrating his lecture at the piano and with other instruments. He will talk on the particular works to be played by the orchestra, taking up the lives of the two composers—Beethoven and Rimsky-Korsakoff—represented on that program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS

DEC 2 1931

The World of Music

Performance of Mahler's Ninth Symphony Causes Discussion of Greatness.

By W. J. HENDERSON

GUSTAVE MAHLER'S ninth symphony reached New York a few nights ago by way of Boston. Serge Koussevitzky, industrious seeker for variety of interest, conducted the Boston Symphony orchestra through a memorable performance of the work. The symphony has the noble merit of being not drawn to such heavenly length as some of the distinguished composer's other works. It has additional merits which may perchance be mentioned with respect. For the moment let us make apology for our existence.

In his always incomparable program notes Philip Hale reprints a letter of Aaron Copland written in 1925 to the New York Times. Mr. Copland is a modernist composer of talent and learning. In his letter he complained that New York critics seemed to be unanimous in the conclusion that as a composer Mahler was quite hopeless.

Mr. Copland did not quarrel with us for what we said so much as for what we left unsaid. He himself admitted a few weaknesses in the composer's art, but felt that the beauties far outweighed them. What has always seemed to this writer to be the basis of local critical regret about Mahler was that he so frequently used trivial themes and so often was prolix and pretentious in his working out. These are two serious faults and, if established, are sufficient to prevent the inclusion of most of Mahler's works in the first rank.

* * *

Mr. Copland held that "Das Lied von der Erde" has in it the "stuff of living music." We grant that heartily. It is not all of the vital kind, but some of it is. Mahler not infrequently attained beauty and eloquence. But this music lover found in him a composer whose visions were much greater than his powers of musical invention or his skill in construction. The things he tried to do in symphonic form sometimes overmastered him and left him prostrate and breathless. Furthermore, he was apparently unable to view his own work with any perspective. Perhaps this accounted for one of his bad habits.

He breakfasted in bed. After the meal he propped himself up and had sheets of score paper spread on his knees. Then he wrote and wrote and wrote till luncheon. No doubt, his mind was in a fine glow throughout the morning. In the language of the street, he was having the time of his life. But he undoubtedly lost all consciousness of the extent of his production, and the fact that he was spreading the butter very thin. He failed to blue pencil his long-winded scores. The thoughts were precious to him. He forgot that the public was not a subject to command, but a disinterested looker-on in Vienna, who had to be won.

Inability to say concisely what they had to say and to perceive the innate worthlessness of certain thematic subjects was what stood in the way of the attainment of their ideals by both Mahler and his admired Bruckner. If there is such a thing as genuine criticism—and this writer believes there is—it is and must always be indifferent to special pleadings. It is not for or against any person. It is for good art and against bad art; and that is its beginning, its end. and its only reason for existence.

* * *

Mahler's was never bad art. It was sincere. The man was striving with all his ability to express his vague conceptions, his undefined, but nonetheless agonizing aspirations. He was not aiming at those superficial effects which quickly gain approval from the ready hands of an audience, yet seldom remain fixed in the minds. But he fell short of pre-eminence in music because he could not attain that perfect amalgamation of matter and form which Walter Pater, with his habitual critical sagacity, declared to be the triumphant differentiation of music from other arts.

Mahler's music should be performed from time to time. To bury it because it is imperfect would be to deprive concertgoers of some interesting hours. For the same reason Bruckner should be heard. There is sufficient loftiness of idea and felicity of expression in the scores of both composers to make us willing to plod through the dusty paths of the barren places. Both men had their moments when they saw the promised land. But the vision was almost always obscure.

* * *

Erich Kleiber lays down the baton of the Philharmonic-Symphony society, which is now to be taken up by the illustrious Arturo Toscanini. Mr. Kleiber will return to Germany whence he came trailing garments of glory. He carries with him the good wishes of music lovers and their players for a long and refreshing rest in his native land.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
CHRONICLE

DEC 2 - 1931

First American performances of Mahler's Ninth Symphony were given this fall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS

DEC 2 1931

Boston Symphony Introduces Piano Concerto by Texan

HAROLD MORRIS.

Piano concertos, which seldom interest contemporary composers, have been brought into prominence again by a Texan, Harold Morris, now a member of the faculty of the Juilliard School of Music in New York. The latest success of this 41-year-old pianist from San Antonio is his Concerto for the Piano which was presented in October by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky in Boston and a few days ago by the same orchestra at Carnegie Hall in New York City. The composer was at the piano.

Comments of music critics in both cities praised the composition as "an addition of work and dignity" to the American repertory of piano. H. T. Parker, critic of the Boston Evening Transcript, used more than a column in his minute description of this concerto which was started some three years ago. Portions of his comment follows:

"The first movement of the concerto had body and abundance, motion and elan. The pianistic drumbeat gave it a tang of wilderness; creative ardor deepened it; rhythmic vigors pulsed through it; at the end came full-rounded whole—as though the tonal stage were full set for the variations that were to be focus and heart of music. One or another struck a plaintive, half-exotic, note. Again a native wildness struggled through, only to subdue itself, restless, regretful. Upon one more a great peace descended. All were emanations of the 'Pilgrim Song' from a touched imagination. All were music in which the piano had characterizing part yet woven into the unfolding symphonic texture. In 1931 concerts are still written, even born alive. No thin blood runs in Mr. Morris; none of the hesitating, refuge-seeking temperament that too often dulls American music-making. He speaks out. His audience could not choose but hear."

Downes in Times.

In the New York Times, Olin Downes contributed:

"The concerto is brilliantly written. It is a symphonic conception and the piano part is matched by seas of heavy orchestration. To this rivalry the composer-pianist was thoroughly equal. Mr. Morris played with extreme brilliancy and aplomb. . . The most valuable movement in the sheerly musical sense is, no doubt, the slow movement, a set of variations on a negro pilgrim song. Mr. Morris knows the South and has been subjected to its musical influences. For the rest one is impressed anew by the development of modern harmonic and orchestral technic and also the rapidly advancing technical resources of present-day American composers."

The composer, himself, adds: "I do not believe in leaning entirely on folk music or that it should in any way limit or hamper our modern musical expression; but rather that it should be the basis, as it was with composers of the past."

Career of Morris.

The distinguished musician was born in San Antonio. He holds degrees from the University of Texas and also from the Cincinnati Conservatory of Music, the latter of which presented him with an honorary master of music degree. He has appeared with many prominent orchestras of the country. A list of his compositions includes a symphony, "Poem After Tagore's 'Gitanjali'" variations on "Dem-a Lum," negro spiritual for chamber orchestra; concerto for piano and orchestra, string quartet, piano quintet, piano and violin sonata, rhapsody for piano, violin and violincello; piano sonatas and songs. There have been performances of his music given by the New York Philharmonic Orchestra under Josef Stransky, Los Angeles Philharmonic Society under Walter Henry Rothwell, Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra under Eugene Ysaye, Rochester Philharmonic under Harold Hansen, Pro Arte Quartet, New York String Quartet and Hans Lange Quartet. A trio and string quartet was chosen by the American committee of the International Society of Contemporaneous Music to be entered in the competition abroad.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS TRIBUNE

DEC 5 - 1931

BOSTON SYMPHONY COMING ON TUESDAY

Next Tuesday evening in the Albee theatre at 8:15 the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its second concert of the season in Providence. Dr. Serge Kousseviitzky announces two numbers for the program, consisting of a recent and an old classic. Beethoven's Fourth Symphony in G-major will open the program. This lyric score which some consider to have been inspired by the composer's love for Therese Brunsvik to whom he was engaged at the time, is one of Beethoven's greatest vein. The ting to ny has orchesvember, y Wil-

Korsaart of suite Arab-to the rilliant nt in nota-played mas-Serge of his
of the

H
ULED

For the first time in 27 years, Beethoven's Fourth Symphony in G major is to be presented in Providence, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to the Albee theatre next Tuesday evening. It was last presented here by William Gericke in 1904.

A more modern classic also will be presented in Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade." This symphonic suite, which describes tales from the Aribian Nights, is more familiar to the Providence public, says Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, director, and the first violin solo number will be rendered by Richard Burgin, concert master. The Beethoven symphony, said to have been inspired by the composer's love for Therese Brunswik, is considered one of his greatest works in the romantic vein.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. REVIEW

BEREZOWSKY TWICE IS SOLOIST WITH THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

CBS Violinist Plays His Own Concerto Under Koussevitzky's Baton

Nicolai Berezowsky, first violinist in the permanent symphony orchestra of the Columbia Broadcasting System, was honored by Serge Koussevitzky with an invitation to perform the solo part in his violin concerto when that work was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston yesterday, for the first time in America, and again today.

The young Russian-American composer wrote this concerto in 1929, and it received its first performance in the following year by the Dresden Philharmonic Orchestra, with the composer conducting and Carl Flesch as soloist. Since then it has been played many times abroad.

Berezowsky first became known in this country as a composer when his sextet was given at the Coolidge Festival in Washington in 1926. Willem Mengelberg conducted the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra in his "Hebrew Suite" in 1927, and the League of Composer has presented a number of his works.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
DEC 6 - 1931

Fourth Symphony Calm and Joyous

Offers Contrast of Mood With "Eroica" and Famed "Fifth"

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In the concert-hall enough may be easily be as good as, or even better than, a feast. Many a symphony should be heard alone, as Beethoven's "Eroica" was heard alone in Boston's Symphony Hall when the Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky played that work as a memorial to the late Thomas A. Edison. Never before had the "Eroica" seemed so impressive or been so completely satisfying.

When Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony return to the Albee Theatre next Tuesday evening they will offer there the next in the series of Beethoven's symphonies, the Fourth in B-flat major. And it will be companioned by only one other piece, the symphonic suite "Scheherazade" of Rimsky-Korsakov.

If the tentative and uncharacteristic First Symphony be disregarded, it may be said that the evenly numbered symphonies among Beethoven's nine are less pretentious than those which bear the odd numbers. The fancifully minded might compare them to pleasant valleys between the mountain peaks. Consider this serene and joyous Fourth Symphony between two such heaven-storming works as the "Eroica" and the famous Fifth or the "Pastoral," between the Fifth and the brilliant Seventh, or finally the little Eighth between the Seventh and the epochal Ninth. It is not necessary to prefer the valleys to the summits, nor yet the summits to the valleys; both have their places. And the order of the Beethoven symphonies, whether reasoned and deliberate or, as seems less likely, merely fortuntious, makes of the series a great tonal epic rising gradually and with ingenious contrasts of mood, from a simple beginning to a great and noble climax.

It was Beethoven's frequent habit to work slowly and painstakingly, upon two or more of his major compositions at the same time. He did not scatter symphonies in careless profusion as did his predecessors, Haydn and Mozart. Thus the Fourth Symphony was begun after work upon the Fifth had been started. So far as we know, the Fourth was composed during the summer of 1906 and may fairly be considered a work of its composer's prime. Already the "Eroica" had set Beethoven above all other symphonists as the Well-Tempered Clavichord set Bach above all other writers of fugues. We hear in the Fourth, then, the voice of the mature Beethoven, and if he returns, as he does in each of the movements save the Adagio, to the lighter, gayer manner of Haydn and Mozart, though giving that manner the imprint of his own personality, we must not look upon this as any sort of regression. The varying character of the nine symphonies is but one more proof of the universality of Beethoven's genius.

Twice the Fourth Symphony is grave rather than sportive: in the mysterious introduction to the first Allegro with its subtly beautiful modulations; and in the Adagio, a movement like no other Beethoven wrote, in which a theme that might be made deeply expressive, even passionate, has a sort of Greek serenity imposed upon it through the formal treatment it receives at the composer's hand. The rhythmic figure announced by the second violins one measure before the chief melody enters in the first violins, and which persists throughout the movement, fixes the rigid mold from which the theme cannot escape. To be sure, Berlioz found that this movement generates an emotion which at the end becomes overwhelming in its intensity. But Berlioz was given both to exaggeration and to self-hypnosis where music was concerned, and much water has flowed under musical bridges since he wrote. We no longer find emotional intensity in Beethoven, unless in certain passages in the last sonatas and string quartets.

Another composer who had his say on the Fourth Symphony of Beethoven was Weber. He found in the exuberant Finale an excuse for satire and ridicule, poking especial fun at the furiously fast figures for the double-basses. No doubt when Weber heard the symphony those figures were not executed with the neatness and dispatch with which modern orchestral virtuosi toss them off. When the piece is played by a modern orchestra of the first rank we are not reminded, as once we might have been, of an elephant trying to dance. But one Beethovenish touch in this movement must not be overlooked: the droll effect made by the first bassoon playing the rapid first subject, dolce, against a light string accompaniment. No composer ever sensed better than did old Beethoven the capacity for sly humor latent in the so-called, but mis-called, "clown of the orchestra." Yet no other composer could make the bassoon so telling in a situation of perfect seriousness: witness the high G flat-E natural-F in the seventh and eighth measures of the introduction to this very symphony.

In the 19th century music, given a new lease of life by the romantic movement, set out on several new paths, one of which was to lead to Rimsky-Korsakov's gorgeous tonal commentary on the Arabian Nights. "Schehereazade" was written 82 years after the Fourth Symphony, and Beethoven might not have regarded it as a legitimate product of the art which he himself practiced. With Beethoven form and subjective feeling are everything, and in his so-called "middle period," from which the Fourth Symphony dates, he held the two in perfect equipoise. With Rimsky, in this brilliant suite at least, the goal is pictorial vividness. The music is not formless, to be sure, but its form is hardly more than a sense of order. There is little counterpoint in this suite, little development of theme. But there is a wealth of sensuous melody and of harmonic color, there are rhythms which bite or titillate, and Rimsky's orchestra glows and sparkles in a manner to make Beethoven's orchestration seem drab, almost a monotone. This, however, is not all in the manner of writing; part of it is in the means. To the orchestral forces of Beethoven's symphony Rimsky-Korsakov adds a piccolo, a second flute, an English horn to alternate with the second oboe, a second pair of horns, three trombones, a tuba and a harp, not to mention a snare-drum, a bass drum, tambourine, cymbals, tam tam and triangle.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

C

DEC 5 19[illegible]

Musical Notes

TRIBUTE TO KOUSSEVITZKY

After the recent concerts of the Symphony orchestra in New York, writes the Transcript, Deems Taylor, the composer who is also journalist, wrote in the newspapers to which he sends a syndicate article: "One conclusion these concerts left is inescapable. It is time we realized that Boston has regained its old place in the sun, and has, once more, one of the world's great orchestras. This may seem a fairly obvious statement, but I doubt whether all of us have grasped its truth. During the war, and the succeeding seasons under Mr. Rabaud's hopelessly handicapped leadership, the ruin of the organization was almost complete. Mr. Monteux, who followed him, was a brilliant program-maker and in many respects a fine conductor; but even he was not stern enough drillmaster to overcome the orchestra's demoralization and bring it within measurable distance of its former perfection.

"For nearly a decade, thereafter, we were in the habit of shaking our heads sadly at every mention of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Habits are not easy to break; but we really must get over that one. Mr. Koussevitzky has wrought the miracle that we thought impossible. His orchestra last week played with technical brilliance, tonal beauty, and sensitive response that stamp it as one of the great ones. Karl Muck would have recognized it.

"Which is high praise and which is also another way of saying that Mr. Koussevitzky is a superb conductor. If there were any doubts on that subject, they would have been dispelled by his transparent and exquisitely modeled readings of Debussy's 'Clouds' and 'Fetes' on Thursday evening, and the stunning performance of Ravel's 'Daphnis and Chloe' that was the high point of the program."

86

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
DEC 1 - 1931

DR. CHAPMAN TO LECTURE AT LIBRARY ON SUNDAY

Monday Morning Musical Club Sponsoring Talk on Hub Symphony.

The Monday Morning Musical Club announces the second in the series of free lectures by Dr. W. Louis Chapman, music critic of the Providence Journal, on the programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, to be given Sunday afternoon at 4 o'clock in the Providence Public Library.

Dr. Chapman will speak on the program arranged by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky for next Tuesday's concert, illustrating his lecture at the piano and with other instruments. He will talk on the particular works to be played by the orchestra, taking up the lives of the two composers—Beethoven and Rimsky-Korsakoff—represented on that program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS
DEC 2 1931

The World of Music

Performance of Mahler's Ninth Symphony Causes Discussion of Greatness.

By W. J. HENDERSON

GUSTAVE MAHLER'S ninth symphony reached New York a few nights ago by way of Boston. Serge Koussevitzky, industrious seeker for variety of interest, conducted the Boston Symphony orchestra through a memorable performance of the work. The symphony has the noble merit of being not drawn to such heavenly length as some of the distinguished composer's other works. It has additional merits which may perchance be mentioned with respect. For the moment let us make apology for our existence.

In his always incomparable program notes Philip Hale reprints a letter of Aaron Copland written in 1925 to the New York Times. Mr. Copland is a modernist composer of talent and learning. In his letter he complained that New York critics seemed to be unanimous in the conclusion that as a composer Mahler was quite hopeless.

Mr. Copland did not quarrel with us for what we said so much as for what we left unsaid. He himself admitted a few weaknesses in the composer's art, but felt that the beauties far outweighed them. What has always seemed to this writer to be the basis of local critical regret about Mahler was that he so frequently used trivial themes and so often was prolix and pretentious in his working out. These are two serious faults and, if established, are sufficient to prevent the inclusion of most of Mahler's works in the first rank.

* * *

Mr. Copland held that "Das Lied von der Erde" has in it the "stuff of living music." We grant that heartily. It is not all of the vital kind, but some of it is. Mahler not infrequently attained beauty and eloquence. But this music lover found in him a composer whose visions were much greater than his powers of musical invention or his skill in construction. The things he tried to do in symphonic form sometimes overmastered him and left him prostrate and breathless. Furthermore, he was apparently unable to view his own work with any perspective. Perhaps this accounted for one of his bad habits.

He breakfasted in bed. After the meal he propped himself up and had sheets of score paper spread on his knees. Then he wrote and wrote and wrote till luncheon. No doubt, his mind was in a fine glow throughout the morning. In the language of the street, he was having the time of his life. But he undoubtedly lost all consciousness of the extent of his production, and the fact that he was spreading the butter very thin. He failed to blue pencil his long-winded scores. The thoughts were precious to him. He forgot that the public was not a subject to command, but a disinterested looker-on in Vienna, who had to be won.

Inability to say concisely what they had to say and to perceive the innate worthlessness of certain thematic subjects was what stood in the way of the attainment of their ideals by both Mahler and his admired Bruckner. If there is such a thing as genuine criticism—and this writer believes there is—it is and must always be indifferent to special pleadings. It is not for or against any person. It is for good art and against bad art; and that is its beginning, its end, and its only reason for existence.

* * *

Mahler's was never bad art. It was sincere. The man was striving with all his ability to express his vague conceptions, his undefined, but nonetheless agonizing aspirations. He was not aiming at those superficial effects which quickly gain approval from the ready hands of an audience, yet seldom remain fixed in the minds. But he fell short of pre-eminence in music because he could not attain that perfect amalgamation of matter and form which Walter Pater, with his habitual critical sagacity, declared to be the triumphant differentiation of music from other arts.

Mahler's music should be performed from time to time. To bury it because it is imperfect would be to deprive concertgoers of some interesting hours. For the same reason Bruckner should be heard. There is sufficient loftiness of idea and felicity of expression in the scores of both composers to make us willing to plod through the dusty paths of the barren places. Both men had their moments when they saw the promised land. But the vision was almost always obscure.

* * *

Erich Kleiber lays down the baton of the Philharmonic-Symphony society, which is now to be taken up by the illustrious Arturo Toscanini. Mr. Kleiber will return to Germany whence he came trailing garments of glory. He carries with him the good wishes of music lovers and their players for a long and refreshing rest in his native land.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
CHRONICLE
DEC 2 - 1931

First American performances of Mahler's Ninth Symphony were given this fall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS
DEC 2 1931

at the school libra Pupils of Miss Bessie Keller, physi education teacher, and Miss R
Curtis, music teacher, will be p sented, and Dr. David Lefkowitz speak on reading, with special ref ence to children.

◆

The Westminster Sewing Circle
Oak Cliff Presbyterian Church meet at 9:30 a. m. Friday at church. Members will sew pill cases for the Presbyterian orphana Scraps for making quilts will be c lected Friday.

◆

The Mount Auburn Parent-Teac
Association will have a radio show
7:30 p. m. Friday at the school in c nection with a bazar and sale candies. Mrs. J. A. Glidewell, pr dent, is in charge.

◆

Mrs. Roscoe Bates will give a b review Wednesday at 2:30 p. m. at home of Mrs. E. L. Woodley, 3216 C lon avenue, for the benefit of the f clinic of the Dallas Methodist H pital.

◆

The Gold Star Mothers' Club meet Thursday at 10 a. m. at the ho of Mrs. J. R. Pickle, 432 Sunset a nue, for an all day session. Comfort for the needy will be made.

Bo

Pian terest been b by a membe School latest s anist f certo f sented phony vitzky by the Hall in poser w Comm cities p addition Americ
Parker, Transcr in his n certo w years a follows:
"The certo ha tion an beat ga
ative ardor deepened it; rhythmic vigors pulsed through it; at the end came full-rounded whole—as though the tonal stage were full set for the variations that were to be focus and heart of music. One or another struck a plaintive, half-exotic, note. Again a native wildness struggled through, only to subdue itself, restless, regretful. Upon one more a great peace descended. All were emanations of the 'Pilgrim Song' from a touched imagination. All were music in which the piano had characterizing part yet woven into the unfolding symphonic texture. In 1931 concerts are still written, even born alive. No thin blood runs in Mr. Morris; none of the hesitating, refuge-seeking temperament that too often dulls American music-making. He speaks out. His audience could not choose but hear."

Downes in Times.

In the New York Times, Olin Downes contributed:

"The concerto is brilliantly written. It is a symphonic conception and the piano part is matched by seas of heavy orchestration. To this rivalry the composer-pianist was thoroughly equal. Mr. Morris played with extreme brilliancy and aplomb. . . The most valuable movement in the sheerly musical sense is, no doubt, the slow movement, a set of variations on a negro pilgrim song. Mr. Morris knows the South and has been subjected to its musical influences. For the rest one is impressed anew by the development of modern harmonic and orchestral technic and also the rapidly advancing technical resources of present-day American composers."

The composer, himself, adds: "I do not believe in leaning entirely on folk music or that it should in any way limit or hamper our modern musical expression; but rather that it should be the basis, as it was with composers of the past."

Career of Morris.

The distinguished musician was born in San Antonio. He holds degrees from the University of Texas and also from the Cincinnati Conservatory of Music, the latter of which presented him with an honorary master of music degree. He has appeared with many prominent orchestras of the country. A list of his compositions includes a symphony, "Poem After Tagore's 'Gitanjali'" variations on "Dem-a Lum," negro spiritual for chamber orchestra; concerto for piano and orchestra, string quartet, piano quintet, piano and violin sonata, rhapsody for piano, violin and violincello; piano sonatas and songs. There have been performances of his music given by the New York Philharmonic Orchestra under Josef Stransky, Los Angeles Philharmonic Society under Walter Henry Rothwell, Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra under Eugene Ysaye, Rochester Philharmonic under Harold Hansen, Pro Arte Quartet, New York String Quartet and Hans Lange Quartet. A trio and string quartet was chosen by the American committee of the International Society of Contemporaneous Music to be entered in the competition abroad.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS TRIBUNE
DEC 5 - 1931

BOSTON SYMPHONY COMING ON TUESDAY

Next Tuesday evening in the Albee theatre at 8:15 the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its second concert of the season in Providence. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky announces two numbers for the program, consisting of a recent and an old classic. Beethoven's Fourth Symphony in G-major will open the program. This lyric score which some consider to have been inspired by the composer's love for Therese Brunsvik to whom he was engaged at the time, is one of Beethoven's greatest works in the romantic vein. The performance will be interesting to many here in that the Symphony has not been performed by this orchestra in Providence since November, 1904, when it was presented by Wilhelm Gericke.

"Scheherazade," by Rimsky-Korsakov, will occupy the latter part of the program. This symphonic suite which describes tales from the Arabian Nights, is more familiar to the Providence public. In this brilliant score every leading instrument in the orchestra has a solo part, notably the first violin, which is played by Richard Burgin, the concert master. The interpretation by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky of this music of his own people is considered one of the finest of his career.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
DEC 5 - 1931

BEETHOVEN'S FOURTH SYMPHONY SCHEDULED

For the first time in 27 years, Beethoven's Fourth Symphony in G major is to be presented in Providence, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to the Albee theatre next Tuesday evening. It was last presented here by William Gericke in 1904.

A more modern classic also will be presented in Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade." This symphonic suite, which describes tales from the Aribian Nights, is more familiar to the Providence public, says Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, director, and the first violin solo number will be rendered by Richard Burgin, concert master. The Beethoven symphony, said to have been inspired by the composer's love for Therese Brunswik, is considered one of his greatest works in the romantic vein.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. REVIEW

BEREZOWSKY TWICE IS SOLOIST WITH THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

CBS Violinist Plays His Own Concerto Under Koussevitzky's Baton

Nicolai Berezowsky, first violinist in the permanent symphony orchestra of the Columbia Broadcasting System, was honored by Serge Koussevitzky with an invitation to perform the solo part in his violin concerto when that work was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston yesterday, for the first time in America, and again today.

The young Russian-American composer wrote this concerto in 1929, and it received its first performance in the following year by the Dresden Philharmonic Orchestra, with the composer conducting and Carl Flesch as soloist. Since then it has been played many times abroad.

Berezowsky first became known in this country as a composer when his sextet was given at the Coolidge Festival in Washington in 1926. Willem Mengelberg conducted the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra in his "Hebrew Suite" in 1927, and the League of Composer has presented a number of his works.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
DEC 6 _ 1931

Fourth Symphony Calm and Joyous

Offers Contrast of Mood With "Eroica" and Famed "Fifth"

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In the concert-hall enough may be easily be as good as, or even better than, a feast. Many a symphony should be heard alone, as Beethoven's "Eroica" was heard alone in Boston's Symphony Hall when the Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky played that work as a memorial to the late Thomas A. Edison. Never before had the "Eroica" seemed so impressive or been so completely satisfying.

When Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony return to the Albee Theatre next Tuesday evening they will offer there the next in the series of Beethoven's symphonies, the Fourth, in B-flat major. And it will be companioned by only one other piece, the symphonic suite "Scheherazade" of Rimsky-Korsakov.

If the tentative and uncharacteristic First Symphony be disregarded, it may be said that the evenly numbered symphonies among Beethoven's nine are less pretentious than those which bear the odd numbers. The fancifully minded might compare them to pleasant valleys between the mountain peaks. Consider this serene and joyous Fourth Symphony between two such heaven-storming works as the "Eroica" and the famous Fifth or the "Pastoral," between the Fifth and the brilliant Seventh, or finally the little Eighth between the Seventh and the epochal Ninth. It is not necessary to prefer the valleys to the summits, nor yet the summits to the valleys; both have their places. And the order of the Beethoven symphonies, whether reasoned and deliberate or, as seems less likely, merely fortuntious, makes of the series a great tonal epic rising gradually and with ingenious contrasts of mood, from a simple beginning to a great and noble climax.

It was Beethoven's frequent habit to work slowly and painstakingly, upon two or more of his major compositions at the same time. He did not scatter symphonies in careless profusion as did his predecessors, Haydn and Mozart. Thus the Fourth Symphony was begun after work upon the Fifth had been started. So far as we know, the Fourth was composed during the summer of 1906 and may fairly be considered a work of its composer's prime. Already the "Eroica" had set Beethoven above all other symphonists as the Well-Tempered Clavichord set Bach above all other writers of fugues. We hear in the Fourth, then, the voice of the mature Beethoven, and if he returns, as he does in each of the movements save the Adagio, to the lighter, gayer manner of Haydn and Mozart, though giving that manner the imprint of his own personality, we must not look upon this as any sort of regression. The varying character of the nine symphonies is but one more proof of the universality of Beethoven's genius.

Twice the Fourth Symphony is grave rather than sportive: in the mysterious introduction to the first Allegro with its subtly beautiful modulations; and in the Adagio, a movement like no other Beethoven wrote, in which a theme that might be made deeply expressive, even passionate, has a sort of Greek serenity imposed upon it through the formal treatment it receives at the composer's hand. The rhythmic figure announced by the second violins one measure before the chief melody enters in the first violins, and which persists throughout the movement, fixes the rigid mold from which the theme cannot escape. To be sure, Berlioz found that this movement generates an emotion which at the end becomes overwhelming in its intensity. But Berlioz was given both to exaggeration and to self-hypnosis where music was concerned, and much water has flowed under musical bridges since he wrote. We no longer find emotional intensity in Beethoven, unless in certain passages in the last sonatas and string quartets.

Another composer who had his say on the Fourth Symphony of Beethoven was Weber. He found in the exuberant Finale an excuse for satire and ridicule, poking especial fun at the furiously fast figures for the double-basses. No doubt when Weber heard the symphony those figures were not executed with the neatness and dispatch with which modern orchestral virtuosi toss them off. When the piece is played by a modern orchestra of the first rank we are not reminded, as once we might have been, of an elephant trying to dance. But one Beethovenish touch in this movement must not be overlooked: the droll effect made by the first bassoon playing the rapid first subject, dolce, against a light string accompaniment. No composer ever sensed better than did old Beethoven the capacity for sly humor latent in the so-called, but mis-called, "clown of the orchestra." Yet no other composer could make the bassoon so telling in a situation of perfect seriousness: witness the high G flat-E natural-F in the seventh and eighth measures of the introduction to this very symphony.

In the 19th century music, given a new lease of life by the romantic movement, set out on several new paths, one of which was to lead to Rimsky-Korsakov's gorgeous tonal commentary on the Arabian Nights. "Schehereazade" was written 82 years after the Fourth Symphony, and Beethoven might not have regarded it as a legitimate product of the art which he himself practiced. With Beethoven form and subjective feeling are everything, and in his so-called "middle period," from which the Fourth Symphony dates, he held the two in perfect equipoise. With Rimsky, in this brilliant suite at least, the goal is pictorial vividness. The music is not formless, to be sure, but its form is hardly more than a sense of order. There is little counterpoint in this suite, little development of theme. But there is a wealth of sensuous melody and of harmonic color, there are rhythms which bite or titillate, and Rimsky's orchestra glows and sparkles in a manner to make Beethoven's orchestration seem drab, almost a monotony. This, however, is not all in the manner of writing; part of it is in the means. To the orchestral forces of Beethoven's symphony Rimsky-Korsakov adds a piccolo, a second flute, an English horn to alternate with the second oboe, a second pair of horns, three trombones, a tuba and a harp, not to mention a snare-drum, a bass-drum, tambourine, cymbals, tam-tam and triangle.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

c

DEC 5 1931

Musical Notes

TRIBUTE TO KOUSSEVITZKY

After the recent concerts of the Symphony orchestra in New York, writes the Transcript, Deems Taylor, the composer who is also journalist, wrote in the newspapers to which he sends a syndicate article: "One conclusion these concerts left is inescapable. It is time we realized that Boston has regained its old place in the sun, and has, once more, one of the world's great orchestras. This may seem a fairly obvious statement, but I doubt whether all of us have grasped its truth. During the war, and the succeeding seasons under Mr. Rabaud's hopelessly handicapped leadership, the ruin of the organization was almost complete. Mr. Monteux, who followed him, was a brilliant program-maker and in many respects a fine conductor; but even he was not stern enough drillmaster to overcome the orchestra's demoralization and bring it within measurable distance of its former perfection.

"For nearly a decade, thereafter, we were in the habit of shaking our heads sadly at every mention of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Habits are not easy to break; but we really must get over that one. Mr. Koussevitzky has wrought the miracle that we thought impossible. His orchestra last week played with technical brilliance, tonal beauty, and sensitive response that stamp it as one of the great ones. Karl Muck would have recognized it.

"Which is high praise and which is also another way of saying that Mr. Koussevitzky is a superb conductor. If there were any doubts on that subject, they would have been dispelled by his transparent and exquisitely modeled readings of Debussy's 'Clouds' and 'Fetes' on Thursday evening, and the stunning performance of Ravel's 'Daphnis and Chloe' that was the high point of the program."

87

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

DEC 6 1931

At the next Friday and Saturday concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston, Mary Garden will appear as soprano soloist in Debussy's "La Demoiselle Elue." For this infrequently performed setting of a lyric poem, derived from Rosetti's "Blessed Damosel," the orchestra will be assisted by the Radcliffe Choral Society under G. W. Woodworth. Marie Murray will sing the contralto solos. The rest of the program will include Wagner's "Faust Overture" and Strauss's "Don Quixote" introduction, theme with variations, and finale, for which Jean Redetti will play the 'cello solo and Jean Lefranc the viola solo.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
EXAMINER

EC 7 - 1931

Words and Music

By Deems Taylor

THE Boston Symphony began its season New York recently, playing twice. O conclusion these concerts left that is in capable: It is time we realized that Bost has regained her old place in the sun, a has, once more, one of the world's gre orchestras.

This may seem like a fairly obvious stat ment, but I doubt whether all of us hav grasped its truth. During the war, and th succeeeding seasons under Rabaud's hop lessly handicaped leadership, the ruin of th organization was almost complete. Mon teux, who followed him, was a brilliant pro gram maker and in many respects a fin conductor; but even he was not a stern enough drillmaster to overcome the orchestra's demoralization and bring it within measurable distance of its former perfection.

For nearly a decade, therefore, we were in the habit of shaking our heads sadly at every mention of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and muttering, "Dear, dear! What a great orchestra that used to be. How sad!" Habits are not easy to break; but we really must get over that one. Koussevitzky has wrought the miracle that we thought impossible. His orchestra plays with technical brilliance, tonal beauty and sensitive response that stamp it as one of the great ones. Karl Muck would have recognized it. Which is high praise.

Which is also another way of saying that Koussevitzky is a superb conductor. If there were any doubts on that subject, they would have been dispelled by his transparent and exquisitely modeled readings of the Debussy Nuages and Fetes on a recent evening, and the stunning performance of Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" that was the high point of the program.

* * *

THE evening was also marked by a first performance in New York of Mahler's Ninth Symphony. In it are all the characteristics that have made Mahler a bone of contention in the world's musical kennels. There is no question of the genuine merit of many of Mahler's musical ideas, nor even of their occasional loftiness and nobility. Nor, on the other hand, will even his most convinced apostles deny that his work is flawed by a considerable alloy of commonplace and downright triviality, whatever the pretentiousness of his methods.

But the thing that handicaps Mahler most heavily is his incorrigible long-windedness. Time and again he reaches a point where, having proved his musical point up to the hilt, he is obviously about to stop. Whereupon, like an orator fascinated by his own eloquence, he says: "And twelfthly, my dear friends—" and begins all over again. The Ninth Symphony, as he wrote it, lasts a few minutes short of an hour. Prune it down until nothing is left save Mahler's musical ideas and the amount of development that they are worth, and the Ninth Symphony would last about twenty minutes.

Some day, some real friend of Mahler's will do just that—take a pruning knife and reduce his works to the length that they would have been if the composer had not stretched them out of shape; and then the great Mahler war will be over.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. JOURNAL

DEC 9 - 1931

KOUSSEVITZKY TO HONOR D'INDY

In memory of Vincent d'Indy, Serge Koussevitzky will change the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston on Friday and Saturday and play the "Istar" variations. Debussy's "Blessed Damozel," with the Radcliffe Choral Society and Mary Garden, and Strauss' "Don Quixote" are additional numbers.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

DEC 7 - 1931

IN TERMS OF MUSIC, Comment in Season

Koussevitzky Contrasts Absolute Music by Beethoven with Rimsky-Korsakov's Story-Telling Tomorrow. Dr. Chapman Discusses the Symphony Program

With the graces of Corelli, the sonorities of Rachmaninoff, and the mysteries of Ravel still fresh in mind, one turns to a program of two symphonies to be played tomorrow evening at the Albee Theatre by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In the Fourth Symphony of Beethoven we have pure musical expression teaching no particular lesson, and adorning no tale. It is beautiful music for music's own sake, meaning the most to those who know it best. But in the "Arabian Night's Tale" or "Scheherazade" of Rimsky Korsakov of three-quarters of a century later there is a direct appeal to the imagination, with opportunities to associate a story directly with the music.

Of all the nine symphonies of Beethoven, the Fourth is the least often played, and for that reason we are less familiar with it than we should be, but many features of it are beautiful and entrancing. For example, take the beginning, which is very different in character from most of the Beethoven symphonies in that it begins softly and with subtle expression rather than with commanding declamation. The very soft and mysterious may command attention if invested with appropriate colors and shades. And there is no more effective figure in all music than the full orchestra in massive softness.

The violins delicately announce a simple episode reinforced by the basoon, for which one must listen intently. After slight variants and intriguing hesitations, the orchestra enters the graceful rollickings of a vivacious "Allegro." Strongly accentuated yet straightforward in line and intent, it is a cheerful symphony without undue seriousness. Beethoven evolves this march like episode through various keys in a fascinating "working out," manoeuvering his orchestral forces with ease and simple grace.

"Adagio" Unostentatious

The "Adagio" is of unostentatious, effortless material, announced by the first violins and later repeated with ornamental figures by the flutes and other wood wind. The clarinet appears in a singing counter-theme assisted by delicate ornament. This restful and ocntemplative adagio is a marked contrast with the "Vivace" which soon interrupts the poetic musings. It is reminiscent of the "Scherzo" of the Fifth Symphony and of the finale to the "Emperor Concerto" of Beethoven for piano and orchestra. The "Trio" following resumes the thoughtful mood only to yield soon to the restlessness of the "Allegro."

The "Finale" consists in the elaboration of a whirlwind violin figures punctuated with delightful secondary themes in the wood wind. Strings must be fluent and supple to give this movement its true meaning.

The "program" of a musical composition has become a recognized and integral factor in the music of our present time. Too often it is employed to add to the interest of a none too worthy work in which the program means more than the music.

This does not in any way apply to Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade." It is inevitable, however, that one would be prejudiced in favor of such a work forthe influence of our childhood impressions of the fascinating "Thousand an One Nights" is as inescapable as the imprint of the fabulous wealth of "Monte Cristo," or the gold doubloons of pirate stories. It is interesting to peer into the mechanism whereby the composer brings these ideas of the sea, the shipwreck, the prince, dance and the atmosphere of Orientalism into music.

Orchestral Coloration

Orchestral coloration is less well understood than that of pictorial art because we do not hear it as often as we see everyday employment of pigments. In this, one of the most beautiful compositions of the past half-century, orchestral richness is employed with a novelty and ingenuity that is arresting.

After an introduction in unison (and here the conductor employs one of the most telling and simple methods of tone impression) the wood wind is heard in sustained chords resembling the introduction to Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream." The addition of the French horn to the wood wind heightens the effect. A violin cadenza accompanied by the harp introduces what proves to be the theme song of the next section, and this is heard sometimes by this or that solo instrument, sometimes tossed about by them, sometimes by the full orchestra. Alternating with the "sea motive" of massive chords in ever changing keys, it captures the attention and holds it securely until the violin reenters with its former cadenza which it seems reluctant to leave.

Those who have been led to believe that the bassoon is an instrument of comic humor will do well to note the oriental and conversational character of the "andantino" by the solo bassoon accompanied by four string basses muted. Rarely does any composer ask that the basses be muted. Too often are the basses too little in evidence and their voice feeble. This fascinating theme is soon assumed by the oboe only to be passed on to the full string choir which alternates with the entire ensemble of wood wind. This movement suggests story telling, conversational moods and languorous repose suddenly interrupted by the noisy entrance of trombones and trumpets in a barbaric fanfare. The tale becomes more dramatic and impassioned, suggesting the entrance of dancers for entertainment. These figures for the brass have been adapted and adopted by many recent "composers".

Third Movement

The third movement is a flowing romanza into which the English horn enters for the first time. Graceful, songful and of charming continuity, its connected thought is interrupted only by sweeping scale passages by flute, clarinet and strings and in bravura of the most refined and elegant type. Sweeping glissandi of the harp with flute chromatics (in the unusual combination of 20 against 11 or 15 or 23 against 14 notes) tell us something of the way in which this great composer accomplishes his effects. They are so extraordinary that it is small wonder that his ideas have been so liberally appropriated.

The last movement suggests the wreck of Sinbad's ship. Marked rhythm and whirlwind speed depict the orgy of the elements, a thunderous orchestral crash marks the shipwreck: the tempest stills in harmonics of the strings and harps and the sea and wave motifs of the first movement reappear. Again the beautiful violin is heard against the diminishing chords of the harp and high harmonics of the solo violin supported by the softest possible wood wind breathe a restful peace.

It is not difficult to see why the "Scherazade" found instant favor with audiences and why its popularity has continued undiminished. Indeed it has proved to be a treasury from which composers of high and low degree have taken thematic material and musical episodes without stint or acknewledgement. Figures from this captivating work are very frequently heard in jazz and in the many atrocities of our time to which they add a saving grace. The almost new method of bravura passages for solo instruments, a method of composition which had not been exploited before this time, is now acknowledged and practised until it is almost a pest. The leading figures of the work itself have been travestied and jazzed to millions of hearers.

DR. W. LOUIS CHAPMAN.

CANTATA PRESENTED

"The Dayspring", a sacred cantata written by J. Sebastian Matthews, organist at Grace Church, was sung by the regular choir and soloists at the church last night. It was the first presentation anywhere of this work, which is particularly appropriate to the Christmas season. In it, Mr. Matthews has assembled hymns, solos and choruses, all set to an organ accompaniment which is a testimony to his gifts in composition.

Suitable writing for the organ with voice is a difficult art and not often does one find a work like this in which there are commendable balance, dynamic strength which does not obtrude, richness of registration and sufficient adherence to the fundamental rules of harmony and counterpoint to give musical unity without being pedantic and overscholastic.

This cantata breathes freshness and spiritual vigor, the occasional interposition of the chorale—that matchless figure of music peculiar to religious song—and the employment of the descant in the final hymn giving a musical contrast with the decisive choruses and beautiful solos which makes for a variety of color and interest. The composer himself presided at the organ with great skill and convincing religious interpretation.

Before the service, an excellent recital was given at the organs by the assistant organist, Miss Grace Regester.

Besides this work, during the 15 years Mr. Matthews has been at Grace Church, he has also written three cantatas, a number of church anthems, various songs and a Christmas oratorio with accompaniment for orchestra and organ which has been performed by many churches in New York and elsewhere.

DR. W. LOUIS CHAPMAN.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
DEC 9 - 1931

IN IERMS OF MUSIC, Comment in Season

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Second Concert of Series With Dr. Koussevitzky Conducting.—Beethoven's Fourth and "Scheherazade" Provide Contrasts

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. erge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the ond of its concert series last night at e Albee Theatre. As usual with the concerts of this orchestra, the theatre was filled and there were many standing.

Two symphonies of widely divergent style but of absorbing interest were played—the Fourth Symphony of Beethoven and "Scheherazade" of Rimsky-Korsakov. The entire program was pervaded by a cheerful lilt and sprightliness. In none of Beethoven's symphonies is there more romantic glow than in this "fourth;" and the poesy and rhapsodic romanticism in the story of "Sindbad" is in evidence throughout. Even the "Adagio" of the Beethoven symphony shares in this absence of the serious and the austere—and adagios are not infrequently scholastic and pedantic.

This concert gave innumerable opportunities for the refinement of orchestral expression. The opening pages of the Beethoven Fourth Symphony showed the superb qualities of the incomparable string section of this famous orchestra. Beautiful tonal mass in finest pianissimo requires unusual technique and personnel, as do unity and perfection of ensemble as was shown in rapid floritura.

This virtuosity of strings, however, is not confined to violins and violas, for it should be known that under the progressive instruction of Dr. Koussevitzky, the 'cellos and string bases have arrived at a proficiency quite unusual in the history of symphony orchestras. So remarkable is the artistry of these less agile instruments that other conductors and orchestras have taken pause and example in notable degree to their great advantage and improvement. No longer may the "double basses" be feeble or sluggish in this orchestra; they are now as flexible and as fluent of articulation as the other strings, a thing that comes only from long study and frequent performance. Not only are the string basses nimble, they are also of fine rich musical quality, a thing that cannot come except from fine artists and not from "factory fiddles." The Boston Symphony Orchestra is a veritable museum of the finest old stringed instruments.

The Fourth Symphony of Beethoven was performed with an artistic reserve and a devotion befitting its classic character. Its romantic nuances were not overurged, its natural rhythm was not overaccentuated, its solo voices were subdued and graceful. Of dainty rather than of heroic proportions, the work has that substantial character always found in Beethoven, to which Dr. Koussevitzky gave less vigorous treatment than is often heard, and quite properly, for its intent is less assertive than that of any other symphony of Beethoven. The unity of the strings was absolute and the all too short work left an impression of melodic grace, delicate contrapuntal weavings and charming reminiscences of the sonata form of musical composition in its perfection. The orchestra was at one with the conductor in this lucid and refined interpretation.

The "Scheherazade" symphony of Rimsky-Korsakov is of widely different character. Its "program" is set forth in the program books and need not be repeated here. Its thematic material is highly original and novel. Indeed the various solo instruments seem to take on personality and their speech individual voices.

In this wise recollection turns to the beautiful solo work of the concertmaster whose exqusite and pellucid playing of the numerous narrative cadenzas in the "Scheherazade" was notably effective. Only a very great artist and magnificent "Strad" could pronounce the solo parts we so often hear at these concerts and evoke the telling harmonics "in alt" heard in the final pages of this present performance. The composer did not need to append "espressivo" to these solo passages, for Mr. Burgin would have played them with consummate artistic expression without special direction.

In the romanza-like "Andantino" the soarings of violins, flute and clarinet were to be remembered for their brilliant speech. In the large literature of the orchestra there is hardly a passage comparable with these scintillating scales, accompanied by sweeping glissandi of the harp or the closing pages of the work with its continued violin harmonic far above the orchestra which recounts the beauties of the "sea theme." For novelty of orchestration no other work compares with this save Rimsky Korsakov's own "Spanish Caprice."

Tribute of appreciation must be paid to Mr. Laus, whose bassoon was splendid in its reedy richness. It is to be wondered why other composers have so seldom availed themselves of the voice of this dignified and effective baritone reed instrument. It has evidently remained for the great Russian composers Tschaikowsky and Rimsky-Korsakov to appreciate the possibilities of the bassoon, in solo parts, to our great advantage and delight.

With the entrance of the English horn in the "Andantino," Mr. Speyer gave another delightful voice to the wood wind choir and Mr. Bedetti frequently added glowing color to this beautiful reed instrument in imitation and unison figures. At the hands of these superb artists, the combination of cor anglais and 'cello is of wondrous and appealing beauty.

Of the numerous times we have heard this entrancing composition it has never seemed so fascinating nor has the reading been so completely faithful and satisfying as that of Dr. Koussevitsky and his men last night. Never before was the orchestra so respectfully subordinate to the solo voices, the presentation so thoroughly consonance with the score, the countless variations of tempos so faithfully observed or the soloists so eloquent in tonal beauty.

The audience was keenly alive to the musical importance of the occasion and after each symphony recalled the conductor and orchestra with enthusiasm.

PROGRAM

Beethoven...Symphony No. 4 in B-flat major, Op. 60

1. Adagio; Allegro vivace.
2. Adagio.
3. Allegro vivace. Trio. Un poco meno allegro.
4. Finale: Allegro, ma non troppo.

Rimsky-Korsakov..........Symphonic Suite. "Scheherazade" (after "The Thousand Nights and a Night"), Op. 35

1. The Sea and Sindbad's Ship.
2. The Story of the Kalandar Prince.
3. The Young Prince and the Young Princess.
4. Festival at Baghdad. The Sea. The Ship goes to Pieces on a Rock surmounted by a Bronze Warrior. Conclusion.

DR. W. LOUIS CHAPMAN.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS TRIBUNE

DEC 9 - 1931

-:- MUSIC -:-

ROMANTIC AND FANTASTIC

In saying what we have to say about the concert of the Boston Symphony last night, we think it best to say first what was regrettable in it. The programme itself was a little disconcerting, consisting as it did of Beethoven's Fourth Symphony and the "Scheherazade" suite by Rimsky-Korsakov. Few lovers of music would argue that this presentation plunged into the profoundities of musical intelligence. Nor was the evening helped out by putting the symphony first on the programme.

Dr. Koussevitzky is so accomplished a musician and a magician that we expected him to show why the Fourth Symphony is worthy of a place among the immortal nine. But he did not fulfill our expectations, perhaps because they can never be fulfilled. This symphony, to our mind, represents something like a quiet valley between high peaks, something wherein the great Beethoven took a rest from his genius while not altogether forgetting it. And it seemed to us also that Dr. Koussevitzky last night took a rest from his own genius in playing it without entirely forgetting himself.

It was quite a different story when the "Scheherazade" began. This suite is, of course, not music that answers either the tragic or romantic queries of the modern world; it challenges only our capacity to enjoy the fantastic. Dr. Koussevitzky directed, and his comrades played, in the very spirit of childlike imagination. They recreated the immortal truths in the Arabian Nights with as much assurance as Rimsky himself recreated them. And because all of us like once in a while to recover the loveliness of our first contact with the reality of a wholly fantastic sphere of activity, we applauded heartily last night when Mr. Koussevitzky and his men—notably the masters of the woodwind among them—brought us back the illusions of other days.

87

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

DEC 6 1931

At the next Friday and Saturday concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston, Mary Garden will appear as soprano soloist in Debussy's "La Demoiselle Elue." For this infrequently performed setting of a lyric poem, derived from Rosetti's "Blessed Damosel," the orchestra will be assisted by the Radcliffe Choral Society under G. W. Woodworth. Marie Murray will sing the contralto solos. The rest of the program will include Wagner's "Faust Overture" and Strauss's "Don Quixote" introduction, theme with variations, and finale, for which Jean Redetti will play the 'cello solo and Jean Lefranc the viola solo.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
EXAMINER

DEC 7 - 1931

Words and Music

By Deems Taylor

THE Boston Symphony began its season in New York recently, playing twice. One conclusion these concerts left that is inescapable: It is time we realized that Boston has regained her old place in the sun, and has, once more, one of the world's great orchestras.

This may seem like a fairly obvious statement, but I doubt whether all of us have grasped its truth. During the war, and the succeeeding seasons under Rabaud's hopelessly handicaped leadership, the ruin of the organization was almost complete. Monteux, who followed him, was a brilliant program maker and in many respects a fine conductor; but even he was not a stern enough drillmaster to overcome the orchestra's demoralization and bring it within measurable distance of its former perfection.

For nearly a decade, therefore, we were in the habit of shaking our heads sadly at every mention of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and muttering, "Dear, dear! What a great orchestra that used to be. How sad!" Habits are not easy to break; but we really must get over that one. Koussevitzky has wrought the miracle that we thought impossible. His orchestra plays with technical brilliance, tonal beauty and sensitive response that stamp it as one of the great ones. Karl Muck would have recognized it. Which is high praise.

Which is also another way of saying that Koussevitzky is a superb conductor. If there were any doubts on that subject, they would have been dispelled by his transparent and exquisitely modeled readings of the Debussy Nuages and Fetes on a recent evening, and the stunning performance of Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" that was the high point of the program.

* * *

THE evening was also marked by a first performance in New York of Mahler's Ninth Symphony. In it are all the characteristics that have made Mahler a bone of contention in the world's musical kennels. There is no question of the genuine merit of many of Mahler's musical ideas, nor even of their occasional loftiness and nobility. Nor, on the other hand, will even his most convinced apostles deny that his work is flawed by a considerable alloy of commonplace and downright triviality, whatever the pretentiousness of his methods.

But the thing that handicaps Mahler most heavily is his incorrigible long-windedness. Time and again he reaches a point where, having proved his musical point up to the hilt, he is obviously about to stop. Whereupon, like an orator fascinated by his own eloquence, he says: "And twelfthly, my dear friends—" and begins all over again. The Ninth Symphony, as he wrote it, lasts a few minutes short of an hour. Prune it down until nothing is left save Mahler's musical ideas and the amount of development that they are worth, and the Ninth Symphony would last about twenty minutes.

Some day, some real friend of Mahler's will do just that—take a pruning knife and reduce his works to the length that they would have been if the composer had not stretched them out of shape; and then the great Mahler war will be over.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. JOURNAL

DEC 9 - 1931

KOUSSEVITZKY TO HONOR D'INDY

In memory of Vincent d'Indy, Serge Koussevitzky will change the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston on Friday and Saturday and play the "Istar" variations. Debussy's "Blessed Damozel," with the Radcliffe Choral Society and Mary Garden, and Strauss' "Don Quixote" are additional numbers.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

DEC 7 - 1931

TERMS OF MUSIC, Comment in Season

[illegible]vitzky Contrasts Absolute Music by Beethoven [illegible] Rimsky-Korsakov's Story-Telling Tomorrow. [illegible]. Chapman Discusses the Symphony Program

[illegible] graces of Corelli, the sonori[illegible]maninoff, and the mysteries [illegible]ll fresh in mind, one turns [illegible]m of two symphonies to be [illegible]rrow evening at the Albee [illegible] the Boston Symphony Or-

[illegible]rth Symphony of Beethoven [illegible] musical expression teach[illegible]cular lesson, and adorning [illegible]s beautiful music for mu[illegible]ke, meaning the most to [illegible]now it best. But in the [illegible]ht's Tale" or "Schehera[illegible]msky Korsakov of three[illegible] century later there is a [illegible] to the imagination, with [illegible] to associate a story di[illegible]e music.

[illegible] nine symphonies of Bee[illegible] Fourth is the least often [illegible]or that reason we are less [illegible] it than we should be, but [illegible]s of it are beautiful and [illegible] For example, take the be[illegible]h is very different in char[illegible]ost of the Beethoven sym[illegible]at it begins softly and with [illegible]sion rather than with com[illegible]lamation. The very soft and [illegible]may command attention if [illegible]th appropriate colors and [illegible] there is no more effective [illegible]ll music than the full or[illegible]massive softness.

[illegible]s delicately announce a sim[illegible]reinforced by the basoon, for [illegible]must listen intently. After [illegible]nts and intriguing hesita[illegible]orchestra enters the graceful [illegible] of a vivacious "Allegro." [illegible]centuated yet straightforward [illegible] intent, it is a cheerful sym[illegible]out undue seriousness. Bee[illegible]lves this march like episode [illegible]arious keys in a fascinating [illegible]ut," manoeuvering his orches[illegible] with ease and simple grace.

[illegible]dagio" Unostentatious

[illegible]agio" is of unostentatious, ef[illegible] material, announced by the first [illegible] later repeated with ornamen[illegible] by the flutes and other wood [illegible] The clarinet appears in a sing[illegible]ter-theme assisted by delicate [illegible] This restful and ocntempla[illegible]io is a marked contrast with [illegible]ce" which soon interrupts the [illegible] musings. It is reminiscent of the "Scherzo" of the Fifth Symphony and of the finale to the "Emperor Concerto" of Beethoven for piano and orchestra. The "Trio" following resumes the thoughtful mood only to yield soon to the restlessness of the "Allegro."

The "Finale" consists in the elaboration of a whirlwind violin figures punctuated with delightful secondary themes in the wood wind. Strings must be fluent and supple to give this movement its true meaning.

The "program" of a musical composition has become a recognized and integral factor in the music of our present time. Too often it is employed to add to the interest of a none too worthy work in which the program means more than the music.

This does not in any way apply to Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade." It is inevitable, however, that one would be prejudiced in favor of such a work for the influence of our childhood impressions of the fascinating "Thousand an One Nights" is as inescapable as the imprint of the fabulous wealth of "Monte Cristo," or the gold doubloons of pirate stories. It is interesting to peer into the mechanism whereby the composer brings these ideas of the sea, the shipwreck, the prince, dance and the atmosphere of Orientalism into music.

Orchestral Coloration

Orchestral coloration is less well understood than that of pictorial art because we do not hear it as often as we see everyday employment of pigments. In this, one of the most beautiful compositions of the past half-century, orchestral richness is employed with a novelty and ingenuity that is arresting.

After an introduction in unison (and here the conductor employs one of the most telling and simple methods of tone impression) the wood wind is heard in sustained chords [illegible] the introduction to Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream." The addition of the French horn to the wood wind heightens the effect. A violin cadenza accompanied by the harp introduces what proves to be the theme song of the next section, and this is heard sometimes by this or that solo instrument sometimes tossed about by them, sometimes by the full orchestra. Alternating with the "sea motive" of massive chords in ever changing keys, it captures the attention and holds it securely until the violin reenters with its former cadenza which it seems reluctant to leave.

Those who have been led to believe that the bassoon is an instrument of comic humor will do well to note the oriental and conversational character of the "andantino" by the solo bassoon accompanied by four string basses muted. Rarely does any composer ask that the basses be muted. Too often are the basses too little in evidence and their voice feeble. This fascinating theme is soon assumed by the oboe only to be passed on to the full string choir which alternates with the entire ensemble of wood wind. This movement suggests story telling, conversational moods and languorous repose suddenly interrupted by the noisy entrance of trombones and trumpets in a barbaric fanfare. The tale becomes more dramatic and impassioned, suggesting the entrance of dancers for entertainment. These figures for the brass have been adapted and adopted by many recent "composers".

Third Movement

The third movement is a flowing romanza into which the English horn enters for the first time. Graceful, songful and of charming continuity, its connected thought is interrupted only by sweeping scale passages by flute, clarinet and strings and in bravura of the most refined and elegant type. Sweeping glissandi of the harp with flute chromatics (in the unusual combination of 20 against 11 or 15 or 23 against 14 notes) tell us something of the way in which this great composer accomplishes his effects. They are so extraordinary that it is small wonder that his ideas have been so liberally appropriated.

The last movement suggests the wreck of Sinbad's ship. Marked rhythm and whirlwind speed depict the orgy of the elements, a thunderous orchestral crash marks the shipwreck: the tempest stills in harmonics of the strings and harps and the sea and wave motifs of the first movement reappear. Again the beautiful violin is heard against the diminishing chords of the harp and high harmonics of the solo violin supported by the softest possible wood wind breathe a restful peace.

It is not difficult to see why the "Scherazade" found instant favor with audiences and why its popularity has continued undiminished. Indeed it has proved to be a treasury from which composers of high and low degree have taken thematic material and musical episodes without stint or acknewledgement. Figures from this captivating work are very frequently heard in jazz and in the many atrocities of our time to which they add a saving grace. The almost new method of bravura passages for solo instruments, a method of composition which had not been exploited before this time, is now acknowledged and practised until it is almost a pest. The leading figures of the work itself have been travestied and jazzed to millions of hearers.

DR. W. LOUIS CHAPMAN.

CANTATA PRESENTED

"The Dayspring", a sacred cantata written by J. Sebastian Matthews, organist at Grace Church, was sung by the regular choir and soloists at the church last night. It was the first presentation anywhere of this work, which is particularly appropriate to the Christmas season. In it, Mr. Matthews has assembled hymns, solos and choruses, all set to an organ accompaniment which is a testimony to his gifts in composition.

Suitable writing for the organ with voice is a difficult art and not often does one find a work like this in which there are commendable balance, dynamic strength which does not obtrude, richness of registration and sufficient adherence to the fundamental rules of harmony and counterpoint to give musical unity without being pedantic and overscholastic.

This cantata breathes freshness and spiritual vigor, the occasional interposition of the chorale—that matchless figure of music peculiar to religious song—and the employment of the descant in the final hymn giving a musical contrast with the decisive choruses and beautiful solos which makes for a variety of color and interest. The composer himself presided at the organ with great skill and convincing religious interpretation.

Before the service, an excellent recital was given at the organs by the assistant organist, Miss Grace Regester.

Besides this work, during the 15 years Mr. Matthews has been at Grace Church, he has also written three cantatas, a number of church anthems, various songs and a Christmas oratorio with accompaniment for orchestra and organ which has been performed by many churches in New York and elsewhere.

DR. W. LOUIS CHAPMAN.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
DEC 9 - 1931

IN TERMS OF MUSIC, Comment in Season

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Second Concert of Series With Dr. Koussevitzky Conducting.—Beethoven's Fourth and "Scheherazade" Provide Contrasts

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. [illegible]rge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the [illegible] concert series last night at [illegible]e Albee Theatre. As usual with the concerts of this orchestra, the theatre was filled and there were many standing.

Two symphonies of widely divergent style but of absorbing interest were played—the Fourth Symphony of Beethoven and "Scheherazade" of Rimsky-Korsakov. The entire program was pervaded by a cheerful lilt and sprightliness. In none of Beethoven's symphonies is there more romantic glow than in this "fourth;" and the poesy and rhapsodic romanticism in the story of "Sindbad" is in evidence throughout. Even the "Adagio" of the Beethoven symphony shares in this absence of the serious and the austere—and adagios are not infrequently scholastic and pedantic.

This concert gave innumerable opportunities for the refinement of orchestral expression. The opening pages of the Beethoven Fourth Symphony showed the superb qualities of the incomparable string section of this famous orchestra. Beautiful tonal mass in finest pianissimo requires unusual technique and personnel, as do unity and perfection of ensemble as was shown in rapid floritura.

This virtuosity of strings, however, is not confined to violins and violas, for it should be known that under the progressive instruction of Dr. Koussevitzky, the 'cellos and string bases have arrived at a proficiency quite unusual in the history of symphony orchestras. So remarkable is the artistry of these less agile instruments that other conductors and orchestras have taken pause and example in notable degree to their great advantage and improvement. No longer may the "double basses" be feeble or sluggish in this orchestra; they are now as flexible and as fluent of articulation as the other strings, a thing that comes only from long study and frequent performance. Not only are the string basses nimble, they are also of fine rich musical quality, a thing that cannot come except from fine artists and not from "factory fiddles." The Boston Symphony Orchestra is a veritable museum of the finest old stringed instruments.

The Fourth Symphony of Beethoven was performed with an artistic reserve and a devotion befitting its classic character. Its romantic nuances were not overurged, its natural rhythm was not overaccentuated, its solo voices were subdued and graceful. Of dainty rather than of heroic proportions, the work has that substantial character always found in Beethoven, to which Dr. Koussevitzky gave less vigorous treatment than is often heard, and quite properly, for its intent is less assertive than that of any other symphony of Beethoven. The unity of the strings was absolute and the all too short work left an impression of melodic grace, delicate contrapuntal weavings and charming reminiscences of the sonata form of musical composition in its perfection. The orchestra was at one with the conductor in this lucid and refined interpretation.

The "Scheherazade" symphony of Rimsky-Korsakov is of widely different character. Its "program" is set forth in the program books and need not be repeated here. Its thematic material is highly original and novel. Indeed the various solo instruments seem to take on personality and their speech individual voices.

In this wise recollection turns to the beautiful solo work of the concertmaster whose exquisite and pellucid playing of the numerous narrative cadenzas in the "Scheherazade" was notably effective. Only a very great artist and magnificent "Strad" could pronounce the solo parts we so often hear at these concerts and evoke the telling harmonics "in alt" heard in the final pages of this present performance. The composer did not need to append "espressivo" to these solo passages, for Mr. Burgin would have played them with consummate artistic expression without special direction.

In the [illegible] "Andantino" the soarings of violins flute and clarinet were to be remembered for their brilliant speech. In the huge literature of the orchestra there is hardly a passage comparable with these scintillating scales, accompanied by sweeping glissandi of the harp or the closing pages of the work with its continued violin harmonic far above the orchestra which recounts the beauties of the [illegible] theme." For novelty of [illegible] no other work compares with [illegible] Rimsky-Korsakov's [illegible].

Tribute of appreciation must be paid to Mr. [illegible] whose bassoon was splendid in [illegible]. It is to be wondered why other composers have so seldom availed themselves of the voice of this dignified and effective baritone reed instrument. It has evidently remained for the great Russian composers Tschaikowsky and Rimsky-Korsakov to appreciate the possibilities of the bassoon in solo parts to our great advantage and delight.

With the entrance of the English horn in the "Andantino," Mr. Speyer gave another delightful voice to the wood wind choir and Mr. Bedetti frequently added glowing color to this beautiful reed instrument in imitation and unison figures. At the hands of these superb artists, the combination of cor anglais and 'cello is of wondrous and appealing beauty.

Of the numerous times we have heard this entrancing composition it has never seemed so fascinating nor has the reading been so completely faithful and satisfying as that of Dr. Koussevitzky and his men last night. Never before was the orchestra so respectfully subordinate to the solo voices, the presentation so thoroughly consonance with the score, the countless variations of tempos so faithfully observed or the soloists so eloquent in tonal beauty.

The audience was keenly alive to the [illegible] importance of the occasion and after each symphony recalled the conductor and orchestra with enthusiasm.

PROGRAM

Beethoven.....Symphony No. 4 in B-flat major, Op. 60
1. Adagio. Allegro vivace.
2. Adagio.
3. Allegro vivace. Trio. Un poco meno Allegro.
4. Finale. Allegro, ma non troppo.

Rimsky-Korsakov..... Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade" after "The Thousand Nights and a Night", Op. 35
1. The Sea and Sindbad's Ship.
2. The Story of the Kalandar Prince.
3. The Young Prince and the Young Princess.
4. Festival at Bagdad. The Sea. The Ship goes to Pieces on a Rock surmounted by a Bronze Warrior. Conclusion.

DR. W. LOUIS CHAPMAN.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS TRIBUNE

DEC 9 - 1931

-:- MUSIC -:-

ROMANTIC AND FANTASTIC

In saying what we have to say about the concert of the Boston Symphony last night, we think it best to say first what was regrettable in it. The programme itself was a little disconcerting, consisting as it did of Beethoven's Fourth Symphony and the "Scheherazade" suite by Rimsky-Korsakov. Few lovers of music would argue that this presentation plunged into the profoundities of musical intelligence. Nor was the evening helped out by putting the symphony first on the programme.

Dr. Koussevitzky is so accomplished a musician and a magician that we expected him to show why the Fourth Symphony is worthy of a place among the immortal nine. But he did not fulfill our expectations, perhaps because they can never be fulfilled. This symphony, to our mind, represents something like a quiet valley between high peaks, something wherein the great Beethoven took a rest from his genius while not altogether forgetting it. And it seemed to us also that Dr. Koussevitzky last night took a rest from his own genius in playing it without entirely forgetting himself.

It was quite a different story when the "Scheherazade" began. This suite is, of course, not music that answers either the tragic or romantic queries of the modern world; it challenges only our capacity to enjoy the fantastic. Dr. Koussevitzky directed, and his comrades played, in the very spirit of childlike imagination. They recreated the immortal truths in the Arabian Nights with as much assurance as Rimsky himself recreated them. And because all of us like once in a while to recover the loveliness of our first contact with the reality of a wholly fantastic sphere of activity, we applauded heartily last night when Mr. Koussevitzky and his men—notably the masters of the woodwind among them—brought us back the illusions of other days.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

DEC 9 - 1931

Symphony Players at Albee Theatre

Beethoven and Rimsky-Korsakov Beautifully Given by Boston Orchestra.

Once more Dr. Serge Koussevitzsky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra blend the old with the comparatively new, to the unrestrained delight of a throng of hearers. The second in the season's Providence series of concerts by the Boston orchestra was played last evening in the Albee Theatre and, of course, the playhouse was crowded to capacity. There are no vacant seats at these concerts; it is no longer possible to count confidently on arriving as the first number is about to be played, and then obtaining a good place. That time has long since passed.

The programme was the Beethoven Fourth Symphony in G Major and the symphonic suite "Scheherazade," of Rimsky-Korsakov, the old and the new, representing the school of a former period and that of today. It was a night of contrasts and a programme of alluring beauty.

The fourth symphony, not as familiar to symphony audiences here as some other works of the great master—for example the monumental "Eroica"—nevertheless is well known to music students and musicians. It is completely and characteristically Beethoven; masterly, authoritative, majestic, a work that appeals profoundly to the sense of beauty in the listener. To its interpretation Dr. Koussevitzky brings all his splendid musical intellect and it was played with a sustained artistry in which every member of the orchestra had his adequate part.

The Rimsky-Korsakov number, the beautiful and familiar Arabian Nights story, found the mood of the audience thoroughly prepared, and rarely does an audience hear such a satisfying performance. The whole suite was carried through like a song, smoothly, with meticulous precision and with a charm of interpretation that captivated the composite imagination of the hearers. The incidental solos by various members of the orchestra, particularly those played by the concert master, Mr. Burgin, gave to the suite a completeness that was highly appreciated.

The programme follows:

Beethoven...Symphony No. 4 in B-flat major. Op 60.
1. Adagio: Allegro vivace.
2. Adagio.
3. Allegro vivace. Trio. Un pocc meno allegro.
4. Finale: Allegro, ma non troppo.

Rimsky-Korsakov.. Symphonic Suit "Scheherazade" (aft "The Thousand Nights and a Night"), Op 35.
1. The Sea and Sindbad's Ship.
2. The Story of the Kalanda Prince
3. The Young Prince and the Youn Princess.
4. Festival at Baghdad. The Sea The Ship goes to Pieces on a Roc surmounted by a Bronze Warrio Conclusion.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HOUSTON, TEX.
CHRONICLE

DEC 13 1931

Our Orchestral Kettle.

Keeping everybody happy is a difficult task for the major symphony orchestra bosses. Which includes both the management and the conductors. No sooner had the finished and marvelous Symphony Band given its first pair of concerts in New York than we began hearing comment about Conductor Koussevitzky. "He's going away," was the substance of the comment.

True enough—but only for a rest. Brother Serge has found the task of making programs, rehearsing them, and then conducting them, rather more than a one-man job . . . for a length music season. He held bravely to his task for the first few years of his post, then the pressure began to tell . . . as it has with every one of the big conductors. You see, the demands of the public for novelty and the best keeps one constantly on tiptoe. Which doesn't help one's nerves.

So Mr. Koussevitzky will give way for a few weeks in February to Sir Hamilton Harty of London. Those who have heard this clever and facile musician's interpretations during his guestships out West say he is worth having about with a baton in his hand.

○ ○ ○

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST

DEC 12 1931

Quality Plus

Viewing the Orchestras at Their Best—Some Notable Concerts

By OSCAR THOMPSON

THOSE who recall with particular interest the stimulating reviews which Ernest Newman wrote for these columns when he came from London to be guest critic of the NEW YORK EVENING POST eight years ago, will remember that the distinguished Britisher had a keen eye for the particular qualities of our American orchestras. They were not quite the same then that they are today. Mr. Newman and his London confrere, H. C. Colles, who guested in the preceding year for the New York Times, viewed the American scene in the days when the Philadelphia Orchestra had a whip hand over its rivals to an extent that would never be conceded today. Arturo Toscanini was not then on the ground to utterly change the complexion of the Philharmonic. Nor had Serge Koussevitzky achieved his purpose of refashioning the Boston Symphony.

In recent weeks a third English critic of eminence has looked us over, waiting until he returned to London to pen his observations for his own publication and for Musical America. This visitor was Basil Maine of the Morning Post, who has a gift for speaking as well as analysis, and who sometimes forsakes the seat of judgment for the public platform, as he did when he crossed the Atlantic to take the role of narrator in the first American performance of Bliss's "Morning Heroes," given at the last Worcester Festival. Mr. Maine's time was limited. He contrived to hear the Boston Symphony, the Philadelphia Orchestra and the New York Philharmonic on three successive days. The conductors were Koussevitzky, Stokowski and Kleiber. The London critic had heard Toscanini conduct the Philharmonic during its European tour. The other orchestras and the conductors were new to him.

He apparently found all three organizations of such high quality that there was little to choose between. He confessed forthwith that he was not one of those able to boast "that if they heard the Boston Symphony and the Philadelphia Orchestra, each behind a screen, they could discern which was the non-union orchestra and which the union orchestra with a two-million-dollar endowment fund." In Musical America he added, that he would "never think of translating music in terms of finance." In this country we may think of it the other way 'round: a question of translating finance in terms of music. But that subject is a rather touchy one just now.

RECENT weeks have yielded New York audiences three orchestral concerts particularly memorable for the superb quality of the playing and the glorification of the conductors engaged. The first was by the Boston Symphony, that which brought Mr. Koussevitzky back to his New York audiences, with two of his acknowledged specialties, the Debussy Nocturnes and the second "Daphnis et Chloe" Suite—which Mr. Maine, who heard the Koussevitzky performance of this work in Boston, referred to as "not so much an interpretation as a moment of transfiguration—"a divine frenzy of inspiration." We who have encountered the same "transfiguration" of this Suite at the hands of Mr. Koussevitzky before may be inclined to vote it an instance of outstanding technique, but it is interesting to find the London critic writing that he experienced nothing like it at the other concerts.

We may wonder whether this experience would have stood alone for him, on his return to England, if he could have heard the Toscanini concert at the Metropolitan two Sundays ago. It was not necessary to admire, or even to like, Respighi's dwindling "Pines of Rome" to feel that the final section took fire under Mr. Toscanini's kindling beat. Those thunders of the Appian way, as he liberates them from their printed staves, are an old story here. But so, too, is the dazzle and swirl of Koussevitzky's Ravel. Sound critic that he is, Mr. Maine was cautious and judicious in what he wrote. He took care to point out, in speaking of his most ravishing experience with America's music, that he did not mean to infer that other orchestras than Koussevitzky's could not convey such an experience. For his sake, we are sorry he could not have heard this particular Toscanini concert, but not primarily because of the too theatrical "Pines of Rome." We could have wished him the lifelong memory of the Toscanini performance of the Brahms Variations on a Theme by Haydn.

The third of the notable recent concerts referred to was that of the Philadelphia Orchestra under Mr. Stokowski this week, with a program that might have seemed outmoded if it had been permitted to sag into anything resembling routine. We have heard numerous other concerts from this orchestra, under this conductor, that equaled or transcended this one in the very qualities which most distinguished it, but it takes its place in today's triptych because it was typical of that sumptuosity of sound which, more than anything else, brought this conductor and this orchestra their fame. It is still something to marvel at—if not as unique, or, in recent seasons, as consistently present in the playing of the Philadelphians, as it was in a day when Mr. Stokowski had no serious rivalry in Manhattan.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

DEC 13 1931

Society, en masse, attended the second concert in a series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, at the Albee Theatre Tuesday night. Several dinner parties preceded the affair.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald-Tribune

DEC 13 1931

In memory of Vincent d'Indy, Serge Koussevitzky changed the Boston Symphony programs of last Friday and Saturday in order to include the "Istar" Variations. Mary Garden and the Radcliffe Choral Society sang in Debussy's "La Damoiselle Elue" and Dr. Koussevitzky gave his first American presentation of Strauss's "Don Quixote."

The Boston Symphony will give Mozart's Requiem for the first time in its regular series next Friday and Saturday in Symphony Hall, assisted by the Bach Cantata Club of Boston, trained by G. Wallace Woodworth.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

DEC 13 1931

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, will give Mozart's "Requiem" in Boston next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The Bach Cantata Club, under G. Wallace Woodworth, will furnish the chorus, and the soloists will be Gertrude Ehrhart, Marie Murray, Joseph Lautner and David Blair McCloskey.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS TRIBUNE

DEC 17 1931

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLANS PENSION FUND CONCERT ON DEC. 27

The annual concert for the benefit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Pension fund will take place in Symphony hall, Boston, Sunday afternoon, Dec. 27.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has followed the tradition of this occasion by announcing a popular program which will be devoted entirely to the music of Tchaikovsky. Roland Hayes, the great colored tenor, is to be the soloist, appearing with the orchestra in Lenski's Air from Tschaikovsky's Opera, "Eugen Onegin," and in the Serenade of "Don Juan." Roland Hayes recently returned from a tour of the West and appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Dec. 14, when his singing was greeted with more applause than any Symphony soloist of the season. Koussevitzky will open the program with Tchaikovisky's Fantasia, "Francesca de Rimini" (after Dante), and close it with the Fourth Symphony of this composer, the reading of which is considered one of the most sensational achievements of the Russian conductor and his great orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
EVE. LEADER

DEC 17

LIKE THE WOMAN WHO WENT to a Boston Symphony concert some years ago. During the playing of Tschaikowsky's "1812" overture, she and a companion entered into conversation. It was all right in certain passages, for the brass is played very loud. But at a certain point there was a very quick change in volume. The forte passages changed to pianissimo, and the talking woman said, so that nearly everybody could hear: "We fry ours in butter."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

DEC 20 1931

NEWLY RECORDED MUSIC

Stravinsky Conducts His Symphony of Psalms—Pfitzner Leads Beethoven's First

By COMPTON PAKENHAM.

IT was an unfortunate delay which was responsible for Columbia's Masterworks Set No. 162 reaching us late, because it seems that its contents are of particular interest to that kindly group which, quite independently of one another, have assumed the paternal supervision of this department. Records lead a precarious existence, and it was during one of those occasional epidemics so dangerous to review copies that our album of Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms" lost itself somewhere along the rocky road from Columbia's shipping department. This, and not, as one of our betters writes, "your notorious prejudice against Stravinsky," accounts for this notice being behindhand. The performance is by the Straram Concerts Orchestra, together with the Alexis Vlassoff Chorus under the direction of the composer, and runs to three twelve-inch disks.

Apropos of this Stravinsky prejudice of ours, having been introduced to it we are half inclined to think it is our subconscious, or whatever, being careful about the company it keeps. In some quarters he who is not driven to tears by the music of Igor Stravinsky seems to be regarded as not normal. Apparently it matters not whether the drops be sweet with love or bitter with rage, so long as they flow. In these circles we are taboo. We cannot think that this is the very glory of glories nor, on the other hand, do we believe that Stravinsky considers his mission in life the scaring of old ladies. We find vastly entertaining pages in his scores, but cannot bring ourselves to take him to our heart, for the cowardly reason that we object to being scratched. Which applies rather to the pre-"Psalms" era, for the simple reason that whoever applies himself to these on the strength of having been tickled by "Le Sacre," for instance, will discover something yet again.

* * *

The "Symphony of Psalms" is symphonic to the extent that on selected passages from the Psalms of David the composer has created something which has unity and in justice should be considered as a whole. Dedicated with disarming frankness "To the glory of God," the work was either completed for or commissioned by the authorities responsible for the fiftieth anniversary celebrations of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The spirit is that of the Mass in that commencing with the sinners' prayer for consideration (Psalm XXXIX, v. 12-13, a statement of confidence in the power of the Almighty (Psalm XL) leads to a burst of praise (Psalm CL) upon which the work closes. These sections are divided in the score as Prelude (one side), Double Fugue (two sides) and Allegro symphonique (three sides)—the proportions of which indicate an impression of almost mathematical building up, which is experienced in the hearing.

* * *

To approach this with any justice it is necessary to attempt the well-nigh impossible, to forget the whole familiar répertoire of religious music, psalm chants, oratorio and the various masses. It is also well, perhaps, to put all conventional notions of means aside, in order that a score which includes neither violins nor violas, reinforces the woodwind and brass and adds a couple of pianos for good measure may be taken with the seriousness of mind it deserves. To minds too closely attuned to what has gone before, it is possible that the highest hurdle to clear will be that of Stravinsky's musical interpretation of the text, his idiom which seems essentially secular, not to say barbaric. All of which may smack of begging the point, but be it noted that the final conditions imposed for the enjoyment of the "Symphony of Psalms" is not the insertion of fingers in your ears during its performance. Failing to understand any indecent enthusiasm for the work, we can at least vouch that it grows on one, and that those who are in search of novelty to mull over until the budget permits of a further investment will find it here.

There are some fine moments, notably the unostentatious and economically developed peak of the prelude, the beautiful opening of the fugue and the promise, unfulfilled, it must be admitted, of magnificence on the side before the last. In which respect the greatest surprise comes with the growing realization that the composer has settled any doubts as to his sincerity by carefully eschewing all temptation to make his hymn of praise garish or spectacular.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald-Tribune

DEC 20 1931

Clifton as Guest Leader With Boston Symphony

American Conductor Invited for Three Concerts

Chalmers Clifton will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in three concerts next month, during the first week of Serge Koussevitzky's annual midseason vacation, directing the Thursday evening concert at Sanders Theater, Cambridge, on January 4, and the regular Friday afternoon and Saturday evening pair of January 15-16 in Symphony Hall. His program consists of Handel's concerto grosso, Op. 6, No. 9, in F major; Charles T. Griffes's Poem for flute and orchestra; Daybreak and the Rhine Journey from Wagner's "Götterdämerung" and Sibelius's second symphony, in D.

During the second week of Dr. Koussevitzky's vacation the Boston Symphony will be conducted by the British composer, Gustav Holst.

Mr. Clifton was born at Jackson, Miss., in 1889, and was graduated from the Cincinnati Conservatory in 1907, and in 1912, summa cum laude, from Harvard, where he studied with Edward Burlingame Hill, Walter R. Spalding and W. C. Heilman. Later he studied with d'Indy and Gedalge in Paris. He was musical director for the Peterboro (N. H.) pageant in 1910, composed music and was musical director for the Lexington (Mass.) pageant in 1915, and was conductor of the Cecilia Society of Boston from 1915 to 1917.

In recent years Mr. Clifton's principal activity as a conductor was in the musical direction of the American Orchestral Association. Owing to illness, he had to discontinue his work with the society in the spring of 1930, but, with improving health, resumed active work as a conductor last season, when he conducted a concert of the Minneapolis Symphony in March. He has also composed in various forms.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

DEC 20 1931

The program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts in Boston Dec. 24 and 26 includes Bach's suite No. 2 for flute and strings, with Georges Laurent as soloist; Ravel's introduction and allegro for harp and string orchestra with flute and clarinet; Frid's suite for orchestra, and Schumann's "Rhenish" symphony.

88

THIS CLIPPING FROM PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

DEC 9 - 1931

Symphony Players at Albee Theatre

Beethoven and Rimsky-Korsakov Beautifully Given by Boston Orchestra.

Once more Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra blend the old with the comparatively new, to the unrestrained delight of a throng of hearers. The second in the season's Providence series of concerts by the Boston orchestra was played last evening in the Albee Theatre and, of course, the playhouse was crowded to capacity. There are no vacant seats at these concerts; it is no longer possible to count confidently on arriving as the first number is about to be played, and then obtaining a good place. That time has long since passed.

The programme was the Beethoven Fourth Symphony in G Major and the symphonic suite "Scheherazade," of Rimsky-Korsakov, the old and the new, representing the school of a former period and that of today. It was a night of contrasts and a programme of alluring beauty.

The fourth symphony, not as familiar to symphony audiences here as some other works of the great master—for example the monumental "Eroica"—nevertheless is well known to music students and musicians. It is completely and characteristically Beethoven: masterly, authoritative, majestic, a work that appeals profoundly to the sense of beauty in the listener. To its interpretation Dr. Koussevitzky brings all his splendid musical intellect and it was played with a sustained artistry in which every member of the orchestra had his adequate part.

The Rimsky-Korsakov number, the beautiful and familiar Arabian Nights story, found the mood of the audience thoroughly prepared, and rarely does an audience hear such a satisfying performance. The whole suite was carried through like a song, smoothly, with meticulous precision and with a charm of interpretation that captivated the composite imagination of the hearers. The incidental solos by various members of the orchestra, particularly those played by the concert master, Mr. Burgin, gave to the suite a completeness that was highly appreciated.

The programme follows:

Beethoven...Symphony No. 4 in B-flat major. Op 60.
1. Adagio: Allegro vivace.
2. Adagio.
3. Allegro vivace. Trio. Un poco meno allegro.
4. Finale: Allegro, ma non troppo.

Rimsky-Korsakov.. Symphonic Suite "Scheherazade" (after "The Thousand Nights and a Night"), Op. 35.
1. The Sea and Sindbad's Ship.
2. The Story of the Kalanda Prince.
3. The Young Prince and the Young Princess.
4. Festival at Baghdad. The Sea. The Ship goes to Pieces on a Rock surmounted by a Bronze Warrior. Conclusion.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HOUSTON, TEX.
CHRONICLE

DEC 1 0 1931

Our Orchestral Kettle.

Keeping everybody happy is a difficult task for the major symphony orchestra bosses. Which includes both the management and the conductors. No sooner had the finished and marvelous [redacted] Symphony Band given its first pair of concerts in New York than we began hearing comment about Conductor Koussevitzky. "He's going away," was the substance of the comment.

True enough—but only for a rest. Brother Serge has found the task of making programs, rehearsing them, and then conducting them, rather more than a one-man job . . . for a length music season. He held bravely to his task for the first few years of his post, then the pressure began to tell . . . as it has with every one of the big conductors. You see, the demands of the public for novelty and the best keeps one constantly on tiptoe. Which doesn't help one's nerves.

So Mr. Koussevitzky will give way for a few weeks in February to Sir Hamilton Harty of London. Those who have heard this clever and facile musician's interpretations during his guestships out West say he is worth having about with a baton in his hand.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST

DEC 1 2 1931

Quality Plus

Viewing the Orchestras at Their Best—Some Notable Concerts

By OSCAR THOMPSON

THOSE who recall with particular interest the stimulating reviews which Ernest Newman wrote for these columns when he came from London to be guest critic of the NEW YORK EVENING POST eight years ago, will remember that the distinguished Britisher had a keen eye for the particular qualities of our American orchestras. They were not quite the same then that they are today. Mr. Newman and his London confrere, H. C. Colles, who guested in the preceding year for the New York Times, viewed the American scene in the days when the Philadelphia Orchestra had a whip hand over its rivals to an extent that would never be conceded today. Arturo Toscanini was not then on the ground to utterly change the complexion of the Philharmonic. Nor had Serge Koussevitzky achieved his purpose of refashioning the Boston Symphony.

In recent weeks a third English critic of eminence has looked us over, waiting until he returned to London to pen his observations for his own publication and for Musical America. This visitor was Basil Maine of the Morning Post, who has a gift for speaking as well as analysis, and who sometimes forsakes the seat of judgment for the public platform, as he did when he crossed the Atlantic to take the role of narrator in the first American performance of Bliss's "Morning Heroes," given at the last Worcester Festival. Mr. Maine's time was limited. He contrived to hear the Boston Symphony, the Philadelphia Orchestra and the New York Philharmonic on three successive days. The conductors were Koussevitzky, Stokowski and Kleiber. The London critic had heard Toscanini conduct the Philharmonic during its European tour. The other orchestras es, he conductors were new to him. it- apparently found all three ornt tions of such high quality that as little to choose between. He i d forthwith that he was not to those able to boast "that if of ard the Boston Symphony and ted ladelphia Orchestra, each bewho screen, they could discern ney as the non-union orchestra and and e union orchestra with a twoand ollar endowment fund." In ving America he added, that he anver think of translating music ould of finance." In this country ay think of it the other way nd. a question of translating a. in terms of music. But that ct is a rather touchy one just RECENT weeks have yielded New York audiences three orchestral concerts particularly memorable for the superb quality of the playing and the glorification of the conductors engaged. The first was by the Boston Symphony, that which brought Mr. Koussevitzky back to his New York audiences, with two of his acknowledged specialties, the Debussy Nocturnes and the second "Daphnis et Chloe" Suite—which Mr. Maine, who heard the Koussevitzky performance of this work in Boston, referred to as "not so much an interpretation as a moment of transfiguration—"a divine frenzy of inspiration." We who have encountered the same "transfiguration" of this Suite at the hands of Mr. Koussevitzky before may be inclined to vote it an instance of outstanding technique, but it is interesting to find the London critic writing that he experienced nothing like it at the other concerts.

We may wonder whether this experience would have stood alone for him, on his return to England, if he could have heard the Toscanini concert at the Metropolitan two Sundays ago. It was not necessary to admire, or even to like, Respighi's dwindling "Pines of Rome" to feel that the final section took fire under Mr. Toscanini's kindling beat. Those thunders of the Appian way, as he liberates them from their printed staves, are an old story here. But so, too, is the dazzle and swirl of Koussevitzky's Ravel. Sound critic that he is, Mr. Maine was cautious and judicious in what he wrote. He took care to point out, in speaking of his most ravishing experience with America's music, that he did not mean to infer that other orchestras than Koussevitzky's could not convey such an experience. For his sake, we are sorry he could not have heard this particular Toscanini concert, but not primarily because of the too theatrical "Pines of Rome." We could have wished him the lifelong memory of the Toscanini performance of the Brahms Variations on a Theme by Haydn.

The third of the notable recent concerts referred to was that of the Philadelphia Orchestra under Mr. Stokowski this week, with a program that might have seemed outmoded if it had been permitted to sag into anything resembling routine. We have heard numerous other concerts from this orchestra, under this conductor, that equaled or transcended this one in the very qualities which most distinguished it, but it takes its place in today's triptych because it was typical of that sumptuosity of sound which, more than anything else, brought this conductor and this orchestra their fame. It is still something to marvel at—if not as unique, or, in recent seasons, as consistently present in the playing of the Philadelphians, as it was in a day when Mr. Stokowski had no serious rivalry in Manhattan.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

DEC 1 3 1931

Society, en masse, attended the second concert in a series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, at the Albee Theatre Tuesday night. Several dinner parties preceded the affair.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald-Tribune

DEC 1 3 1931

In memory of Vincent d'Indy, Serge Koussevitzky changed the Boston Symphony programs of last Friday and Saturday in order to include the "Istar" Variations. Mary Garden and the Radcliffe Choral Society sang in Debussy's "La Damoiselle Elue" and Dr. Koussevitzky gave his first American presentation of Strauss's "Don Quixote."

The Boston Symphony will give Mozart's Requiem for the first time in its regular series next Friday and Saturday in Symphony Hall, assisted by the Bach Cantata Club of Boston, trained by G. Wallace Woodworth.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

DEC 1 3 1931

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, will give Mozart's "Requiem" in Boston next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The Bach Cantata Club, under G. Wallace Woodworth, will furnish the chorus, and the soloists will be Gertrude Ehrhart, Marie Murray, Joseph Lautner and David Blair McCloskey.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS TRIBUNE

DEC 1 7 1931

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLANS PENSION FUND CONCERT ON DEC. 27

The annual concert for the benefit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Pension fund will take place in Symphony hall, Boston, Sunday afternoon, Dec. 27.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has followed the tradition of this occasion by announcing a popular program which will be devoted entirely to the music of Tchaikovsky. Roland Hayes, the great colored tenor, is to be the soloist, appearing with the orchestra in Lenski's Air from Tschaikovsky's Opera, "Eugen Onegin," and in the Serenade of "Don Juan." Roland Hayes recently returned from a tour of the West and appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Dec. 14, when his singing was greeted with more applause than any Symphony soloist of the season. Koussevitzky will open the program with Tchaikovisky's Fantasia, "Francesca de Rimini" (after Dante), and close it with the Fourth Symphony of this composer, the reading of which is considered one of the most sensational achievements of the Russian conductor and his great orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
EVE. LEADER

DEC 17 1931

LIKE THE WOMAN WHO WENT to a Boston Symphony concert some years ago. During the playing of Tschaikowsky's "1812" overture, she and a companion entered into conversation. It was all right in certain passages, for the brass is played very loud. But at a certain point there was a very quick change in volume. The forte passages changed to pianissimo, and the talking woman said, so that nearly everybody could hear: "We fry ours in butter."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

DEC 2 0 1931

NEWLY RECORDED MUSIC

Stravinsky Conducts His Symphony of Psalms—Pfitzner Leads Beethoven's First

By COMPTON PAKENHAM.

IT was an unfortunate delay which was responsible for Columbia's Masterworks Set No. 162 reaching us late, because it seems that its contents are of particular interest to that kindly group which, quite independently of one another, have assumed the paternal supervision of this department. Records lead a precarious existence, and it was during one of those occasional epidemics so dangerous to review copies that our album of Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms" lost itself somewhere along the rocky road from Columbia's shipping department. This, and not, as one of our betters writes, "your notorious prejudice against Stravinsky," accounts for this notice being behindhand. The performance is by the Straram Concerts Orchestra, together with the Alexis Vlassoff Chorus under the direction of the composer, and runs to three twelve-inch disks.

Apropos of this Stravinsky prejudice of ours, having been introduced to it we are half inclined to think it is our subconscious, or whatever, being careful about the company it keeps. In some quarters he who is not driven to tears by the music of Igor Stravinsky seems to be regarded as not normal. Apparently it matters not whether the drops be sweet with love or bitter with rage, so long as they flow. In these circles we are taboo. We cannot think that this is the very glory of glories nor, on the other hand, do we believe that Stravinsky considers his mission in life the scaring of old ladies. We find vastly entertaining pages in his scores, but cannot bring ourselves to take him to our heart, for the cowardly reason that we object to being scratched. Which applies rather to the pre-"Psalms" era, for the simple reason that whoever applies himself to these on the strength of having been tickled by "Le Sacre," for instance, will discover something yet again.

* * *

The "Symphony of Psalms" is symphonic to the extent that on selected passages from the Psalms of David the composer has created something which has unity and in justice should be considered as a whole. Dedicated with disarming frankness "To the glory of God," the work was either completed for or commissioned by the authorities responsible for the fiftieth anniversary celebrations of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The spirit is that of the Mass in that commencing with the sinners' prayer for consideration (Psalm XXXIX, v. 12-13, a statement of confidence in the power of the Almighty (Psalm XL) leads to a burst of praise (Psalm CL) upon which the work closes. These sections are divided in the score as Prelude (one side), Double Fugue (two sides) and Allegro symphonique (three sides)—the proportions of which indicate an impression of almost mathematical building up, which is experienced in the hearing.

* * *

To approach this with any justice it is necessary to attempt the well-nigh impossible, to forget the whole familiar répertoire of religious music, psalm chants, oratorio and the various masses. It is also well, perhaps, to put all conventional notions of means aside, in order that a score which includes neither violins nor violas, reinforces the woodwind and brass and adds a couple of pianos for good measure may be taken with the seriousness of mind it deserves. To minds too closely attuned to what has gone before, it is possible that the highest hurdle to clear will be that of Stravinsky's musical interpretation of the text, his idiom which seems essentially secular, not to say barbaric. All of which may smack of begging the point, but be it noted that the final conditions imposed for the enjoyment of the "Symphony of Psalms" is not the insertion of fingers in your ears during its performance. Failing to understand any indecent enthusiasm for the work, we can at least vouch that it grows on one, and that those who are in search of novelty to mull over until the budget permits of a further investment will find it here.

There are some fine moments, notably the unostentatious and economically developed peak of the prelude, the beautiful opening of the fugue and the promise, unfulfilled, it must be admitted, of magnificence on the side before the last. In which respect the greatest surprise comes with the growing realization that the composer has settled any doubts as to his sincerity by carefully eschewing all temptation to make his hymn of praise garish or spectacular.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald-Tribune

DEC 2 0 1931

Clifton as Guest Leader With Boston Symphony

American Conductor Invited for Three Concerts

Chalmers Clifton will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in three concerts next month, during the first week of Serge Koussevitzky's annual midseason vacation, directing the Thursday evening concert at Sanders Theater, Cambridge, on January 4, and the regular Friday afternoon and Saturday evening pair of January 15-16 in Symphony Hall. His program consists of Handel's concerto grosso, Op. 6, No. 9, in F major; Charles T. Griffes's Poem for flute and orchestra; Daybreak and the Rhine Journey from Wagner's "Götterdämerung" and Sibelius's second symphony, in D.

During the second week of Dr. Koussevitzky's vacation the Boston Symphony will be conducted by the British composer, Gustav Holst.

Mr. Clifton was born at Jackson, Miss., in 1889, and was graduated from the Cincinnati Conservatory in 1907, and in 1912, summa cum laude, from Harvard, where he studied with Edward Burlingame Hill, Walter R. Spalding and W. C. Heilman. Later he studied with d'Indy and Gedalge in Paris. He was musical director for the Peterboro (N. H.) pageant in 1910, composed music and was musical director for the Lexington (Mass.) pageant in 1915, and was conductor of the Cecilia Society of Boston from 1915 to 1917.

In recent years Mr. Clifton's principal activity as a conductor was in the musical direction of the American Orchestral Association. Owing to illness, he had to discontinue his work with the society in the spring of 1930, but, with improving health, resumed active work as a conductor last season, when he conducted a concert of the Minneapolis Symphony in March. He has also composed in various forms.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

DEC 2 0 1931

The program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts in Boston Dec. 24 and 26 includes Bach's suite No. 2 for flute and strings, with Georges Laurent as soloist; Ravel's introduction and allegro for harp and string orchestra with flute and clarinet; Frid's suite for orchestra, and Schumann's "Rhenish" symphony.

Nov 20

Aus der Muſik-Welt

Boſton-Orcheſter.

Boſton Symphony Orcheſtra, erſtes Abend-Konzert der Saiſon, Carnegie Hall; Dirigent: Serge Kouſſevitzky. Das Programm:
Symphonie No. 9 in D-dur..........Mahler
(Zum erſten Male in New York)
Zwei Nocturnos (Nuages & Fêtes)..Debuſſy
„Daphnis et Chloé" (2. Ballett-Suite)..Ravel

Das Boſton Symphony Orcheſtra und ſein dynamiſcher Leiter Serge Kouſſevitzky ſind wieder in die Carnegie Hall eingekehrt. Das erſte Abend-Konzert der Spielzeit ſtand im Zeichen der New Yorker Erſtaufführung von Guſtav Mahlers „Symphonie No. 9 in D-dur", die erſt vor wenigen Wochen in Boſton zur amerikaniſchen Erſtaufführung gelangt war.

Ueber das letzte große ſymphoniſche Werk des Spätromantikers — eine „Symphonie No. 10" iſt nicht beendet worden —, über Perſönlichkeit und Weltbild Guſtav Mahlers iſt erſt kürzlich in einem Einführungsartikel der Verſuch einer Würdigung gemacht worden. Der todkrank aus New York nach Wien Zurückgekehrte ſollte ſein Werk nicht mehr hören, trotzdem ſeine Entſtehung auf das Jahr 1909 zurückgeht. Er ſtarb am 18. Mai 1911, körperlich und ſeeliſch gebrochen; ſein Schüler Bruno Walter brachte die „Neunte" im folgenden Jahre zur Uraufführung. Es muß überraſchen, daß die D-dur-Symphonie, wie die Mehrzahl von Mahlers ſymphoniſchen Werken, bis heute in New York unbekannt geblieben ſind, trotzdem den Komponiſten von ſeiner Tätigkeit am Metropolitan und Philharmoniſchen Orcheſter her viele Bande mit der Stadt und ihren Muſikfreunden verknüpfen. Jedoch, — gerade die neunte Symphonie gelangt auch drüben verhältnismäßig ſelten zur Aufführung, und es dürften ſich geſtern abend nur wenige Zuhörer im Saale befunden haben, denen ſie von Europareiſen her bekannt war.

Guſtav Mahler.

Seine neunte Symphonie wurde geſtern abend in Carnegie Hall zur New Yorker Erſtaufführung gebracht.

Trotzdem dem gigantiſchen Werk, deſſen Darbietung eine volle Stunde in Anſpruch nimmt, im Strukturellen, in der Erfindung, Schwächen anhaften, die vielleicht Zeugnis von bangem Todesahnen und demzufolge von ſchneller kompoſitoriſcher Arbeit ſind, machte ſeine oft geniale Kraft, die im „Adagio", Vergeſſen ſuchend, in das unendliche Meer der Sterne hinauflangt, die New Yorker Erſtaufführung zu einem Erlebnis, das keiner der Zuhörer ſchnell aus dem Gedankenkreiſe ſtreichen können wird. Serge Kouſſevitzky und dem prächtig disponierten Orcheſter gebührt für dieſe unvergeßliche Darbietung warmer Dank! —

Wie der Dirigent im letzten Satze die feinen dynamiſchen Abſtufungen bis zum hauchzarten „piano" aus dem Klangkörper herauszauberte, — das mußte faſt wie ein Mirakel dünken. Hier löſte ſich wirklich die gequälte, bedrängte Menſchenſeele von allem irdiſchen Kummer los und verſank in das Nichts des Vergeſſens! —

Ueber das „Programm" der neunten Symphonie iſt viel und fruchtlos debattiert worden. Die alte Streitfrage ſoll hier nicht wieder aufgenommen werden. Guſtav Mahler, der in ſeinen erſten Werken die peinlich-ſorgfältigſten Erläuterungen ſeinen ſymphoniſchen Werken beifügte, hat ſeinen Zeitgenoſſen und Paladinen keine Aufſchlüſſe über ſein Schwanenlied gegeben. Wenigſtens vermögen ſeine Biographen und Mitarbeiter, von denen Bekker, Stefan und Specht genannt werden ſollen, kein authentiſches Material zu liefern. Gewiß, — die D-dur-Symphonie iſt Programm-Muſik, beſſer Bekenntnis-Muſik des Weltanſchauungs-Muſikers Guſtav Mahler, deſſen ganzes Schaffen Spiegelbild der Zeitumſtände, perſönlicher Beſchwerniſſe, ethiſcher und äſthetiſcher Probleme war und ſo gewertet werden muß. Eine ſchmerzliche bis zu Bitternis gravierende Stimmung durchzieht das „Andante comodo"; lichtere Momente werden ſchnell von Grau peſſimiſtiſcher Wolkenwände verhängt. Der zweite Satz, „Im Tempo eines gemächlichen Ländlers, etwas täppiſch und ſehr derb", gemahnt eher in ſeinen ſtarr umriſſenen Kontouren, in der oft bizarren Orcheſtrierung an eine „Danſe Macabre"; „Rondo" und „Burleske" tragen ähnliche Weſenszüge, und ſelbſt der beſchließende Satz bringt nicht die Löſung, die Befreiung: Der Hörer gewinnt den Eindruck, als wenn hier ein Reſignierter dem Irdiſchen mit einer letzten großen Geſte der Enttäuſchung Lebewohl ſagt, um nicht auf ragendem Olymp in ein vergeiſtigtes Jenſeits einzugehen, ſondern um im Nirwana, im Auslöſchen Körper und Seele vergehen und verglimmen zu laſſen!

Rein muſikaliſch iſt die letzte Symphonie Mahlers eines der bedeutendſten Produkte ſympohniſchen Schaffens, und das trotz der mannigfaltigen Schwächen, die ihr in einer überdetaillierten, die große Sammlung, die konzentrierte Kraft ermangelnden Architektonik anhaften. Wie der einleitende Satz aus thematiſchen Partikeln zu einem wuchtigen Gebäude emporgeführt wird, das iſt eines der größten Beiſpiele ſymphoniſcher Struktur. Jene fernen, lockenden Hornrufe, die wir bereits in den „Nachtmuſiken" der E-moll-Symphonie wahrnehmen, ertönen wieder. Die Grundſtimmung iſt weich, reſigniert. Von ſchönſter melodiſcher Führung iſt die Behandlung der Soloſtimmen gegen Schluß des Satzes. Klangmaleriſch zeigen dieſer wie die folgenden Sätze wieder den Tonzauberer, der neben Richard Strauß nicht ſeinesgleichen findet. Wie hier oft die ſeltſamſten Farbenkombinationen neben- und übereinander geſetzt werden, wie vor allem die Holz-Inſtrumente mit Oberton-Effekten ausgeſtattet werden, wie dabei die Geſamtleinwand doch faſt immer ihre Leuchtkraft, ihre harmoniſche Farbverteilung, ihre Tiefenwirkung bewahrt, — das konnte nur von einem, in all ſeinem Leid und vielleicht gerade darum genialen Muſiker geſchaffen werden. —

Paul Bekker behauptet, der dritte Satz habe im Original die Widmung „Meinen Brüdern in Appoll" getragen. Vielleicht erklären ſich ſo die melodiſchen Banalitäten, das aufgebauſchte Klangbild am beſten, mit denen der Kämpfer und Dulder Mahler ſeinen ſelbſtzufriedenen „Brüdern in Appoll" Spott mit Spott und Hohn mit Hohn vergilt. — Von energiſch betontem Rhythmus, reſonanter Kraft iſt der Streichkörper im beſchließenden „Adagio". Mit einem immenſen orcheſtralen Aufgebot ſtrebt der Komponiſt hier zum dynamiſchen Klimax und dann verklingt allmählich dieſer letzte Ausbruch eines ſentimentalen Romantikers und die Erde mit ihrem Leid bleibt weit unter ihm zurück. — Der Kreis iſt geſchloſſen. — Das abſolute Nichts hat ihn wieder! — — —

Man möchte dem Orcheſter und ſeinem Dirigenten für eine prächtige Wiedergabe lange Lobeshymnen ſingen. Wie die Streicher, wie das unvergleichliche Bläſerkorps dem Leiter folgten, — das war ſelten, das war Erleben! — Kouſſevitzky waltete über der Partitur mit heiligem Eifer, mit feinem Formverſtehen und inniger Einfühlung in den Geiſt des Werkes.

Und das Publikum ſpendete dem Schwanenlied Guſtav Mahlers, dem Dirigenten und ſeinen Muſikern herzlichen, wohlverdienten Beifall....

J. H. M.

TROMMER'S
White Label Malz-Bräu
Gebraut aus erlesenem importiertem Mährischem Malz und importiertem zertifiziertem Saazer Hopfen
Die Premiere von TROMMER'S
berühmten Bräuen
Unsere anderen Bräue—hell, dunkel und Oktober-Bräu — sind aus dem feinsten erlesenen Malz und importiertem böhmischem Hopfen gebraut
Am ZAPF u. auf Flaschen gezogen
:::ÜBERALL:::

---

bune ny Works ram hestra, in and Sat-ican pera Frid a wn here.
suite for d Allegro id Schu-certo will America
next Friiel Dushond symopen the Stravintakes his Chalmers

and Gustav Holst will conduct the Boston Symphony, the former during the week of January 10 and the latter in the week of January 17. Mr. Holst, who is about to make his second visit to Boston, will be connected with the music department of Harvard University for the remainder of the college year.

THIS CLIPPING FROM FALL RIVER, MASS.
HERALD-NEWS

DEC 29 1931

Boston Symphony to Play Twice This Week

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give the ~~11th~~ pair of concerts in Symphony hall Friday afternoon and Saturday night. Dr. Koussevitzky will give the first American performance of Stravinsky's concerto in D, for violin and orchestra.

This work has been performed in London and Berlin this season. The movements comprise Toccato, two Arias and Capriccio. Samuel Dushkin, who was the violinist in the European performances, will play the solo part. D'Indy's Second Symphony in B flat major will open the concert, and the orchestral suite from Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" will be the concluding number.

R. G. de T.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
Brooklyn Standard Union

DEC 29 1931

Cellist Knows 300 Works

BOSTON, Dec. 29 (UP).—Jean Bedetti, first cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, knows 300 complete works by memory.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MT. VERNON, N. Y.
ARGUS

DEC 29 1931

CELLIST KNOWS 300 WORKS

BOSTON, Dec. 29 (UP).—Jean Bedetti, first cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, knows 300 complete works by memory.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION-STAR

DEC 23 1931

Boston Sympothny will play a new Gershwin symphony, "The Second Rhapsody," for first time January 29.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
Journal of Commerce

DEC 24 1931

* * *

George Gershwin's "The Second Rhapsody" will be given its first public performance with the Boston Symphony January 29 and 30, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting and Mr. Gershwin at the piano. Mr. Koussevitzky considers the competition one of America's finest.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
YONKERS, N. Y.
HERALD

DEC 24 1931

CELLIST KNOWS 300 WORKS

Boston, Dec. 24.—Jean Bedetti, first cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, knows 300 complete works by memory.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
STAR

DEC 26 1931

Ravel's 'Valse' Is Latest Issue of Boston Symphony

Ravel's popular "Boleco" is a good example of the stimulus exerted on this composer by a simple dance motif. "La Valse" is another. In each of these compositions, Ravel is inspired to his most brilliant efforts in instrumentation and climactic effects.

A new recording of "La Valse," by the Boston Symphony orchestra under Koussevitzky (Victor, 7413-14) is a happy coupling of composer and interpreter—as happy and as successful as the "Daphnis et Chloe" which was issued about a year ago.

Ravel apotheosizes the waltz in this tense and glittering work. In it are heard the charm and lilt that are typically Viennese and Johann Strauss, but with something momentous and significant added to them. The waltz, at the beginning, seems to rise from dark shrouding mists, growing more defined as it progresses and finally reaching up to dazzling heights at the finale.

The interpretation is quite as fine as are all of the Boston's recordings, with spaciousness of tone and wide variety in color and bre. The odd side is devote vel's transcription of "Danse," beautifully

Trio No. 7 in B fl Archduke" (Beethover by Alfred Cort, pi [illegible], violini

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAPH

DEC 27 1931

Fiddler Here to Sell Stravinsky

Samuel Dushkin, violinist, is here especially designated by Stravinsky to introduce to this country his new concerto for violin and symphony orchestra.

Performances of this work, the first of its kind written by Stravinsky, will be given in six cities, with Dushkin appearing each time as solo artist. The American premiere will be given by Koussevitzki and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, January 1 and 2.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

DEC 27 1931

Chalmers Clifton will be guest conductor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in three concerts—at the Sanders Theatre in Cambridge on Jan. 14 and at Symphony Hall in Boston on Jan. 15 and 16. His program will include Handel's Concerto Grosso in F, Op. 6, No. 9; Griffes's Poem for flute and orchestra, excerpts from "Götterdämmerung," and Sibelius's Second symphony, in D.

The Boston Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will give the first American performance of Stravinsky's new violin concerto in Boston next Friday and Saturday. Samuel Dushkin, who played the solo part in the concerto's première abroad, will play it here. The program will also include Stravinsky's "Petruchka" suite and Vincent d'Indy's Second symphony, in B flat.

Nov 20

Aus der Muſik-Welt

Boſton-Orcheſter.

Boſton Symphony Orcheſtra, erſtes Abend-Konzert der Saiſon, Carnegie Hall; Dirigent: Serge Kouſſevitzky. Das Programm:
Symphonie No. 9 in D-dur.........Mahler
(Zum erſten Male in New York)
Zwei Nocturnos (Nuages & Fêtes)..Debuſſy
„Daphnis et Chloé" (2. Ballett-Suite)..Ravel

Das Boſton Symphony Orcheſtra und ſein dynamiſcher Leiter Serge Kouſſevitzky ſind wieder in die Carnegie Hall eingekehrt. Das erſte Abend-Konzert der Spielzeit ſtand im Zeichen der New Yorker Erſtaufführung von Guſtav Mahlers „Symphonie No. 9 in D-dur", die erſt vor wenigen Wochen in Boſton zur amerikaniſchen Erſtaufführung gelangt war.

Ueber das letzte große ſymphoniſche Werk des Spätromantikers — eine „Symphonie No. 10" iſt nicht beendet worden —, über Perſönlichkeit und Weltbild Guſtav Mahlers iſt erſt kürzlich in einem Einführungsartikel der Verſuch einer Würdigung gemacht worden. Der todkrank aus New York nach Wien Zurückgekehrte ſollte ſein Werk nicht mehr hören, trotzdem ſeine Entſtehung auf das Jahr 1909 zurückgeht. Er ſtarb am 18. Mai 1911, körperlich und ſeeliſch gebrochen; ſein Schüler Bruno Walter brachte die „Neunte" im folgenden Jahre zur Uraufführung. Es muß überraſchen, daß die D-dur-Symphonie, wie die Mehrzahl von Mahlers ſymphoniſchen Werken, bis heute in New York unbekannt geblieben ſind, trotzdem den Komponiſten von ſeiner Tätigkeit am Metropolitan und Philharmoniſchen Orcheſter her viele Bande mit der Stadt und ihren Muſikfreunden verknüpfen. Jedoch, — gerade die neunte Symphonie gelangt auch drüben verhältnismäßig ſelten zur Aufführung, und es dürften ſich geſtern abend nur wenige Zuhörer im Saale befunden haben, denen ſie von Europareiſen her bekannt war.

Guſtav Mahler.

Seine neunte Symphonie wurde geſtern abend in Carnegie Hall zur New Yorker Erſtaufführung gebracht.

Trotzdem dem gigantiſchen Werk, deſſen Darbietung eine volle Stunde in Anſpruch nimmt, im Strukturellen, in der Erfindung, Schwächen anhaften, die vielleicht Zeugnis von bangem Todesahnen und demzufolge von ſchneller kompoſitoriſcher Arbeit ſind, machte ſeine oft geniale Kraft, die im „Adagio", Vergeſſen ſuchend, in das unendliche Meer der Sterne hinauflangt, die New Yorker Erſtaufführung zu einem Erlebnis, das keiner der Zuhörer ſchnell aus dem Gedankenkreiſe ſtreichen können wird. Serge Kouſſevitzky und dem prächtig disponierten Orcheſter gebührt für dieſe unvergeßliche Darbietung warmer Dank! —

Wie der Dirigent im letzten Satze die feinen dynamiſchen Abſtufungen bis zum hauchzarten „piano" aus dem Klangkörper herauszauberte, — das mußte faſt wie ein Mirakel dünken. Hier löſte ſich wirklich die gequälte, bedrängte Menſchenſeele von allem irdiſchen Kummer los und verſank in das Nichts des Vergeſſens! —

Ueber das „Programm" der neunten Symphonie iſt viel und fruchtlos debattiert worden. Die alte Streitfrage ſoll hier nicht wieder aufgenommen werden. Guſtav Mahler, der in ſeinen erſten Werken die peinlich-ſorgfältigſten Erläuterungen ſeinen ſymphoniſchen Werken beifügte, hat ſeinen Zeitgenoſſen und Paladinen keine Aufſchlüſſe über ſein Schwanenlied gegeben. Wenigſtens vermögen ſeine Biographen und Mitarbeiter, von denen Bekker, Stefan und Specht genannt werden ſollen, kein authentiſches Material zu liefern. Gewiß,—die D-dur-Symphonie iſt Programm-Muſik, beſſer Bekenntnis-Muſik des Weltanſchauungs-Muſikers Guſtav Mahler, deſſen ganzes Schaffen Spiegelbild der Zeitumſtände, perſönlicher Beſchwerniſſe, ethiſcher und äſthetiſcher Probleme war und ſo gewertet werden muß. Eine ſchmerzliche bis zu Bitternis gravierende Stimmung durchzieht das „Andante comodo"; lichtere Momente werden ſchnell von Grau peſſimiſtiſcher Wolkenwände verhängt. Der zweite Satz, „Im Tempo eines gemächlichen Ländlers, etwas täppiſch und ſehr derb", gemahnt eher in ſeinen ſtarr umriſſenen Konturen, in der oft bizarren Orcheſtrierung an eine „Danſe Macabre"; „Rondo" und „Burleske" tragen ähnliche Weſenszüge, und ſelbſt der beſchließende Satz bringt nicht die Löſung, die Befreiung: Der Hörer gewinnt den Eindruck, als wenn hier ein Reſignierter dem Irdiſchen mit einer letzten großen Geſte der Enttäuſchung Lebewohl ſagt, um nicht auf ragendem Olymp in ein vergeiſtigtes Jenſeits einzugehen, ſondern um im Nirwana, im Auslöſchen Körper und Seele vergehen und verglimmen zu laſſen!

Rein muſikaliſch iſt die letzte Symphonie Mahlers eines der bedeutendſten Produkte ſympohniſchen Schaffens, und das trotz der mannigfaltigen Schwächen, die ihr in einer überdetaillierten, die große Sammlung, die konzentrierte Kraft ermangelnden Architektonik anhaften. Wie der einleitende Satz aus thematiſchen Partikeln zu einem wuchtigen Gebäude emporgeführt wird, das iſt eines der größten Beiſpiele ſymphoniſcher Struktur. Jene fernen, lockenden Hornrufe, die wir bereits in den „Nachtmuſiken" der E-moll-Symphonie wahrnehmen, ertönen wieder. Die Grundſtimmung iſt weich, reſigniert. Von ſchönſter melodiſcher Führung iſt die Behandlung der Soloſtimmen gegen Schluß des Satzes. Klangmaleriſch zeigen dieſer wie die folgenden Sätze wieder den Tonzauberer, der neben Richard Strauß nicht ſeinesgleichen findet. Wie hier oft die ſeltſamſten Farbenkombinationen neben- und übereinander geſetzt werden, wie vor allem die Holz-Inſtrumente mit Oberton-Effekten ausgeſtattet werden, wie dabei die Geſamtleinwand doch faſt immer ihre Leuchtkraft, ihre harmoniſche Farbverteilung, ihre Tiefenwirkung bewahrt, — das konnte nur von einem, in all ſeinem Leid und vielleicht gerade darum genialen Muſiker geſchaffen werden. —

Paul Bekker behauptet, der dritte Satz habe im Original die Widmung „Meinen Brüdern in Appoll" getragen. Vielleicht erklären ſich ſo die melodiſchen Banalitäten, das aufgebauſchte Klangbild am beſten, mit denen der Kämpfer und Dulder Mahler ſeinen ſelbſtzufriedenen „Brüdern in Appoll" Spott mit Spott und Hohn mit Hohn vergilt. — Von energiſch betontem Rhythmus, reſonanter Kraft iſt der Streichkörper im beſchließenden „Adagio". Mit einem immenſen orcheſtralen Aufgebot ſtrebt der Komponiſt hier zum dynamiſchen Klimax und dann verklingt allmählich dieſer letzte Ausbruch eines ſentimentalen Romantikers und die Erde mit ihrem Leid bleibt weit unter ihm zurück. — Der Kreis iſt geſchloſſen. — Das abſolute Nichts hat ihn wieder! — — —

Man möchte dem Orcheſter und ſeinem Dirigenten für eine prächtige Wiedergabe lange Lobeshymnen ſingen. Wie die Streicher, wie das unvergleichliche Bläſerkorps dem Leiter folgten, — das war ſelten, das war Erleben! — Kouſſevitzky waltete über der Partitur mit heiligem Eifer, mit feinem Formverſtehen und inniger Einfühlung in den Geiſt des Werkes.

Und das Publikum ſpendete dem Schwanenlied Guſtav Mahlers, dem Dirigenten und ſeinen Muſikern herzlichen, wohlverdienten Beifall....

J. H. M.

TROMMER'S
White Label Malz-Bräu
Gebraut aus erlesenem importiertem Mährischem Malz und importiertem zertifiziertem Saazer Hopfen
Die Premiere von TROMMER'S berühmten Bräuen
Unsere anderen Bräu—hell, dunkel und Oktober-Bräu — sind aus dem feinsten erlesenen Malz und importiertem böhmischem Hopfen gebraut
Am ZAPF u. auf Flaschen gezogen
:::ÜBERALL:::

---

bune ny Works ram hestra, in and Sat-dcan pera Frid a wn here.
suite for d Allegro
d Schu-certo will America
next Friuel Dushond symopen the Stravintakes his Chalmers
Clifton and Gustav Holst will conduct the Boston Symphony, the former during the week of January 10 and the latter in the week of January 17. Mr. Holst, who is about to make his second visit to Boston, will be connected with the music department of Harvard University for the remainder of the college year.

THIS CLIPPING FROM FALL RIVER, MASS.
HERALD-NEWS

DEC 29 1931

Boston Symphony to Play Twice This Week

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give the ~~11th~~ pair of concerts in Symphony hall Friday afternoon and Saturday night. Dr. Koussevitzky will give the first American performance of Stravinsky's concerto in D, for violin and orchestra.

This work has been performed in London and Berlin this season. The movements comprise Toccato, two Arias and Capriccio. Samuel Dushkin, who was the violinist in the European performances, will play the solo part. D'Indy's Second Symphony in B flat major will open the concert, and the orchestral suite from Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" will be the concluding number.

R. G. de T.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
Brooklyn Standard Union

DEC 29 1931

Cellist Knows 300 Works

BOSTON, Dec. 29 (UP).—Jean Bedetti, first cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, knows 300 complete works by memory.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION-STAR

DEC 23 1931

Boston Sympothny will play a new Gershwin symphony, "The Second Rhapsody," for first time January 29.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
Journal of Commerce

DEC 24 1931

* * *

George Gershwin's "The Second Rhapsody" will be given its first public performance with the Boston Symphony January 29 and 30, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting and Mr. Gershwin at the piano. Mr. Koussevitzky considers the competition one of America's finest.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
YONKERS, N. Y.
HERALD

DEC 24 1931

CELLIST KNOWS 300 WORKS

Boston, Dec. 24.—Jean Bedetti, first cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, knows 300 complete works by memory.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
STAR

DEC 26 1931

Ravel's 'Valse' Is Latest Issue of Boston Symphony

Ravel's popular "Boleco" is a good example of the stimulus exerted on this composer by a simple dance motif. "La Valse" is another. In each of these compositions, Ravel is inspired to his most brilliant efforts in instrumentation and climactic effects.

A new recording of "La Valse," by the Boston Symphony orchestra under Koussevitzky (Victor, 7413-14) is a happy coupling of composer and interpreter—as happy and as successful as the "Daphnis et Chloe" which was issued about a year ago.

Ravel apotheosizes the waltz in this tense and glittering work. In it are heard the charm and lilt that are typically Viennese and Johann Strauss, but with something momentous and significant added to them. The waltz, at the beginning, seems to rise from dark shrouding mists, growing more defined as it progresses and finally reaching up to dazzling heights at the finale.

The interpretation is quite as fine as are all of the Boston's recordings, with spaciousness of tone and wide variety in color and
bre. The odd side is devote vel's transcription of "Danse," beautifully

Trio No. 7 in B fl Archduke" (Beethover
by Alfred Cortot, pi

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAPH

DEC 27 1931

Fiddler Here to Sell Stravinsky

Samuel Dushkin, violinist, is here especially designated by Stravinsky to introduce to this country his new concerto for violin and symphony orchestra.

Performances of this work, the first of its kind written by Stravinsky, will be given in six cities, with Dushkin appearing each time as solo artist. The American premiere will be given by Koussevitzki and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, January 1 and 2.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

DEC 27 1931

Chalmers Clifton will be guest conductor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in three concerts—at the Sanders Theatre in Cambridge on Jan. 14 and at Symphony Hall in Boston on Jan. 15 and 16. His program will include Handel's Concerto Grosso in F, Op. 6, No. 9; Griffes's Poem for flute and orchestra, excerpts from "Götterdämmerung," and Sibelius's Second symphony, in D.

The Boston Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will give the first American performance of Stravinsky's new violin concerto in Boston next Friday and Saturday. Samuel Dushkin, who played the solo part in the concerto's première abroad, will play it here. The program will also include Stravinsky's "Petruchka" suite and Vincent d'Indy's Second symphony, in B flat.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MT. VERNON, N. Y.
ARGUS

DEC 29 1931

CELLIST KNOWS 300 WORKS

BOSTON, Dec. 29 (UP).—Jean Bedetti, first cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, knows 300 complete works by memory.

aats-Zeitung, Freitag, den 20. November 1931.

Sheh r, die Tochter des verbannten greiſen Exſultans der Türkei, der bis zu ſeinem Sturze den Titel des „Kalifen", des letzten Erben der Herrſcherwürde Mohammeds, führte, und gleichzeitig wurde ein Neffe des Niſam, Prinz Moazzam Jah, mit einer Nichte des Sultans, der Sultana Nilufar Gannin, religiös getraut.

Das glänzende Feſt, zu dem ſich kündigt einen ne

h um Sparsamk

„Symphonie No. 10" iſt nicht worden —, über Perſönlichkeit un bild Guſtav Mahlers iſt erſt für einem Einführungsartikel der einer Würdigung gemacht worde todkrank aus New York nach W rückgekehrte ſollte ſein Werk nic hören, trotzdem ſeine Entſtehung
Jahr 1909 zurückgeht. Er ſtarb
Mai 1911, körperlich und ſeel brochen; ſein Schüler Bruno brachte die „Neunte" im folgende zur Uraufführung. Es muſ raſchen, daß die D-dur-Symph die Mehrzahl von Mahlers ſy ſchen Werken, bis heute in Ne unbekannt geblieben ſind, trotz
Komponiſten von ſeiner Täti Metropolitan und Philharmoni cheſter her viele Bande mit be und ihren Muſikfreunden ve
Jedoch, — gerade die neunte S

TROMMER
White Label Malz-
Gebraut aus erlesenem im
Mährischem Malz und impo zertifiziertem Saazer Hopf Die Premiere vo
TROMMER'S
berühmten Bräue
Unsere anderen Bräu—hell, dunk Oktober-Bräu — sind aus dem fe erlesenen Malz und impor
böhmischem Hopfen gebrau
Am ZAPF u. auf Flaschen gez
:::ÜBERALL:

N-GE CHER — Korrekter ch Grosse, Gesetzte
50 Mit

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION-STAR

DEC 23 1931

Boston Sympothny will play a new Gershwin symphony, "The Second Rhapsody," for first time January 29.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
Journal of Commerce

DEC 24 1931

* * *

George Gershwin's "The Second Rhapsody" will be given its first public performance with the Boston Symphony January 29 and 30, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting and Mr. Gershwin at the piano. Mr. Koussevitzky considers the competition one of America's finest.

* * * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
YONKERS, N. Y.
HERALD

DEC 24 1931

CELLIST KNOWS 300 WORKS

Boston, Dec. 24.—Jean Bedetti, first cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, knows 300 complete works by memory.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
STAR

DEC 26 1931

Ravel's 'Valse' Is Latest Issue of Boston Symphony

Ravel's popular "Boleco" is a good example of the stimulus exerted on this composer by a simple dance motif. "La Valse" is another. In each of these compositions, Ravel is inspired to his most brilliant efforts in instrumentation and climactic effects.

A new recording of "La Valse" by the Boston Symphony orchestra under Koussevitzky (Victor, 7413-14) is a happy coupling of composer and interpreter—as happy and as successful as the "Daphnis et Chloe" which was issued about a year ago.

Ravel apotheosizes the waltz in this tense and glittering work. In it are heard the charm and lilt that are typically Viennese and Johann Strauss, but with something momentous and significant added to them. The waltz, at the beginning, seems to rise from dark shrouding mists, growing more defined as it progresses and finally reaching up to dazzling heights at the finale.

The interpretation is quite as fine as are all of the Boston's recordings, with spaciousness of tone and wide variety in color and bre. The odd side is devote vel's transcription of "Danse," beautifully

Trio No. 7 in B fl Archduke" (Beethove by Alfred Cort ha d, violin

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

DEC 26 1931

DUSHKIN, VIOLINIST, BACK.

Brings New Stravinsky Concerto for Performance Here.

Samuel Dushkin, violinist, returned yesterday from Europe on the Leviathan. He made his début here six years ago with the New York Symphony Orchestra and has been playing abroad for three years.

He said that he had brought with him a new concerto by Stravinsky which he would play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky on Friday. He will give the same composition in Philadelphia on Jan. 5 with the orchestra there under Leopold Stokowski and at Carnegie Hall on Feb. 1. The work had its world première in Berlin in October.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST

DEC 26 1931

NEW CONCERTO ARRIVES

Samuel Dushkin, violinist, who has just returned from Europe on the Leviathan after playing abroad for three years, said today that he brought with him a new concerto by Stravinsky, which he would play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky Friday.

He will give the same composition in Philadelphia on January 5 with the orchestra there under Leopold Stokowski and at Carnegie Hall on February 1. The work had its world premiere in Berlin in October.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PINE BLUFF, ARK.
COMMERCIAL

DEC 26 1931

CELLIST KNOWS 300 WORKS

BOSTON, — (UP) —Jean Bedetti, first cellist of the Boston Symphony orchestra, knows 300 complete works by memory.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PADUCAH, KY.
SUN-DEMOCRAT

DEC 27 1931

CELLIST KNOWS 300 WORKS

BOSTON, Dec. 26 (UP)—Jean Bodetti, first cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, knows 300 complete works by memory.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAPH

DEC 27 1931

Fiddler Here to Sell Stravinsky

Samuel Dushkin, violinist, is here especially designated by Stravinsky to introduce to this country his new concerto for violin and symphony orchestra.

Performances of this work, the first of its kind written by Stravinsky, will be given in six cities, with Dushkin appearing each time as solo artist. The American premiere will be given by Koussevitzki and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, January 1 and 2.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

DEC 27 1931

Chalmers Clifton will be guest conductor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in three concerts—at the Sanders Theatre in Cambridge on Jan. 14 and at Symphony Hall in Boston on Jan. 15 and 16. His program will include Handel's Concerto Grosso in F, Op. 6, No. 9; Griffes's Poem for flute and orchestra, excerpts from "Götterdämmerung," and Sibelius's Second symphony, in D.

The Boston Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will give the first American performance of Stravinsky's new violin concerto in Boston next Friday and Saturday. Samuel Dushkin, who played the solo part in the concerto's première abroad, will play it here. The program will also include Stravinsky's "Petruchka" suite and Vincent d'Indy's Second symphony, in B flat.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald-Tribune

DEC 27 1931

Boston Symphony

D'Indy and Stravinsky Works on First 1932 Program

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in its concert of last Thursday and Saturday, gave the first American performances of a suite by Geza Frid a Hungarian composer unknown here. Other numbers were a Bach suite for flute, Ravel's Introduction and Allegro for harp and orchestra, and Schumann's third symphony.

Igor Stravinsky's violin concerto will be given for the first time in America in the Boston concerts of next Friday and Saturday, with Samuel Dushkin as the soloist. The second symphony of Vincent d'Indy will open the program, which closes with Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" suite While Serge Koussevitzky takes his annual January vacation, Chalmers Clifton and Gustav Holst will conduct the Boston Symphony, the former during the week of January 10 and the latter in the week of January 17. Mr. Holst, who is about to make his second visit to Boston, will be connected with the music department of Harvard University for the remainder of the college year.

THIS CLIPPING FROM FALL RIVER, MASS.
HERALD-NEWS

DEC 29 1931

Boston Symphony to Play Twice This Week

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give the 11th pair of concerts in Symphony hall Friday afternoon and Saturday night. Dr. Koussevitzky will give the first American performance of Stravinsky's concerto in D, for violin and orchestra.

This work has been performed in London and Berlin this season. The movements comprise Toccato, two Arias and Capriccio. Samuel Dushkin, who was the violinist in the European performances, will play the solo part. D'Indy's Second Symphony in B flat major will open the concert, and the orchestral suite from Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" will be the concluding number.

R. G. de T.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
Brooklyn Standard Union

DEC 29 1931

Cellist Knows 300 Works

BOSTON, Dec. 29 (UP).—Jean Bedetti, first cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, knows 300 complete works by memory.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MT. VERNON, N. Y.
ARGUS

DEC 29 1931

CELLIST KNOWS 300 WORKS

BOSTON, Dec. 29 (UP).—Jean Bedetti, first cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, knows 300 complete works by memory.

"The Orchestra plays with a sureness, a balance of the choirs, a precision of accent and nicety of shadings, a proportion of the inner parts, a variety of color and elasticity of pace. Mr. Koussevitzky is a leader of extraordinary temperament, orchestral control and imagination—the proof of his power is found in the vividness, force and color of his performances with the superb band that he has made the sensitive and almost infallible vehicle of his inspiration."—N.Y. Times.

FIVE PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS

BY THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
CONDUCTOR

Friday, November 20
Friday, January 8
Thursday, February 4
Friday, March 4
Friday, April 8

Evenings at 8:15 o'clock

OPERA HOUSE ACADEMY OF MUSIC

Season Tickets for the Series of Five Concerts: $12.50, $10.00, $8.00, $6.00. Boxes, $15.00, $12.50, $8.00.
Single Tickets for First Concert now on Sale: $2.75, $2.25, $1.75, $1.25. Boxes, $3.00, $2.50.

A Symphony Concert Of Cerebration

Dr. Koussevitzky Invites His Audience First to d'Indy, Then to Stravinsky

Trans. — Jan 2

STRAVINSKY is an eminent composer and the father of what, for the while, is an expensive family. As eminent composer he was bound, sooner or later, to write a Concerto for Violin. Few, with any length of years, have dodged this obligation; many have confronted it with alacrity. As father of a family in this deflational day, he must look to his income. Therefore when Mr. Samuel Dushkin, the violinist, came along with a thick bundle of bank-notes in one hand and a commission for a Violin-Concerto in the other, there was sound reason why Stravinsky should accept both. The resulting piece was played for the first time in America at the Symphony Concert of Friday afternoon. Mr. Dushkin, of course, took the violin-part. He will play it, indeed, wherever the Concerto is heard through two years to come. This policy of exclusion may irk a few other violinists with an inclination to modernisms; but the more serious aspect is the effect upon the Concerto itself.

For one hearer at least, Mr. Dushkin, yesterday afternoon, was rather lost in the shuffle. Interest in the new Concerto exceeded interest in him. The orchestral part, as it came from Dr. Koussevitzky, held the ear more than did the solo-part as it came from the violinist. Mr. Dushkin, relatively a pallid, gentle figure, has neither the tone nor the temperament, the musical or the personal saliency to stamp himself upon many a listener when Stravinsky, and also Koussevitzky, are in presence. As for the audience it heard intently and applauded roundly; but in what measure for the violinist and in what for the Concerto none may plausibly say. For a few the moment of the afternoon was an instant of embarrassment in the orchestra over rhythms changing almost measure for measure. The conductor, but not the violinist, cloaked it as best he might. Such incidents are so rare at Symphony Hall that they were sure to set the corridor quidnuncs a-buzzing.

Paper-impressions from reading and study of the new Concerto have been recorded twice in these columns. Sound-impressions, to be gathered for the first time Friday afternoon, confirmed, lessened or enhanced them. The sound impressions may be the more valid, since it is custom to say that a piece of music becomes its full self only in disclosing and vitalizing performance. Certainly they are the more material, since while ten are searching the score (Messrs. Schott: Mainz) under the study-lamp, ten thousand will be hearing it as the "newest Stravinsky." . . . First, then, the Violin-Concerto is virtuoso-piece in the eighteenth rather than the nineteenth-century sense of the word. It displays the violinist; yet preserves the integrity of the whole as symphonic piece, and not violin-solo with orchestral accompaniment. It invites the resource and stimulates the skill of the violinist; but puts no artificial and stunt-like obstacles in his way. In true eighteenth-century fashion, it gives him occasion to prove his taste in the two middle movements; his skill in the first and the fourth. The form, furthermore, derives from that century: Toccata; Aria I.; Aria II.; Caprice, without enchainment and so brief that the whole Concerto hardly exceeds twenty minutes.

Within this form the matter is economical and close-packed. There is no structural elaboration; usually the formal progress is simplified into a three-part shaping of each movement. Throughout Stravinsky was evidently minded to waste not a note. Scarcely a measure is so much "filling" or recourse to the nineteenth-century padding of "passage-work." In these respects the concentration of the composer's mind, the technical mastery of his hand, are unmistakable. . . . The quality of the musical matter is another story. In the Toccata it is light and gay, fluent and rhythmic, adroitly adaptable to form, key, the violin and the purposes of the Concerto. It is amusing enough to follow, but without distinction save in the play over it of harmonic, instrumental, and, in particular, violinistic color.

The two Arie consist of melodic outlines in free play,—the arabesques of the eighteenth century — sustained upon chord-formations as in the second, or wrought into a complex counterpoint as in the first. In the second Aria the outlines coalesce and expand into brief, broad melody for the violin. In the first, it is oftener heard decoratively. While the design and the color often engage the ear, interest the mind and entertain the fancy, the melodic substance makes little and, again, undistinguished, impression upon all three. . . . The Finale, though it has dark spots, is of the sparkling, sportive, chameleon-like Stravinsky, heard last season in the Caprice for Orchestra with Piano. Toward the end returns the Stravinsky who is master of ever-changing rhythms and swiftly flashing color. So distinguished, this Finale excels the other three divisions; is truly and compellingly Stravinskian.

When all is said and done, the Concerto for Violin leaves the same impression —minor differences aside—as have Stravinsky's other ventures into "pure" or "absolute" music. So far as the contemporary generation may sort out the work of a composer, it has already relegated to secondary place his Piano-Concerto and his Piano-Sonata, his Symphony and his Octuor, both for Wind Instruments; on the edge hangs such a jeu d' esprit as the Caprice of last year, while at the very bottom lies such occasional stuff as "Ragtime." The music that has made Stravinsky's fame and set him high among living composers is outspread in "Petrushka," "The Rite of Spring," "Œdipus Rex" and the "Psalms-Symphony." Every one of these four pieces runs to a text or to a scenario. Other music contained in "Renard," "The Fire-Bird," "Les Noces," "The Nightingale," "The Story of the Soldier," "Mavra" and, in degree, "Apollo Musagetes," bears only less witness to his distinctive and signal quality. Again all these pieces were written to text or scenario or folk-tale. In a word, to be his full, best and most characteristic self, Stravinsky must have something "on which to hang" his music, something from the theater, something from folk-lore, something—though the devotees curse the word—more or less "literary." Then he has not only something to write about but also something that unifies what he writes; suits his structural procedures; invites and stimulates his command of rhythm, color, movement; warms his invention; vitalizes his every needful power. (By chance or by deliberation Dr. Koussevitzky submitted clear proof—when next the Violin-Concerto he placed the familiar Suite from "Petrushka.")

Then emerges the potent Stravinsky of the four masterpieces, each in its genre; the full-charactered Stravinsky of the surrounding group. When, however, he would write a self-contained, self-sustaining music as in the Violin-Concerto of yesterday and its few predecessors, he sets himself an alien task to be accomplished by dint of will and mind and skilful hand. Toil as all three may, they have not yet accomplished the desired tour de force. Instead, they have produced an unimaginative, uncharacteristic, devitalized music. On the surface are the Stravinskian earmarks plainly enough—The Transcript's analysts have together enumerated them—but within is little of the life-giving and all-conquering Stravinsky who wrote "Le Sacre" and "Noces," who can still write "Œdipus Rex" and "The Psalms-Symphony." The prestige of his name carries his "absolute" music through a brief day; until in this instance Mr. Dushkin has had his money's worth. Then it slips out of ear and mind. Only seven years ago he himself brought the Piano-Concerto to Symphony Hall. Who now recalls so much as a measure of it? Who beside the composer has since lifted a finger to play it?

As though continuing the memorial rites began a fortnight ago with "Istar," d'Indy's Symphony in B-flat filled the first fifty minutes of the concert. (If we persist in a mourning more in evidence here than in the composer's own Paris, we may yet hear his "Summer Day on the Mountain" wherein the song in his heart caught into itself the logic in his head.) Through those fifty minutes there was hardly a rustle of restlessness. At the end came a long round of honest applause. In 1905, when the Symphony was new to Boston, ears and tongues battled against d'Indy's acrid harmonies and sharp-edged progressions; resented his keener strokes of instrumental color. Yesterday few thought twice about them except as the free-willed expression of the composer, contributing also to what is now the common stock of music. D'Indy wrote more than one page in his Symphony to demonstrate with French logic the validity of the cyclic theory and practice he had learned in composition from Franck. Nowadays they have to do with a dead issue. Whoever chooses may write music from germinal motivs; swing them full circle; go unscathed so long as it is good.

Twenty-five years ago there was argument in Paris over the symphonic form as sympathetic or alien to French composers. D'Indy, keen for every controversy, would prove that it stimulated him; scaled his symphony largely; magnified it to his utmost. If invention slackened, if emotional tension relaxed, he plied his mind only the harder. Inevitably dry and sterile pages result; pages that incite to the damning adjective "cerebral"; though some of us have yet to discover any music in the larger forms that was not achieved by mental process as well as by creative impulse.

Properly the audience was heedless of these reservations, if it even suspected their existence. It heard other matter in the Symphony; listened engrossed and stirred. For the traits that distinguish it are nearly non-existent in the music of this immediate day. D'Indy wrote on the grand scale; now miniatures are the fashion. He spoke nobly of the soul; whereas the present attitude toward it is often cynical. His themes are musical thoughts that he sets in vigorous motion, side by side, above or below each other, now opposed, now blended. To our short-winded age, he seems an impressively (or, maybe, a tediously) long-breathed composer. Writing, he slighted nothing; left nothing to chance; which is neither the slap-dash nor the slip-shod twentieth-century custom. He sought and gained the deep glows of the string choir—they were notable yesterday; the bitter-sweet speech of the woodwinds; the metallic as well as the smooth sonorities of the brass.

The beauty that d'Indy would compass, like the thought behind it, was often grave and austere, lofty and rarefied. Ears, it appeared yesterday, are still open to it; minds and hearts still touched by the purity of the flame. The complement was the feeling for the natural world, for the country-folk that people it, infusing "Summer Day on the Mountain," touching the viola's song in the scherzo of this B-flat symphony. For d'Indy was above all else, a subjective composer. He could look nowhere and write except in his mind and heart. To him at the close of his life our skeptical detachments were alien, incomprehensible.

Dr. Koussevitzky so timed, shaped, accented and colored this music that the best and enduring traits stood forth; that the intrinsic and not the temporary quality was salient. So heard, the d'Indy that could be dogmatist and bigot and blatant patriot; who staled in old age, went schoolmasterish and lived in superior isolation, blew down the wind. Instead rose the image of a spacious and lofty mind, clear and alert as a French mind should be, of a genuinely exalted and believing spirit, aristocratic but not unfriendly, who spoke austerely yet nobly because for him there was no other way. Our musical inheritance from d'Indy is meager; but it is like no other our time has yielded. The bitter in it clears the tongue.

H. T. P.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Herald Jan. 2

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the Boston Symphony orchestra, conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall, was as follows: D'Indy, symphony No. 2, B flat major; Stravinsky, concerto in D for violin; Stravinsky, suite from the ballet, "Petrouchka."

The concerto was played for the first time in the United States. Mr. Samuel Dushkin brought it out in Berlin on October 23, 1931. He introduced it later in London and Paris. It is said that he has a proprietary right on it for two or three years, so he wishes to be identified with it. It is doubtful whether any violinist will dispute his right; the concerto abounds in technical difficulties, the music can hardly be called grateful to performer or pleasing to the average audience. The music is that of the Stravinsky in his latest phase. Did Dr. Koussevitzky by putting the concerto and the "Petrouchka" suite close together wish to remind the audience that there was another Stravinsky, a man of fancy, dramatic instinct, humorous on occasion, as well as the Stravinsky of the last years, whose stream of invention seems to have run dry, a man of patterns, dabs of phrases with endless repetitions?

There are four movements in this concerto: a toccata, a sort of perpetuum mobile, by far the most interesting section of the work; two arias, dry, sterile music devoid of grace, or dignity or emotion; and a capriccio for a finale rhythmically entertaining. The whole concerto is on the surface. There is opportunity for the violinist to show his skill; there are tricks in the instrumentation that amuse the hearer who values the unexpected, the uncommon.

Mr. Dushkin took full advantage of the opportunities offered; the music confined him to a merely technical display. When he played here at a Monday night concert of the orchestra in March, 1928, he chose a concerto by Mozart. There was a time when Stravinsky talked of going back to Mozart, as at another time he thought he would write in the manner of Bach. Would that he would, and could, write in the manner of the earlier Stravinsky.

Mr. Dushkin pleased the audience. He was recalled several times. The music of Petrouchka of course, needs the action on the stage. This has been said many times of any suite derived from a modern ballet. Yet in the playhouse, if one looks intently at the stage, the music is only half heard and at random. Listen as intently as you will to the music, the spectacle and the evolutions insist upon your attention. And so concert performances of ballet music are useful, especially to those who have seen the ballets and enjoy reconstructing mentally the various epi-

---

SYMPHONY GIVES NEW CONCERTO

Post — Jan 2

Stravinsky's Work for Violin Played by Dushkin

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

If other symphony concerts have provided deeper satisfactions, few have offered more food for reflection than that of yesterday, which included the Second Symphony of d'Indy, Stravinsky's new Violin Concerto and the suite from the latter composer's "Petrouchka."

D'INDY'S SECOND

Since this Symphony in B flat is d'Indy's most imposing, most considerable orchestral work, it was fitting that Dr. Koussevitzky should play it as memorial, even though he had already marked the French composer's passing by a revival of the superb "Istar" Variations. Three weeks ago the Variations carried all before them, while a re-hearing of the Symphony recalled the approach of over-intellectuality that d'Indy's admirers were once prone to dispute and disclaim. Is not this symphony, after all, a product of the head rather than of the heart, a music almost too perfect, in which there is no fine frenzy, a music that is reasoned and calculated, flawlessly proportioned and marvellously factured, yet emotionally cold?

That which once passed in it for warmth and richness, as in the second movement, is now revealed as merely an idiom compounded of Franckian and Wagnerian sensuousness slightly curbed and corrected by d'Indian austerity. Today we have become used to orchestral and harmonic richness. These things, so easily accomplished, no longer excite us of themselves. And even the upswelling chorale at the symphony's end seemed yesterday of an intellectual rather than an emotional fervor, though the audience's response to this sonorous peroration was hearty and prolonged.

Stravinsky's Concerto

The first American performance of Stravinsky's Violin Concerto, with Samuel Dushkin, for whom it was written, as the soloist, must count as a major musical event even though the piece itself prove intrinsically unimportant. The Stravinsky of today is a musical chameleon — witness the "Appolon Musagete," the "Oedipus," the "Symphony of Psalms," the Capriccio, and now this Concerto. In the last named, which is entertaining enough to hear and no more formidable or fearsome than was the equally amiable Capriccio, the listener is reminded now of Paganini, now of Bach.

In the second of the four brief movements much use is made of a figure derived, no doubt unconsciously, from a theme in the second act of "Die Walkuere." There is a hint in the fourth division of Drdla's well-known "Souvenir," and not only is this music prevailingly undistinguished and derivative, individual only in certain peculiarities of harmony, rhythm and instrumentation, it is often merely trivial.

Recalls for Mr. Dushkin

The music of "Petrouchka," like that of "The Firebird," is wearing thin, but at least it has style and consistency. Hearing it, one thinks of Stravinsky alone, and perhaps of the Russian folk to whom he is indebted for the only salient melodies in the score.

Both Concerto and Suite, barring a temporary mishap in the former, were brilliantly performed yesterday. There were many recalls for Mr. Dushkin, who accomplished his difficult task with apparent ease.

MUSIC

Globe Jan 2

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The first performance in the United States of Stravinsky's new concerto for violin, at yesterday's Symphony concert, was applauded with more warmth than the ultra-conservative Friday audience usually shows for modern music, though one might have wished for even heartier applause for this latest important work of the most distinguished of living composers.

The familiar suite from "Petruchka," an acknowledged masterpiece now, whatever people felt when Stravinsky wrote it 20 years ago, was also on the program. The only other number was d'Indy's second Symphony.

Stravinsky's concerto has nothing in common with the 19th Century violin concertos of Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Saint-Saens, Brahms, and the rest. It is not a big display piece full of sound and fury, interspersed with cadenzas. It is chamber music, for a small orchestra, in which the solo violin is the most important instrument rather than what the Victorian play bills dubbed "an added attraction."

The solo part appears to a mere listener to be quite as difficult to play as those in the standard virtuoso repertory of concertos. Mr Dushkin, the young and relatively obscure violinist selected by Stravinsky to introduce this concerto in Paris, London, Berlin, and now in Boston, gave a wholly admirable performance. He has rhythmic sense, the feeling for 20th Century melody the work demands.

Except that the melodic style suggests 17th and 18th Century music rather than Russian folk song, the new concerto does not represent a Stravinsky who has broken with his own past. The rhythms are a logical evolution from those in "Petruchka," the scoring is more subtle, less obvious in its brilliance, yet not radically different. There is somewhat more polyphony, an interweaving of rhythms rather than of melodies, than in "Petruchka," but no more than in many of the composer's earlier works.

Stravinsky's originality of manner and of substance can hardly be disputed. What really matters most is, of course, that the music should captivate the listener. This "Petruchka" did yesterday even after repeated hearings. This the new concerto also did at a first hearing. All that a newspaper reviewer can really say about a new work is that it did, or did not send little shivers up and down his spine. He is, or he fails to be, in Victorian phraseology, "captivated." One enthralled by Stravinsky can only repeat a profession of faith that he is the most distinguished of living composers, the surest of being in the repertory in the next century.

It was curious to observe yesterday the utter divergence between the 19th century manner of d'Indy and the modernity of Stravinsky. D'Indy wanted his music to be grand, to be uplifting, to be full of soul, to be inspiring. He strove a bit to consciously to plan the work on a grand scale. He could not evade the influence of Wagnerian harmony and of the style of Cesar Franck. But he did succeed in writing a thoroughly earnest, dignified, tasteful symphony, with some originality of manner and a certain depth of feeling.

Stravinsky is not in the least disposed to d'Indy's type of ethical culture in music. He obviously loathes the grandiose 19th century forms, the deadly earnestness of tone so manifest in d'Indy. Stravinsky merely wants to make a subtle pattern, chiefly of rhythms, to convey in tones his own perception that the world, if not a moral place, is, at all events, a thrilling one. He is not afraid to be brief, not afraid to be gay, not afraid to be cynical. In these matters he is akin to his own generation, that of the men now between 20 and 50.

There are no concerts next week, as the orchestra goes on tour. P. R.

A Symphony Concert Of Cerebration

Dr. Koussevitzky Invites His Audience First to d'Indy, Then to Stravinsky

Trans. — Jan 2

STRAVINSKY is an eminent composer and the father of what, for the while, is an expensive family. As eminent composer he was bound, sooner or later, to write a Concerto for Violin. Few, with any length of years, have dodged this obligation; many have confronted it with alacrity. As father of a family in this deflational day, he must look to his income. Therefore when Mr. Samuel Dushkin, the violinist, came along with a thick bundle of bank-notes in one hand and a commission for a Violin-Concerto in the other, there was sound reason why Stravinsky should accept both. The resulting piece was played for the first time in America at the Symphony Concert of Friday afternoon. Mr. Dushkin, of course, took the violin-part. He will play it, indeed, wherever the Concerto is heard through two years to come. This policy of exclusion may irk a few other violinists with an inclination to modernisms; but the more serious aspect is the effect upon the Concerto itself.

For one hearer at least, Mr. Dushkin, yesterday afternoon, was rather lost in the shuffle. Interest in the new Concerto exceeded interest in him. The orchestral part, as it came from Dr. Koussevitzky, held the ear more than did the solo-part as it came from the violinist. Mr. Dushkin, relatively a pallid, gentle figure, has neither the tone nor the temperament, the musical or the personal saliency to stamp himself upon many a listener when Stravinsky, and also Koussevitzky, are in presence. As for the audience it heard intently and applauded roundly; but in what measure for the violinist and in what for the Concerto none may plausibly say. For a few the moment of the afternoon was an instant of embarrassment in the orchestra over rhythms changing almost measure for measure. The conductor, but not the violinist, cloaked it as best he might. Such incidents are so rare at Symphony Hall that they were sure to set the corridor quidnuncs a-buzzing.

Paper-impressions from reading and study of the new Concerto have been recorded twice in these columns. Sound-impressions, to be gathered for the first time Friday afternoon, confirmed, lessened or enhanced them. The sound impressions may be the more valid, since it is custom to say that a piece of music becomes its full self only in disclosing and vitalizing performance. Certainly they are the more material, since while ten are searching the score (Messrs Schott: Mainz) under the study-lamp, ten thousand will be hearing it as the "newest Stravinsky." . . . First, then, the Violin-Concerto is virtuoso-piece in the eighteenth rather than the nineteenth-century sense of the word. It displays the violinist; yet preserves the integrity of the whole as symphonic piece, and not violin-solo with orchestral accompaniment. It invites the resource and stimulates the skill of the violinist; but puts no artificial and stunt-like obstacles in his way. In true eighteenth-century fashion, it gives him occasion to prove his taste in the two middle movements; his skill in the first and the fourth. The form, furthermore, derives from that century: Toccata; Aria I.; Aria II.; Caprice, without enchainment and so brief that the whole Concerto hardly exceeds twenty minutes.

Within this form the matter is economical and close-packed. There is no structural elaboration; usually the formal progress is simplified into a three-part shaping of each movement. Throughout Stravinsky was evidently minded to waste not a note. Scarcely a measure is so much "filling" or recourse to the nineteenth-century padding of "passage-work." In these respects the concentration of the composer's mind, the technical mastery of his hand, are unmistakable. . . . The quality of the musical matter is another story. In the Toccata it is light and gay, fluent and rhythmic, adroitly adaptable to form, key, the violin and the purposes of the Concerto. It is amusing enough to follow, but without distinction save in the play over it of harmonic, instrumental, and, in particular, violinistic color.

The two Arie consist of melodic outlines in free play,—the arabesques of the eighteenth century — sustained upon chord-formations as in the second, or wrought into a complex counterpoint as in the first. In the second Aria the outlines coalesce and expand into brief, broad melody for the violin. In the first, it is oftener heard decoratively. While the design and the color often engage the ear, interest the mind and entertain the fancy, the melodic substance makes litt and, again undistinguished, impression upon all three. . . . The Finale, though it has dark spots, is of the sparkling, sportive, chameleon-like Stravinsky, heard last season in the Caprice for Orchestra with Piano. Toward the end returns the Stravinsky who is master of ever-changing rhythms and swiftly flashing color. So distinguished, this Finale excels the other three divisions; is truly and compellingly Stravinskian.

When all is said and done, the Concerto for Violin leaves the same impression—minor differences aside—as have Stravinsky's other ventures into "pure" or "absolute" music. So far as the contemporary generation may sort out the work of a composer, it has already relegated to secondary place his Piano-Concerto and his Piano-Sonata, his Symphony and his Octuor, both for Wind Instruments; on the edge hangs such a jeu d' esprit as the Caprice of last year, while at the very bottom lies such occasional stuff as "Ragtime." The music that has made Stravinsky's fame and set him high among living composers is outspread in "Petrushka," "The Rite of Spring," "Œdipus Rex" and the "Psalms-Symphony." Every one of these four pieces runs to a text or to a scenario. Other music contained in "Renard," "The Fire-Bird," "Les Noces," "The Nightingale," "The Story of the Soldier," "Mavra" and, in degree, "Apollo Musagetes," bears only less witness to his distinctive and signal quality. Again all these pieces were written to text or scenario or folk-tale. In a word, to be his full, best and most characteristic self, Stravinsky must have something "on which to hang" his music, something from the theater, something from folk-lore, something—though the devotees curse the word—more or less "literary." Then he has not only something to write about but also something that unifies what he writes; suits his structural procedures; invites and stimulates his command of rhythm, color, movement; warms his invention; vitalizes his every needful power. (By chance or by deliberation Dr. Koussevitzky submitted clear proof—when next the Violin-Concerto he placed the familiar Suite from "Petrushka.")

Then emerges the potent Stravinsky of the four masterpieces, each in its genre; the full-charactered Stravinsky of the surrounding group. When, however, he would write a self-contained, self-sustaining music as in the Violin-Concerto of yesterday and its few predecessors, he sets himself an alien task to be accomplished by dint of will and mind and skilful hand. Toil as all three may, they have not yet accomplished the desired tour de force. Instead, they have produced an unimaginative, uncharacteristic, devitalized music. On the surface are the Stravinskian earmarks plainly enough—The Transcript's analysts have together enumerated them—but within is little of the life-giving and all-conquering Stravinsky who wrote "Le Sacre" and "Noces," who can still write "Œdipus of New Hampshire. The foregoing statement renders it unnecessary for me to answer your other questions at this time.

---

"Permit me to observe your remarks show that you are surprised that a Western man should think of securing the support of an Eastern man and that surprises me and causes me to fear that you fail to understand that the economic errors now bankrupting the country are universal and require universal remedies to ameliorate the condition of all sections. Please do not overlook the fact that the little business man in New Hampshire suffers from the same cause as the little man in Oklahoma, the farmer of New Hampshire equally with that of the farmer of Oklahoma."

To Elect March 8

New Hampshire will elect its delegates to the Republican and Democratic national conventions at the March town meetings and special elections in cities on March 8. Delegates can pledge themselves to a specific candidate and in such cases the name of the candidate and the pledge of the delegate is printed on the official ballots. A delegate elected under this pledge can vote for no other candidate until released by the candidate to whom he is pledged. Candidates for delegate to the national conventions can pay a filing fee of ten dollars or submit the signatures of 100 legal voters in the State.

It was the pledge to Coolidge in 1924 by the majority of candidates for delegate to the Republican national convention that permitted a popular referendum in New Hampshire on the Coolidge candidacy and resulted in the defeat of United States Senator George H. Moses, who announced he was for Coolidge but refused to pledge under the New Hampshire law.

May Pass Tariff Bill Next Week

Washington, Jan. 2 (A.P.)—Speaker Garner said today the draft of the Democratic tariff measure will be submitted to the joint Senate House policy committee Monday and that it will be introduced immediately after approval by that group. Hearings probably will get under way

---

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Herald Jan. 2

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the Boston Symphony orchestra, conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall, was as follows: D'Indy, symphony No. 2, B flat major; Stravinsky, concerto in D for violin; Stravinsky, suite from the ballet, "Petrouchka."

The concerto was played for the first time in the United States. Mr. Samuel Dushkin brought it out in Berlin on October 23, 1931. He introduced it later in London and Paris. It is said that he has a proprietary right on it for two or three years, so he wishes to be identified with it. It is doubtful whether any violinist will dispute his right; the concerto abounds in technical difficulties, the music can hardly be called grateful to performer or pleasing to the average audience. The music is that of the Stravinsky in his latest phase. Did Dr. Koussevitzky by putting the concerto and the "Petrouchka" suite close together wish to remind the audience that there was another Stravinsky, a man of fancy, dramatic instinct, humorous on occasion, as well as the Stravinsky of the last years, whose stream of invention seems to have run dry, a man of patterns, dabs of phrases with endless repetitions?

There are four movements in this concerto: a toccata, a sort of perpetuum mobile, by far the most interesting section of the work; two arias, dry, sterile music devoid of grace, or dignity or emotion; and a capriccio for a finale rhythmically entertaining. The whole concerto is on the surface. There is opportunity for the violinist to show his skill; there are tricks in the instrumentation that amuse the hearer who values the unexpected, the uncommon.

Mr. Dushkin took full advantage of the opportunities offered: the music confined him to a merely technical display. When he played here at a Monday night concert of the orchestra in March, 1928, he chose a concerto by Mozart. There was a time when Stravinsky talked of going back to Mozart, as at another time he thought he would write in the manner of Bach. Would that he would, and could, write in the manner of the earlier Stravinsky.

Mr. Dushkin pleased the audience. He was recalled several times. The music of Petrouchka of course, needs the action on the stage. This has been said many times of any suite derived from a modern ballet. Yet in the playhouse, if one looks intently at the stage, the music is only half heard and at random. Listen as intently as you will to the music, the spectacle and the evolutions insist upon your attention. And so concert performances of ballet music are useful, especially to those who have seen the ballets and enjoy reconstructing mentally the various episodes. The music of the 18th century ballets and of those even down to the time of Delibes, Goldmark, Gounod, Rubinstein bear better the transference to the concert hall.

It was well to begin a new year with music as lofty and noble as is found in the majority of d'Indy's pages.

Only the finale sinks below the prevailing high level, and there are fine moments in the introduction to this finale. It is natural that the influence of Cesar Frank is shown especially in the two middle movements. So great was d'Indy's devotion to his master that he proudly admitted the influence; but d'Indy was no mere copyist; the greatest pages of the symphony are his own.

When the work was first heard here a quarter of a century ago it was a stumbling block to the reactionaries of 1905. Yet they were not violent in opposition. No one went so far as a Berlin critic who, when Busoni brought out the second symphony, described it as "hideous non-music "(nmusik"), teeming with painfully absurd harmonies." And now Berliners rejoice in Schoenberg, Webern and Berg; they even crowded a huge hall to hear this concerto by Stravinsky and tumultuously applauded it.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The next pair of concerts will be on Jan. 15, 16. Chalmers Clifton will conduct them. Handel, concerto grosso for strings, F major, op. 6, No. 9 (first time in Boston). Griffes, poem for flute (Mr. Laurent), and orchestra (first time at these concerts). Wagner, Daybreak and Siegfried's Rhine Journey from "Dusk of the Gods." Sibelius, symphony No. 2, D major.

SYMPHONY GIVES NEW CONCERTO

Post — Jan 2

Stravinsky's Work for Violin Played by Dushkin

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

If other symphony concerts have provided deeper satisfactions, few have offered more food for reflection than that of yesterday, which included the Second Symphony of d'Indy, Stravinsky's new Violin Concerto and the suite from the latter composer's "Petrouchka."

D'INDY'S SECOND

Since this Symphony in B flat is d'Indy's most imposing, most considerable orchestral work, it was fitting that Dr. Koussevitzky should play it as memorial, even though he had already marked the French composer's passing by a revival of the superb "Istar" Variations. Three weeks ago the Variations carried all before them, while a re-hearing of the Symphony recalled the approach of over-intellectuality that d'Indy's admirers were once prone to dispute and disclaim. Is not this symphony, after all, a product of the head rather than of the heart, a music almost too perfect, in which there is no fine frenzy, a music that is reasoned and calculated, flawlessly proportioned and marvellously factured, yet emotionally cold?

That which once passed in it for warmth and richness, as in the second movement, is now revealed as merely an idiom compounded of Franckian and Wagnerian sensuousness slightly curbed and corrected by d'Indian austerity. Today we have become used to orchestral and harmonic richness. These things, so easily accomplished, no longer excite us of themselves. And even the upswelling chorale at the symphony's end seemed yesterday of an intellectual rather than an emotional fervor, though the audience's response to this sonorous peroration was hearty and prolonged.

Stravinsky's Concerto

The first American performance of Stravinsky's Violin Concerto, with Samuel Dushkin, for whom it was written, as the soloist, must count as a major musical event even though the piece itself prove intrinsically unimportant. The Stravinsky of today is a musical chameleon — witness the "Appolon Musagete," the "Oedipus," the "Symphony of Psalms," the Capriccio, and now this Concerto. In the last named, which is entertaining enough to hear and no more formidable or fearsome than was the equally amiable Capriccio, the listener is reminded now of Paganini, now of Bach.

In the second of the four brief movements much use is made of a figure derived, no doubt unconsciously, from a theme in the second act of "Die Walkuere." There is a hint in the fourth division of Drdla's well-known "Souvenir," and not only is this music prevailingly undistinguished and derivative, individual only in certain peculiarities of harmony, rhythm and instrumentation, it is often merely trivial.

Recalls for Mr. Dushkin

The music of "Petrouchka," like that of "The Firebird," is wearing thin, but at least it has style and consistency. Hearing it, one thinks of Stravinsky alone, and perhaps of the Russian folk to whom he is indebted for the only salient melodies in the score.

Both Concerto and Suite, barring a temporary mishap in the former, were brilliantly performed yesterday. There were many recalls for Mr. Dushkin, who accomplished his difficult task with apparent ease.

MUSIC

Globe Jan 2

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The first performance in the United States of Stravinsky's new concerto for violin, at yesterday's Symphony concert, was applauded with more warmth than the ultra-conservative Friday audience usually shows for modern music, though one might have wished for even heartier applause for this latest important work of the most distinguished of living composers.

The familiar suite from "Petruchka," an acknowledged masterpiece now, whatever people felt when Stravinsky wrote it 20 years ago, was also on the program. The only other number was d'Indy's second Symphony.

Stravinsky's concerto has nothing in common with the 19th Century violin concertos of Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Saint-Saens, Brahms, and the rest. It is not a big display piece full of sound and fury, interspersed with cadenzas. It is chamber music, for a small orchestra, in which the solo violin is the most important instrument rather than what the Victorian play bills dubbed "an added attraction."

The solo part appears to a mere listener to be quite as difficult to play as those in the standard virtuoso repertory of concertos. Mr Dushkin, the young and relatively obscure violinist selected by Stravinsky to introduce this concerto in Paris, London, Berlin, and now in Boston, gave a wholly admirable performance. He has rhythmic sense, the feeling for 20th Century melody the work demands.

Except that the melodic style suggests 17th and 18th Century music rather than Russian folk song, the new concerto does not represent a Stravinsky who has broken with his own past. The rhythms are a logical evolution from those in "Petruchka," the scoring is more subtle, less obvious in its brilliance, yet not radically different. There is somewhat more polyphony, an interweaving of rhythms rather than of melodies, than in "Petruchka," but no more than in many of the composer's earlier works.

Stravinsky's originality of manner and of substance can hardly be disputed. What really matters most is, of course, that the music should captivate the listener. This "Petruchka" did yesterday even after repeated hearings. This the new concerto also did at a first hearing. All that a newspaper reviewer can really say about a new work is that it did, or did not send little shivers up and down his spine. He is, or he fails to be, in Victorian phraseology, "captivated." One enthralled by Stravinsky can only repeat a profession of faith that he is the most distinguished of living composers, the surest of being in the repertory in the next century.

It was curious to observe yesterday the utter divergence between the 19th century manner of d'Indy and the modernity of Stravinsky. D'Indy wanted his music to be grand, to be uplifting, to be full of soul, to be inspiring. He strove a bit to consciously to plan the work on a grand scale. He could not evade the influence of Wagnerian harmony and of the style of Cesar Franck. But he did succeed in writing a thoroughly earnest, dignified, tasteful symphony, with some originality of manner and a certain depth of feeling.

Stravinsky is not in the least disposed to d'Indy's type of ethical culture in music. He obviously loathes the grandiose 19th century forms, the deadly earnestness of tone so manifest in d'Indy. Stravinsky merely wants to make a subtle pattern, chiefly of rhythms, to convey in tones his own perception that the world, if not a moral place, is, at all events, a thrilling one. He is not afraid to be brief, not afraid to be gay, not afraid to be cynical. In these matters he is akin to his own generation, that of the men now between 20 and 50.

There are no concerts next week, as the orchestra goes on tour. P. R.

91

A Symphony Concert Of Cerebration

Dr. Koussevitzky Invites His Audience First to d'Indy, Then to Stravinsky

Trans. — Jan 2

STRAVINSKY is an eminent composer and the father of what, for the while, is an expensive family. As eminent composer he was bound, sooner or later, to write a Concerto for Violin. Few, with any length of years, have dodged this obligation; many have confronted it with alacrity. As father of a family in this deflational day, he must look to his income. Therefore when Mr. Samuel Dushkin, the violinist, came along with a thick bundle of bank-notes in one hand and a commission for a Violin-Concerto in the other, there was sound reason why Stravinsky should accept both. The resulting piece was played for the first time in America at the Symphony Concert of Friday afternoon. Mr. Dushkin, of course, took the violin-part. He will play it, indeed, wherever the Concerto is heard through two years to come. This policy of exclusion may irk a few other violinists with an inclination to modernisms; but the more serious aspect is the effect upon the Concerto itself.

For one hearer at least, Mr. Dushkin, yesterday afternoon, was rather lost in the shuffle. Interest in the new Concerto exceeded interest in him. The orchestral part, as it came from Dr. Koussevitzky, held the ear more than did the solo-part as it came from the violinist. Mr. Dushkin, relatively a pallid, gentle figure, has neither the tone nor the temperament, the musical or the personal saliency to stamp himself upon many a listener when Stravinsky, and also Koussevitzky, are in presence. As for the audience it heard intently and applauded roundly; but in what measure for the violinist and in what for the Concerto none may plausibly say. For a few the moment of the afternoon was an instant of embarrassment in the orchestra over rhythms changing almost measure for measure. The conductor, but not the violinist, cloaked it as best he might. Such incidents are so rare at Symphony Hall that they were sure to set the corridor quidnuncs a-buzzing.

Paper-impressions from reading and study of the new Concerto have been recorded twice in these columns. Sound-impressions, to be gathered for the first time Friday afternoon, confirmed, lessened or enhanced them. The sound impressions may be the more valid, since it is custom to say that a piece of music becomes its full self only in disclosing and vitalizing performance. Certainly they are the more material, since while ten are searching the score (Messrs. Schott: Mainz) under the study-lamp, ten thousand will be hearing it as the "newest Stravinsky." . . . First, then, the Violin-Concerto is virtuoso-piece in the eighteenth rather than the nineteenth-century sense of the word. It displays the violinist; yet preserves the integrity of the whole as symphonic piece, and not violin-solo with orchestral accompaniment. It invites the resource and stimulates the skill of the violinist; but puts no artificial and stunt-like obstacles in his way. In true eighteenth-century fashion, it gives him occasion to prove his taste in the two middle movements his skill in the first and the fourth. The form, furthermore, derives from that century: Toccata; Aria I.; Aria II.; Caprice, without enchainment and so brief that the whole Concerto hardly exceeds twenty minutes.

Within this form the matter is economical and close-packed. There is no structural elaboration; usually the formal progress is simplified into a three-part shaping of each movement. Throughout Stravinsky was evidently minded to waste not a note. Scarcely a measure is so much "filling" or recourse to the nineteenth-century padding of "passage-work." In these respects the concentration of the composer's mind, the technical mastery of his hand, are unmistakable. . . . The quality of the musical matter is another story. In the Toccata it is light and gay, fluent and rhythmic, adroitly adaptable to form, key, the violin and the purposes of the Concerto. It is amusing enough to follow, but without distinction save in the play over it of harmonic, instrumental, and, in particular, violinistic color.

The two Arie consist of melodic outlines in free play,—the arabesques of the eighteenth century — sustained upon chord-formations as in the second, or wrought into a complex counterpoint as in the first. In the second Aria the outlines coalesce and expand into brief, broad melody for the violin. In the first, it is oftener heard decoratively. While the design and the color often engage the ear interest the mind and entertain the fancy, the melodic substance makes litt and, again undistinguished, impression upon all three. . . . The Finale, though it has dark spots, is of the sparkling, sportive, chameleon-like Stravinsky, heard last season in the Caprice for Orchestra with Piano. Toward the end returns the Stravinsky who is master of ever-changing rhythms and swiftly flashing color. So distinguished, this Finale excels the other three divisions; is truly and compellingly Stravinskian.

When all is said and done, the Concerto for Violin leaves the same impression —minor differences aside—as have Stravinsky's other ventures into "pure" or "absolute" music. So far as the contemporary generation may sort out the work of a composer, it has already relegated to secondary place his Piano-Concerto and his Piano-Sonata, his Symphony and his Octuor, both for Wind Instruments; on the edge hangs such a jeu d' esprit as the Caprice of last year, while at the very bottom lies such occasional stuff as "Ragtime." The music that has made Stravinsky's fame and set him high among living composers is outspread in "Petrushka," "The Rite of Spring," "Œdipus Rex" and the "Psalms-Symphony." Every one of these four pieces runs to a text or to a scenario. Other music contained in "Renard," "The Fire-Bird," "Les Noces," "The Nightingale," "The Story of the Soldier," "Mavra" and, in degree, "Apollo Musagetes," bears only less witness to his distinctive and signal quality. Again all these pieces were written to text or scenario or folk-tale. In a word, to be his full, best and most characteristic self, Stravinsky must have something "on which to hang" his music, something from the theater, something from folk-lore, something—though the devotees curse the word—more or less "literary." Then he has not only something to write about but also something that unifies what he writes; suits his structural procedures; invites and stimulates his command of rhythm, color, movement; warms his invention; vitalizes his every needful power. (By chance or by deliberation Dr. Koussevitzky submitted clear proof—when next the Violin-Concerto he placed the familiar Suite from "Petrushka.")

Then emerges the potent Stravinsky of the four masterpieces, each in its genre; the full-charactered Stravinsky of the surrounding group. When, however, he would write a self-contained, self-sustaining music as in the Violin-Concerto of yesterday and its few predecessors, he sets himself an alien task to be accomplished by dint of will and mind and skilful hand. Toil as all three may, they have not yet accomplished the desired tour de force. Instead, they have produced an unimaginative, uncharacteristic, devitalized music. On the surface are the Stravinskian earmarks plainly enough—The Transcript's analysts have together enumerated them—but within is little of the life-giving and all-conquering Stravinsky who wrote "Le Sacre" and "Noces," who can still write "Œdipus of New Hampshire. The foregoing statement renders it unnecessary for me to answer your other questions at this time.

---

"Permit me to observe your remarks show that you are surprised that a Western man should think of securing the support of an Eastern man and that surprises me and causes me to fear that you fail to understand that the economic errors now bankrupting the country are universal and require universal remedies to ameliorate the condition of all sections. Please do not overlook the fact that the little business man in New Hampshire suffers from the same cause as the little man in Oklahoma, the farmer of New Hampshire equally with that of the farmer of Oklahoma."

To Elect March 8

New Hampshire will elect its delegates to the Republican and Democratic national conventions at the March town meetings and special elections in cities on March 8. Delegates can pledge themselves to a specific candidate and in such cases the name of the candidate and the pledge of the delegate is printed on the official ballots. A delegate elected under this pledge can vote for no other candidate until released by the candidate to whom he is pledged. Candidates for delegate to the national conventions can pay a filing fee of ten dollars or submit the signatures of 100 legal voters in the State.

It was the pledge to Coolidge in 1924 by the majority of candidates for delegate to the Republican national convention that permitted a popular referendum in New Hampshire on the Coolidge candidacy and resulted in the defeat of United States Senator George H. Moses, who announced he was for Coolidge but refused to pledge under the New Hampshire law.

May Pass Tariff Bill Next Week

Washington, Jan. 2 (A.P.)—Speaker Garner said today the draft of the Democratic tariff measure will be submitted to the joint Senate House policy committee Monday and that it will be introduced immediately after approval by that group. Hearings probably will get under way

---

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

Herald Jan. 2

The program of the Boston Symphony orchestra, conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall, was as follows: D'Indy, symphony No. 2, B flat major; Stravinsky, concerto in D for violin; Stravinsky, suite from the ballet, "Petrouchka."

The concerto was played for the first time in the United States. Mr. Samuel Dushkin brought it out in Berlin on October 23, 1931. He introduced it later in London and Paris. It is said that he has a proprietary right on it for two or three years, so he wishes to be identified with it. It is doubtful whether any violinist will dispute his right; the concerto abounds in technical difficulties, the music can hardly be called grateful to performer or pleasing to the average audience. The music is that of the Stravinsky in his latest phase. Did Dr. Koussevitzky by putting the concerto and the "Petrouchka" suite close together wish to remind the audience that there was another Stravinsky, a man of fancy, dramatic instinct, humorous on occasion, as well as the Stravinsky of the last years, whose stream of invention seems to have run dry, a man of patterns, dabs of phrases with endless repetitions?

There are four movements in this concerto: a toccata, a sort of perpetuum mobile, by far the most interesting section of the work; two arias, dry, sterile music devoid of grace, or dignity or emotion; and a capriccio for a finale rhythmically entertaining. The whole concerto is on the surface. There is opportunity for the violinist to show his skill; there are tricks in the instrumentation that amuse the hearer who values the unexpected, the uncommon.

Mr. Dushkin took full advantage of the opportunities offered: the music confined him to a merely technical display. When he played here at a Monday night concert of the orchestra in March, 1928, he chose a concerto by Mozart. There was a time when Stravinsky talked of going back to Mozart, as at another time he thought he would write in the manner of Bach. Would that he would, and could, write in the manner of the earlier Stravinsky.

Mr. Dushkin pleased the audience. He was recalled several times. The music of Petrouchka of course, needs the action on the stage. This has been said many times of any suite derived from a modern ballet. Yet in the playhouse, if one looks intently at the stage, the music is only half heard and at random. Listen as intently as you will to the music, the spectacle and the evolutions insist upon your attention. And so concert performances of ballet music are useful, especially to those who have seen the ballets and enjoy reconstructing mentally the various episodes. The music of the 18th century ballets and of those even down to the time of Delibes, Goldmark, Gounod, Rubinstein bear better the transference to the concert hall.

It was well to begin a new year with music as lofty and noble as is found in the majority of d'Indy's pages.

Only the finale sinks below the prevailing high level, and there are fine moments in the introduction to this finale. It is natural that the influence of Cesar Frank is shown especially in the two middle movements. So great was d'Indy's devotion to his master that he proudly admitted the influence; but d'Indy was no mere copyist; the greatest pages of the symphony are his own.

When the work was first heard here a quarter of a century ago it was a stumbling block to the reactionaries of 1905. Yet they were not violent in opposition. No one went so far as a Berlin critic who, when Busoni brought out the second symphony, described it as "hideous non-music "(nmusik"), teeming with painfully absurd harmonies." And now Berliners rejoice in Schoenberg, Webern and Berg; they even crowded a huge hall to hear this concerto by Stravinsky and tumultuously applauded it.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The next pair of concerts will be on Jan. 15, 16. Chalmers Clifton will conduct them. Handel, concerto grosso for strings, F major, op. 6, No. 9 (first time in Boston). Griffes, poem for flute (Mr. Laurent), and orchestra (first time at these concerts). Wagner, Daybreak and Siegfried's Rhine Journey from "Dusk of the Gods." Sibelius, symphony No. 2, D major.

SYMPHONY GIVES NEW CONCERTO

Post Jan 2

Stravinsky's Work for Violin Played by Dushkin

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

If other symphony concerts have provided deeper satisfactions, few have offered more food for reflection than that of yesterday, which included the Second Symphony of d'Indy, Stravinsky's new Violin Concerto and the suite from the latter composer's "Petrouchka."

D'INDY'S SECOND

Since this Symphony in B flat is d'Indy's most imposing, most considerable orchestral work, it was fitting that Dr. Koussevitzky should play it as memorial, even though he had already marked the French composer's passing by a revival of the superb "Istar" Variations. Three weeks ago the Variations carried all before them, while a re-hearing of the Symphony recalled the approach of over-intellectuality that d'Indy's admirers were once prone to dispute and disclaim. Is not this symphony, after all, a product of the head rather than of the heart, a music almost too perfect, in which there is no fine frenzy, a music that is reasoned and calculated, flawlessly proportioned and marvellously factured, yet emotionally cold?

That which once passed in it for warmth and richness, as in the second movement, is now revealed as merely an idiom compounded of Franckian and Wagnerian sensuousness slightly curbed and corrected by d'Indian austerity. Today we have become used to orchestral and harmonic richness. These things, so easily accomplished, no longer excite us of themselves. And even the upswelling chorale at the symphony's end seemed yesterday of an intellectual rather than an emotional fervor, though the audience's response to this sonorous peroration was hearty and prolonged.

Stravinsky's Concerto

The first American performance of Stravinsky's Violin Concerto, with Samuel Dushkin, for whom it was written, as the soloist, must count as a major musical event even though the piece itself prove intrinsically unimportant. The Stravinsky of today is a musical chameleon — witness the "Appolon Musagete," the "Oedipus," the "Symphony of Psalms," the Capriccio, and now this Concerto. In the last named, which is entertaining enough to hear and no more formidable or fearsome than was the equally amiable Capriccio, the listener is reminded now of Paganini, now of Bach.

In the second of the four brief movements much use is made of a figure derived, no doubt unconsciously, from a theme in the second act of "Die Walkuere." There is a hint in the fourth division of Drdla's well-known "Souvenir," and not only is this music prevailingly undistinguished and derivative, individual only in certain peculiarities of harmony, rhythm and instrumentation, it is often merely trivial.

Recalls for Mr. Dushkin

The music of "Petrouchka," like that of "The Firebird," is wearing thin, but at least it has style and consistency. Hearing it, one thinks of Stravinsky alone, and perhaps of the Russian folk to whom he is indebted for the only salient melodies in the score.

Both Concerto and Suite, barring a temporary mishap in the former, were brilliantly performed yesterday. There were many recalls for Mr. Dushkin, who accomplished his difficult task with apparent ease.

MUSIC

Globe Jan 2

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The first performance in the United States of Stravinsky's new concerto for violin, at yesterday's Symphony concert, was applauded with more warmth than the ultra-conservative Friday audience usually shows for modern music, though one might have wished for even heartier applause for this latest important work of the most distinguished of living composers.

The familiar suite from "Petruchka," an acknowledged masterpiece now, whatever people felt when Stravinsky wrote it 20 years ago, was also on the program. The only other number was d'Indy's second Symphony.

Stravinsky's concerto has nothing in common with the 19th Century violin concertos of Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Saint-Saens, Brahms, and the rest. It is not a big display piece full of sound and fury, interspersed with cadenzas. It is chamber music, for a small orchestra, in which the solo violin is the most important instrument rather than what the Victorian play bills dubbed "an added attraction."

The solo part appears to a mere listener to be quite as difficult to play as those in the standard virtuoso repertory of concertos. Mr Dushkin, the young and relatively obscure violinist selected by Stravinsky to introduce this concerto in Paris, London, Berlin, and now in Boston, gave a wholly admirable performance. He has rhythmic sense, the feeling for 20th Century melody the work demands.

Except that the melodic style suggests 17th and 18th Century music rather than Russian folk song, the new concerto does not represent a Stravinsky who has broken with his own past. The rhythms are a logical evolution from those in "Petruchka," the scoring is more subtle, less obvious in its brilliance, yet not radically different. There is somewhat more polyphony, an interweaving of rhythms rather than of melodies, than in "Petruchka," but no more than in many of the composer's earlier works.

Stravinsky's originality of manner and of substance can hardly be disputed. What really matters most is, of course, that the music should captivate the listener. This "Petruchka" did yesterday even after repeated hearings. This the new concerto also did at a first hearing. All that a newspaper reviewer can really say about a new work is that it did, or did not send little shivers up and down his spine. He is, or he fails to be, in Victorian phraseology, "captivated." One enthralled by Stravinsky can only repeat a profession of faith that he is the most distinguished of living composers, the surest of being in the repertory in the next century.

It was curious to observe yesterday the utter divergence between the 19th century manner of d'Indy and the modernity of Stravinsky. D'Indy wanted his music to be grand, to be uplifting, to be full of soul, to be inspiring. He strove a bit to consciously to plan the work on a grand scale. He could not evade the influence of Wagnerian harmony and of the style of Cesar Franck. But he did succeed in writing a thoroughly earnest, dignified, tasteful symphony, with some originality of manner and a certain depth of feeling.

Stravinsky is not in the least disposed to d'Indy's type of ethical culture in music. He obviously loathes the grandiose 19th century forms, the deadly earnestness of tone so manifest in d'Indy. Stravinsky merely wants to make a subtle pattern, chiefly of rhythms, to convey in tones his own perception that the world, if not a moral place, is, at all events, a thrilling one. He is not afraid to be brief, not afraid to be gay, not afraid to be cynical. In these matters he is akin to his own generation, that of the men now between 20 and 50.

There are no concerts next week, as the orchestra goes on tour. P. R.

Symphony Off on Second Tour of Season to New York--Musical Notes

Post Jan 3

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

This week the Symphony Orchestra makes its second journey of the season to New York. In the two concerts that Dr. Koussevitzky and his men will give in Carnegie Hall they will present works in which they have signally triumphed at home: Beethoven's fourth and Sibelius' fourth symphonies, the brilliant and attractive suite by Geza Frid and the ninth symphony of Mahler. The last named piece, already played in New York by the Boston orchestra this season at a Thursday evening concert, will be heard this time at a Saturday matinee. Now become an earnest apostle of the Mahlerian gospel, Dr. Koussevitzky is evidently determined that both of his New York audiences shall hear the monumental symphony that he himself has introduced to their city.

* * * *

When the orchestra returns to Boston, Dr. Koussevitzky will take his annual fortnight's holiday, in which he receives a well-earned respite from his conductorial labors and also finds time to study scores that will be heard during the balance of the season. An American, Chalmers Clifton, and an Englishman, Gustav Holst, will be the guest conductors of the orchestra during Dr. Koussevitzky's absence.

* * * *

Mr. Clifton, who will direct next week's pair of concerts, was for nine years conductor of the American Orchestral Society of New York. Baltimore, Cincinnati and Paris have all heard him as guest conductor. From 1915-17 he was conductor of the Cecilia Society of this city and in 1915 of the Harvard alumni chorus. His programme for the symphony concerts of Jan. 15 and 16 includes Handel's concerto grosso in F major, Griffes' poem for flute and orchestra, in which Mr. Laurent will be the soloist; Siegfried's Rhine journey from Wagner's "Die Goetterdaemmerung" and the second symphony of Sibelius.

* * * *

As already mentioned in these columns Mr. Holst is coming to Harvard University for the second half of the academic year to teach composition in accordance with the terms of the Lamb Bequest. The distinguished English composer previously visited this country in 1923 when he conducted his "Hymn of Jesus" at the Ann Arbor Festival. It is by that work and his suite, "The Planets," together with a few smaller compositions, that Mr. Holst is at present known in Boston. Perhaps he will add to our acquaintance with his music by conducting in Symphony Hall his latest score, "Hammersmith," a prelude and scherzo, depicting a London crowd making holiday on the Thames. Mr. Basil Maine, who heard the work last November in London, was chiefly impressed by the river-music.

* * * *

At the concert of the British Broadcasting Society in Queen's Hall, at which "Hammersmith" was first performed, the British capital received its initial hearing of William Walton's oratorio, "Belshazzar's Feast," which then as it had previously at the Leeds Festival made a veritable sensation. The production of notable choral pieces, at a virtual standstill during the nineteenth century, is one of the interesting musical phenomena of our own day. Simultaneously with "Belshazzar's Feast," a new German oratorio of seeming significance, if of uneven interest, made its appearance in the shape of Hindemith's pessimistically philosophical "Die Unaufhoerliche" or "The Never-Ceasing." To judge from the reviews the English piece would seem to provide the more stimulating entertainment.

* * * *

A FIRST PERFORMANCE

Post Jan 3

Jean Sibelius, the eminent Finnish composer, has completed a new symphony and has stipulated that the first performance must be entrusted to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Dr. Koussevitsky.

There are some music lovers who are not made happy by listening to Sibelius. But the insistence of Sibelius that the first performance of his new work to be heard anywhere must be in Boston is a striking tribute to the extraordinary reputation of the Symphony Orchestra and of Dr. Koussevitsky. That is more important than the discomfiture of a minority who do not like Sibelius.

OUSSEVITZKY

LIP HALE

ch: A Biographical Chronicle by Arthur pf, New York. 258 pp.

Mr. Lourie, whose home is in Paris, knew Dr. Koussevitzky in Russia before and during the revolution. He himself is a musician; some of his compositions have been performed in this country; one, by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The strictly biographical portion of the present volume is of more interest to American readers than Mr. Lourie's digressions and his reflections on art.

He makes some surprising statements:

"Debussy . . . was brought up on Moussorgsky, was nourished by him." Did Debussy know any music by Moussorgsky before he was awarded the prix de Rome?

The concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra at the time Dr. Koussevitzky was appointed conductor "had lost their former prestige and subscriptions had almost ceased." A false and ignorant statement. Mr. Lourie, mentioning former conductors, has not the grace to name Pierre Monteux, who saved the orchestra when it was threatened with disbandment.

Dr. Koussevitzky "introduced Brahms to Boston, where he had been respected, but very little played." This time Mr. Lourie's ignorance would be appalling, were it not laughable. He is naturally much better informed when he tells the story of Dr. Koussevitzky's life, the development of his genius, and the musical conditions in Russian cities.

The whole of this man's life, Mr. Lourie assures us—as if assurance were needed—"bears the impress of one single passion, his ardent love for music, which consumes his being as with fire . . . Koussevitzky, the eternally youthful and insatiable lover of music, has become her lawful spouse." The opening chapter is all in this vein, ending with the assertion that Koussevitzky is "a conductor of musical ecstasy." This is "his principal and most highly characteristic feature. Everything that approximates music to a state of ecstasy is near and dear to him and yields itself freely to his sway."

There was little to stimulate the boy born in a poor, drab little Russian town. The father gave violin lessons for a paltry fee; the mother played the piano. She died when Serge was three years old. The boy loved musical sounds. He learned from strolling musicians to play various instruments, he even tried to compose; chiefly music for entr'actes in the theatre. A Mme. Ropenberg took an interest in him; provided him with his first professional training. Serge became conductor of the little orchestra. The father did not wish his son to become a professional musician. There was no money for his schooling. The boy left home secretly, and at the age of 14 arrived at Moscow, penniless. This was in 1888.

He was too late for entrance in the Conservatory, but he succeeded in gaining admission to the Philharmonic School, passing the examination. There were only three bursaries—free lessons and money to support a pupil—vacant, horn, trombone and double bass. Serge chose the double bass; completed in five months a course for which five years were allotted; played at a pupil's concert; became the leader of the double basses in the Imperial Theatre. He studied harmony, counterpoint, free composition; taught the double bass at the Philharmonic School, astonished Auer and others in St. Petersburg, hearing applicants for the post of leader of the double basses at the Opera, and at last toured Europe as a virtuoso, making his first appearance at Berlin in 1898. In 1900 he began to write and transpose music for his instrument.

Romance entered into his life; his meeting the woman who became his wife. Mr. Lourie pays her a glowing and richly deserved tribute. She aided her husband in making his career as a conductor a reality. "It became, so to speak, the creative work of Natalya Konstantinovna's life, her chef d'oeuvre, a substitute for her own artistic efforts at sculpture, at which prior to her meeting with him she had worked with enthusiasm and which she sacrificed to her husband, on a par with everything else she did for him."

He went to Berlin and gained experience in conducting with the orchestra of the Hochschule. This was in 1906. He did not study with any one of the conductors but learned by attending concerts led by Nikisch, Mahler, Weingartner, Mottl, Schuch. It was his habit to learn a score by heart, then have it played to him by a pianist, while he conducted, "and he had the work repeated until he had mastered the technic of the gestures necessary in the given instance. He devised this method for himself, not because he was not a pianist, but because it was for him the most convenient and practical. When he had studied a composition sufficiently to have complete control of his gestures without the necessity of further supervision, he turned to the orchestra. This system of studying a score he has continued to the present day. Thanks to it he acquired that complete freedom in his movements and gestures which is essential to a conductor, and, most important, developed a plastic technic in his handling of the orchestra." Later in the book is an interesting chapter on Koussevitzky as a conductor and an interpreter; how the sonority of his orchestra is based on the tone, the singing quality of the strings, which may account for his propensity for slow tempos, so as to "open out the bar-lines, so to speak, and let the 'air' in, with the object of allowing everything in the score to come through, thereby making sure that it reaches the hearer." He determines the tempo from secondary parts, found in the accompaniment to the fundamental matrical structure, or in the harmonic figuration. "Instead of his hands he makes use of his eyes to hypnotize the orchestra and produces a greater effect with them than with the movements of his hands."

Mr. Lourie is right in saying that in the early days of acquaintance with a conductor the public estimate is based almost entirely on physical sympathy or antipathy. "If no physiological contact is established, the most brilliant musical qualifications will fail to accomplish their purpose, and between the public and the conductor there will exist a yawning gulf of coldness and tediousness."

When Arthur Nikisch came to Boston some were entranced by his manicured hands and the exuberance of his shirt cuffs; others were repelled by his accordion trousers cut accordingly to the then prevailing Leipsic fashion

Koussevitzky made his debut as a conductor with the Philharmonic orchestra in Berlin on Jan. 23, 1908. He made a point even then of putting new compositions on his program. This sometimes disturbed an orchestra, as when in 1910 the London Symphony was in rehearsal hostile towards Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy," which it thought "absurd stuff." Koussevitzky's resolute propaganda for new music became one of the distinguishing features of his career. There is much about Scriabin and his relations with Koussevitzky, whose beginning as a conductor in Berlin leads to a survey of the state of orchestral music in that city.

There are chapters on "Westernism and Slavophilism" as shown in musical Russia, Tchaikovsky versus Moussorgsky, and on Koussevitzky's publishing venture, after he returned to Moscow in 1909; his concert life in Moscow and St. Petersburg, with the famous tours on the Volga, after he had formed an orchestra of his own—85 musicians chosen by competitive examination.

At one town on the Volga leading merchants asked to have the harp prominently placed on the platform so they might see what it was like and how it was played.

If Mr. Lourie devotes a chapter to Scriabin, he has much to say about Tchaikovsky, Debussy, Strauss, Stravinsky.

The decline in Koussevitzky's concert seasons in Russia began in 1915-16. Letters demanded that he should play nothing by a German composer. There were concerts under the bolshevist regime. Koussevitzky had the courage to speak of it in a public letter as the harshest, most despotic and violent regime that had ever reigned over Russia, of its baseness and brutality. He escaped from soviet Russia in the spring of 1920. Then came concerts at London, Paris, Spain and Portgual, Berlin and Warsaw. A concert at Rome late in 1920 was broken up by a Fascist demonstration. There are pages relating to Stravinsky and Schoenberg. Of course Mr. Lourie tells Americans what they need and what they should do in music; how our fundamental task is "the stimulation of creative work." Perhaps it is just as well that "at the moment I cannot devote myself to a survey of this question in all its complexity."

This volume, translated by S. W. Pring from the Russian, dedicated to Madam Koussevitzky, contains 16 illustrations and an adequate index. It is a handsome volume by reason of its page and type.

Koussevitzky's Career

SERGEI KOUSSEVITZKY AND HIS EPOCH. A biographical chronicle by Arthur Lourie. Translated from the Russian by S. W. Pring. 253 pp. New York: Alfred A. Knopf.

MR. SERGEI KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and, on occasion, a transcendent player of the double bass, has not yet reached his fifty-seventh year, and his career is still, it may be hoped, far from ended. For that reason it may be a little premature to launch a full-fledged biography of him. But everybody who has submitted to the spell of his orchestral conducting—and his admirers must be as numerous in New York as they are in Boston—will be glad of an authoritative account of his life and of the way he was brought up to become a double-bass player and then an orchestral conductor, in the first flight of both.

Mr. Lourié's book gives a detailed account of Mr. Koussevitzky's life from his birth in a poor little town now hardly discernible upon the map. The family was musical and the father gave violin lessons. The boy picked up a little knowledge of many instruments. A friendly neighbor introduced him to the classics and gave him piano lessons, and he made himself conductor of a primitive little orchestra in the town. His father opposed his becoming a musician; so one day he took a parcel of his modest belongings and made his way to Moscow. The Philharmonic Conservatory took him in as a pupil, and he chose the double bass to study, that being one of the three instruments in which there was at the time a vacancy for free instruction. This it was that made him a double-bass player, to rank with Dragonetti and Bottesini.

In due time he was admitted to the orchestra of the Imperial Theatre of Moscow, soon becoming a celebrity as a soloist on his instrument, and making his first appearance as such in Berlin in 1898. He made his début as a conductor in Berlin with the Philharmonic Orchestra in 1908. The impression he produced was one of freshness, novelty and power. Thereupon he gave himself up completely to conducting. The succeeding years brought forward important series of concerts in Russia, one of the most important and picturesque of which was a tour with his own orchestra in a steamboat, which he chartered for the purpose, down the Volga. He conducted orchestral and operatic performances in Paris, London, Spain and Portugal, and was invited to take charge of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Lourié, in addition to describing the career of Mr. Koussevitzky in terms which may be accepted as authoritative, has written chapters of more or less value about Russian music in Koussevitzky's time. He gives the usual denunciations of the modernists to Rimsky-Korsakoff, who is compared to Beckmesser; then there is an account of Debussy's Russian visit, which is supposed to have had so important an influence on his development; Strauss is properly set down, Stravinsky set up. Tchaikovsky, not generally thought much of by the modernists and scorned by the thorough-going Russian nationalists, is given unexpected praise. For Scriabin in his earlier years Koussevitzky had much admiration; but a rupture occurred between them because Koussevitzky could not become an idolater, an attitude which Scriabin considered indispensable. The book will undoubtedly be found valuable and informing by the very many admirers of Mr. Koussevitzky.

RICHARD ALDRICH.

Concert-Chronicle

Trans. — Jan. 5

Retrospect, with Reflections

THOUGH many a subscriber to the Symphony Concerts takes week by week the music that he (or she) there receives, a decent number have not yet forgotten Harold Morris's Piano-Concerto, produced last October with the composer as pianist, warmly received by audience and press, notable example of Dr. Koussevitzky's zeal for deserving American composers. Subsequently, in November, conductor, orchestra and pianist repeated it in New York. Last Saturday Mr. Henderson of The Sun included it in his list of salient new pieces heard during the year 1931; added a just, if not too cheerful paragraph of comment:

> It is gratifying to find a sound and healthy piano-concerto by an American. But there are many reasons for fearing that Harold Morris's commendable work will not easily establish itself as a permanent fixture in the repetories of solo-pianists. It is an American product; and it is no secret that the American composer has no partisans. . . He has always to overcome the lurking suspicion that he cannot write because composing music is an occupation followed only by an inferior type of human being. Truly great minds take up politics or big business and leave music to carpet-knights and ladies' men. This subject is too serious to be followed at this moment. But the ill-concealed contempt of social dignitaries and commercial barons for disciples of the muses and humble cultivators of the humanities is one of the mountainous obstacles in the path of art in these United States.

Nevertheless, among the novelties produced last year, Mr. Morris's concerto stasds well up in the front rank. It will march forward with a struggle not only for the reason already stated, but also because it is not a virtuoso-piece. Many pianists will shy at it because they will not discern in it any opportunity to "make a hit." The best music-lovers will accord it their respect, but this is a period in which respect is distinctly out of favor.

fantastic as the thing that has actually occurred—the phenomenal success of his narrative in its play-form.

The history of "Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde," the play, is as glamorous as the amazing progress of the thea-

---

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

This week the Symphony Orchestra makes its second journey of the season to New York. In the two concerts that Dr. Koussevitzky and his men will give in Carnegie Hall they will present works in which they have signally triumphed at home: Beethoven's fourth and Sibelius' fourth symphonies, the brilliant and attractive suite by Geza Frid and the ninth symphony of Mahler. The last named piece, already played in New York by the Boston orchestra this season at a Thursday evening concert, will be heard this time at a Saturday matinee. Now become an earnest apostle of the Mahlerian gospel, Dr. Koussevitzky is evidently determined that both of his New York audiences shall hear the monumental symphony that he himself has introduced to their city.

* * * *

When the orchestra returns to Boston, Dr. Koussevitzky will take his annual fortnight's holiday, in which he receives a well-earned respite from his conductorial labors and also finds time to study scores that will be heard during the balance of the season. An American, Chalmers Clifton, and an Englishman, Gustav Holst, will be the guest conductors of the orchestra during Dr. Koussevitzky's absence.

* * * *

Mr. Clifton, who will direct next week's pair of concerts, was for nine years conductor of the American Orchestral Society of New York. Baltimore, Cincinnati and Paris have all heard him as guest conductor. From 1915-17 he was conductor of the Cecilia Society of this city and in 1915 of the Harvard alumni chorus. His programme for the symphony concerts of Jan. 15 and 16 includes Handel's concerto grosso in F major, Griffes' poem for flute and orchestra, in which Mr. Laurent will be the soloist; Siegfried's Rhine journey from Wagner's "Die Goetterdaemmerung" and the second symphony of Sibelius.

* * * *

As already mentioned in these columns Mr. Holst is coming to Harvard University for the second half of the academic year to teach composition in accordance with the terms of the Lamb Bequest. The distinguished English composer previously visited this country in 1923 when he conducted his "Hymn of Jesus" at the Ann Arbor Festival. It is by that work and his suite, "The Planets," together with a few smaller compositions, that Mr. Holst is at present known in Boston. Perhaps he will add to our acquaintance with his music by conducting in Symphony Hall his latest score, "Hammersmith," a prelude and scherzo, depicting a London crowd making holiday on the Thames. Mr. Basil Maine, who heard the work last November in London, was chiefly impressed by the river-music.

* * * *

At the concert of the British Broadcasting Society in Queen's Hall, at which "Hammersmith" was first performed, the British capital received its initial hearing of William Walton's oratorio, "Belshazzar's Feast," which then as it had previously at the Leeds Festival made a veritable sensation. The production of notable choral pieces, at a virtual standstill during the nineteenth century, is one of the interesting musical phenomena of our own day. Simultaneously with "Belshazzar's Feast," a new German oratorio of seeming significance, if of uneven interest, made its appearance in the shape of Hindemith's pessimistically philosophical "Die Unaufhoerliche" or "The Never-Ceasing." To judge from the reviews the English piece would seem to provide the more stimulating entertainment.

* * * *

A FIRST PERFORMANCE

Post Jan 3

Jean Sibelius, the eminent Finnish composer, has completed a new symphony and has stipulated that the first performance must be entrusted to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Dr. Koussevitsky.

There are some music lovers who are not made happy by listening to Sibelius. But the insistence of Sibelius that the first performance of his new work to be heard anywhere must be in Boston is a striking tribute to the extraordinary reputation of the Symphony Orchestra and of Dr. Koussevitsky. That is more important than the discomfiture of a minority who do not like Sibelius.

LOURIE'S KOUSSEVITZKY

Herald

By PHILIP HALE

Sergei Koussevitzky and his epoch: A Biographical Chronicle by Arthur Lourie. Published by Alfred A. Knopf, New York. 258 pp.

Mr. Lourie, whose home is in Paris, knew Dr. Koussevitzky in Russia before and during the revolution. He himself is a musician; some of his compositions have been performed in this country; one, by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The strictly biographical portion of the present volume is of more interest to American readers than Mr. Lourie's digressions and his reflections on art.

He makes some surprising statements:

"Debussy . . . was brought up on Moussorgsky, was nourished by him." Did Debussy know any music by Moussorgsky before he was awarded the prix de Rome?

The concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra at the time Dr. Koussevitzky was appointed conductor "had lost their former prestige and subscriptions had almost ceased." A false and ignorant statement. Mr. Lourie, mentioning former conductors, has not the grace to name Pierre Monteux, who saved the orchestra when it was threatened with disbandment.

Dr. Koussevitzky "introduced Brahms to Boston, where he had been respected, but very little played." This time Mr. Lourie's ignorance would be appalling, were it not laughable. He is naturally much better informed when he tells the story of Dr. Koussevitzky's life, the development of his genius, and the musical conditions in Russian cities.

The whole of this man's life, Mr. Lourie assures us—as if assurance were needed—"bears the impress of one single passion, his ardent love for music, which consumes his being as with fire . . . Koussevitzky, the eternally youthful and insatiable lover of music, has become her lawful spouse." The opening chapter is all in this vein, ending with the assertion that Koussevitzky is "a conductor of musical ecstasy." This is "his principal and most highly characteristic feature. Everything that approximates music to a state of ecstasy is near and dear to him and yields itself freely to his sway."

There was little to stimulate the boy born in a poor, drab little Russian town. The father gave violin lessons for a paltry fee; the mother played the piano. She died when Serge was three years old. The boy loved musical sounds. He learned from strolling musicians to play various instruments, he even tried to compose; chiefly music for entr'actes in the theatre. A Mme. Ropenberg took an interest in him; provided him with his first professional training. Serge became conductor of the little orchestra. The father did not wish his son to become a professional musician. There was no money for his schooling. The boy left home secretly, and at the age of 14 arrived at Moscow, penniless. This was in 1888.

He was too late for entrance in the Conservatory, but he succeeded in gaining admission to the Philharmonic School, passing the examination. There were only three bursaries—free lessons and money to support a pupil—vacant, horn, trombone and double bass. Serge chose the double bass; completed in five months a course for which five years were allotted; played at a pupil's concert; became the leader of the double basses in the Imperial Theatre. He studied harmony, counterpoint, free composition; taught the double bass at the Philharmonic School, astonished Auer and others in St. Petersburg, hearing applicants for the post of leader of the double basses at the Opera, and at last toured Europe as a virtuoso, making his first appearance at Berlin in 1898. In 1900 he began to write and transpose music for his instrument.

Romance entered into his life; his meeting the woman who became his wife. Mr. Lourie pays her a glowing and richly deserved tribute. She aided her husband in making his career as a conductor a reality. "It became, so to speak, the creative work of Natalya Konstantinovna's life, her chef d'oeuvre, a substitute for her own artistic efforts at sculpture, at which prior to her meeting with him she had worked with enthusiasm and which she sacrificed to her husband, on a par with everything else she did for him."

He went to Berlin and gained experience in conducting with the orchestra of the Hochschule. This was in 1906. He did not study with any one of the conductors but learned by attending concerts led by Nikisch, Mahler, Weingartner, Mottl, Schuch. It was his habit to learn a score by heart, then have it played to him by a pianist, while he conducted, "and he had the work repeated until he had mastered the technic of the gestures necessary in the given instance. He devised this method for himself, not because he was not a pianist, but because it was for him the most convenient and practical. When he had studied a composition sufficiently to have complete control of his gestures without the necessity of further supervision, he turned to the orchestra. This system of studying a score he has continued to the present day. Thanks to it he acquired that complete freedom in his movements and gestures which is essential to a conductor, and, most important, developed a plastic technic in his handling of the orchestra." Later in the book is an interesting chapter on Koussevitzky as a conductor and an interpreter; how the sonority of his orchestra is based on the tone, the singing quality of the strings, which may account for his propensity for slow tempos, so as to "open out the bar-lines, so to speak, and let the 'air' in, with the object of allowing everything in the score to come through, thereby making sure that it reaches the hearer." He determines the tempo from secondary parts, found in the accompaniment to the fundamental matrical structure, or in the harmonic figuration. "Instead of his hands he makes use of his eyes to hypnotize the orchestra and produces a greater effect with them than with the movements of his hands."

Mr. Lourie is right in saying that in the early days of acquaintance with a conductor the public estimate is based almost entirely on physical sympathy or antipathy. "If no physiological contact is established, the most brilliant musical qualifications will fail to accomplish their purpose, and between the public and the conductor there will exist a yawning gulf of coldness and tediousness."

When Arthur Nikisch came to Boston some were entranced by his manicured hands and the exuberance of his shirt cuffs; others were repelled by his accordion trousers cut accordingly to the then prevailing Leipsic fashion.

Koussevitzky made his debut as a conductor with the Philharmonic orchestra in Berlin on Jan. 23, 1908. He made a point even then of putting new compositions on his program. This sometimes disturbed an orchestra, as when in 1910 the London Symphony was in rehearsal hostile towards Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy," which it thought "absurd stuff." Koussevitzky's resolute propaganda for new music became one of the distinguishing features of his career. There is much about Scriabin and his relations with Koussevitzky, whose beginning as a conductor in Berlin leads to a survey of the state of orchestral music in that city.

There are chapters on "Westernism and Slavophilism" as shown in musical Russia, Tchaikovsky versus Moussorgsky, and on Koussevitzky's publishing venture, after he returned to Moscow in 1909; his concert life in Moscow and St. Petersburg, with the famous tours on the Volga, after he had formed an orchestra of his own—85 musicians chosen by competitive examination.

At one town on the Volga leading merchants asked to have the harp prominently placed on the platform so they might see what it was like and how it was played.

If Mr. Lourie devotes a chapter to Scriabin, he has much to say about Tchaikovsky, Debussy, Strauss, Stravinsky.

The decline in Koussevitzky's concert seasons in Russia began in 1915-16. Letters demanded that he should play nothing by a German composer. There were concerts under the bolshevist regime. Koussevitzky had the courage to speak of it in a public letter as the harshest, most despotic and violent regime that had ever reigned over Russia, of its baseness and brutality. He escaped from soviet Russia in the spring of 1920. Then came concerts at London, Paris, Spain and Portgual, Berlin and Warsaw. A concert at Rome late in 1920 was broken up by a Fascist demonstration. There are pages relating to Stravinsky and Schoenberg. Of course Mr. Lourie tells Americans what they need and what they should do in music; how our fundamental task is "the stimulation of creative work." Perhaps it is just as well that "at the moment I cannot devote myself to a survey of this question in all its complexity."

This volume, translated by S. W. Pring from the Russian, dedicated to Madam Koussevitzky, contains 16 illustrations and an adequate index. It is a handsome volume by reason of its page and type.

Koussevitzky's Career

N.Y. Times Jan 3

SERGEI KOUSSEVITZKY AND HIS EPOCH. A biographical chronicle by Arthur Lourie. Translated from the Russian by S. W. Pring. 253 pp. New York: Alfred A. Knopf.

MR. SERGEI KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and, on occasion, a transcendent player of the double bass, has not yet reached his fifty-seventh year, and his career is still, it may be hoped, far from ended. For that reason it may be a little premature to launch a full-fledged biography of him. But everybody who has submitted to the spell of his orchestral conducting—and his admirers must be as numerous in New York as they are in Boston—will be glad of an authoritative account of his life and of the way he was brought up to become a double-bass player and then an orchestral conductor, in the first flight of both.

Mr. Lourié's book gives a detailed account of Mr. Koussevitzky's life from his birth in a poor little town now hardly discernible upon the map. The family was musical and the father gave violin lessons. The boy picked up a little knowledge of many instruments. A friendly neighbor introduced him to the classics and gave him piano lessons, and he made himself conductor of a primitive little orchestra in the town. His father opposed his becoming a musician; so one day he took a parcel of his modest belongings and made his way to Moscow. The Philharmonic Conservatory took him in as a pupil, and he chose the double bass to study, that being one of the three instruments in which there was at the time a vacancy for free instruction. This it was that made him a double-bass player, to rank with Dragonetti and Bottesini.

In due time he was admitted to the orchestra of the Imperial Theatre of Moscow, soon becoming a celebrity as a soloist on his instrument, and making his first appearance as such in Berlin in 1898. He made his début as a conductor in Berlin with the Philharmonic Orchestra in 1908. The impression he produced was one of freshness, novelty and power. Thereupon he gave himself up completely to conducting. The succeeding years brought forward important series of concerts in Russia, one of the most important and picturesque of which was a tour with his own orchestra in a steamboat, which he chartered for the purpose, down the Volga. He conducted orchestral and operatic performances in Paris, London, Spain and Portugal, and was invited to take charge of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Lourié, in addition to describing the career of Mr. Koussevitzky in terms which may be accepted as authoritative, has written chapters of more or less value about Russian music in Koussevitzky's time. He gives the usual denunciations of the modernists to Rimsky-Korsakoff, who is compared to Beckmesser; then there is an account of Debussy's Russian visit, which is supposed to have had so important an influence on his development; Strauss is properly set down, Stravinsky set up. Tchaikovsky, not generally thought much of by the modernists and scorned by the thorough-going Russian nationalists, is given unexpected praise. For Scriabin in his earlier years Koussevitzky had much admiration; but a rupture occurred between them because Koussevitzky could not become an idolater, an attitude which Scriabin considered indispensable. The book will undoubtedly be found valuable and informing by the very many admirers of Mr. Koussevitzky.

RICHARD ALDRICH.

Concert-Chronicle

Trans. — Jan. 5

Retrospect, with Reflections

THOUGH many a subscriber to the Symphony Concerts takes week by week the music that he (or she) there receives, a decent number have not yet forgotten Harold Morris's Piano-Concerto, produced last October with the composer as pianist, warmly received by audience and press, notable example of Dr. Koussevitzky's zeal for deserving American composers. Subsequently, in November, conductor, orchestra and pianist repeated it in New York. Last Saturday Mr. Henderson of The Sun included it in his list of salient new pieces heard during the year 1931; added a just, if not too cheerful paragraph of comment:

> It is gratifying to find a sound and healthy piano-concerto by an American. But there are many reasons for fearing that Harold Morris's commendable work will not easily establish itself as a permanent fixture in the repetories of solo-pianists. It is an American product; and it is no secret that the American composer has no partisans. . . He has always to overcome the lurking suspicion that he cannot write because composing music is an occupation followed only by an inferior type of human being. Truly great minds take up politics or big business and leave music to carpet-knights and ladies' men. This subject is too serious to be followed at this moment. But the ill-concealed contempt of social dignitaries and commercial barons for disciples of the muses and humble cultivators of the humanities is one of the mountainous obstacles in the path of art in these United States.

Nevertheless, among the novelties produced last year, Mr. Morris's concerto stasds well up in the front rank. It will march forward with a struggle not only for the reason already stated, but also because it is not a virtuoso-piece. Many pianists will shy at it because they will not discern in it any opportunity to "make a hit." The best music-lovers will accord it their respect, but this is a period in which respect is distinctly out of favor.

Time, Change, And A Moral For The Hour

Jan 4 — Trans.

D'Indy and Stravinsky Have Now Applauded Place in Our Concert-Halls

TIME and change win victories—in Boston, at Symphony Hall, notably through the Symphony Concerts of last week. . . . The faithful program-book recorded the first performances of d'Indy's Symphony in B-flat, in January of 1905 under Gericke, in the following December under the composer himself. Some "now living" (as the program-book also likes to say) remembered both. Each at the time was occasion for sharp-tongued debate. The composer and his Symphony did not lack fervent partisans. The detractors were as many, laying on and sparing not. Open-minded listeners who had heard more or less sympathetically, kept the ring. Nowadays the performance of new music, say by Hindemith, produces a pretty exchange of epithets. Even so with d'Indy's Symphony twenty-six years ago.

There were hard words for much that it contained—harmonies, coloring, ideas, treatment, what not. Scarcely an adjective in the now familiar catalogue was overlooked. He was an innovator, a modernist (or whatever was then the equivalent of that term). He had affronted Euterpe, and the guardians of her temple rose up to repel him. His champions retorted in kind. Those that stood midway began to question their favorable impressions; were hardly reassured until this Second Symphony was twice repeated in 1909. Then came the turn of the detractors to know doubts.

Last Friday and Saturday the Symphony was heard anew after nearly seven years' interval. Its length had not diminished. It still exacted close listening. Yet through those fifty minutes it held both audiences intent; while at the end the applause was general, warm and honest. None repined at d'Indy's matter or manner. Response to the qualities that distinguish him ran clear. Harmonic and instrumental color, once resented as "acrid" or "biting," now fell upon accustomed ears. Procedures, rejected as "innovating" when the Symphony was new, passed unnoticed. Even the reproachful adjective, "cerebral," had lost force. Euterpe was no longer affronted in her temple. Dr. Koussevitzky was paying just homage to her devoted and departed servant. In Bostonian ears one more symphony out of our own time stood secure. The only dissenters were a few young modernists, which was indeed to bring time full circle.

"Safe and Sane"

After this Symphony of d'Indy, the new Violin-Concerto of Stravinsky. Again close, eager listening; general, hearty, honest applause. It is easy to say cynically that every "assisting artist" in a solo-part is clapped at Symphony Hall. But Mr. Dushkin, on Saturday evening, proved his own title to a considerable share in those plaudits. To many he was an ingratiating presence; while there was no doubting that he played con amore a violin-part that exacted no less than it displayed. Some part of the applause must, however, have fallen to the Concerto itself; as it fell a year ago when Mr. Sanromá was equally successful with the Caprice for Orchestra and Piano. The Concerto runs also in Stravinsky's lighter vein. The hard, incisive, repetitious Toccata, at the outset, makes its instant mark. Sharp-set rhythms, crossing and re-crossing, enliven the finale. Each of the two Arie between is ornately written. The second invites the violin to song until dissonances, as it were, stick in its throat. So interested and amused, an audience does not test for the while the source of its pleasure. And the Violin-Concerto is applauded hardly less than the Piano-Caprice.

Yet this may not be all. Through ten years the public of the Symphony Concerts has been listening more or less regularly to Stravinsky's music. The Suites from his "Fire-Bird" and his "Petrushka" have become repertory pieces. His "Rite of Spring," when Mr. Monteux produced it, made stir in the symphonic world. "Œdipus Rex" and the "Psalms-Symphony" left memories behind. He himself took the solo part in his Piano-Concerto. Not one in the succession of his pieces has passed without preliminary heralding and subsequent debate. Like or mislike his music, he is composer in the public eye, ear and mind—off his own bat tireless and efficient showman. Place him higher or lower, he is no insignificant creator, no small influence, in the music-making of our time.

Sooner or later there was bound to be repercussion to this pomp and circumstance. Little by little the public at Symphony Hall, as in many another concert-room, has come to believe that Stravinsky is an eminent composer to be received accordingly when he proffers new work. If it also pleases them on the instant, as did first the Piano-Caprice and now the Violin-Concerto, then the warmer and more widespread the applause. As for the procedures, the idiosyncrasies, the perversities that were once "the mark of the beast"—and the Violin-Concerto does not spare them—are they not also the sign-manual of the illustrious Igor? Into the stock-pot also have gone not a few. . . . "The world do move," said the Negro preacher, and, probably, he was no frequenter of symphony concerts.

From Symphony Hall

The Symphony Orchestra will go to New York on Thursday morning. In the evening at Carnegie Hall, Dr. Koussevitzky will lead it through this program:

Suite	Corelli
Symphony, No. 4, in B-flat major	Beethoven
Symphony, No. 4, in A minor	Sibelius
Suite for Orchestra	Frid

For the matinée of Saturday the conductor sets this program:

Symphony, No. 9	Mahler
Introduction and Allegro for Harp with Accompaniment for Strings, Flute and Clarinet (Harp: Mr. B. Zighera)	Ravel
Suite from the Ballet, "Petrushka"	Stravinsky

Symphony Hall has read with some surprise the announcement of the first performance of Ravel's Piano-Concerto at a concert of the orchestra of the State Opera in Berlin next Friday, with Wittgenstein as pianist. It was one of the expected pieces to mark the fiftieth year of the Orchestra, though Ravel was unable to finish it in time.

The cold that nearly disabled Dr. Koussevitzky last Friday and Saturday keeps him from the conductor's stand at the supplementary matinée today. Mr. Burgin, who would normally be substitute, is still recovering from the motor-accident that kept him from his usual chair last week. Consequently, Mr. Fiedler will be deputy-conductor this afternoon, leading the orchestra for the first time through a subscription concert. A Suite of Bach, a little Symphony of Mozart and Beethoven's Symphony in C minor fill the program.

Jan 5

Her

TUESDAY SYMPHONY CONCERT

Owing to the illness of both Dr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Burgin, the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Tuesday afternoon series, which took place yesterday, was conducted by Arthur Fiedler. The program was as follows: Bach, Suite No. 2 in B minor, for flute and strings (flute solo, George Laurent); Mozart, Symphony in C major, No. 34 (Koechel No. 338); Beethoven, Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Op. 67. An appreciative audience filled the hall.

The orchestra's Monday and Tuesday programs rarely stimulate interest and curiosity by that indulgence in new oddities and ancient rarities that so often characterizes the programs of the main Friday and Saturday series. But their greater sobriety brings its compensations. There is less wasted time, for experiments sometimes prove unfruitful; the programs have better balance, are more likely to reveal an intelligent underlying plan. Yesterday's program, for example, might well have been regarded as an attempt to exemplify three evolutionary stages of symphonic music—the orchestral dance suite of Bach, the Mozartian form of the developed symphony, and the more romantic, more subjective form which it assumed with Beethoven.

Yet it must not be thought that there was anything of the solemnity of a historical demonstration about this concert. There was an exquisite charm and piquancy both in the music of Bach's suite and in the mere timbre of the much reduced orchestra, plus harpsichord and solo flute, that played it. The spirit of a divertimento sparked in it. The exuberance of the first and last movements of the little minuet-less symphony of Mozart's musical maturity, the warm grace of its central andante, were no less delightful, and the ever-popular fifth syphony of Beethoven did not fail to reveal its impressive beauty and force.

The performance, under the competent baton of Arthur Fiedler, was upon the whole excellent, although there were momentary defects of balance in Beethoven and some less than clear articulation of counterpoints in Bach. S. S.

Fiedler Conducts at Symphony Concert

Arthur Fiedler conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time at a regular subscription concert when he took the baton at the second of the Tuesday matinee series. Mr. Fiedler led at short notice because of Mr. Koussevitzky's being indisposed by a persistent cold and the fact that Richard Burgin, concertmaster, who would ordinarily substitute, is not yet recovered from a recent automobile smash-up.

Amer Jan 6

Concert-Chronicle

Tran Jan 6

Fiedler to the Fore

IN Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, the second concert of the supplementary Tuesday series, furnished convincing assurance of the solidarity and adaptiveness of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. No doubt the orchestra is scarcely in need of testing as regards these qualities. Nevertheless, the appearance of Mr. Fiedler in the conductor's stand in place of Dr. Koussevitzky, who was still indisposed by his cold, and likewise in place of Mr. Burgin, whose injuries in a motor accident prevented him from assuming leadership, aroused the curiosity of the general listener as to how the orchestra would perform in Dr. Koussevitzky's absence and how Mr. Fiedler would carry the new responsibility of an entire subscription program entrusted for the first time to his care. (Some talk was heard in the hall—more lightly than seriously meant—that the orchestra should establish an official succession of conductors after the manner of State affairs, from the President down to the last Cabinet officer. If Mr. Fiedler, too, should have been unable to conduct—?)

Program, performance and applause followed a definite progression. The concert began with a Suite of Bach, No. 2, in B minor for flute and strings, with Mr. Laurent playing the solo part. The middle number was Mozart's Symphony in C major, No. 34 (K. 338). Finally came Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, in C minor. For Bach Suite at the beginning of the concert, there was but a handful of players. Through the first two divisions—an "overture" and rondo—one observed the familiar amenities and patterns of eighteenth century music. Such music, it was easy to decide, though fresh and engrossing at first, can run to tedious lengths. One reckoned without Bachian skill, Bachian invention and—surprisingly enough—Bachian fancy. This graceful and sparkling music grew more delightful with every measure. Mr. Laurent, principal exponent of the composer's light-hearted mood, piped notes of enticing clarity; while the surrounding strings and harpsichord caught up or tossed back the sprightly figures, and now and again wove the strands of musing comment. As for Mr. Fieldler, his part in producing this result was commendably quiet and unobtrusive; the music spoke of itself; attention was not drawn to the personality of the conductor.

Mozart's Symphony required a much larger, though not a modern, orchestra. The effect of the vigorous strokes of the opening movement was almost startling. However engrossing the music of Bach had been, the transition to that of Mozart was like changing from a miniature to a full-sized stage. Here was a larger joyfulness. The spontaneity and frankness of Mozart's music are proverbial. Dip at random into any of his symphonies, unfamiliar as well as familiar, and there will always be at least some pages of freshness and beauty. For these qualities, this short Symphony in C minor is especially engaging. Mr. Fiedler conducted with assurance if without notable responsiveness to nuance. Observing the security of the orchestra under his hand, the audience grew more cordial in applause.

Beethoven's Symphony brought in the complete orchestra. The performance may be characterized as straightforward but eloquent. Beethoven's music, once set in motion, carried by the weight of its own power. This result is surely to the credit of substitute conductor and musicians alike. At the close, the applause of the audience was sincerely hearty and prolonged, recalling Mr. Fiedler to the stage many times and inducing him to bid the orchestra rise in response. N. M. J.

Music

Jan 6

Tuesday Symphony

In the enforced absence of Dr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Burgin, Mr. Arthur Fiedler conducted, in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, the second of the Tuesday series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program was made up of Bach's Suite No. 2 in B minor, for flute and strings; Mozart's Symphony in C major, No. 34 (K. 338), and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

SCIENCE MONITOR,

Very tactfully, Mr. Fiedler, in his first appearance as conductor of a subscription concert, made no attempt to give revolutionary "readings." The Bach and the Mozart items had been played under Dr. Koussevitzky at Friday and Saturday concerts this season. The Koussetvitzkyan interpretation of the Beethoven Fifth is familiar. A modest deputy, deferring to his chief and showing a proper respect for the virtuosity of his associates, Mr. Fiedler devoted himself to seeing that the music ran its appointed course, and then to passing on the applause to the players.

In general, therefore, the concert was a fair copy of former performances of these works. There was one moment of tentativeness in the Bach, but otherwise the Suite and the Mozart symphony were exquisitely articulated. In the Beethoven there was a slight sense of hurried tempi in the first movement, but it was pleasant to hear the slow movement "going," rather than dragging as it has been known to do under Koussevitzky's baton. A nice instrumental balance was maintained throughout the symphony, and the Scherzo, the "bridge passage" and the Finale were impressively published. The large audience cordially received the substitute conductor, to whom, as well as to the orchestra, a success must be credited.

L. A. S.

921

Boston Transcript
324 Washington Street, Boston, Mass.
(Entered at the Post Office, Boston, Mass., as Second Class Mail Matter)
THURSDAY, JANUARY 7, 1932

Frederick P. Cabot

A man of admirable mind, humble attitude, and noble spirit—one of the most distinguished Bostonians of our time—passes with the death of Judge Frederick Pickering Cabot. Day after day through sixteen years he—who was Major Higginson's chosen successor as president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who was the president of the Harvard Union, the creator of the Judge Baker Foundation, and active in many other places of leadership—went each morning to a small, somewhat unusually dingy room in the courthouse of Suffolk County, there to deal with the lives of children who came before him not in the buoyancy of youth, but in the depression, the fear, even the surliness of childhood broken and disturbed, because misdirected.

To the problems of each child he gave infinite patience in the search for full understanding. Such effort required, of course, the widest possible exploration of facts. It extended into every phase of the delinquent child's home, school and neighborhood life—a search which led frequently to the discovery of conditions ever more and more oppressing and sordid. But even when these appeared, Judge Cabot, despite the quick sensitivity of his nature, never shrank back, when the work seemed to him likely to have worth for the child and the State. The material circumstances he recognized at their full realistic value, and controlled his moral judgment by them without sentimentality. Moved also by an almost over-active conscience, and informed by exceptional knowledge of jurisprudence, he recognized always the essential force of the law as an expression of the community's will, and therefore as an instrument which he must wield at all times for the community's protection as well as for the possible welfare of the individual child, never yielding, in this respect, to the evasions of law which in some cities the juvenile judge has thought justified.

But in all of Judge Cabot's search for ways of helpfulness, the master-key was sympathy, derived from great faith that somewhere in each human life there may be found good, if one can but reach it. And so, as the children came where he sat upon the bench—always in dignity, often austere—there happened time and again what to the attendant policemen seemed almost a miracle. Again and again boys and girls, who entered that courtroom reluctant, fearful, defiant, would in a few moments pour forth to the judge statements of needed facts, inward confessions, such as no resource of the investigating officers had ever heard from them before in least part. These delinquent children gave to Judge Cabot faith, because he gave them faith.

Of late, some earnest-minded but academic investigators have been examining the records of the Boston Juvenile Court, striving to appraise its results, to tabulate them by grinding away at statistics. But thus far the professors—though not the man in charge of their survey—have missed the point. They have not seen that they are dealing with a power which transcends all statistics—a power which has not alone brought evident good to thousands of young lives, but good which never can be seen by any save those who received it and who will remember it perchance as sole sustainment even in the adversity which the statisticians call failure. That power, beyond intellectual calculation, which Judge Cabot possessed, came from, was akin to, and now abides with, the spirit of One who said, "Suffer little children to come unto me."

HE BOSTON HERALD, THURSDAY, JANUARY 7, 19

Judge Cabot Dies in Hospital After Operation in 64th Year

(Continued from Page One)

evident early in life when, as a student at Harvard, he worked with boys' clubs of Boston. In later life he became an overseer of the Boston poor.

On the death of Judge Harvey H. Baker of the Boston juvenile court in 1916, a number of organizations which co-operated with the court in welfare work united in recommending Judge Cabot's appointment as his successor, to Gov. David I. Walsh. Judge Cabot was not appointed, however, until Gov. McCall had taken office the following January.

He was a member of the Bar Association of the city of Boston, and was a member of the Tavern, Union and Harvard clubs and the Pokanoket Club of Dover.

Associate justices of the Boston juvenile court are Judges Frank Leveroni and Philip Rubinstein.

TRIBUTES TO CABOT

Friends and associates joined in paying tribute to Judge Cabot last night, on learning of his death, as follows:

MAYOR JAMES M. CURLEY:

The passing of Judge Frederick P. Cabot will be mourned not only by members of the judiciary and those privileged to know him intimately but by countless men who made mistakes in early life and were saved to useful lives by his kindly guidance and friendship. To his important work he gave devoted service and his passing is a real loss, not only to his family but to the entire community.

JUDGE FRANK LEVERONI, juvenile court:

The death of Judge Cabot is a shock to me as well as to all those who have known him. Only yesterday his secretary telephoned and said that he was improving and was expected out shortly. The city and the state have lost a faithful servant who devoted his last 15 years for the welfare of the community, especially in dealing with the youth of the city. His services were invaluable at the White House conference. His loss will be felt by all those interested in child welfare work, in musical circles, and in the universities with which he had been connected for so many years. His loss to me is irreparable.

JUDGE PHILIP RUBENSTEIN, juvenile court:

The work that Judge Cabot did for the children of Boston was so remarkable that it cannot be measured. His death is an immeasurable loss to the commonwealth.

DR. WILLIAM T. HEALY, director, Judge Baker Foundation:

"Fifteen years of close association with Judge Cabot revealed to me one of the most sterling characters I have ever known. His unselfish devotion to public service was remarkable. His patience was unending and often he spent hours at a time with some youngster who was brought before him. He was unquestionably the most celebrated juvenile authority in this country. Besides all this, he was the finest man I ever knew."

HERBERT C. PARSONS, commissioner of probation:

Out of a wide acquaintance with juvenile court judges of the country I know that Judge Cabot was held in the highest esteem by them and I regarded him as pre-eminent among judges. His death is a very great loss to Massachusetts and to courts of juvenile delinquency.

DR. RICHARD C. CABOT:

He has been an important figure in relation to the delinquents of this state for the last 20 years and has had an enormous influence upon the welfare of the classes from which the delinquents are drawn. He exercised an important leadership in all the branches of social work he touched. His work with regard to the Boston Symphony orchestra has been of the greatest importance. The state will find it difficult to replace him.

BOSTON TRAVELER. THURSDAY. JANUARY 7. 193

Many Friends Mourn Death of Judge Cabot

Arrangements for Funeral of Great Jurist Being Made

(Photo by Purdy)
JUDGE FREDERICK P. CABOT

Arrangements are being completed for the funeral of Judge Frederick P. Cabot of the Boston juvenile court, who died last night at the Phillips House. He was 63, unmarried, and made his home with his sister, Miss Amy W. Cabot, at 72 Chestnut street.

A leading figure in many walks of life, he was also prominently identified with many important organizations. He was an overseer of Harvard College, a member of the council of Radcliffe College, president of the governing board of Harvard Union, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra and president of the Judge Baker Foundation.

Judge Cabot was also treasurer and director of the Fisher Manufacturing Company, the Winthrop Mills Company, and had many other business interests.

He is survived by four sisters, Miss Amy Cabot, Mrs. James J. Putnam of Marlboro street, Mrs. Arthur Lyman of Waltham and Mrs. John Richardson of Chestnut Hill, and two brothers, Stephen P. of Pinckney street and Francis H. Cabot of New York.

In 1929 he was invited by President Hoover to serve on the President's committee on the White House conference on child welfare and protection.

Judge Cabot was born in Brookline, June 15, 1868, the son of Francis and Mary Louise (Higginson) Cabot. He was graduated from Harvard in 1886 and in 1890 was awarded the degrees of A. M. and LL. B simultaneously.

He was admitted to practice in the supreme judicial court in 1893 and three years later became assistant United States attorney. From 1897 to 1916 he practised law. Then came his appointment in the juvenile court, which followed his interest in child welfare, by Gov. McCall.

He was a member of the Bar Association and of the Tavern, Union and Harvard clubs and the Pokanoket Club of Dover.

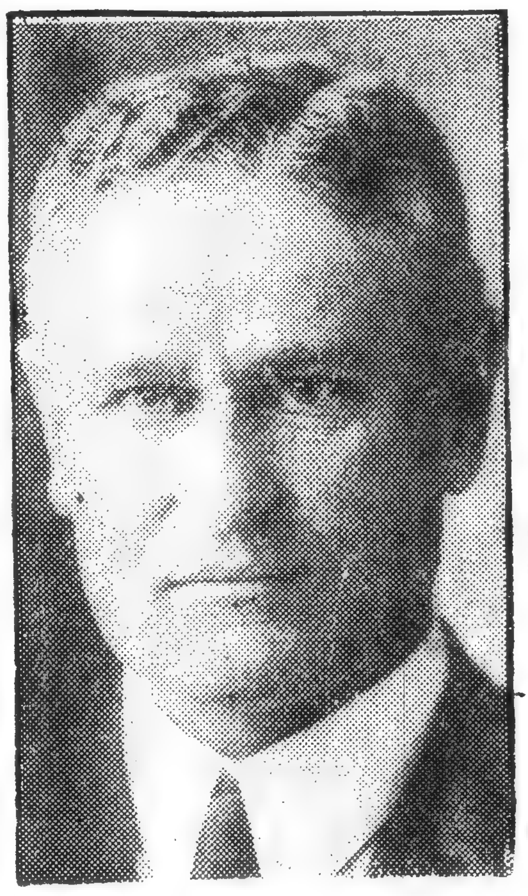
JUDGE CABOT DIES AT PHILLIPS HOUSE AFTER OPERATION

National Authority on Child Delinquency Was In 64th Year

NAMED TO BENCH BY GOV. McCALL

Overseer of Harvard and Head of Boston Symphony Trustees

Claimed by Death



(Photo by Purdy)
JUDGE FREDERICK P. CABOT

Judge Frederick P. Cabot of the Boston juvenile court, one of the foremost American authorities on child delinquency, died at 8 o'clock last night at the Phillips House, Massachusetts General Hospital, in his 64th year. He had been under treatment for about a month and his death was the result of complications following an operation.

He was unmarried and lived with his sister, Miss Amy W. Cabot, at 72 Chestnut street. He had offices at 53 State street.

During his well-rounded life he became associated with numerous interests and at the time of his death he was prominently connected with many important organizations.

OVERSEER OF HARVARD

He was an overseer of Harvard College and a member of the council of Radcliffe College, president of the governing board of the Harvard Union, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra, president of the Judge Baker Foundation and a trustee of Wentworth Institute and Gov. Dummer Academy. He was also treasurer and director of the Fisher Manufacturing Company and the Winthrop Mills Company and had many other business interests.

Surviving him are four sisters, Miss Amy Cabot, Mrs. James J. Putnam of 106 Marlboro street; Mrs. Arthur Lyman of Waltham, and Mrs. John Richardson of Chestnut Hill, and two brothers, Stephen P. Cabot of 112 Pinckney street, formerly headmaster of St. George's school at Middletown, R. I., and Francis H. Cabot of New York.

Judge Cabot's work among delinquent children was recognized by President Hoover in June, 1929, when he was invited to serve as a member of the President's committee on the White House conference on child welfare and protection. He was largely instrumental in establishing the Judge Baker Foundation, a medical and psychological clinic for diagnosis of difficult cases, and brought to the foundation Dr. William Healey and Dr. Augusta F. Bonner.

Funeral arrangements are not complete.

A leading figure in many walks of life, Judge Cabot's death was a great loss to the city of Boston, which he served with such loyalty that his reputation as a juvenile court jurist was nationally known, and to many citizens with whom he was acquainted or allied through his many activities.

BORN IN BROOKLINE

Born in Brookline, June 15, 1868, he was one of 11 children of Francis and Mary Louisa (Higginson) Cabot. He prepared for college at the Hopkinson school in Boston, was graduated from Harvard in 1886 and was awarded the degrees of A. M. and LL.B. simultaneously in 1890.

During his years as a graduate student he was editor of the Harvard Law Review.

He was admitted to practice in the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts in 1893 and three years later was admitted to the United States circuit court for the district of Massachusetts and to the circuit court of appeals for the first district.

In 1896 he became assistant United States attorney for the state of Massachusetts, which position he held for one year, serving at first under Sherman Hoar and later under Boyd B. Jones. During his tenure of office he took part in the first Bram trial, celebrated among the murder mysteries of the sea.

From the time of his retirement in 1897 until 1916, when he entered on his duties in the juvenile court, he practiced law with the firm of Hurlburt, Jones and Cabot.

His interest in child welfare became

(Continued on Page Eleven)

ON EVENING AMERICAN *

DEATH CLAIMS JUDGE CABOT SUDDENLY

Funeral arrangements for Judge Frederick P. Cabot, of the Juvenile Court, a national authority on child delinquency, who died suddenly at Phillips House, Massachusetts General Hospital, will be announced today.

The Judge entered the hospital about four weeks ago for an operation and although apparently upon the road to recovery, died shortly after 8 o'clock last night.

HEADED FOUNDATION

A statement issued by the Boston juvenile court today said:

> "The staff of the Boston juvenile court most keenly feel the loss of Judge Cabot.
>
> "Judge Cabot's friendliness and patience were so great that they made the most obstinate and stubborn child understand respect for law and for the authority of parents.
>
> "For a long time there will remain a great emptiness in the Boston juvenile court."

The judge, who was 65, was often consulted by officials of other cities and states and even of foreign countries regarding problems of juvenile delinquency.

He had served in the juvenile court since 1915, when he was appointed to succeed Judge Harvey Baker. He was also made president of the Judge Baker Foundation for research in child welfare.

Judge Cabot was born in Brookline in June, 1868, and was graduated from Harvard in 1890. Three years later he took simultaneously the degrees of M. A. and LL.B. and was admitted to the bar.

SYMPHONY EXECUTIVE

He was president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, an overseer of Harvard College, a trustee of Wentworth Institute, a member of the council of Radcliffe College and treasurer and director of the Fisher Mfg. Co. and the Winthrop Mills Co.

He was unmarried and is survived by four sisters and two brothers: Francis H. Cabot of New York, Stephen P. Cabot of Boston, Mrs. James J. Putnam of Boston, Mrs. John Richardson of Chestnut Hill, Mrs. Arthur Lyman of Waltham, and Miss Amy W. Cabot of Boston.

Globe Jan 7 THE

JUDGE F. P. CABOT DIES IN HOSPITAL

Juvenile Court Justice Underwent Operation

Judge Frederick P. Cabot of the Juvenile Court and president of the Judge Baker Foundation, died suddenly at 8 o'clock last night at the Phillips House of the Massachusetts General Hospital. Judge Cabot underwent an operation four weeks ago, but was thought to be well on the way to recovery.

In 1917, Judge Cabot was instrumental in establishing the Judge Baker Foundation, a medical and psychological clinic for the diagnosis of difficult cases brought before the Juvenile Court, as well as cases from social agencies, schools and private families.

Photo by Purdy

JUDGE FREDERICK P. CABOT

He brought to the Foundation Dr William Healey and Dr Augusta F. Bonner, pioneers in that field. He has been president of the Foundation since it started.

Chosen by Hoover

Judge Cabot had a keen understanding of children and an appreciation of the value and influence of environment and training. He brought those qualities to the Juvenile Court bench, to which he was appointed in 1916. Remarkable work has been done by the court acting on the principle that a child, through proper habit formation and correct training, can become a desirable citizen instead of an undesirable criminal.

The work of Judge Cabot for delinquent children was recognized by President Hoover in June, 1929, when he was invited to serve as a member of the President's Committee on the White House Conference on Child Health and Protection. He was chairman of the sub-section entitled Socially Handicapped-Delinquency.

He was president of the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc, and had been president of the Massachusetts Society for Promoting the Interests of Adult Blind since 1923. In 1924, he was elected an overseer of Harvard and was a member of a number of the overseers' committees. He had been a member of the council and associate of Radcliffe College for many years.

Born in Brookline

Judge Cabot was born in Brookline, June 15, 1868, the son of Francis and Louisa Higginson Cabot. He prepared for Harvard at Hopkinson School, was graduated from Harvard in 1890 and received the degrees of AM and LLB in 1893. Shortly after his graduation from law school, he began the practice of law in Boston and in 1896, he was appointed Assistant United States Attorney for the District of Massachusetts and served in that position in 1896 and 1897.

On leaving the Federal service, during which he had been an attorney at the first trial of Bram, Judge Cabot entered the firm of Hurlburt, Jones & Cabot, with which he was connected until 1916.

He was made an associate and member of the council of Radcliffe College in 1907 and a trustee and treasurer of Dummer Academy, Byfield, in 1909. Later he was president of the trustees of the academy and was a trustee of Wentworth Institute, Boston. He was a member of the Bar Association of the city of Boston.

He was treasurer and director of the Fisher Manufacturing Company and the Winthrop Mills Company. He was a member of the Tavern, Union and Harvard Clubs of Boston, Harvard Club of New York and the Pokanoket Club of Dover.

His home was at 72 Chestnut st, Boston, and his office at 53 State st, Boston.

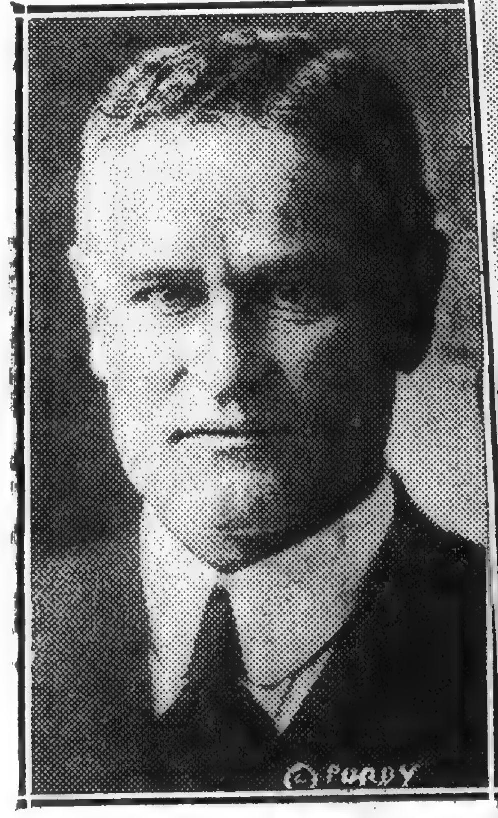
JUDGE CABOT DEAD

Post Jan

Head of Baker Foundation and Symphony Orchestra

NAMED TO JUVENILE COURT IN 1915

Had Been Ill in Phillips House for One Month



© PURDY

FREDERICK P. CABOT
Noted lawyer and judge, who die last night.

Frederick Pickering Cabot, judg of the Juvenile Court and noted Bostonian of distinguished ancestry, diec at the Phillips House of the Massachusetts General Hospital last night after an illness of one month.

He entered the hospital one month ago for an operation and for a time it was believed that he would recover. Convalescence overtaxed his strength and he died very unexpectedly shortly after 7 o'clock last night. He was unmarried and is survived by four sisters and two brothers, Francis Higginson Cabot of New York, Stephen P. Cabot of Boston, Mrs. James J. Putnam of Boston, Mrs. John Richardson of Chestnut Hill, Mrs. Arthur Lyman of Waltham and Miss Amy W. Cabot of Boston.

cannot be enforce 10 — Sixth Col.

Judge Cabot of Juvenile Court Dies in Hospital

Continued From First Page

Judge Cabot was distinguished as one of Boston's foremost citizens, remarkable for his culture and humanitarian principles. He was born in Brookline, June 15, 1868, and took his bachelor's degree with the class of 1890 at Harvard. He took a master's degree in 1893 along with a degree of LL.B. In the same year he was admitted to the Massachusetts bar and began practice.

He had offices at 53 State street and lived at 72 Chestnut street and kept a country home in Dover.

He served as assistant United States district attorney here in 1896 and 1897 and then became a member of the law firm of Hurlburt, Jones & Cabot. He was appointed to the juvenile court in 1915, succeeding Judge Harvey Baker, and he had served continuously in that position ever since.

Symphony Orchestra Head

He was president of the Judge Baker Foundation, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, an overseer of Harvard College, a trustee of Wentworth Institute, a member of the council of Radcliffe College and treasurer and director of the Fisher Manufacturing Company and the Winthrop Mills Company.

He was a member of the Boston Bar Association, the Tavern Union, Harvard club of Boston; the Pokanoket of Dover and the Harvard Club of New York. He was widely known throughout the country as an expert in the settlement of the problems of delinquent children.

Interest in Children

All his life he exhibited a keen interest in the problems of these children, and he was consulted by officials of other States, cities and even foreign countries.

Many a young man and woman, header for crime and disgrace, owe their rehabilitation to the cultured and kindly judge of the juvenile court. Funeral plans, incomplete last night, will be announced today.

Trans. Jan. 7

Judge Cabot's Funeral Saturday

Head of Juvenile Court, Harvard, '90, Active in Various Fields of Usefulness

Judge Frederick Pickering Cabot of the Juvenile Court, and one of the outstanding figures in the country in the field of child delinquency, died suddenly early last evening at the Phillips House, Massachusetts General Hospital, where he had been a patient for the past four weeks. He was in his sixty-fourth year.

The funeral will be held at King's Chapel Saturday at 2.30 P. M.

During an extremely active life Judge Cabot had had many interests of a highly constructive nature, and so conspicuous had his work among children become that two years ago President Hoover invited him to serve as a member of the President's Committee on the White House Conference on Child Health and Protection. He was chairman of the sub-section entitled Socially Handicapped elinquency. For this special work the resident announced that a sum of 00,000 had been placed at his disposal o cover the preliminary expenses, the oney having been privately contributed.

Continued on Page Eleven

Judge Cabot's Funeral Saturday

Continued from Page One

In the important movement for the eform of court procedure as it relates o youth, and the substitution of analyis and education for mere punishment, udge Cabot had always been a strong dvocate.

He was largely instrumental in establishing the Judge Baker Foundation, a edical and psychological clinic for dinosis of difficult cases, and he brought the foundation Dr. William Healey d Dr. Augusta F. Bonner.

Judge Cabot was born in Brookline, ne 15, 1868, the son of Francis and uisa Higginson Cabot. He prepared r Harvard at Hopkinton School, was aduated from Harvard in 1890 and reived the degrees of A. M. and LL. B. 1893. Shortly after his graduation from the Law School he began the practice of law in Boston, and in 1896 he was appointed assistant United States attorney for the district of Massachusetts and served in that position in 1896 and 1897.

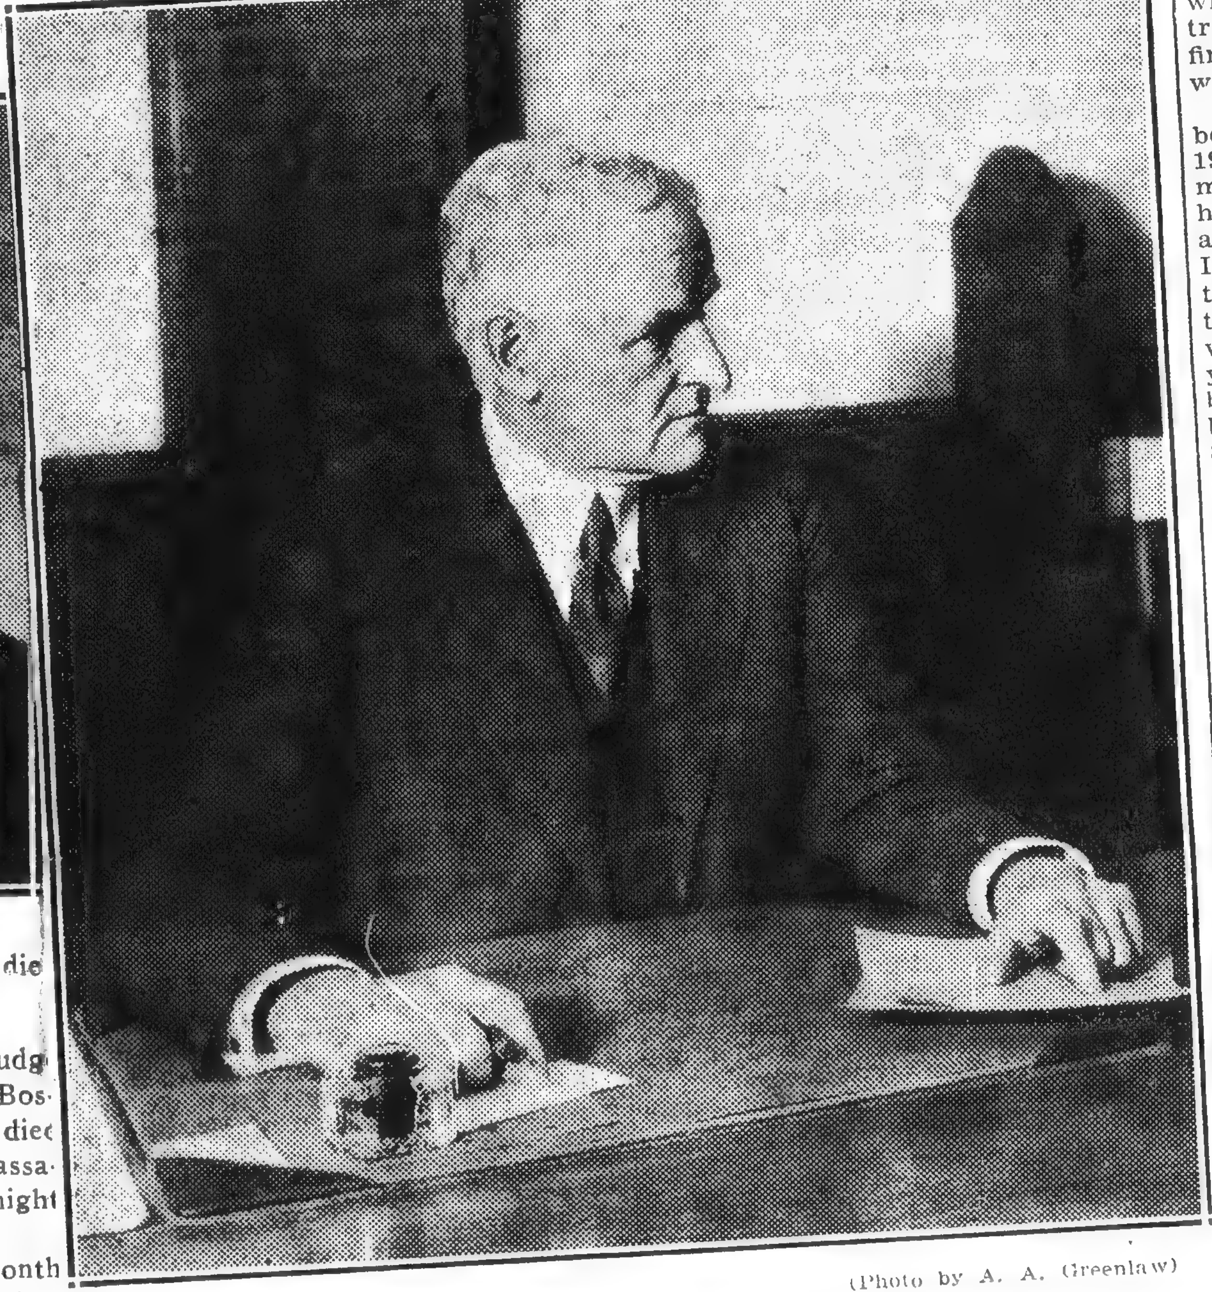
On leaving the Federal service during which he had been an attorney at the first trial of Bram, Judge Cabot entered the firm of Hurlburt, Jones & Cabot, with which he was connected until 1916.

He was made an associate and member of the council of Radcliffe College in 1907 and a trustee and treasurer of Dummer Academy, Byfield, in 1909. Later he was president of the trustees of the academy and was trustee of Wentworth Institute, Boston. He was a member of the Bar Association of the city of Boston. Always deeply interested in Harvard he had been an overseer for some years, and president of the governing board of the Harvard Union. He had long been a factor in the affairs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and was president of its board of trustees. He was treasurer and director of the Fisher Manufacturing Company and the Winthrop Mills Company. He was a member of the Tavern, Union and Harvard clubs of Boston, Harvard Club of New York and the Pokanoket Club of Dover.

Judge Cabot made his home at 72 Chestnut street, Beacon Hill, and had his office at 53 State street.

Surviving him are four sisters, Miss Amy W. Cabot, who lived with him; Mrs. James J. Putnam of 106 Marlboro street; Mrs. Arthur Lyman of Waltham, and Mrs. John Richardson of Chestnut Hill and two brothers, Stephen P. Cabot o 112 Pinckney street, formerly headmaste of St. George's School at Middletown R. I., and Francis H. Cabot of Nev York.

Friend of Youth Is No More



(Photo by A. A. Greenlaw)

Judge Frederick P. Cabot

Head of Juvenile Court, Whose Death Occurred at the Phillips House, Was a Leading Authority on Child Delinquency; Was Graduate of Harvard, and Had Been Boston Lawyer

---

RITES TOMORROW FOR JUDGE CABOT

Prof. Ropes of Harvard Will Officiate

Herald

Funeral services for Judge Frederick Pickering Cabot of the Boston juvenile court, outstanding figure in the study of child delinquency, will be held tomorrow afternoon at 2:30 o'clock in King's Chapel.

Prof. James Hardy Ropes of the Harvard Theological school will officiate, assisted by the Rev. John C. Perkins, pastor. Burial will be at Walnut Hill cemetery, Jamaica Plain.

Charles Jackson will be in charge of the ushers. They will include six nephews of Judge Cabot, John Richardson, Higginson Cabot, George Bonner Cabot, Dr. James Putnam, Arthur T. Lyman and Joseph Lee, Jr. Others will be Henry Shattuck, Charles Hopkinson, Allston Burr, Mark Howe, Warren Sturgis and Arthur Brooks. There will be no pallbearers.

National, state and city governments, the bench and bar will be represented at the funeral in addition to delegations from Radcliffe College, Harvard University, Judge Baker Memorial Foundation, Boston Symphony Orchestra and many other organization with which Judge Cabot was affiliated.

Added to the many tributes paid Judge Cabot since his death was a tribute yesterday from Clerk John T. Lane of the Boston juvenile court. Speaking for himself and his co-workers, Clerk Lane said:

"The staff of the Boston juvenile court most keenly feels the loss of Judge Cabot. His friendliness and patience were so great that he made the most obstinate child understand the respect for law and authority of parents. For a long time there will remain a great emptiness in the Boston juvenile court."

HE WILL BE MISSED

Few men could have been taken from active life in Boston, to be more sadly missed, than the late Judge Frederick P. Cabot. He was so prominent in so many walks of life that it is hard to say in just which his talents and tastes gave him preeminence.

As judge of the Boston juvenile court, he was noted for his sanity and large charity, and his views on child delinquency were sought the country over. He was an overseer of Harvard College; president of the governing board of the Harvard Union; member of the council of Radcliffe College; president of the Judge Baker foundation and president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. So wide a variety of cultural positions is probably not possessed by any other man in Boston.

Of Judge Cabot it can be said without exaggeration that he will be sadly missed from the manifold life of the city.

93

Globe Jan 7

THI

JUDGE F. P. CABOT DIES IN HOSPITAL

Juvenile Court Justice Underwent Operation

Judge Frederick P. Cabot of the Juvenile Court and president of the Judge Baker Foundation, died suddenly at 8 o clock last night at the Phillips House of the Massachusetts General Hospital. Judge Cabot underwent an operation four weeks ago, but was thought to be well on the way to recovery.

In 1917, Judge Cabot was instrumental in establishing the Judge Baker

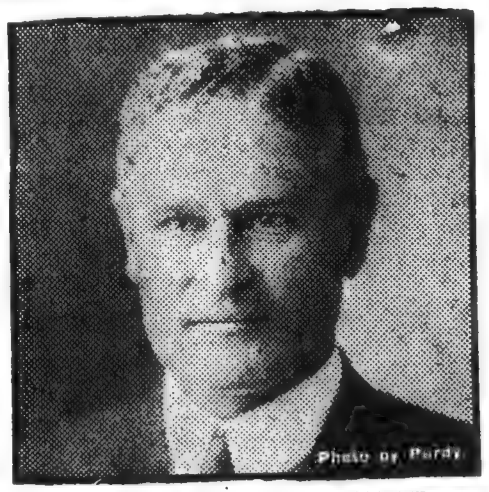


Photo by Purdy

JUDGE FREDERICK P. CABOT

Foundation, a medical and psychological clinic for the diagnosis of difficult cases brought before the Juvenile Court, as well as cases from social agencies, schools and private families.

He brought to the Foundation Dr William Healey and Dr Augusta F. Bonner, pioneers in that field. He has been president of the Foundation since it started.

Chosen by Hoover

Judge Cabot had a keen understanding of children and an appreciation of the value and influence of environment and training. He brought those qualities to the Juvenile Court bench, to which he was appointed in 1916. Remarkable work has been done by the court acting on the principle that a child, through proper habit formation and correct training, can become a desirable citizen instead of an undesirable criminal.

The work of Judge Cabot for delinquent children was recognized by President Hoover in June, 1929, when he was invited to serve as a member of the President's Committee on the White House Conference on Child Health and Protection. He was chairman of the sub-section entitled Socially Handicapped-Delinquency.

He was president of the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc, and had been president of the Massachusetts Society for Promoting the Interests of Adult Blind since 1923. In 1924, he was elected an overseer of Harvard and was a member of a number of the overseers' committees. He had been a member of the council and associate of Radcliffe College for many years.

Born in Brookline

Judge Cabot was born in Brookline, June 15, 1868, the son of Francis and Louisa Higginson Cabot. He prepared for Harvard at Hopkinson School, was graduated from Harvard in 1890 and received the degrees of AM and LLB in 1893. Shortly after his graduation from law school, he began the practice of law in Boston and in 1896, he was appointed Assistant United States Attorney for the District of Massachusetts and served in that position in 1896 and 1897.

On leaving the Federal service, during which he had been an attorney at the first trial of Bram, Judge Cabot entered the firm of Hurlburt, Jones & Cabot, with which he was connected until 1916.

He was made an associate and member of the council of Radcliffe College in 1907 and a trustee and treasurer of Dummer Academy, Byfield, in 1909. Later he was president of the trustees of the academy and was a trustee of Wentworth Institute, Boston. He was a member of the Bar Association of the city of Boston.

He was treasurer and director of the Fisher Manufacturing Company and the Winthrop Mills Company. He was a member of the Tavern, Union and Harvard Clubs of Boston, Harvard Club of New York and the Pokanoket Club of Dover.

His home was at 72 Chestnut st, Boston, and his office at 53 State st, Boston.

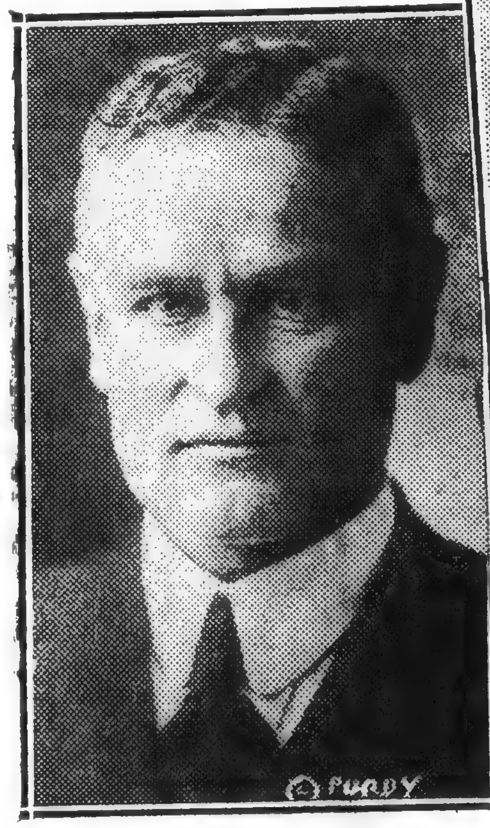
JUDGE CABOT DEAD

Post Jan 8

Head of Baker Foundation and Symphony Orchestra

NAMED TO JUVENILE COURT IN 1915

Had Been Ill in Phillips House for One Month



© PURDY

FREDERICK P. CABOT
Noted lawyer and judge, who die last night.

Frederick Pickering Cabot, judg of the Juvenile Court and noted Bostonian of distinguished ancestry, diec at the Phillips House of the Massachusetts General Hospital last night after an illness of one month.

He entered the hospital one month ago for an operation and for a time it was believed that he would recover. Convalescence overtaxed his strength and he died very unexpectedly shortly after 7 o'clock last night. He was unmarried and is survived by four sisters and two brothers, Francis Higginson Cabot of New York, Stephen P. Cabot of Boston, Mrs. James J. Putnam of Boston, Mrs. John Richardson of Chestnut Hill, Mrs. Arthur Lyman of Waltham and Miss Amy W. Cabot of Boston.

cannot be [illegible] 10 — Sixth Col.

Judge Cabot of Juvenile Court Dies in Hospital

Continued From First Page

Judge Cabot was distinguished as one of Boston's foremost citizens, remarkable for his culture and humanitarian principles. He was born in Brookline, June 15, 1868, and took his bachelor's degree with the class of 1890 at Harvard. He took a master's degree in 1893 along with a degree of LL.B. In the same year he was admitted to the Massachusetts bar and began practice.

He had offices at 53 State street and lived at 72 Chestnut street and kept a country home in Dover.

He served as assistant United States district attorney here in 1896 and 1897 and then became a member of the law firm of Hurlburt, Jones & Cabot. He was appointed to the juvenile court in 1915, succeeding Judge Harvey Baker, and he had served continuously in that position ever since.

Symphony Orchestra Head

He was president of the Judge Baker Foundation, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, an overseer of Harvard College, a trustee of Wentworth Institute, a member of the council of Radcliffe College and treasurer and director of the Fisher Manufacturing Company and the Winthrop Mills Company.

He was a member of the Boston Bar Association, the Tavern Union, Harvard club of Boston; the Pokanoket of Dover and the Harvard Club of New York. He was widely known throughout the country as an expert in the settlement of the problems of delinquent children.

Interest in Children

All his life he exhibited a keen interest in the problems of these children, and he was consulted by officials of other States, cities and even foreign countries.

Many a young man and woman, header for crime and disgrace, owe their rehabilitation to the cultured and kindly judge of the juvenile court. Funeral plans, incomplete last night, will be announced today.

Judge Cabot's Funeral Saturday

Head of Juvenile Court, Harvard, '90, Active in Various Fields of Usefulness

Judge Frederick Pickering Cabot of the Juvenile Court, and one of th outstanding figures in the country the field of child delinquency, died denly early last evening at the Ph House, Massachusetts General Ho where he had been a patient for the past four weeks. He was in his sixty-fourth year.

The funeral will be held at King's Chapel Saturday at 2.30 P. M.

During an extremely active life Judge Cabot had had many interests of highly constructive nature, and so co spicuous had his work among childr become that two years ago Presid Hoover invited him to serve as a m ber of the President's Committee on White House Conference on Child H and Protection. He was chairman sub-section entitled Socially Handi

Continued on Page Eleven

rhe as and and she mon te of had near-and ay, tate in ould

b. 14.
and Alaniverdmitbegan ter bettus & ttorney

Judge Cabot's Funeral Saturday

Continued from Page One

Delinquency. For this special work the President announced that a sum of $500,000 had been placed at his disposal to cover the preliminary expenses, the money having been privately contributed.

In the important movement for the reform of court procedure as it relates to youth, and the substitution of analysis and education for mere punishment, Judge Cabot had always been a strong advocate.

He was largely instrumental in establishing the Judge Baker Foundation, a medical and psychological clinic for diagnosis of difficult cases, and he brought to the foundation Dr. William Healey and Dr. Augusta F. Bonner.

Judge Cabot was born in Brookline, June 15, 1868, the son of Francis and Louisa Higginson Cabot. He prepared for Harvard at Hopkinton School, was graduated from Harvard in 1890 and received the degrees of A. M. and LL. B. in 1893. Shortly after his graduation from the Law School he began the practice of law in Boston, and in 1896 he was appointed assistant United States attorney for the district of Massachusetts and served in that position in 1896 and 1897.

On leaving the Federal service during which he had been an attorney at the first trial of Bram, Judge Cabot entered the firm of Hurlburt, Jones & Cabot, with which he was connected until 1916.

He was made an associate and member of the council of Radcliffe College in 1907 and a trustee and treasurer of Dummer Academy, Byfield, in 1909. Later he was president of the trustees of the academy and was trustee of Wentworth Institute, Boston. He was a member of the Bar Association of the city of Boston. Always deeply interested in Harvard he had been an overseer for some years, and president of the governing board of the Harvard Union. He had long been a factor in the affairs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and was president of its board of trustees. He was treasurer and director of the Fisher Manufacturing Company and the Winthrop Mills Company. He was a member of the Tavern, Union and Harvard clubs of Boston, Harvard Club of New York and the Pokanoket Club of Dover.

Judge Cabot made his home at 72 Chestnut street, Beacon Hill, and had his office at 53 State street.

Surviving him are four sisters, Miss Amy W. Cabot, who lived with him; Mrs. James J. Putnam of 106 Marlboro street; Mrs. Arthur Lyman of Waltham, and Mrs. John Richardson of Chestnut Hill and two brothers, Stephen P. Cabot of 112 Pinckney street, formerly headmaster of St. George's School at Middletown R. I., and Francis H. Cabot of New York.

Friend of Youth Is No More

(Photo by A. A. Greenlaw)

Judge Frederick P. Cabot
Head of Juvenile Court, Whose Death Occurred at the Phillips House, Was a Leading Authority on Child Delinquency; Was Graduate of Harvard, and Had Been Boston Lawyer

---

RITES TOMORROW FOR JUDGE CABOT

Prof. Ropes of Harvard Will Officiate

Herald Jan 8

Funeral services for Judge Frederick Pickering Cabot of the Boston juvenile court, outstanding figure in the study of child delinquency, will be held tomorrow afternoon at 2:30 o'clock in King's Chapel.

Prof. James Hardy Ropes of the Harvard Theological school will officiate, assisted by the Rev. John C. Perkins, pastor. Burial will be at Walnut Hill cemetery, Jamaica Plain.

Charles Jackson will be in charge of the ushers. They will include six nephews of Judge Cabot, John Richardson, Higginson Cabot, George Bonner Cabot, Dr. James Putnam, Arthur T. Lyman and Joseph Lee, Jr. Others will be Henry Shattuck, Charles Hopkinson, Allston Burr, Mark Howe, Warren Sturgis and Arthur Brooks. There will be no pallbearers.

National, state and city governments, the bench and bar will be represented at the funeral in addition to delegations from Radcliffe College, Harvard University, Judge Baker Memorial Foundation, Boston Symphony Orchestra and many other organization with which Judge Cabot was affiliated.

Added to the many tributes paid Judge Cabot since his death was a tribute yesterday from Clerk John T. Lane of the Boston juvenile court. Speaking for himself and his co-workers, Clerk Lane said:

"The staff of the Boston juvenile court most keenly feels the loss of Judge Cabot. His friendliness and patience were so great that he made the most obstinate child understand the respect for law and authority of parents. For a long time there will remain a great emptiness in the Boston juvenile court."

HE WILL BE MISSED

Few men could have been taken from active life in Boston, to be more sadly missed, than the late Judge Frederick P. Cabot. He was so prominent in so many walks of life that it is hard to say in just which his talents and tastes gave him preeminence.

As judge of the Boston juvenile court, he was noted for his sanity and large charity, and his views on child delinquency were sought the country over. He was an overseer of Harvard College; president of the governing board of the Harvard Union; member of the council of Radcliffe College; president of the Judge Baker foundation and president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. So wide a variety of cultural positions is probably not possessed by any other man in Boston.

Of Judge Cabot it can be said without exaggeration that he will be sadly missed from the manifold life of the city.

94

ABOT RITES ON SATURDAY

tate and City Leaders oin in Tribute to Judge

Post Jan 8

The humble and the great joined yes rday in paying tribute to the memory Judge Frederick P. Cabot of the oston Juvenile court, for whom fu eral services will be held at 2:3 'clock tomorrow afternoon in King' hapel.

National, State and municipal, to ether with judicial, civic and socia eaders and other persons of prom ence mourned the passing of th idely known and beloved friend o nfortunate youths.

Mothers and fathers whose broke earts the late judge mended throug indly advice to their law-breakin ons and daughters at one time or ar ther likewise deeply mourned Judg abot's death.

The Rev. James Hardy Ropes, fo nerly of the Harvard Theologic chool and a close friend of the Cab amily, will officiate at the services t norrow afternoon. Dr. Ropes will ssisted by the Rev. John Carroll Pe ins, pastor of King's chapel.

The body will be cremated. Inte nent of the ashes will take place Valnut Hills cemetery, Jamaica Pla The list of ushers will comprise ephews of the late judge.

Boston Daily Globe
FRIDAY, JAN 8, 1932

THE MERCIFUL

FOURTEEN years he has been growing up under your eyes. Then, almost over night, he becomes a stranger, and a stranger not only to you but to himself. His voice cracks. He is horribly embarrassed. His young body, which up to now has worked like a fine machine, turns awkward and gets out of control. He is sensitive about the down on his upper lip, and the suggestion that he begin to shave may either fill him with pride or wound him—there is no knowing which. He, who was always frank as daylight, is now shy and secretive. He finds it hard to look you square in the eye, and, if he does, his look is likely to be accusatory.

Here is the average discomfort of the normal boy even under the most favorable conditions. Then what must it be in a household befogged with ignorance and behagged by poverty? If your boy, with wise and intelligent parents, excellent schooling, perhaps plus the advantage of a college education, finds it an ordeal (and who does not?) to win a niche for himself in the working world, what must it be for youngsters who have none of these? Then suppose an otherwise promising lad develops an erratic streak for which he is not in the least to blame, or that his parents die and the family is broken up, and he is pitched out into a life-and-death battle with the world for which he is utterly weaponless. He gets into trouble. Your average policeman is no psychiatrist. The boy is jailed. Unless someone steps in, society proceeds to make out of this bewildered urchin a hardened young criminal. Whose fault is it?

Not the fault of the Judge Baker Foundation, nor of the late Judge Cabot, who spent the last 15 years of his life untangling such snarls, if indeed he was not able to prevent them.

Within 24 hours of Judge Cabot's death in Boston there appeared on the stage of the Mansfield Theatre in New York the first performance of a play by Mr T. C. Upham, entitled "Lost Boy," a powerful study of a misunderstood youngster hounded into crime and finally into suicide. One psychologist understands the lad and, if given a free hand, could have saved him; but the routineers meddle and the boy goes desperate. The work to which Judge Cabot had given his talent and devotion had become, almost in the hour of his death, a theme of tragic drama. When the justice of a cause begins possessing the minds of creative artists it is well on its march.

Yet in a period when the whole world seems in chaos, what matters the chaos in the mind of an adolescent? Perhaps one has more to do with the other than we guess. Do not moments come when the idea suggests itself that the outer, or material, confusion may be nothing more nor less than an external expression of the inner or spiritual chaos? Your boy, any boy, himself a chaos, is expected to grapple with a world in chaos, and nowhere is it more chaotic than in that part where he must grapple with it first. Watch a boy struggle with the mere problem of earning a living, a question which is out in the open and can at least be freely discussed. Even here his perplexities are painful enough. Persons on the safe side of adult life hasten to forget what adolescence was like. Perhaps what is needed is that a few refuse to forget and insist on making it difficult for others to forget.

Those who have occasion to work with the Judge Baker Foundation must be very dense if they do not quickly discover that they are dealing with persons equipped with an extraordinary psychological training, deep sympathies, and fine human understanding. It is not too much to say that their daily work is to prevent such tragedies as that represented in the New York theatre. At the end of Judge Cabot's life let it be written,

"Blessed are the merciful . . ."

Uncle Dudley.

PAY LAST TRIBUTE TO JUDGE CABOT

Flower banked casket containing body of Judge Frederick P. Cabot being taken from King's Chapel following funeral services.

King's Chapel Filled at Funeral of Juvenile Court Head

SERVICES NOTABLE FOR SIMPLICITY

Herald Jan 10

Final tribute was accorded the late Judge Frederick P. Cabot of the Boston juvenile court, widely known authority in the field of child delinquency, at funeral services in King's chapel yesterday afternoon, which were notable for their simplicity.

The services attracted a host of friends and admirers who comfortably filled the church. Their attendance in such large numbers and from such a wide diversity of fields of endeavor testified eloquently to the deep esteem in which Judge Cabot had been held, and to the sharp, enduring impress he had made on life.

IMPRESSIVE TRIBUTE

Ranging from the humble newsboy to the college president, the friends who joined in paying a last, impressive tribute included outstanding representatives of social service endeavor, the bench and bar, educational institutions and cultural interests, together with persons of varied callings who enjoyed close contact with Judge Cabot through one or another of his numerous activities and interests.

Conspicuous among the friends were the judge's two associates in the juvenile court—Special Justices Frank Leveroni and Philip Rubenstein—and Clerk John T. Lane and the entire staff of 25 workers attached to the court. Present also were Judge Cabot's chief associates in the Judge Baker Foundation, Dr. William Healy and Dr. Augusta F. Bronner—co-workers with him in the activities of this juvenile social clinic which he was largely instrumental in founding.

The services, consisting of scriptural readings, hymns and prayer, were conducted by the Rev. Dr. James Hardy Ropes of the faculty of the Harvard Theological school, assisted by the Rev. Dr. John Carroll Perkins, minister of King's Chapel. Hymns sung by a choir of eight voices under the direction of Raymond C. Robinson, organist of King's Chapel, were, "O God Our Help in Ages Past," and, "For All The Saints."

During the services the casket, banked with flowers and greens, stood outside the chancel, and the chancel rail and window recesses along both sides of the church were lined with floral pieces.

NEPHEWS USHERS

Six of the ushers were nephews: Arthur T. Lyman, John Richardson, Joseph Lee, Jr., James J. Putnam, F. Higginson Cabot, Jr., and George B. Cabot. Other ushers included Henry L. Shattuck, M. A. DeWolfe Howe, Allston Burr, Arthur H. Brooks, Warren Sturgis, Charles Hopkinson and Charles Jackson.

Radcliffe College was represented among those attending the services by President Ada Louise Comstock, and Harvard was represented by Dean LeBaron R. Briggs and other officers of the university. The commonwealth was represented by State Treasurer Charles F. Hurley, and delegates from the Bar Association of the city of Boston comprised Harold J. Coolidge, Charles L. Barlow, Judge Abraham K. Cohen, Damon E. Hall, Hugh D. McLellan and W. Rodman Peabody.

Representatives were also present from the Massachusetts Bar Association, the Boston Symphony orchestra trustees, the class of 1890 of Harvard College, Lincoln House, Wentworth Institute, the Harry E. Burroughs Newsboys' Foundation, the Newsboys' Club, and several social clubs of which Judge Cabot was a member.

At the request of the family the services were simple and comparatively brief. Following cremation, interment services to be attended only by members of the family will take place today at Walnut Hills cemetery. The services, to be held at 2:30 P. M., will be conducted by the Rev. Dr. Perkins of King's Chapel.

AMONG MOURNERS

The list of those having seat reservations at the services included the following:

Abbott, Mrs
Allen, Edward E
Atkinson, Miss Carla
Bangs, Francis R
Barney, Dr & Mrs D
Barrie, Fr.
Bell, Mr and Mrs
Blackall, Mrs Robt M
Blake, Miss Marion
Brennan, William H
Bronner, Mr
Brooks, Mrs Arthur
Brown, Miss Bernice
Butler, Miss Frances
Butler, Miss Charlotte
Burr, Mrs Allston
Cabot, Miss Aimee
Cabot, Mr Channing
Cabot, Blake
Cabot, Mr and Mrs Chilton
Cabot, Mr & Mrs F H
Cabot, Miss Faith
Cabot, Mrs Folin
Cabot, Mr Folin
Cabot, Mr & Mrs H B
Cabot, Rev J Higginson
Cabot, Mr John
Cabot, Dr & Mrs Richard
Cabot, Stephen P
Cabot, Miss Theodora
Colt, Mr & Mrs Chas
Comstock, Miss Ada
Cook, Mrs
Cunningham, Miss Hesta
Curtis, Miss Fannie
Cushman, Roy
Dane, Ernest B
Davenport, Charles M
Donald, Malcolm
Driscoll, Miss
Edsall, Mr and Mrs David
Gray, Ronald
Gluck, Mr and Mrs
Hale, Richard W
Hallowell, N Penrose
Hayes, Sanderson W
Hamlin, Miss Elizabeth
Head, Miss Elizabeth and niece
Healey, Dr
Herrick, Mr and Mrs R F
Herter, Christian
Higginson, Mrs Henry L
Higginson, Mrs Wentworth
Hill, Mr and Mrs. Arthur D
Holmes, Edward J
Homans, Mrs Robert
Hopkinson, Mrs Chas
Houghton, Mrs M G
Howe, Mrs Mark
Hurlburt, Henry F
Ieraidi, Mr and Mrs Francis
Jackson, Mr and Mrs Charles
Jones, Philip N
Judd, George
Kerr, Lewis R
King, Mr and Mrs James R
Lane, Mr
Lawrence, Bishop
Lee, Mr & Mrs Joseph
Lee, Dr & Mrs Roger
Lee, Dr & Mrs Roger I
Lee, Miss Susan
Lenroot, Miss Katharine
Lockwood, Mrs
Lowell, Hon Arnold
Lowell, Frederick E
Lowes, A W
Lyford, Miss Katharine
Lyman, Mr and Mrs Arthur
Lyman, Mrs A T
McKever, Dr and Mrs
McKurnen, Mrs
Merritt, Mr
Morton, James M
O'Mara, Mr
Parker, Herbert
Parsons, Herbert
Parson, Mr and Mrs K B G
Payne, Richard
Perkins, Thomas N
Philadelpheus, Miss
Phillips, William
Pickman, Edward M
Plant, Dr James S
Prince, Mr and Mrs Morton
Putnam, Dr James J
Putnam, Mrs James J
Putnam, Miss Louisa
Putnam, Dr Marion
Richardson, Mrs John
Richardson, Mrs John Jr
Richardson, Dr and Mrs Wyman
Ropes, Mrs James H
Saltonstall, Richard
Sands, Mr Eliot
Sawyer, Henry B
Seabury, Mrs
Sedgwick, Mr and Mrs Ellery
Shattuck, Dr George
Shattuck, Henry
Simonds, Mr and Mrs H G
Solano, Lewis F
Stein, Mrs
Stearns, Dr Warren B
Stoddard, William L
Sturgis, Mrs Warren
Sullivan, Miss
Sullivan, Mrs Russell
Tapley, Miss Alice
Tappan, Robert M
Tuttle, Miss
Van Waters, Dr Miriam

CABOT MEMORIAL CONCERT TUESDAY

A special concert will be given by the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in memory of Jurge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the board of trustees of the orchestra who died last week. The concert will take place tomorrow afternoon in Symphony hall at 4 o'clock. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will return from his mid-season vacation to conduct.

The program which Dr. Koussevitzky has arranged will include choruses from Mozart's Requiem Mass, in which the orchestra will be assisted by the Bach Cantata Club. The concluding number will be Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, a score for which Judge Cabot had often expressed to Dr. Koussevitzky an especial fondness. The orchestra's memorial concert will be open to the public, and no card will be required for admission. The doors will be opened at 3 o'clock.

Trav. Jan 11

CABOT MEMORIAL CONCERT TODAY

Symphony Orchestra to Honor Memory of Late Trustee

The detailed program is announced for the concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a memorial to Judge Frederick P. Cabot, who was president of the board of trustees of the orchestra for 13 years, at 4 o'clock this afternoon, and open to the public.

Dr. Koussevitzky has arranged the following program:

Choruses from Mozart's Requiem.
Requiem.
Dies Irae.
Rex tremendae.
Confutatis.
Lacrimosa.
(Bach Cantata Club, assisting)
Tchaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony No. 6.

The Symphony Orchestra will honor the memory of the late Frederick P. Cabot, President of the Board of Trustees, by a concert in Symphony Hall tomorrow, Tuesday, afternoon. The hall will be open to all comers from three o'clock. The concert will begin at four. The orchestra and the choir of the Bach Cantata Club will be heard in four numbers from Mozart's Requiem; the orchestra alone in Chaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct.

CABOT MEMORIAL CONCERT WILL START AT 4 TODAY

The program for the memorial concert this afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in memory of Judge Frederick P. Cabot was announced yesterday by Dr Serge Koussevitzky, who has returned from his mid-season vacation to conduct. The doors will open at 3 o'clock and the concert will begin at 4.

The program:

Choruses from Mazart's Requiem; Requiem; Dies Irae; Rex tremendae; Confutatis; Lacrimosa (Bach Cantata Club assisting); Tchaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony No. 6.

Judge Cabot was president of the board of trustees of the orchestra for 13 years. The concert, which is open without charge to the public, was arranged by members of the orchestra and their conductor. No tickets of admission will be required.

Concert-Chronicle

New York Revisited

THE fates of the concert-calendar were unkind, in New York last week, to Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra. They gave their first concert on Thursday evening, when the renowned Lotte Lehmann was making her first appearance in Manhattan—not as operatic actress but as singer of songs. Consequently "second-line" reviewers sat before them to set down comment briefer than usual, often more generalized than particular. They distributed the usual compliments. Sibelius's Fourth Symphony was "superbly played. Dr. Koussevitzky lavished infinite care upon it and the great orchestra lent it every eloquence." Beethoven's Fourth Symphony and Corelli's Suite for Strings were "superlatively performed." Or this again, from The Times, as to Sibelius's Symphony:

> From the opening notes, Dr. Koussevitzky had complete command of the orchestra. There was just balance; the resources of the ensemble were conserved; the climaxes had inevitability; the reading was prevailingly tight and tense. There were suggestions of sweetness and Spring in the second movement, not over-sweetened. The broad, expressive melody that is the crest of the third movement was sung with opulent tone. The closing was dull and gray as the composer's conception.

To the program there was occasional demur. It was too long; or it failed to give Frid's Suite—the final number—the chance that the piece deserved. Not all were quick to see that the conductor would contrast the Symphonies of Beethoven and Sibelius, the Suites of Corelli and of Frid. There were the usual repinings over the young Hungarian's music. Scarcely a reviewer was disposed to take it for what it manifestly is; a fertile high-spirited, exercise in fancy and in skill. "It was entertaining [illegible] "not important." Or the themes lacked "great significance" and were overworked. Of all mortal men, only reviewers walk always among the stars where everything is "important" and nothing is insignificant. The rest of us—poor devils!—snatch eagerly at something that is "entertaining and original." So little is in our hapless lives.

ABOT RITES ON SATURDA

tate and City Leader oin in Tribute to Judge

Post Jan 8

The humble and the great joined yes- rday in paying tribute to the memory f Judge Frederick P. Cabot of the oston Juvenile court, for whom fu eral services will be held at 2:3 'clock tomorrow afternoon in King' hapel.

National, State and municipal, to ether with judicial, civic and socia eaders and other persons of prom ence mourned the passing of th widely known and beloved friend o nfortunate youths.

Mothers and fathers whose broke earts the late judge mended throug kindly advice to their law-breakin ons and daughters at one time or ar other likewise deeply mourned Judg Cabot's death.

The Rev. James Hardy Ropes, fo merly of the Harvard Theologic school and a close friend of the Cab amily, will officiate at the services t morrow afternoon. Dr. Ropes will ssisted by the Rev. John Carroll Pe kins, pastor of King's chapel.

The body will be cremated. Inte ment of the ashes will take place Walnut Hills cemetery, Jamaica Pla The list of ushers will comprise nephews of the late judge.

Westerner Offers Own Platform in Seeking Presidential Nomination

Special Dispatch to the Globe

FOURTEEN years he has been growing up under your eyes. Then, almost over night, he becomes a stranger, and a stranger not only to you but to himself. His voice cracks. He is horribly embarrassed. His young body, which up to now has worked like a fine machine, turns awkward and gets out of control. He is sensitive about the down on his upper lip, and the suggestion that he begin to shave may either fill him with pride or wound him—there is no knowing which. He, who was always frank as daylight, is now shy and secretive. He finds it hard to look you square in the eye, and, if he does, his look is likely to be accusatory.

Here is the average discomfort of the normal boy even under the most favorable conditions. Then what must it be in a household befogged with ignorance and behagged by poverty? If your boy, with wise and intelligent parents, excellent schooling, perhaps plus the advantage of a college education, finds it an ordeal (and who does not?) to win a niche for himself in the working world, what must it be for youngsters who have none of these? Then suppose an otherwise promising lad develops an erratic streak for which he is not in the least to blame, or that his parents die and the family is broken up, and he is pitched out into a life-and-death battle with the world for which he is utterly weaponless. He gets into trouble. Your average policeman is no psychiatrist. The boy is jailed. Unless someone steps in, society proceeds to make out of this bewildered urchin a hardened young criminal. Whose fault is it?

Not the fault of the Judge Baker Foundation, nor of the late Judge Cabot, who spent the last 15 years of his life untangling such snarls, if indeed he was not able to prevent them.

Within 24 hours of Judge Cabot's death in Boston there appeared on the stage of the Mansfield Theatre in New York the first performance of a play by Mr T. C. Upham, entitled "Lost Boy," a powerful study of a misunderstood youngster hounded into crime and finally into suicide. One psychologist understands the lad and, if given a free hand, could have saved him; but the routineers meddle and the boy goes desperate. The work to which Judge Cabot had given his talent and devotion had become, almost in the hour of his death, a theme of tragic drama. When the justice of a cause begins possessing the minds of creative artists it is well on its march.

Yet in a period when the whole world seems in chaos, what matters the chaos in the mind of an adolescent? Perhaps one has more to do with the other than we guess. Do not moments come when the idea suggests itself that the outer, or material, confusion may be nothing more nor less than an external expression of the inner or spiritual chaos? Your boy, any boy, himself a chaos, is expected to grapple with a world in chaos, and nowhere is it more chaotic than in that part where he must grapple with it first. Watch a boy struggle with the mere problem of earning a living, a question which is out in the open and can at least be freely discussed. Even here his perplexities are painful enough. Persons on the safe side of adult life hasten to forget what adolescence was like. Perhaps what is needed is that a few refuse to forget and insist on making it difficult for others to forget.

Those who have occasion to work with the Judge Baker Foundation must be very dense if they do not quickly discover that they are dealing with persons equipped with an extraordinary psychological training, deep sympathies, and fine human understanding. It is not too much to say that their daily work is to prevent such tragedies as that repre-

---

FINAL TRIBUTE TO JUDGE CABOT

King's Chapel Filled at Funeral of Juvenile Court Head

SERVICES NOTABLE FOR SIMPLICITY

Herald Jan 10

Final tribute was accorded the late Judge Frederick P. Cabot of the Boston juvenile court, widely known authority in the field of child delinquency, at funeral services in King's chapel yesterday afternoon, which were notable for their simplicity.

The services attracted a host of friends and admirers who comfortably filled the church. Their attendance in such large numbers and from such a wide diversity of fields of endeavor testified eloquently to the deep esteem in which Judge Cabot had been held, and to the sharp, enduring impress he had made on life.

IMPRESSIVE TRIBUTE

Ranging from the humble newsboy to the college president, the friends who joined in paying a last, impressive tribute included outstanding representatives of social service endeavor, the bench and bar, educational institutions and cultural interests, together with persons of varied callings who enjoyed close contact with Judge Cabot through one or another of his numerous activities and interests.

Conspicuous among the friends were the judge's two associates in the juvenile court—Special Justices Frank Leveroni and Philip Rubenstein—and Clerk John T. Lane and the entire staff of 25 workers attached to the court. Present also were Judge Cabot's chief associates in the Judge Baker Foundation, Dr. William Healy and Dr. Augusta F. Bronner—co-workers with him in the activities of this juvenile social clinic which he was largely instrumental in founding.

The services, consisting of scriptural readings, hymns and prayer, were conducted by the Rev. Dr. James Hardy Ropes of the faculty of the Harvard Theological school, assisted by the Rev. Dr. John Carroll Perkins, minister of King's Chapel. Hymns sung by a choir of eight voices under the direction of Raymond C. Robinson, organist of King's Chapel, were, "O God Our Help in Ages Past," and, "For All The Saints."

During the services the casket, banked with flowers and greens, stood outside the chancel, and the chancel rail and window recesses along both sides of the church were lined with floral pieces.

NEPHEWS USHERS

Six of the ushers were nephews: Arthur T. Lyman, John Richardson, Joseph Lee, Jr., James J. Putnam, F. Higginson Cabot, Jr., and George B. Cabot. Other ushers included Henry L. Shattuck, M. A. DeWolfe Howe, Allston Burr, Arthur H. Brooks, Warren Sturgis, Charles Hopkinson and Charles Jackson.

Radcliffe College was represented among those attending the services by President Ada Louise Comstock, and Harvard was represented by Dean LeBaron R. Briggs and other officers of the university. The commonwealth was represented by State Treasurer Charles F. Hurley, and delegates from the Bar Association of the city of Boston comprised Harold J. Coolidge, Charles L. Barlow, Judge Abraham K. Cohen, Damon E. Hall, Hugh D. McLellan and W. Rodman Peabody.

Representatives were also present from the Massachusetts Bar Association, the Boston Symphony orchestra trustees, the class of 1890 of Harvard College, Lincoln House, Wentworth Institute, the Harry E. Burroughs Newsboys' Foundation, the Newsboys' Club, and several social clubs of which Judge Cabot was a member.

At the request of the family the services were simple and comparatively brief. Following cremation, interment services to be attended only by members of the family will take place today at Walnut Hills cemetery. The services, to be held at 2:30 P. M., will be conducted by the Rev. Dr. Perkins of King's Chapel.

AMONG MOURNERS

The list of those having seat reservations at the services included the following:

Abbott, Mrs
Allen, Edward E
Atkinson, Miss Carla
Bangs, Francis R
Barney, Dr & Mrs D
Barrie, Fr.
Bell, Mr and Mrs
Blackall, Mrs Robt M
Blake, Miss Marion
Brennan, William H
Bronner, Mr
Brooks, Mrs Arthur
Brown, Miss Bernice
Butler, Miss Frances
Butler, Miss Charlotte
Burr, Mrs Allston
Cabot, Miss Aimee
Cabot, Mr Channing
Cabot, Blake
Cabot, Mr and Mrs Chilton
Cabot, Mr & Mrs F H
Cabot, Miss Faith
Cabot, Mrs Folin
Cabot, Mr Folin
Cabot, Mr & Mrs H B
Cabot, Rev J Higginson
Cabot, Mr John
Cabot, Dr & Mrs Richard
Cabot, Stephen P
Cabot, Miss Theodora
Colt, Mr & Mrs Chas
Comstock, Miss Ada
Cook, Mrs
Cunningham, Miss Hesta
Curtis, Miss Fannie
Cushman, Roy
Dane, Ernest B
Davenport, Charles M
Donald, Malcolm
Driscoll, Miss
Edsall, Mr and Mrs David
Gray, Ronald
Gluck, Mr and Mrs
Hale, Richard W
Hallowell, N Penrose
Hayes, Sanderson W
Hamlin, Miss Elizabeth
Head, Miss Elizabeth and niece
Healey, Dr
Herrick, Mr and Mrs R F
Herter, Christian
Higginson, Mrs Henry L
Higginson, Mrs Wentworth
Hill, Mr and Mrs. Arthur D
Holmes, Edward J
Homans, Mrs Robert
Hopkinson, Mrs Chas
Houghton, Mrs M G
Howe, Mrs Mark
Hurlburt, Henry F
Ieraidi, Mr and Mrs Francis
Jackson, Mr and Mrs Charles
Jones, Philip N
Judd, George
Kerr, Lewis R
King, Mr and Mrs James R
Lane, Mr
Lawrence, Bishop
Lee, Mr & Mrs Joseph
Lee, Dr & Mrs Roger
Lee, Dr & Mrs Roger I
Lee, Miss Susan
Lenroot, Miss Katharine
Lockwood, Mrs
Lowell, Hon Arnold
Lowell, Frederick E
Lowes, A W
Lyford, Miss Katharine
Lyman, Mr and Mrs Arthur
Lyman, Mrs A T
McKever, Dr and Mrs
McKurnen, Mrs
Merritt, Mr
Morton, James M
O'Mara, Mr
Parker, Herbert
Parsons, Herbert
Parson, Mr and Mrs K B G
Payne, Richard
Perkins, Thomas N
Philadelpheus, Miss
Phillips, William
Pickman, Edward M
Plant, Dr James S
Prince, Mr and Mrs Morton
Putnam, Dr James J
Putnam, Mrs James J
Putnam, Miss Louisa
Putnam, Dr Marion
Richardson, Mrs John
Richardson, Mrs John Jr
Richardson, Dr and Mrs Wyman
Ropes, Mrs James H
Saltonstall, Richard
Sands, Mr Eliot
Sawyer, Henry B
Seabury, Mrs
Sedgwick, Mr and Mrs Ellery
Shattuck, Dr George
Shattuck, Henry
Simonds, Mr and Mrs H G
Solano, Lewis F
Stein, Mrs
Stearns, Dr Warren B
Stoddard, William L
Sturgis, Mrs Warren
Sullivan, Miss
Sullivan, Mrs Russell
Tapley, Miss Alice
Tappan, Robert M
Tuttle, Miss
Van Waters, Dr Miriam

PAY LAST TRIBUTE TO JUDGE CABOT

Flower banked casket containing body of Judge Frederick P. Cabot being taken from King's Chapel following funeral services.

CABOT MEMORIAL CONCERT TUESDAY

A special concert will be given by the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in memory of Jurge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the board of trustees of the orchestra who died last week. The concert will take place tomorrow afternoon in Symphony hall at 4 o'clock. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will return from his mid-season vacation to conduct.

The program which Dr. Koussevitzky has arranged will include choruses from Mozart's Requiem Mass, in which the orchestra will be assisted by the Bach Cantata Club. The concluding number will be Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, a score for which Judge Cabot had often expressed to Dr. Koussevitzky an especial fondness. The orchestra's memorial concert will be open to the public, and no card will be required for admission. The doors will be opened at 3 o'clock.

Trav. Jan 11

CABOT MEMORIAL CONCERT TODAY

Symphony Orchestra to Honor Memory of Late Trustee

The detailed program is announced for the concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a memorial to Judge Frederick P. Cabot, who was president of the board of trustees of the orchestra for 13 years, at 4 o'clock this afternoon, and open to the public.

Dr. Koussevitzky has arranged the following program:

Choruses from Mozart's Requiem.
Requiem.
Dies Irae.
Rex tremendae.
Confutatis.
Lacrimosa.
(Bach Cantata Club, assisting)
Tchaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony No. 6.

The Symphony Orchestra will honor the memory of the late Frederick P. Cabot, President of the Board of Trustees, by a concert in Symphony Hall tomorrow, Tuesday, afternoon. The hall will be open to all comers from three o'clock. The concert will begin at four. The orchestra and the choir of the Bach Cantata Club will be heard in four numbers from Mozart's Requiem; the orchestra alone in Chaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct.

CABOT MEMORIAL CONCERT WILL START AT 4 TODAY

The program for the memorial concert this afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in memory of Judge Frederick P. Cabot was announced yesterday by Dr Serge Koussevitzky, who has returned from his mid-season vacation to conduct. The doors will open at 3 o'clock and the concert will begin at 4.

The program:

Choruses from Mazart's Requiem; Requiem; Dies Irae; Rex tremendae; Confutatis; Lacrimosa (Bach Cantata Club assisting); Tchaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony No. 6.

Judge Cabot was president of the board of trustees of the orchestra for 13 years. The concert, which is open without charge to the public, was arranged by members of the orchestra and their conductor. No tickets of admission will be required.

Concert-Chronicle

New York Revisited

THE fates of the concert-calendar were unkind, in New York last week, to Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra. They gave their first concert on Thursday evening, when the renowned Lotte Lehmann was making her first appearance in Manhattan—not as operatic actress but as singer of songs. Consequently "second-line" reviewers sat before them to set down comment briefer than usual, often more generalized than particular. They distributed the usual compliments. Sibelius's Fourth Symphony was "superbly played. Dr. Koussevitzky lavished infinite care upon it and the great orchestra lent it every eloquence." Beethoven's Fourth Symphony and Corelli's Suite for Strings were "superlatively performed." Or this again, from The Times, as to Sibelius's Symphony:

> From the opening notes, Dr. Koussevitzky had complete command of the orchestra. There was just balance; the resources of the ensemble were conserved; the climaxes had inevitability; the reading was prevailingly tight and tense. There were suggestions of sweetness and Spring in the second movement, not over-sweetened. The broad, expressive melody that is the crest of the third movement was sung with opulent tone. The closing was dull and gray as the composer's conception.

To the program there was occasional demur. It was too long; or it failed to give Frid's Suite—the final number—the chance that the piece deserved. Not all were quick to see that the conductor would contrast the Symphonies of Beethoven and Sibelius, the Suites of Corelli and of Frid. There were the usual repinings over the young Hungarian's music. Scarcely a reviewer was disposed to take it for what it manifestly is; a fertile high-spirited, exercise in fancy and in skill. "It was entertaining [illegible] "not important." Or the themes lacked "great significance" and were overworked. Of all mortal men, only reviewers walk always among the stars where everything is "important" and nothing is insignificant. The rest of us—poor devils!—snatch eagerly at something that is "entertaining and original." So little is in our hapless lives.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

95

Day's Record And News of Concert-Halls

In Memory of Judge Cabot, Apollo Club with Harp, Paderewski's Pieces

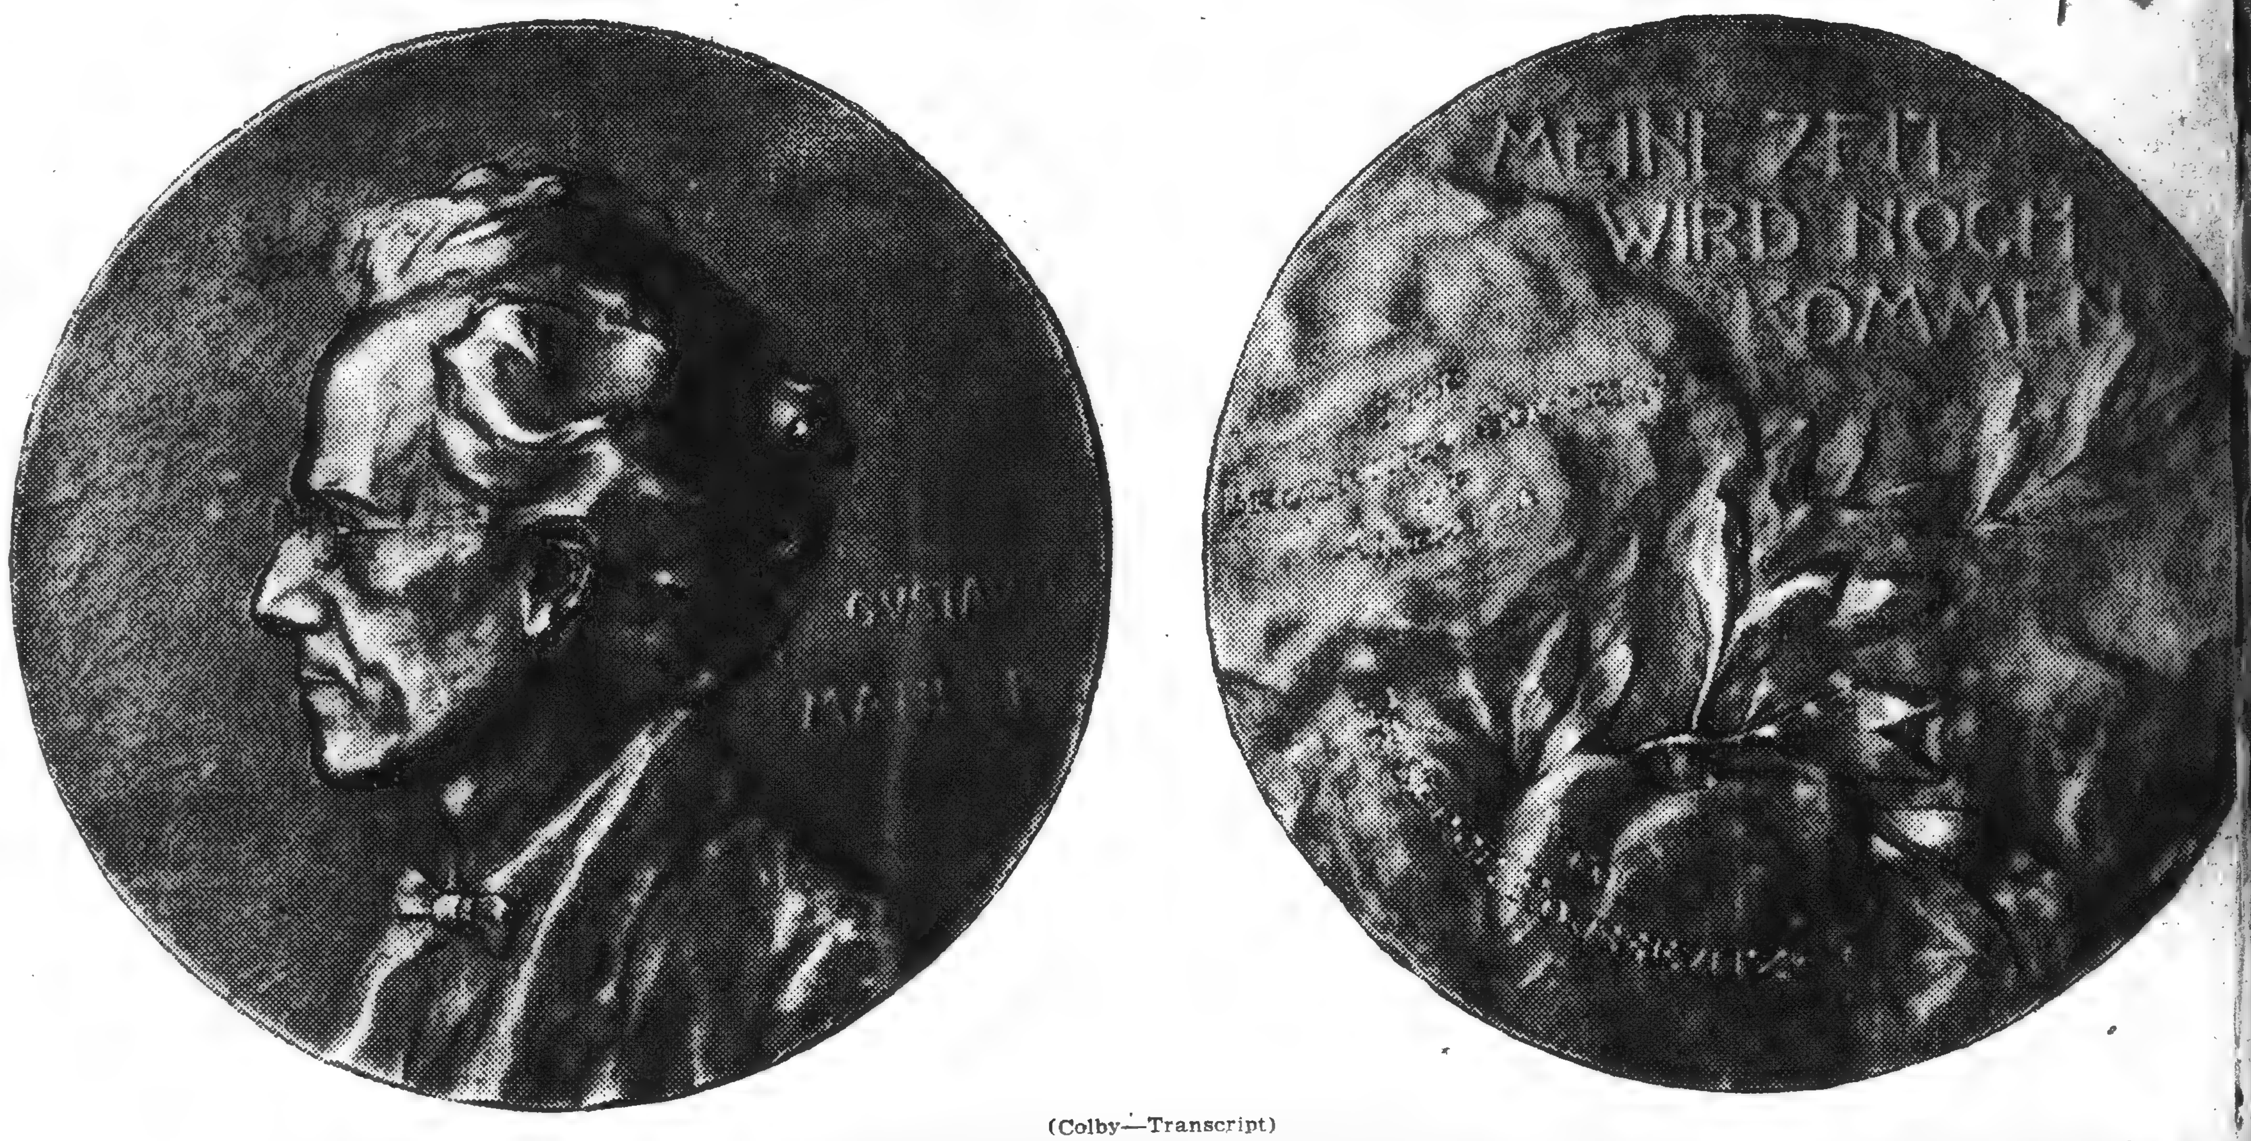
THE trustees, the managers, the conductor and the members of the Symphony Orchestra chose a wise way to recall and honor the memory of the President of the Board, the late Frederick P. Cabot. Precedent ordained a commemorative piece to be first number at the next pair of Symphony Concerts. The choice would not be easy. In the past, whatever the occasion, it has seldom escaped blame. For the most part the usual audience would listen in the usual way, then pass to the further course of the concert. If it were invited to rise, it would straggle to its feet. If it were asked to stand during the memorial number, it would shuffle uneasily. The restraining arm of the conductor might be necessary to check misplaced applause. Every frequenter of the Symphony Concerts, especially in pre-war years, remembers how awkward these "tributes" seemed to sensitive participants; how incongruous with the purpose. They suited only dead composers, recalled by some fragment of their own music in normal, yet honoring place.

Dr. Koussevitzky, who has a sense of ceremony, suggested the better way: A concert isolated from any regular series, departing from normal course, confined within its commemorative purpose, open to all comers. With the program there would also be room for choice. Since death and departure prompted the occasion, death and departure might not be ignored. There was thought of churchly rite, of the world to come. Therefore five numbers from Mozart's Requiem Mass. Evidently Dr. Koussevitzky was disinclined to the conventional pieces for such occasion—Mozart's Masonic Funeral Music, or the slow movement from Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, or the plangent mourning for Siegfried in "Götterdämmerung," or the transcription for orchestra of the Funeral March in Chopin's Piano-Sonata. He preferred music that in life Judge Cabot had heard with admiration and emotion. One such Symphony immediately occurred to him—Chaikovsky's "Pathetic." In it, moreover, who but death beats the drum in the second movement; while the final threnody, whatever its undernote of despair, is also lamentation. Above finality and oblivion it sounds.

As the conductor had planned, so the memorial concert was accomplished. The audience filled the hall. Since human nature is changeless, some in it had seized the opportunity to sit before Dr. Koussevitzky, the orchestra and the "Pathetic Symphony" without money and without price. Many more had come in the spirit of the occasion; while among them frequenters and sustainers of the Symphony Concerts were not lacking. A sporadic rustle of applause at the conductor's entrance quickly subsided. At his call first the orchestra, then the audience, rose for a moment of ceremonial silence. Then, with the Bach Cantata Club as choir, followed these numbers from Mozart's Requiem Mass: the petition for rest and light; the first strophes of Dies Iræ; the strophe in which the God of majesty—and pity—descends; the strophe of the call to the blest; the succeeding strophes that end the hymn with a prayer. In degree the absence of solo voices may have conditioned the choice, but it was appropriate. There was pause for the readjustment of the orchestra; then the "Pathetic Symphony"; from stage and auditorium quiet dispersal. . . . . Through fourteen years Judge Cabot had served faithfully the orchestra, its public and the art of music that is its care. All three had joined together in these final rites of recollection, regard and regret.

H. T. P.

"My Time Will Yet Come"



(Colby—Transcript)

Medal of Honor Bestowed upon Dr. Koussevitzky Last Saturday in New York by the Bruckner-Mahler Society of America to Mark His Production in Boston and New York, This Season, of Mahler's Ninth Symphony. In Appreciation as Well of His Zeal for Both Composers

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA HONORS JUDGE CABOT

Free Concert Pays Tribute to Late Head of Trustees

The Boston Symphony Orchestra paid tribute to the late Judge Frederick Pickering Cabot, president of the board of trustees of the orchestra, who died Jan 6, with a memorial concert in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon.

Dr Koussevitzky returned from his mid-season vacation to conduct five choruses from Mozart's Requiem: The "Requiem," the "Dies Irae," "Rex Tremendae," "Confutatis," and the "Lacrimosa" and Tschaikovsky's sixth symphony, the "Pathetic," for which Judge Cabot is said to have expressed liking and admiration. The Bach Cantata Club sang the choral parts in Mozart's score.

Judge Cabot was the first president of the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony. He was elected to that office in 1916, when Maj Henry Lee Higginson, founder and sustainer of the orchestra, relinquished control of the Boston Symphony, and the present governing organization was established.

The concert was open to the general public, who were admitted without admission fee and without tickets, the first time, it is said, such circumstances have prevailed in the history of the Boston Symphony. The doors were opened at 3, and the auditorium was soon filled.

The family of Judge Cabot and members of the board of trustees occupied a section of the first balcony on the right hand side near the platform.

At 4 o'clock, Dr Koussevitzky walked to the podium, and with a slight gesture bade orchestra and audience rise. After a minute of silence he turned and began the first chorus of supplication from Mozart's mass for the dead.

Following the choral music, an intense and moving performance of Tchaikovsky's symphony concluded the impressive and fitting musical tribute.

SYMPHONY'S TRIBUTE TO JUDGE CABOT

Memorial Concert as Gift to the Public

Post JAN 13

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Yesterday afternoon, for the second time this season, Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra paid tribute to the dead with a memorial concert that was gift to the public. In the first concert such honor was paid to the late Thomas A. Edison. The concert of yesterday was for Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the Board of Trustees of the Symphony Orchestra from 1918 until his death a few days ago.

"PATHETIC" HIS FAVORITE

For Mr. Edison the commemorative music was Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, a favorite piece of the great inventor. To Dr. Koussevitzky, Judge Cabot had often confessed a strong partiality for the "Pathetic" Symphony of Tchaikovsky, and this Symphony, played yesterday, proved, as might have been foreseen, highly suitable as memorial music. A mood of melancholy rising to the heights of tragedy pervades, if it does not dominate, the first movement. The Finale has long been known as one of the mightiest of musical threnodies. In this masterpiece of his fellow-countryman's Dr. Koussevitzky has ever been eloquent as interpreter and conductor. This eloquence, perhaps even intensified by the nature of the occasion, was evident yesterday.

As preface to the Symphony came five choruses; the Requiem Aeternam, Dies Irae, Rex Tremendae, Confutatis and Lacrimosa from Mozart's Requiem, sung by the Bach Cantata Club, which had recently assisted the Symphony Orchestra in a performance of that work. The appropriateness of this music to the purpose for which it was used yesterday goes without the saying, and the performance again attested to the quality of the choir and to the devotion of Dr. Koussevitzky.

A few seats yesterday were reserved for guests of the orchestra and for the members of the chorus once their part in the concert was done. There were not seats enough left to accommodate all of those who wished to attend, and some were permitted to stand in the aisles. At Dr. Koussevitzky's first appearance on the stage an incautious few attempted applause, which was quickly silenced; from then on until the end there was no handclapping or other unseemly expression of approbation. At the concert's beginning, when he reached the conductor's stand, Dr. Koussevitzky bade audience and orchestra stand for a few moments in silent tribute to the man who for 14 years had ably presided over the board that has guided the orchestra's destinies.

Sensibility

TRANS JAN 11

(Marceau—New York)

Chalmers Clifton

To Be Guest-Conductor at the Symphony Concerts of Next Friday and Saturday

Trans. Jan 14

As guest-composer and conductor at the Symphony Concerts of next week, Gustav Holst will fill the program with his own music, viz: A new Prelude and Scherzo, "Hammersmith," named from the riverside suburb in which he lives in London; the ballet-music from his opera, "The Perfect Fool"; a rhapsody on Somerset folk-songs; his largest orchestral piece, "The Planets," unheard here since Mr. Monteux's day. Mars, Venus, Mercury, Jupiter, Saturn, Uranus and Neptune each has a division.

96

Concert-Chronicle

Trans Jan 14

From Mr. Clifton as Guest

IN his eight years at Symphony Hall Dr. Koussevitzky has established a "tradition" in program-making for the Symphony Concerts. Deputy conductors and guest-conductors, when their turn comes, alike defer to it. On every program for the concerts of Friday and Saturday—it ordains—there shall be something new. This something need not be the latest effusion of the latest experimenter, though the experimenters have received due place. It may be long overlooked music from the distant past; or that greater rarity a neglected masterwork from a composer of recent or present day.

Chalmers Clifton—to be guest-conductor at Cambridge this evening, in Boston on Friday and Saturday, so filling the first week of Dr. Koussevitzky's annual respite—heeds the new "tradition." Out of the remote and out of the recent past, he sets on his program a work not yet known to the Symphony Concerts: Handel's Concerto Grosso, No. 9, in F major for String Orchestra; Griffes's Poem for Flute and Orchestra, with Mr. Laurent in the solo-part. Nor are the excerpts from "Götterdämmerung" — "Morning Dawn" and "Siegfried's Rhine-Journey" —too familiar in these days at Symphony Hall, since outside the "Ride of the Valkyrs" Dr. Koussevitzky extracts little from the "Ring" music-dramas. Only with the Symphony from Sibelius—the second—does Mr. Clifton enter upon ground that Dr. Koussevitzky frequents.

Griffes and Handel

Eleven years ago Mr. Monteux discovered Griffes as orchestral composer and produced at the Symphony Concerts his tone-poem, "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan." Last spring Dr. Koussevitzky timely revived it. Now comes the Poem for Flute and Orchestra heard first in Boston at a concert of the Boston Musical Association, with Georges Longy conducting and Elizabeth Jordan playing the solo-part. "It was composed," said the program-note, "in the summer of 1919 at the suggestion of Mr. Georges Barrère, the noted flutist," who "first played it at a concert of the New York Symphony Orchestra under Walter Damrosch in the following November.

John Tasker Howard, in his recent book on American music, has this to say of Griffes's Poem: "It ["The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan"] is colorful music, and so is his Poem for Flute and Orchestra, which was first played by Georges Barrère with unforgettable mastery. In the orchestration of the Poem Griffes surpassed his work in the Pleasure-Dome. It is the most mature of his works. Starting in a gray mood, it merges into a dance movement of strange tonality, with a suggestion of Oriental rhythm and color."

The Poem is scored for small orchestra in addition to the solo-flute, only two horns, harp and strings. Low-pitched instruments play a melody "espressivo" (9-8) which the solo-flute soon repeats. In the thirtieth measure the flute, "tranquillamente" against sustained chords in the orchestra, has a descending phrase which is repeated after several of the later divisions of the piece, somewhat in the manner of a refrain. Stage by stage, the music stirs into ever increasing activity, gradually gathers more and more speed until finally it breaks into a dazzling "Vivace," 2-4. After this has touched climax in a "Presto," the original tempo and mood are resumed with the melody of the refrain, then with the theme of the beginning which is now also theme of conclusion. The reader finds charm in every page of the score.

Though one sees Handel's Concerti Grossi frequently listed on programs, it is surprising that less than half of them have been heard at the Symphony Concerts. Only Numbers 5, 6, 7, 10 and 12 have been played here, and of those five, Number Seven had its last turn long before the present régime. Now Mr. Clifton adds No. 9, in F major, to the list. Two solo violins constitute the "concertino." The movements are (1) Largo; (2) Allegro; (3) Larghetto; (4) Allegro; (5) Minuet. The first, fourth and fifth use the string orchestra "tutti"; in the second and third the "concertino" alternates with the rest of the orchestra. The Largo, on the printed page, looks like a very elementary modern waltz. The first Allegro is bright and vivid. The Larghetto has the rhythm of a "Siciliano" so often favored by eighteenth century composers when writing in this tempo. The second Allegro is a four-voiced fugue. The Minuet—a curious choice for a final movement—is a simple two-part form with a 'cello solo beginning each of the two parts.

A. H. M.

As Cambridge First Hears Mr. Clifton

Trans Jan 15

USUALLY one of the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Cambridge falls into Dr. Koussevitzky's two-weeks' vacation. Last evening's concert was no exception. And the first of the two guest conductors—with the same program as that of today and Saturday in Boston—Mr. Chalmers Clifton, at this concert made his bow to Boston within the precincts of his alma mater. That program assembled a Concerto Grosos of Handel, hitherto unheard in these parts. Number Nine, in F major; Charles T. Griffes's Poem for Flute and Orchestra with Mr. Laurent as soloist—also a novelty; portions of Wagner's "Götterdämmerung," known as "Daybreak" and "Siegfried's Rhine Journey"; Sibelius's second Symphony.

Mr. Clifton, in his slight, fragile figure, still recalls the remembered youth of his student days and a few years later. Even then he was conducting. But almost a score of intervening years have brought the inevitable gray to his head. And of course his manner before his orchestra has long left behind anything that might be termed "student-mässig." He conducts with vigor and with certainty; most of the time his eyes are not on his score, indicating that that score is all but memorized. His readings avoid angularity; keep his music fluid and moving; court flexibility of rhythm. Apparently he has no difficulty in imposing his carefully considered plans on the orchestra.

Detailed consideration of this concert this review will avoid since the place for such consideration is in tomorrow's review of the concert at Symphony Hall. Suffice it to say that Handel's concerto follows more or less the accustomed course of these concerti, with its bright, sparkling movements, its movements grave, its movements borrowed from the dances of the day; that Mr. Clifton and his orchestra gave forth both the breadths and the vigors and the energetic movement of Handelian music. Not often does one hear from Mr. Laurent except in occasional solo passages which are part of the general orchestral texture. It was matter of gratification then, to hear him in the suave, subtle music of Griffes's Poem. Surely every nuance, every delicate change of mood which Griffes put into his score Mr. Laurent drew from it. And Mr. Clifton and the orchestra adeptly sketched the slight orchestral backgrounud.

To hear Mr. Clifton conduct Wagner one might easily have dubbed him a Wagnerian. Clearly were the various motives outlined. Unbroken was the general musical flow. And as a progress toward a single climax, well placed, amply delivered, he read his music.

His Sibelius was music of flaming passion—if the term has not been overworked. Ardently he bade brasses and woodwinds proclaim their several themes. It was also music of those immense vistas which Sibelius so ably summons, often with a single line, or at most two lines of music.

A. H. M.

There is no warrant for the reiterated rumor that production of Mr. Gershwin's Second Rhapsody for Piano and Orchestra is indefinitely postponed at the Symphony Concerts. Conductor and composer have agreed upon Friday, Jan. 29, and Saturday, Jan. 30, as the dates of first performance and neither has changed his mind. In the following week, moreover, Dr. Koussevitzky intends to play the new Rhapsody in New York and possibly in other cities.

Trans

JANUARY 16, 1932

== Deaths

Colorless Symphonic Afternoon

Handel, Griffes, Sibelius Eke Out an Unrewarding Guest-Conductor

WHEN Mr. Chalmers Clifton, as guest-conductor during the first week of Dr. Koussevitzky's annual absence from the Symphony Concerts, came to the platform of Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, the assembled string choir of the orchestra gave no sign. The audience, for its part, received him with a light round of courteous applause. It looked upon the straight, slender figure that some recalled from Mr. Clifton's youthful days as conductor of the Pierian Sodality in Cambridge and of The Cecilia in Boston. Fifteen years of maturing in New York and elsewhere have greyed blonde hair and taken color from fresh cheeks. With the quick step that used to mark him. Mr. Clifton still advances to the podium, though not at the top speed with which Mr. Stokowski strides across the intervening distance. Yet in certain movements of the arms and in the backward fling of his head at moments of proclamation or climax he recalls for the instant the renowned Philadelphian. Mr. Clifton, however, is no imitator; out of experience he has acquired a serviceable technique of his own. It neither distracts the audience nor, so far as the concert tested it, fails of its purpose with the orchestra.

To most Mr Clifton's program was pleasing—the choice of a conductor who also takes thought of his hearers. Since the temptation of Dr. Koussevitzky's string choir is irresistible, it began with one of Handel's Concerti Grossi, in F major No. 9, new to Symphony Hall. It surprised—and possibly disappointed—expectant hearers, since it contains less of the stately, orotund, broadly songful Handel than of the Handel who at will turned off light-running allegros, smiling minuets, deft gigues. Then followed Griffes's Poem for Flute and Orchestra hitherto strangely overlooked at these concerts. Though brief, it takes high place in his slender residue. Seldom in our time is music drenched in such rhapsodic quality. Played by Mr. Laurent at the top of his powers, while a diminished orchestra set in background, it held the audience rapt and stirred.

Since the days of Dr. Muck the public of Symphony Hall has not heard so few excerpts from the "Ring" operas of Wagner. Therefore the arrangement for concert-purpose of the music in which Siegfried parts from Brünnhilde at dawn and voyages the Rhine toward Gunther's house, sounded with uncommon freshness. But removed from its place in "Götterdämmerung," it is not the most effective of Wagnerian fragments. . . . On that score the concluding number made amends. Sibelius's Second Symphony, in D major, is familiar stuff in this, his American seat. These twenty years it has not once failed of glad response.

It would not be the truth to say that Mr. Clifton has matured into a remarkable conductor; but he is well-schooled, intelligent and capable. He did not once thrust himself between composer and audience that the music in hand might bask in his, rather than the creator's, glory. Nor did he once distort it into what our précieuses call a "very personal reading." Rather an exuberant and unquenchable energy possessed him, to be stayed only by the soft-voiced Griffes. Often he seemed strangely dull to the finer sonorities of which the orchestra is capable. The Wagnerian excerpts lacked manifold splendor of tone. The string choir sounded lean rather than rich through Handel's Concerto. Even in the Symphony, the solo-instruments seemed less significant and characteristic than is their wont or the composer's design. In the slow movement the advent of the dominant melody from woodwind chords against whiplash strings was surprisingly unimpressive. Only in the unfolding flood of the Finale did Mr. Clifton discover how multifold could be the instrument at his disposal.

Perhaps one reason is not far to seek. Mr. Clifton proved uncommonly fond of quick and rather inflexible tempi. He brisked through the swifter movements of Handel's Concerto as though it were his will to keep them short-breathed. Even when the marking was largo or larghetto, he would not give the choir time to broaden the expansive phrases. Rather he clipped them. At the outset the ear welcomed his pace with the fragments from "Götterdämmering." Here was to be no luscious dallying. Soon it was plain that this quickening lessened broad flow and spacious progress, was too tight for many an outspreading period. Only in the Symphony of Sibelius did the conductor's tempi seem apt to substance, spirit, style. Only there did his accents suggest a lively sense of charactering rhythm.

Unmistakably this Symphony is Mr. Clifton's tour de force. Yet even there came reservation and mistrust. His musical intelligence will carry him so far;his capability will keep him and the orchestra going presentably. All three encourage expectations that slip away unfulfilled. The song of the Rhine-Maidens began to glow. Now, the listener thought, was Mr. Clifton's moment; but he "exposed" it rather than turned it into tonal gold. The great-voiced Handel sounds not at all out of this Concerto Grosso. He swells not into instrumental song; he strides, full-handed, through no counterpoint. The slower moments recede into conventional formulas. All else is freshly invented, lightly worked, quick-motioned, gay-spirited. With such a Handel we listeners too seldom make acquaintance. Yet the conductor, with all his briskness, dried and cribbed him into a monotonous exposition of chamber music. . . . Mr. Clifton's cool intelligence is untouched by the divine fire; his clear capability is too little tempered by sensibility, finesse and projecting imagination. By all means let us hear these lesser conductors when their betters are not available. They must not say that, being Americans, they receive no opportunity. Their shortcomings, as well as their accomplishments, make them interesting.

Griffes's Poem was the inspiriting piece of the afternoon. Such rhapsodic music seems in these cerebral days to belong to another time. Leave Stravinsky at his table from morn to midnight pondering measures; while out of doors Griffes outpours his song irresistibly. It emerges out of the shadowy accompaniment; takes shape, gathers body, unfolds from itself division into division; sinks into final glow. Romantic rapture possesses the composer; romantic ardor releases him; he cannot choose but sing upon his flute. A music at white heat almost melts waiting judgment. The listener is warmed to the heart; stirred to the quick. With difficulty wisdom reminds him that such composition is inevitably uneven—and he remembers measures when for the moment the melodic obsession flags. The rapture and the ardor beat high again; but reflection wishes that now and again they had been choicer of material and of means.

Or in imagination the listener sees Griffes bending over the music-paper, refining upon a subtly shaded accompaniment, in the reaction from creative heats fearing lest the glow fade. If it has, then Mr. Laurent renewed it not only with a wondrous richness of tone, but with a wealth of rhapsodic feeling. Through measure after measure composer and player sang as one. Griffes looked upon a vision, meditated and wrote the tone-poem of "Kubla Khan." A passion of creation filled him and he could not choose but make this rhapsody. Had he lived to maturity, then in him inspiration and reflection might have joined, and to what music-making.

H. T. P.

The program-book at the Symphony Concert yesterdav made first announcement of subscriptions to the guarantee fund that annually meets the operating deficit. The list of contributors, thus far, fills the usual two pages, but their subscriptions amount to no more than $36,677.50. Evidently the friends of the Symphony Orchestra have more than common reason to bestir themselves.

[illegible]

tion in New England * * SATURDAY, JANUARY 16, 1

RS HAVE UNITED

Chalmers Clifton Conducts Boston Symphony as Guest

By MOSES SMITH

Chalmers Clifton conducts this week's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, while Serge Koussevitzky takes his annual fortnight of respite from his strenuous labors.

Mr. Clifton assembles, for his program, an assortment of mixed matter that includes a Concerto Grosso of Handel, the Poem for flute and orchestra by Charles T. Griffes, "Daybreak" and Siegfried's Rhine Journey from "Gotterdammerung" of Wagner, and Sibelius' second symphony.

Considering, first, the externals of Mr. Clifton's conducting, it may be said that he is of the "vigorous" school, mirroring the excitement of the music (if any) with his own gestures. Each number of this program, moreover, he knew so thoroughly that his glances at the scores before him were but perfunctory. His indications were direct and—apparently—accurate to the men before him.

So far as his "readings" were concerned, we liked especially that of the Handel Concerto, the ninth of the set, never previously heard in Boston. The style was Handelian, as we conceive it, and the playing of the orchestra under Mr. Clifton was immense. The following Poem of the ill-fated Griffes was also given sensitive performance, with Mr. Laurent playing the flute solo ravishingly. The music itself is the later Griffes—Debussyan in character, sparingly and exquisitely orchestrated.

CLIFTON CONDUCTS AT SYMPHONY

Trav

With Mr. Chalmers Clifton in the conductor's stand, the Boston Symphony orchestra yesterday afternoon turned its attention to a program that was interesting in is musical balance and brilliant in its performance.

Mr. Chalmers has distinguished himself as a conductor from the days long before the war, and displayed the same virility and interpretative powers, the same sensitive and highly intelligent conception of the material at hand, for which he has been favorably known to concert lovers.

The first performance in Boston of the F major Concerto Grosso for string orchestra of Handel opened the afternoon's program. In robust vein, with the delicacy of tone and briskness of rhythm reserved for the closing Minuct and Gigue, the concerto is one of the most significant and magnificent of the twelve in the suite.

There followed a Poem for flute and orchestra with Mr. Georges Laurent as soloist, by Charles Tomlinson Griffes, one of America's great composers whose untimely passing some years ago was a genuine loss to the musical world. The music of the flute in solo has an acute sweetness, appealing when an artist of Mr. Laurent's attainments is entrusted with it, and Griffe's poem brings out all the delicacy and loveliness of tones.

The stirring Daybreak and Siegfried's Rhone Journey from Wagner's "Dusk of the Gods," proved as exciting and inspiring musical fare as ever, with the orchestra and conductor rising to splendid heights.

The last half of the afternoon's program held the second symphony from the most eminent of Finnish composers, Jan Sibelius. Having won the distinction of putting Finland on the musical map, Sibelius stands today as one of the most original, powerful and individual geniuses in musical history. While the seriousness of his attitude is always apparent, there are glimpses of trenscendent beauty everywhere, throughout the four movements of this significant work. The finale is a triumph of brilliance in sound and color, and the performance yesterday left an audience at the pitch of enthusiasm. There was vigorous applause for orchestra and conductor.

The program will be repeated this evening, while next week's concerts present as conductors Mr. Gustav Holst in a program of his own compositions.

J. D.

Boston Symphony

With Dr. Serge Koussevitzky on his mid-season vacation, the twelfth program of the Boston Symphony season was entrusted to Mr. Chalmers Clifton, the New York conductor and composer, who on the afternoon of Jan. 15 directed, in Symphony Hall, Boston, the performance of these works: Handel: Concerto Grosso in F major, op. 6, No. 9; Griffes: Poem for flute and orchestra; Wagner: "Daybreak" and "Siegfried's Rhine Journey" from "Götterdämerung"; Sibelius: Symphony No. 2 in D major.

Mr. Clifton, although no stranger to Boston, having directed from 1915 to 1917 the chorus of the Cecilia Society, made on the present occasion, we believe, his first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He revealed himself at once as a conductor of authority, familiar with orchestral routine, who places his talents at the service of the composer in hand, without striving for unusual effects. These qualities led to an exceptionally fine performance of the Handel item, which, oddly enough, had not been heard before in Boston.

Charles T. Griffes's Poem, heard now for the first time at these concerts, had a luminous interpretation, benefiting not only by the superb artistry of Mr. Georges Laurent, first flautist of the orchestra, but by the sympathetic accompaniment. This work and the symphonic poem, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," seem destined to stand as the principal monuments to Griffes, who was a young American composer of high promise.

The gifts which had carried Mr. Clifton with success thus far were less serviceable in the Wagnerian excerpts. This music demands a penetrating dramatic understanding which goes far deeper than any indications which may be found in the score. The interpretation here was faithful but not perhaps revelatory of all the possibilities. The symphony, however, had a vivid reading and a brilliant performance, and the conductor was warmly applauded at its close.

L. A. S.

E. L. H.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Her Jan 16

By PHILIP HALE

Chalmers Clifton, as a guest, conducted the 12th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Symphony hall yesterday afternoon. His program was as follows: Handel, Concerto Grosso, F major, op. 6, No. 9. Griffes, poem for flute (Mr. Laurent), and orchestra. Wagner, "Daybreak" and "Siegfried's Rhine Journey," from "Dusk of the Gods." Sibelius, symphony No. 2, D major.

There is no record of a previous performance in Boston of Handel's ninth concerto. Why this music has been neglected is unaccountable. One wished yesterday that it had not been performed with almost undeviating tonal force, except for the "concertino" passages, the measures for two solo violine. Surely the music, especially the larghetto and the minuet, demand gentler, more expressive treatment. Mr. Clifton, having this great orchestra before him, was apparently intoxicated by the sonority and too often called for full strength. Having technical control, giving many evidences of his skill as a conductor, he nevertheless was sparing in contrasts of light and shade and averse to fine dynamic gradations. And so Handel and Sibelius suffered more than once.

As some conductors let Handel's oratorio singers roar lustily throughout his choruses—wasn't it Ruskin who mentioned the "multitudinous roar of mediocrity"? so Mr. Clifton seems to be of the impression that Handel's concertos should be played in a continuously and aggressively sturdy manner, as if nuances were not known in that composer's day and generation.

Fortunately this proclivity for extreme loudness was not noticeable in the accompaniment to the Poem for flute; and for two good reasons: the score forbids; the orchestra was reduced. There is a sentimental as well as a musical interest in the compositions of Griffes. of whose early death it might be said in Marlowe's words:

"Cut is the branch that might have grown full straight,
And burn-ed is Apollo's laurel bough."

It was in Boston that Griffes knew the joy of success when his "Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan" was applauded 12 years ago; it was here that his admirers realized he was a sick man, worn out by overwork, and the final task of copying his orchestral parts, for he could not afford a copyist, copying at night and teaching music by day.

This Poem was brought out in New York at a symphony concert in the same year and the same month that "Kubla Khan" was heard in Boston. The next year there was a performance at a concert of the Boston Musical Association. The Poem is of unequal worth. The greater part has decided individuality in its romanticism, pages of true poetic feeling, in both the solo measures and those of the accompaniment, but there is one short section that one would wish away: a section in which the theme and its treatment are out of place, unworthy of the context, a theme surprisingly vulgar for so refined a musician. But Griffes had not reached his maturity as an artist; he was still more or less in the experimental stage; he had not the time for revision and rejection; it was as if he felt the need of haste, and wishing to hear his music, realized that the night was fast approaching when he could not work. The solo was beautifully played by Mr. Laurent, technically and with the rhapsodic feeling demanded by the music. And here Mr. Clifton was discreet and sympathetic in the accompaniment.

Those who insist that excerpts from Wagner's "Ring" should not be played in concert halls are here reminded that he himself characterized the "Rhine Journey" as an orchestral scherzo; that during his lifetime he conducted in concert excerpts from his music dramas. It was good to hear this brilliant scherzo and its prelude, which had not been performed at these concerts since 1922.

Was the apparently episodic character of the symphony the fault of the composer or the conductor? Certainly the movements lacked continuity of thought; nor was there any necessity for the ever-recurring tempestuous treatment, too seldom relieved by quietly emotional sections. Mr. Clifton, undoubtedly, had his own scheme carefully planned; he brought out stirring effects in his swellings of tonal force, but his whole interpretation was in too violent a vein. When he arrived at an inevitable climax, it had been discounted by preceding orchestral explosiveness, blare of brass and forcing of strings. An audience in any country rejoices in the stress that is brother of noise. It is therefore not surprising that this interpretation was loudly applauded by many.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Mr. Gustav Holst, the celebrated English composer, will, as a guest, conduct his Somerset Rhapsody; the ballet from his opera, "The Perfect Fool"; the prelude and scherzo "Hammersmith"; and "The Planets." Only "The Planets" is known in Boston.

Post Jan 16

CLIFTON CONDUCTS SYMPHONY

Georges Laurent, Flute the Soloist in Griffes' "Poem"

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Dr. Koussevitzky is now on his midwinter holiday, and the first of the two guest conductors to replace him at the Symphony concerts is Chalmers Clifton, who yesterday afternoon, making his first Boston appearance as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, led that band through a programme of pieces by Handel, ,Briffes, Wagner and Sibelius.

HANDEL AND GRIFFES

No stranger to this city is Mr. Clifton. For two seasons, 1915-1917, he was the conductor of the Cecilia Society. It may be said of him, however, that he is the first American who has appeared as guest conductor at a pair of Symphony Concerts who came as conductor only, not partly as composer.

It is the custom for guest conductors at the Symphony Concerts to introduce some music not in the current repertory of the orchestra, that they may not, so to speak, encroach upon the regular conductor's own ground. Thus Mr. Clifton offered yesterday one of the 12 Concerto Grossi for strings by Handel, No. 9, in F major, that for some reason had escaped previous performance at the Symphony Concerts. For the first time at these concerts, too, Mr. Clifton offered Charles T. Griffes' Poem for flute and orchestra. The double excerpt from Wagner's "Dusk of the Gods," "Daybreak" and Siegfried's "Rhine-Journey," and the Second Symphony of Sibelius made the rest of the programme.

Laurent as Soloist

Griffes' Poem strengthened the suspicion that, gifted as he was, that composer's talent lay in the direction of the smaller rather than the larger forms. This Poem is music of no great distinction or originality, though the final section, wherein the music takes on an Oriental tinge, is notably more interesting than what had gone before. But it afforded welcome opportunity for Mr. Laurent's appearance as soloist, and in his playing of the flute part yesterday there were represented in the highest degree taste, musicianship and virtuosity which have long made him an outstanding member of an outstanding orchestra.

The Concerto Grosso of Handel may not be one of the most important of the 12, but it by no means deserves complete neglect. Mr. Clifford is to be thanked for giving us a hearing of music which is, after all, Handel's and none other's.

Audience Cordial

In the pieces by Handel and Griffes Mr. Clifford displayed his most engaging qualities as conductor. Handel's music was played smoothly, musically, with tonal finish, with expression and with vigor when those qualities were in order. The delicate orchestration of Griffes' Poem was permitted its full effect, and Mr. Clifton kept the orchestra properly subordinated to the flute, a creditable achievement. His choice of the pieces by Wagner and Sibelius seemed an unfortunate one, since there was reason to believe, from yesterday's performance of both, that music of such elemental bigness and dramatic force is alien to Mr. Clifton's temperament. Both pieces seemed yesterday somehow dwarfed and minimized.

At the end of the Symphony Mr. Clifton was recalled by applause which seemed genuinely cordial. And it should be added that Mr. Laurent received a tribute of handclapping that must have proved to him, if he did not already know, how much he is admired and beloved by the subscribers to the Symphony Concerts.

MUSIC

Globe Jan. 16

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Chalmers Clifton conducted yesterday's Symphony concert as guest, since Dr Koussevitzky is taking his annual midseason vacation. Next week Gustav Holst, the noted English composer, will conduct the orchestra in a program of his own works.

Mr Clifton's program included a Handel concerto grosso in F major, opus 6, No. 9; the late Charles T. Griffes' poem for flute and orchestra; "Daybreak" and "Siegfried's Rhine Journey," from Wagner's "Goetterdammerung," and Sibelius' Second Symphony. Georges Laurent, first flute of the Boston Symphony, was soloist.

It is to be wished that American orchestras of the first rank would more often turn, as the Boston Symphony has done this week, to American conductors when a guest leader is needed. If a European of the calibre of Toscanini, Mengelberg, Fuertwangler, or Bruno Walter is available, he should, of course be preferred to any living American. But if no conductor already known to be of the first rank is to be had, it is better to give the opportunity to a young American. How else can we hope to develop American musicians? Too often our foremost orchestras are conducted by Europeans, who have no real superiority over American conductors, either in talent or in experience.

Mr Clifton, a Harvard graduate, and a former conductor of the Cecilia Society, is no stranger to Boston. In recent years he has been conductor of the American Orchestral Society in New York. He has appeared as guest in other American cities. Yesterday he rose to his opportunity. His conducting had taste and authority. His readings were individual and eloquent without doing violence to either the letter or the spirit of the chosen pieces. Plainly his abilities deserve recognition. Were he a European, he would no doubt have won a permanent conductorship of an important orchestra before this.

It is curious that the Handel concerto played yesterday should have been overlooked by other conductors. Music so ingratiating belongs in the standard repertory, yet this concerto had not been perfoimed in Boston before. Mr Clifton, using the full number of the strings, and the necessary harpsichord, secured a richness and variety of tone without excessive sonority. His reading had the qualities said by Rolland to be needed in the performance of these Handel concertos. It sounded like an improvisation, a spontaneous give and take between instruments and groups of instruments. There was none of the pedestrian time beating that disfigures routine performances of such music, but a sensitive, flexible shaping of phrases, a delicate, never insistent rhythmic flow.

Mr Laurent's consciously impeccable flute playing deserved the hearty applause accorded him after the Griffes "Poem." He is an admirable flute player. But there is more emotion in the poignant, groping melodies of Griffes than his interpretation disclosed. At moments his phrasing lacked subtlety. This "Poem" misses by a tragically narrow margin being a masterpiece. Griffes' death at 35 robbed us of one of the two or three American composers who have given promise of great creative achievement.

Mr Clifton's Wagner had the requisite sonority and breadth of style, though it lacked something of the perfect clarity of line that distinguishes the conducting of Dr Karl Muck, or of Toscanini. The excerpts brought the wonted thrill to the listener. But there were blurred passages.

The Sibelius symphony was particularly well interpreted. Its highly individual idiom was sympathetically treated. The final apotheosis was dramatic, with no lapse into facile melodrama. It brought conductor and players hearty applause.

P. R.

97

Holst Best Known for Compositions

Symphony Leader Began Professional Career as Trombonist

Prov

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Gustav Holst, who will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert in the Albee Theatre Tuesday night, is an Englishman of Swedish descent on the paternal side. The name was originally Von Holst, but in that form it had a suspiciously Teutonic sound and, in the early years of the World War, Holst dropped the von lest he be suspected of having German blood. The place of his birth was Cheltenham, and the year 1874.

In company with many other prominent English composers—for he is better known as composer than as conductor—Holst was a pupil of Sir Charles Villiers Stanford at the Royal College of Music, where he, himself, is now professor of composition. As a boy he aspired to be a pianist, but a tendency to neuritis made such a career impossible. So he mastered the trombone, and thus he was given opportunity to learn the orchestra from the inside, an experience invaluable to him both as composer and as conductor. As occasional choral conductor, too, Holst has acquired a command of choral composition, and he handles both media, the orchestra and the chorus, with brilliant mastery.

In Boston Gustav Holst is known by his large-scaled astrological suite for orchestra, "The Planets," by his earlier Oriental suite, "Beni Mora," by his "Hymn of Jesus" for chorus and orchestra, by his singularly impressive setting for male chorus and wind and percussion instruments of Walt Whitman's "Dirge for Two Veterans," by certain of his choral Hymns from the "Rig Veda," and by a few songs.

Among the other works of Holst which have brought him renown at home may be mentioned a choral symphony and a satirical opera, "The Perfect Fool." A recent piece enthusiastically acclaimed at its London premiere is "Hammersmith," an orchestral description of a London crowd making holiday on the Thames. Details of Mr. Holst's programs for Providence and for Boston are not yet at hand, but it is probable that "Hammersmith" will be included for one or the other, or perhaps for both cities.

Holst has once before visited America, in 1923. His present trip is in response to an invitation to teach composition at Harvard University for the remainder of the present academic year, an invitation made possible by the request of Mrs. Horatio Lamb.

Concert-Chronicle

Holst of Hammersmith

Trans Jan 20

IN a chance copy of a program-book for a concert in London of the British Broadcasting Corporation is a note about Gustav Holst that may be first introduction to him as guest-composer and conductor at the next pair of Symphony Concerts. The occasion was the first performance of "Hammersmith" Prelude and Scherzo for Orchestra" to be heard also at Symphony Hall on Friday and Saturday. [Hammersmith is a western suburb of London beside the Thames. It still sits a little apart; wear an aspect of its own neither Victorian Edwardian nor Georgian, rather a blen of all three with an earlier survival her and there; remains a favorite dwellin place for men and women working i the arts]. Says the program-book:

"Four generations of Holsts have al ready made their mark on English music and a gifted daughter of our present-da composer is already promising to ad a share of her own to the family luster Gustav Holst, although his Christian nam recalls his Swedish ancestry, belongs t that English West Country which ha given our time so many of its illustriou figures, Elgar and Vaughan William among them. He and Vaughan William are bound by ties of a friendship which goe back to student days, a brotherhood of a tistic ideals which is none the less real de spite the wide divergencies between thei most characteristic music. Holst's is s wholly individual that to speak of Vaugha Williams' influence on it, as is sometime done, is misleading. The truth is rathe that a common interest in folk-song, and common devotion to their own country have been responsible for some of th freshest and most wholesome music c both, like Holst's 'Cotswolds Symphony 'Somerset Rhapsody,' or 'Egdon Heath His, moreover, ranges over so wide a fiel in subject as in form, and is already s voluminous—amazingly voluminous whe we remember the busy life he has alway led and the high standard he demands c his work—that no one influence can b pointed to as having inspired more tha this or that part of it.

"For many years he has lived in Lo don, in the comparatively peaceful oas which Kipling made illustrious as Bru glesmith, but London has not yet fu nished him with a subject for music c so big a scale as Vaughan Williams' 'Lo don Symphony,' nor in quite so serious strain. Of this new work, he says hir self, 'as far as the work owes anythir to outside influences it is the result c living in Hammersmith for thirty-nine years on and off and wanting to express my feelings for the place in music. . . . Just as I was going to start on the work, I read A. P. Herbert's "Water Gipsies." [A novel of the river] There is no program and no attempt to depict any person or incident. The only two things that I think were in my mind were (1) a district crowded with cockneys, which would be overcrowded if it were not for the everlasting good humor of the people concerned, and (2) the background of the river, that was there before the crowd and will be there presumably long after, and which goes on its way largely unnoticed and apparently quite unconcerned.' "

Incidents and Prospects

Dr. Koussevitzky keeps his liking for anniversaries. The hundredth birthday of Lewis Carroll who invented and wrote "Alice in Wonderland" falls on Wednesday of next week. The sequel to "Alice" was "Through the Looking Glass." The book suggested to Deems Taylor, the composer, a Suite of like title, first heard in Boston in Mr. Monteux's time. To mark the century Dr. Koussevitzky will include it in the Symphony Concerts of Jan. 29 and 30. On nearly the same days the Chicago and the Cincinnati Orchestras will also play it.

98

Jan 21, '32

Pla

Gustav Holst, New Guest at Symphony Hall

As Composer and Conductor He Chooses Widely From His Music

THIS week-end a distinguished composer and conductor is to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra through a program of his own works. He is Gustav Theodore Holst, though except in dictionaries one hears as little of the "Theodore" as of the "von," which was a part of his name before the war. There is no better introduction possible than through the sparkling introductory paragraph written by his colleague Joseph Holbrooke in the chapter he devotes to Holst in his "Contemporary British Composers." Says Mr. Holbrooke:

"Some years ago I was rehearsing my poem, 'The Raven,' with the London Symphony Orchestra at Queen's Hall, andl after I had laid the law down, as far as I could, for my score, I was approached by a short, fair and quite diffident young man, who had been listening. He asked me if I minded him coming to the rehearsal. Of course I said no. I asked him if he was a composer. He said he did a little in that direction, but he could get no performances. He informed me that he was a trombone player by profession and that his name was Holst. I was much interested, as I did not know of him, neither had I ever heard of a great composer who played trombone for his bread. There is nothing stranger than the truth. I said I hoped we should meet again. In those days I was much in evidence in orchestral concerts, but I never met Holst again, and doubted whether I should have known him again if I had met him. There was nothing striking about his externals!"

Of course Holst has done several things in life besides play a trombone. His experience with the heavy brass dates from the period immediately after his student days at the Royal College of Music, when Holst at once joined the orchestra of the Carl Rosa Opera Company as trombonist—but also as "répétiteur." From 1903 to 1923 he was engaged as a teacher, notably at St. Paul's School for Girls in London for which his "St. Paul Suite" was named. Since that time he has devoted himself to composition. Probably his first interest as a composer was in the folk-music of his country, reflected in "The St. Paul Suite," to be first piece on the program for Friday and Saturday, instead of the announced "Somerset Rhapsody."

The St. Paul's Suite for String Orchestra in place of the usual dedication, bears the line, "For St. Paul's Girls' School Orchestra.." The suite was written in 1913, but not published until 1922, when Holst conducted it at a Queen's Hall concert. The movements are (1) Jig, (2) Ostinato, (3) Intermezzo, (4) Finale.

The "Jig" is a vigorous "Vivace," 6–8, in the accustomed jig rhythm and with modal harmonic implications. A contrast, 9–8, is somewhat broader but without losing jig character. There is considerable variety of harmonic treatment.

The "ostinato" of the movement thus named is a three-note figure, ascending, descending, ascending, descending continuously—C D E D C D E D C, etc., throughout the entire length of the movement. It is easy to imagine that the music-master of St. Paul's may have written it as a three-finger exercise for the orchestra made up of his charges. The movement is "Presto." The meter changes from 3-4 to 2-4 and back again, thus giving two varied schemes of accentuation. There is also variation between staccato and legato treatment of the figure. Further there is variaion of he pitch, by shifting once to the octave. A waltz tune and its accompaniment are woven around this buzzing figure. Strings are muted for this movement.

The "Intermezzo" alternates between an Andante con Moto "in three-bar rhythm," 3-4, A minor, and a Vivace, 2-4, A major. The Andante is a violin solo; the Vivace vigorously rhythmed.

In the Finale the jig-like tune "Dargason" (6-8) is first treated imitatively. For contrast, 'cellos sing the cantabile "Green Sleeves" (3-4) against it, introducing a pleasing effect of cross-rhythm. There is an effective climax and then a quiet, but rhythmically active close.

Ballet-Fantasy

Next from the opera, "The Perfect Fool" Opus 39 (1921) comes a charming little ballet in introduction and four scenes. The opera is not at all a comic equivalent of Wagner's "Parsifaf," as has sometimes been inferred from its title. Words and music are both by Mr. Holst. The story is well told by Edwin Evans in the "Musical Times":

"At the rise of the curtain the Wizard commands the spirits of the Earth to bring him a cup, those of Water to fill it with the sweetest essence of love, and those of Fire to dwell within it. By means of this potion he hopes to win the Princess, but he defers drinking it until her arrival. Meanwhile the Fool and his Mother, wandering outcasts, pass that way.

"Two predictions of the wise men form the main theme of the story. Of the Fool they have said:

"He wins a bride with a glance of his eye:
With a look he kills a foe.
He achieves where others fail
With one word.

and of the Princess,

"She shall marry the man who does
The deed no other can do.

"It is the Mother who first discovers that these prophecies are complementary. but she humors the Wizard, even to the point of rehearsing his wooing-song in order to divert his attention from her sleeping son. But while the Wizard is sleeping she administers the potion to the Fool, replacing it with water from the pitcher of a passing maiden. At dawn the Princess arrives, and the Wizard drinks from the cup, but discovers that it has failed of its effect and departs vowing vengeance. There are two other suitors, one from the land of Italian opera, the other from that of heroic music-drama. The latter stumbles over the Fool and awakens him so that his first glance falls on the Princess, and the magic works immediately. Presently news is brought that the country is being devastated by the Wizard and his fiery imps, but the Mother induces the Fool to hold his ground, and he fulfills the second part of the prophecy. The danger averted, he completes the tale, for he succeeds where others have failed in resisting the Princess's charms, and he does so with the one word 'No,' which is the answer to the question, 'Do you love me?' It is the only word he has spoken through the opera. Then, just as he is about to be crowned, he again falls asleep."

Mr. Evans calls this story a "literary equivalent of music, a blend of pure fantasy and high comedy, elements neither of which demands an esoteric meaning, or even a precise definition." Mr. Evans then launches into a somewhat lengthy discussion of a third element, the element of burlesque, provided by the introduction of the lovers from Italian and Wagnerian opera.

As yet nothing is definitely decided, but indications are that Katherine Cornell will begin in Boston her tour in "The Barretts of Wimpole Street." The run in New York will end on Saturday, Feb. 13. The next Monday, Feb. 15, should be the opening date in Boston.

The ballet music occurs at the very beginning of the opera when the Wizard invokes the spirits of Earth, Water, Fire to join in the making of the love-potion. The Wizard's words (transferred of course to orchestral voice) in his supposedly terrifying phrase, together with their accompaniment, form the introductory portion and also the interludes between the three dances. The Dance of the Spirits of the Earth (moderato, 7-8) begins with a slightly syncopated theme in low contrabasses, rises higher and higher and eventually dominates the entire development. The Dance of the Spirits of Water (allegretto, 4-4) is a bright music, in high transparent registers—harp, flutes, violins, oboes. More aggressive is the music of the Dance of the Spirits of Fire (Allegro moderato, 3-4), and entirely appropriate to the summons of the Wizard.

"Spirits of Fire, come to my Call
Dwell within this cup.
Burning, scorching, blasting.
Obey!"

Associations

Mr. Holst includes also on this program his newest work, the Prelude and Scherzo entitled "Hammersmith." It has had but one previous performance, by the orchestra of the British Broadcasting Corporation, in London, Nov. 25, 1931. In the London Daily Telegraph Mr. M. D. Calvocoressi quotes the program book concerning the new work:

"As far as the work owes anything to outside influences, it is the result of living in Hammersmith and wanting to express my feelings for the place in music. There is no program and no attempt to depict any person or incident. The only two things that I think were in my mind were (1) a district crowded with Cockneys . . . and (2) the background of the river." Mr. Calvocoressi continues: "Both the crowd and the river are . . . themes whose association and idiosyncrasies account for the form of the work and the quality of the music, which are the only things that matter. And surely it would have been impossible to warn listeners more emphatically than Holst has done against attempts to connect the music with the concrete impressions which may have inspired it."

At the first performance the program book of the British Broadcasting Company printed this analysis: "The Prelude opens softly, 'Andante quasi adagio' with a theme for basses and violas which, with only slight modification is the ground bass throughout [F-sharp minor]. Above it [in F major] two bassoons announce a long subject which flute and violas repeat after them. Picolo and trumpet break in one after the other, piccolo very softly and trumpet fortissimo, with the instruction 'coarse tone' with a capricious phrase which afterwards becomes" the second subject of the Scherzo, "and for a moment the music grows in strength and speed, to die away again as suddenly.

"The Scherzo is begun by two flutes. without accompaniment" in a leaping rollicking sort of theme. "One clarinet follows, in fugal fashion, with the same subject, bass clarinet, horns and lower strings entering next. A counter subject is announced first by clarinet and viola. . . . A climax is quickly reached, and then two trumpets . . enter with a second subject" anticipated in the Prelude. "The Scherzo is a splendid example of the way in which Holst can blend the most scholarly of forms wtih a hearty, bustling humor. It is closed by a brief English horn solo.

"The Trio, a short and concise fugal movement, is at first a string quartet. . . . close on which follow woodwinds, horns and other strings with a livelier theme to close this section." The returning Scherzo recapitulates in more close-knit texture than at first but in broader manner. There is a return to the Adagio to "round off" the piece as a whole.

Of Seven Stars

"The Planets" is Holst's most extensive and most popular, if not his greatest, work. Since it begins with "Mars, the Bringer of War" the statement is sometimes erroneously made that it was inspired by the late war. As a matter of fact, much of it was already written when the German War began, though it did not come to performance until 1918. The following exposition is based in part upon studies of the subject in two English magazines: by Richard Capell in Music and Letters for January 1927 and by Eric Blom in The Music Teacher for December, 1931.

"Not here or anywhere else," writes Mr. Capell, "did Holst depend on the development of the title into the 'program' . . . . If the musical form of this composition of Holst made a title necessary, the breadth of the intention called for one that should be no restriction on the imagination. Well, the title chosen could hardly have been broader, the more since the planets were here not to be thought of physically or even in their mythological association, but in their astrological signification. They are the stars that shape our courses.

"Do not let us solemnly take Holst for an astrologer. He would not make an orthodox one. He leaves out some of the chief celestial forces and includes two planets not known to classical astrology (Uranus and Neptune). . . . The planets, then, are the influences of destiny and the constituents of the spirit."

"Although there is no thematic link [turning now to Mr. Blom] between the movements, they are so ordered that each one acts as a foil to its neighbors. They may be compared to a series of contrasting frescoes that gain in decorative effect by being placed next to each other. The work is scored for an exceptionally large orchestra, including such rarely used instruments as bass flute, bass oboe and euphonium."

I.—"Mars, Bringer of War." "This has been called the most ferocious piece of music in existence. . . . Holst hews his image of Mars's bulk and merciless mask without love, certainly, but with a sort of appreciative recognition." Pages of a persistent, ponderously rhythmed pedal point on G, in drums, harp, and full string choir form a sort of merciless, grinding background for the first and last portions of this movement. Ominously a phrase winds up to the principal theme—a wave-like series of major triads. Fanfare figures, war-like in suggestion, soon ensue. At the top of the climax the savage grinding of the pedal G returns.

II.—"Venus, Bringer of Peace." "His Venus swims ineffably mild into the evening sky, and he counts from her nothing but blessings. After the frightfulness of Mars her coming into this guise has an exquisite value. The whole of this movement is pervaded by the serenity of a world which nothing seems able to disturb. Gently swaying themes, coolly shimmering tone-colors, eventually give way to a less remote, more human element in the music, when a violin solo over syncopated rhythms enters upon an extended emotional melody. Opening themes are repeated and the piece ends quietly."

III. "Mercury. the Winged Messenger." This is the "scherzo" of the set. Students of harmonic schemes may ponder that the scale upon which it is mostly built is B-flat, C, D, E-flat, E-natural, F-sharp, G-sharp, A. "The music here flickers and plays in a state of disembodied joy. Mind, says Mercury . . . is that which can overcome matter and make good its escape to a sphere of divine playfulness." Harmonic and rhythmic interest are of a high order. A violin solo introduces the melody which dominates the middle section.

IV. "Jupiter, Bringer of Jollity." The movement is robustly elemental. "All the main themes [there are four of them] are imbued with the joy of living, of simple festivity and the exhilaration of the open air." A long-breathed melody, suggesting an exalted folk-song, after the "riot" caused by the other four, brings welcome relief before the recapitulation.

V. "Saturn, Bringer of Old Age." "Old age is seen as a dispensation too grave for a smile, but also, not to be dreaded. Holst declares that he sees Saturn silent." "Flutes and harps begin with a continuous slow alternation of two chords that set up a kind of grey, wintry environment, out of which the principal theme emerges in a fragmentary manner in the double basses." As it develops we become aware that it is "illustrative of the calm beauty and the wisdom of old age rather than of its regrets and decrepitude." The mood of the wisdom of old tude." The mood of the close is solemn and quiet.

VI. "Uranus, the Magician." "In magic the humorous eye can not help seeing a joke. . . . Holst's sixth god makes the mountains resound with the roaring fun. . . . He is a mighty, if genial, magician. The whirlwind is his plaything. This is he that made Behemoth." Trumpets and trombones with full power utter a sort of magic formula that is the clue to this weird and fantastic movement. After a pause bassoons begin a dry statement of the whimsical prinicpal theme. There are repetitions of the magic formula and subsidiary themes scintillating and piquantly rhythmed.

VII. "Neptune, the Mystic." "The last planet swims in mystery on the far confines of our system. What is to be made of it, the ultimate unknown, by our peering into the dark? . . . In the light of what has gone before eternity shall not affright us. We stand on the brink of Neptune's flood that stretches away from the shore of time. For honor's sake we may not fear, nor yet foster unwarranted mortal hopes. We may only wonder at the wash of the unanswerable waves." The atmosphere remains mysteriously remote. "The thematic materia is enwrapped in a vaguely shimmering texture and deliberately indeter in sh

Holst in Boston

Monitor Jan 23

For the second week of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's mid-season vacation, Mr. Gustav Holst, the distinguished English composer, now sojourning in America, was invited to devise and direct a program made up of his own works. Accordingly, on the afternoon of Jan. 22, he conducted, in Symphony Hall, Boston, these compositions: "St. Paul's" Suite; Prelude and Scherzo, "Hammersmith"; ballet from the opera, "The Perfect Fool"; and "The Planets." "Hammersmith" and the ballet music were then heard for the first time in Boston.

Mr. Holst scored a decided artistic and popular success. As a conductor he is devoid of mannerisms or "plastic" appeal, but he obviously had the good will of audience and orchestra alike. It may be said that his music, which has been too little heard in Boston, resembles his conducting, in that it is straightforward and businesslike—very English, in fact. It wins immediate admiration for its masterly technique of composition and for its resourceful orchestration, but what gains our liking is its Englishness, that quality which is so noticeable in Vaughan Williams and which is due in part, probably, to the employment of folk tunes and of themes in the folk manner.

Thus "Hammersmith" recalls the "London" Symphony, not for any specific similarity—though the flow of the Thames is pictured in both pieces—but for a certain vigor and buoyancy, contrasted with a meditative turn. It is not difficult to believe that Mr. Holst had just read Mr. Herbert's "The Water Gypsies" when he wrote this score, just as Mr. Walton had looked upon a Rowlandson print before he set down his tone-picture of "Portsmouth Point"—and just as Miss Sackville-West may well have listened to Mr. Holst's "Saturn" before writing "All Passion Spent." Mr. Holst's "Orientalism" has probably been exaggerated. "Beni Mora" and the "Rig Veda" Hymns may properly call up the Far East, and there is a brief use of modal harmonies in the "St. Paul's" Suite, but Western scales and unusual instrumental timbres are sufficient to produce a nostalgic atmosphere in the "Hammersmith" Prelude and even in "Neptune, the Mystic."

"The Planets" had been heard once before in Boston, under Mr. Monteux, in 1923, but without the woman's chorus in the final section. This chorus seemed important at the concert under review, as the off-stage voices, fading away in interplanetary spaces, brought the curtain. "The Planets" is considered, we believe, Mr. Holst's greatest work. Certainly it is impressive, with its hard and metallic characterization of Mars, its jovial Jupiter, its tender depiction of the quiet glories of age. It is true that the peace brought by this Venus seems a little tame—in spite of the melting beauty of Mr. Boettcher's horn tone—and that the magic of Uranus does not always hold us captive. It is true, too, that the thematic material of the Suite is not invariably of the finest order, and that the composer is not entirely free of the prolixity which is said to be characteristic of the schoolmaster. Nevertheless we are grateful to him for bringing to our hearing these works of one of the most significant of English composers, and we suspect that he is grateful to the Boston Orchestra for lending them the eloquence of its voice.

L. A. S.

98

Jan 21, '32

Pla

Gustav Holst, New Guest at Symphony Hall

As Composer and Conductor He Chooses Widely From His Music

THIS week-end a distinguished composer and conductor is to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra through a program of his own works. He is Gustav Theodore Holst, though except in dictionaries one hears as little of the "Theodore" as of the "von," which was a part of his name before the war. There is no better introduction possible than through the sparkling introductory paragraph written by his colleague Joseph Holbroqke in the chapter he devotes to Holst in his "Contemporary British Composers." Says Mr. Holbrooke:

"Some years ago I was rehearsing my poem, 'The Raven,' with the London Symphony Orchestra at Queen's Hall, andl after I had laid the law down, as far as I could, for my score, I was approached by a short, fair and quite diffident young man, who had been listening. He asked me if I minded him coming to the rehearsal. Of course I said no. I asked him if he was a composer. He said he did a little in that direction, but he could get no performances. He informed me that he was a trombone player by profession and that his name was Holst. I was much interested, as I did not know of him, neither had I ever heard of a great composer who played trombone for his bread. There is nothing stranger than the truth. I said I hoped we should meet again. In those days I was much in evidence in orchestral concerts, but I never met Holst again, and doubted whether I should have known him again if I had met him. There was nothing striking about his externals!"

Of course Holst has done several things in life besides play a trombone. His experience with the heavy brass dates from the period immediately after his student days at the Royal College of Music, when Holst at once joined the orchestra of the Carl Rosa Opera Company as trombonist—but also as "répétiteur." From 1903 to 1923 he was engaged as a teacher, notably at St. Paul's School for Girls in London for which his "St. Paul Suite" was named. Since that time he has devoted himself to composition. Probably his first interest as a composer was in the folk-music of his country, reflected in "The St. Paul Suite," to be first piece on the program for Friday and Saturday, instead of the announced "Somerset Rhapsody."

The St. Paul's Suite for String Orchestra in place of the usual dedication, bears the line, "For St. Paul's Girls' School Orchestra.." The suite was written in 1913, but not published until 1922, when Holst conducted it at a Queen's Hall concert. The movements are (1) Jig, (2) Ostinato, (3) Intermezzo, (4) Finale.

The "Jig" is a vigorous "Vivace," 6–8, in the accustomed jig rhythm and with modal harmonic implications. A contrast, 9–8, is somewhat broader but without losing jig character. There is considerable variety of harmonic treatment.

The "ostinato" of the movement thus named is a three-note figure, ascending, descending, ascending, descending continuously—C D E D C D E D C, etc., throughout the entire length of the movement. It is easy to imagine that the music-master of St. Paul's may have written it as a three-finger exercise for the orchestra made up of his charges. The movement is "Presto." The meter changes from 3-4 to 2-4 and back again, thus giving two varied schemes of accentuation. There is also variation between staccato and legato treatment of the figure. Further there is variaion of he pitch, by shifting once to the octave. A waltz tune and its accompaniment are woven around this buzzing figure. Strings are muted for this movement.

The "Intermezzo" alternates between an Andante con Moto "in three-bar rhythm," 3–4, A minor, and a Vivace, 2-4, A major. The Andante is a violin solo; the Vivace vigorously rhythmed.

In the Finale the jig-like tune "Dargason" (6–8) is first treated imitatively. For contrast, 'cellos sing the cantabile "Green Sleeves" (3–4) against it, introducing a pleasing effect of cross-rhythm. There is an effective climax and then a quiet, but rhythmically active close.

Ballet-Fantasy

Next from the opera, "The Perfect Fool" Opus 39 (1921) comes a charming little ballet in introduction and four scenes. The opera is not at all a comic equivalent of Wagner's "Parsifaf," as has sometimes been inferred from its title. Words and music are both by Mr. Holst. The story is well told by Edwin Evans in the "Musical Times":

"At the rise of the curtain the Wizard commands the spirits of the Earth to bring him a cup, those of Water to fill it with the sweetest essence of love, and those of Fire to dwell within it. By means of this potion he hopes to win the Princess, but he defers drinking it until her arrival. Meanwhile the Fool and his Mother, wandering outcasts, pass that way.

"Two predictions of the wise men form the main theme of the story. Of the Fool they have said:

"He wins a bride with a glance of his eye:
With a look he kills a foe.
He achieves where others fail
With one word.

and of the Princess,

"She shall marry the man who does
The deed no other can do.

"It is the Mother who first discovers that these prophecies are complementary, but she humors the Wizard, even to the point of rehearsing his wooing-song in order to divert his attention from her sleeping son. But while the Wizard is sleeping she administers the potion to the Fool, replacing it with water from the pitcher of a passing maiden. At dawn the Princess arrives, and the Wizard drinks from the cup, but discovers that it has failed of its effect and departs vowing vengeance. There are two other suitors, one from the land of Italian opera, the other from that of heroic music-drama. The latter stumbles over the Fool and awakens him so that his first glance falls on the Princess, and the magic works immediately. Presently news is brought that the country is being devastated by the Wizard and his fiery imps, but the Mother induces the Fool to hold his ground, and he fulfills the second part of the prophecy. The danger averted, he completes the tale, for he succeeds where others have failed in resisting the Princess's charms, and he does so with the one word 'No,' which is the answer to the question, 'Do you love me?' It is the only word he has spoken through the opera. Then, just as he is about to be crowned, he again falls asleep."

Mr. Evans calls this story a "literary equivalent of music, a blend of pure fantasy and high comedy, elements neither of which demands an esoteric meaning, or even a precise definition." Mr. Evans then launches into a somewhat lengthy discussion of a third element, the element of burlesque, provided by the introduction of the lovers from Italian and Wagnerian opera.

As yet nothing is definitely decided, but indications are that Katherine Cornell will begin in Boston her tour in "The Barretts of Wimpole Street." The run in New York will end on Saturday, Feb. 13. The next Monday, Feb. 15, should be the opening date in Boston.

The ballet music occurs at the very beginning of the opera when the Wizard invokes the spirits of Earth, Water, Fire to join in the making of the love-potion. The Wizard's words (transferred of course to orchestral voice) in his supposedly terrifying phrase, together with their accompaniment, form the introductory portion and also the interludes between the three dances. The Dance of the Spirits of the Earth (moderato, 7-8) begins with a slightly syncopated theme in low contrabasses, rises higher and higher and eventually dominates the entire development. The Dance of the Spirits of Water (allegretto, 4-4) is a bright music, in high transparent registers—harp, flutes, violins, oboes. More aggressive is the music of the Dance of the Spirits of Fire (Allegro moderato, 3-4), and entirely appropriate to the summons of the Wizard.

"Spirits of Fire, come to my Call
Dwell within this cup.
Burning, scorching, blasting.
Obey!"

Associations

Mr. Holst includes also on this program his newest work, the Prelude and Scherzo entitled "Hammersmith." It has had but one previous performance, by the orchestra of the British Broadcasting Corporation, in London, Nov. 25, 1931. In the London Daily Telegraph Mr. M. D. Calvocoressi quotes the program book concerning the new work:

"As far as the work owes anything to outside influences, it is the result of living in Hammersmith and wanting to express my feelings for the place in music. There is no program and no attempt to depict any person or incident. The only two things that I think were in my mind were (1) a district crowded with Cockneys . . . and (2) the background of the river." Mr. Calvocoressi continues: "Both the crowd and the river are . . . themes whose association and idiosyncrasies account for the form of the work and the quality of the music, which are the only things that matter. And surely it would have been impossible to warn listeners more emphatically than Holst has done against attempts to connect the music with the concrete impressions which may have inspired it."

At the first performance the program book of the British Broadcasting Company printed this analysis: "The Prelude opens softly, 'Andante quasi adagio' with a theme for basses and violas which, with only slight modification is the ground bass throughout [F-sharp minor]. Above it [in F major] two bassoons announce a long subject which flute and violas repeat after them. Picolo and trumpet break in one after the other, piccolo very softly and trumpet fortissimo, with the instruction 'coarse tone' with a capricious phrase which afterwards becomes" the second subject of the Scherzo, "and for a moment the music grows in strength and speed, to die away again as suddenly.

"The Scherzo is begun by two flutes. without accompaniment" in a leaping rollicking sort of theme. "One clarinet follows, in fugal fashion, with the same subject, bass clarinet, horns and lower strings entering next. A counter subject is announced first by clarinet and viola. . . . A climax is quickly reached, and then two trumpets . . enter with a second subject" anticipated in the Prelude. "The Scherzo is a splendid example of the way in which Holst can blend the most scholarly of forms wtih a hearty, bustling humor. It is closed by a brief English horn solo.

"The Trio, a short and concise fugal movement, is at first a string quartet. . . . close on which follow woodwinds, horns and other strings with a livelier theme to close this section." The returning Scherzo recapitulates in more close-knit texture than at first but in broader manner. There is a return to the Adagio to "round off" the piece as a whole.

Of Seven Stars

"The Planets" is Holst's most extensive and most popular, if not his greatest, work. Since it begins with "Mars, the Bringer of War" the statement is sometimes erroneously made that it was inspired by the late war. As a matter of fact, much of it was already written when the German War began, though it did not come to performance until 1918. The following exposition is based in part upon studies of the subject in two English magazines: by Richard Capell in Music and Letters for January 1927 and by Eric Blom in The Music Teacher for December, 1931.

"Not here or anywhere else," writes Mr. Capell, "did Holst depend on the development of the title into the 'program' . . . . If the musical form of this composition of Holst made a title necessary, the breadth of the intention called for one that should be no restriction on the imagination. Well, the title chosen could hardly have been broader, the more since the planets were here not to be thought of physically or even in their mythological association, but in their astrological signification. They are the stars that shape our courses.

"Do not let us solemnly take Holst for an astrologer. He would not make an orthodox one. He leaves out some of the chief celestial forces and includes two planets not known to classical astrology (Uranus and Neptune). . . . The planets, then, are the influences of destiny and the constituents of the spirit."

"Although there is no thematic link [turning now to Mr. Blom] between the movements, they are so ordered that each one acts as a foil to its neighbors. They may be compared to a series of contrasting frescoes that gain in decorative effect by being placed next to each other. The work is scored for an exceptionally large orchestra, including such rarely used instruments as bass flute, bass oboe and euphonium."

I.—"Mars, Bringer of War." "This has been called the most ferocious piece of music in existence. . . . Holst hews his image of Mars's bulk and merciless mask without love, certainly, but with a sort of appreciative recognition." Pages of a persistent, ponderously rhythmed pedal point on G, in drums, harp, and full string choir form a sort of merciless, grinding background for the first and last portions of this movement. Ominously a phrase winds up to the principal theme—a wave-like series of major triads. Fanfare figures, war-like in suggestion, soon ensue. At the top of the climax the savage grinding of the pedal G returns.

II.—"Venus, Bringer of Peace." "His Venus swims ineffably mild into the evening sky, and he counts from her nothing but blessings. After the frightfulness of Mars her coming into this guise has an exquisite value. The whole of this movement is pervaded by the serenity of a world which nothing seems able to disturb. Gently swaying themes, coolly shimmering tone-colors, eventually give way to a less remote, more human element in the music, when a violin solo over syncopated rhythms enters upon an extended emotional melody. Opening themes are repeated and the piece ends quietly."

III. "Mercury, the Winged Messenger." This is the "scherzo" of the set. Students of harmonic schemes may ponder that the scale upon which it is mostly built is B-flat, C, D, E-flat, E-natural, F-sharp, G-sharp, A. "The music here flickers and plays in a state of disembodied joy. Mind, says Mercury . . . is that which can overcome matter and make good its escape to a sphere of divine playfulness." Harmonic and rhythmic interest are of a high order. A violin solo introduces the melody which dominates the middle section.

IV. "Jupiter, Bringer of Jollity." The movement is robustly elemental. "All the main themes [there are four of them] are imbued with the joy of living, of simple festivity and the exhilaration of the open air." A long-breathed melody, suggesting an exalted folk-song, after the "riot" caused by the other four, brings welcome relief before the recapitulation.

V. "Saturn, Bringer of Old Age." "Old age is seen as a dispensation too grave for a smile, but also, not to be dreaded. Holst declares that he sees Saturn silent." "Flutes and harps begin with a continuous slow alternation of two chords that set up a kind of grey, wintry environment, out of which the principal theme emerges in a fragmentary manner in the double basses." As it develops we become aware that it is "illustrative of the calm beauty and the wisdom of old age rather tnan of its regrets and decrepitude." The mood of the wisdom of old tude." The mood of the close is solemn and quiet.

VI. "Uranus, the Magician." "In magic the humorous eye can not help seeing a joke. . . . Holst's sixth god makes the mountains resound with the roaring fun. . . . He is a mighty, if genial, magician. The whirlwind is his plaything. This is he that made Behemoth." Trumpets and trombones with full power utter a sort of magic formula that is the clue to this weird and fantastic movement. After a pause bassoons begin a dry statement of the whimsical prinicpal theme. There are repetitions of the magic formula and subsidiary themes scintillating and piquantly rhythmed.

VII. "Neptune, the Mystic." "The last planet swims in mystery on the far confines of our system. What is to be made of it, the ultimate unknown, by our peering into the dark? . . . In the light of what has gone before eternity shall not affright us. We stand on the brink of Neptune's flood that stretches away from the shore of time. For honor's sake we may not fear, nor yet foster unwarranted mortal hopes. We may only wonder at the wash of the unanswerable waves." The atmosphere remains mysteriously remote. "The thematic material is enwrapped in a vaguely shimmering texture, and deliberately indeterminite in shape."

A. H. M.

N[illegible] E[illegible]poser, now so[illegible] in Am[illegible]a, was invited to de[illegible] and direct a program made up of his own works. Accordingly, on the afternoon of Jan. 22, he conducted, in Symphony Hall, Boston, these compositions: "St. Paul's" Suite; Prelude and Scherzo, "Hammersmith"; ballet from the opera, "The Perfect Fool"; and "The Planets." "Hammersmith" and the ballet music were then heard for the first time in Boston.

Mr. Holst scored a decided artistic and popular success. As a conductor he is devoid of mannerisms or "plastic" appeal, but he obviously had the good will of audience and orchestra alike. It may be said that his music, which has been too little heard in Boston, resembles his conducting, in that it is straightforward and businesslike—very English, in fact. It wins immediate admiration for its masterly technique of composition and for its resourceful orchestration, but what gains our liking is its Englishness, that quality which is so noticeable in Vaughan Williams and which is due in part, probably, to the employment of folk tunes and of themes in the folk manner.

Thus "Hammersmith" recalls the "London" Symphony, not for any specific similarity—though the flow of the Thames is pictured in both pieces—but for a certain vigor and buoyancy, contrasted with a meditative turn. It is not difficult to believe that Mr. Holst had just read Mr. Herbert's "The Water Gypsies" when he wrote this score, just as Mr. Walton had looked upon a Rowlandson print before he set down his tone-picture of "Portsmouth Point"—and just as Miss Sackville-West may well have listened to Mr. Holst's "Saturn" before writing "All Passion Spent." Mr. Holst's "Orientalism" has probably been exaggerated. "Beni Mora" and the "Rig Veda" Hymns may properly call up the Far East, and there is a brief use of modal harmonies in the "St. Paul's" Suite, but Western scales and unusual instrumental timbres are sufficient to produce a nostalgic atmosphere in the "Hammersmith" Prelude and even in "Neptune, the Mystic."

"The Planets" had been heard once before in Boston, under Mr. Monteux, in 1923, but without the woman's chorus in the final section. This chorus seemed important at the concert under review, as the off-stage voices, fading away in interplanetary spaces, brought the curtain. "The Planets" is considered, we believe, Mr. Holst's greatest work. Certainly it is impressive, with its hard and metallic characterization of Mars, its jovial Jupiter, its tender depiction of the quiet glories of age. It is true that the peace brought by this Venus seems a little tame—in spite of the melting beauty of Mr. Boettcher's horn tone—and that the magic of Uranus does not always hold us captive. It is true, too, that the thematic material of the Suite is not invariably of the finest order, and that the composer is not entirely free of the prolixity which is said to be characteristic of the schoolmaster. Nevertheless we are grateful to him for bringing to our hearing these works of one of the most significant of English composers, and we suspect that he is grateful to the Boston Orchestra for lending them the eloquence of its voice.

L. A. S.

The Prose and The Poetry of Gustav Holst

As Guest-Composer He Fills The Symphony Concert With Four Pieces

TRANS. — JAN. 23

HOW very personal—as the French have it—is the art, or craft, or trade, or livelihood, of reviewing! The apple-cheeked recruit knows no such sensation. For the first times he is giving his impressions and opinions to as many as chance to read him. To himself he may think of them as the world. The pouched and wrinkled veteran is more inured. That questioning sensation, he found long since, is one of the sleeping dogs that it were best to leave undisturbed. Now and then, however, it rises to bite him. . . . Friday afternoon a slave of his calling departed from his place in Symphony Hall in an agreeable state of satisfaction. He had enjoyed the Symphony Concert of Mr. Holst as guest-composer and conductor; by some strange throwback into the age of innocence took it for granted that most others were like-minded.

He first encountered in the lobby Alpha, his friend, who immediately complained that the concert had been "too long"—two hours of it.. The engrossed reviewer had not given a thought to duration; but he hastened to apologize for the guest. English and European audiences—a tougher breed than ours—are accustomed to such length; Mr. Holst with them. . . . Under the marquise Beta, also his friend. The guest, it seemed, was no adept program-maker. Had he been such, he would have put first the long, exacting "Planets," not left that tapestry of tone-poems to the final hour. "A fresh audience is a receptive audience." The slave, thinking again of himself, could only mutter something about a program that advances steadily to climax warning all within earshot along the way. Again he would be true to the guest.

Omega, no more than acquaintance, was waiting on the sidewalk, dogmatic as usual. "All-Beethoven, all-Wagner, all-Chaikovsky is well enough" he said with a wag of a wise head; "but not all-anybody-else." You might suppose that he had conned the works of Mr. Holst, which are considerable, as fast as they fell from the press; whereas until that afternoon he was probably unaware of the distinguished composer's existence. And the silly reviewer had been pleased to hear three pieces hitherto outside his ken and to listen again to the manifold "Planets." . . . Just around the corner, like posterity in the musical play, was little Omicron. "Composers can't conduct," he affirmed succinctly. Yet the rather competent Boston Symphony Orchestra had played as though the guest could conduct; while to the slave he had seemed uncommonly lucid and direct, single-minded for his music.

"Trade-vicissitudes," the reviewer thought to himself. (He had once read the phrase in a financial column and fancied it). He would justify himself, albeit a little shaken, by his report of the afternoon. First, to warm welcome, had come Mr. Holst middle-aged, gray-haired, loose-clothed, accustomed to the concert-hall, modest, friendly, alert, evidently keen for the day's work. . . . Then to the "St. Paul's Suite for Strings," written for the orchestra of the girls' school in London at which he was long the music-master. (He must have taught apt pupils well, if they played what is here set down for them.) A jig, an "ostinato" haunted by a three-note figure, an intermezzo, the finale, ran lightly by. Mr. Holst had drawn material from English folk-song; used it frankly for melody that was close to tune; once touched it with exotic fancy. Rhythm and such color as he could risk from a string choir not to be overtaxed, were oftener his reliance. For instants the progress had seemed a little repetitious. Oftener the Suite was pleasant to hear for freshness and directness, for skill and scholarship unafraid to smile and take itself lightly. The mood was human, genial, sympathetic.

Next to "Hammersmith: Prelude and Scherzo," Mr. Holst's newest work, only two months from production in London. The composer dwells in that western suburb where the broad gray river, brightened or darkened, swift or sluggish, ruffled or smooth, slips endlessly by, unchanged beside the changing generations of men. And these generations are hearty, full-blooded, bustling folk taking this life as they find it, high-humoredly withal. Throughout the musical progress and the expansion of these external promptings go hand in hand. The prelude is the river-music; the scherzo the music of the folk; toward the end they join together to round out both the design and the suggestion. Prelude and scherzo upspring from a life in which the composer shares, that he has come to cherish. It breeds in him, English-wise, both sentiment and humor; sets invention, imagination and skill in creative motion.

Note as well the richness and free choice of technical resource; the certainty of means; the transformation of scholarship and craft into a lucid, vivid music; the rhythmical impetus; the harmonic and instrumental color wrought into a flowing texture. With a head Mr. Holst composes, from the impulses of a heart. If a fugal structure beguiles him as it often does, it but serves both musical and emotional expression. If almost for mannerism he inclines to abrupt transition, it whips up tonal progress.

Then to three numbers from the opera of 1923, "The Perfect Fool." The Wizard invokes the Spirits of Earth. They dance with feet cloven, as it were, by syncopation. He summons the Spirits of Water. They shimmer—in the higher registers of the orchestra—across the tonal air. He calls to his aid the Spirits of Fire. They come hot-footed and gleaming. All three dances are brief and theater-wise; alive with rhythm, aglow with color. Suffice it if the underlying motly generates both. Each dance takes a fantastic turn; has no part in the mood of travesty that elsewhere infuses the opera. (The wise Holst writes in one act lest he exhaust it). Again scholarship and resource as means to ends. Again the unfailing lucidity and directness of expression. Again harmony and color that is born of the underlying melody, not grafted upon it. The hearer's mental image of the composing Holst has taken shape.

Last to the seven tone-poems of the planets, to make less the Symphonic Suite of the pedants than a seven-fold tonal fresco—upon one wall Mars and Venus and Mercury and Jupiter panelled; upon another Saturn and Uranus and Neptune. (The music dates from 1920 before there was a new-found Pluto.) . . . Mars the Bringer of War into the lives and destinies of men. For him Mr. Holst writes a ponderous music, grinding of rhythm, flaring with color. Through all the afternoon, it is his music of power. . . . Venus the Bringer of Peace to soothe those lives and soften those destinies. (Mr. Holst will not willingly lose his hold upon life as the source of music.) For her he writes graciously, serenely, limpidly. The rhythms sway; the colors glisten; out of lyrical mood flows luminous melody. It is his music of the lighter beauty. . . . Mercury the Winged Messenger—to bear the interchanged thoughts and tidings of men. A scherzo, if the hearer likes, of darting figures and interlacing melody. But what are these figures but ideas tossed into the common existence, there interchanged? The manifold Holst transfuses into tones the play and the wit of human minds. . . . Jupiter, the Bringer of Jollity. Holst for heartiness, Holst for humor, Holst to the making, not of melodies, but of a good round tune; Holst affirming his Englishry. The common man under spell of a jovial planet chortling it off on the village screen. The composer likes him; out of liking writes exuberantly.

So to the contrasting tryptitch. . . . Saturn, the Bringer of Old Age for end to human lives, for pause in human destinies. The melodic line thins and pales; the rhythm slows; the color grays. The music recedes from the ear rather than impinges upon it. After warmths, cold; after stir, calm. These are the outskirts of the universe. Holst quests for the graver beauty and finds it. . . . Uranus the magician. He haunts this remote world; conjures up tumults; sweeps across it; shakes it in the hollow of his hand. And of a sudden the silence he has broken stills him. At least once in this seven-fold tone-poem, Holst must release his spirit of fantasy. Into matter, means rhythm and color, he infuses it. . . . it. . . .

Last Neptune the Mystic. Little by little a wan music loses shape, motion, color; dissolves into stirless wisps; fades into faint shimmer. The hushed voices of a hidden chorus of women wind across it. ghosts of human sound. On this ut-

---

MUSIC

Globe Jan 23

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Gustav Holst, the noted English composer, conducted a program of his own music at yesterday's Symphony concert. It included his "St Paul's Suite," "Hammersmith," ballet music from the opera "The Perfect Fool," and the suite, "The Planets." Mr Holst, the latest of the long series of distinguished European composers to appear at these concerts, was warmly and deservedly applauded by both orchestra and audience. He has come to this country to be at Harvard during the second half year as visiting lecturer.

The "St Paul's Suite," for strings, which began the program, was written in 1913, for the student orchestra at St Paul's Girls' School, where Mr Holst then taught music. Its four movements are unpretentious, ingratiating music, in the spirit of the old English folk tunes from which the elder generation of living British composers draw the melodic inspiration their predecessors used to seek in Mendelssohn. The audience was especially delighted with the finale in this suite, where two folk tunes, "Dargason" and "Green Sleeves" are combined.

The prelude and scherzo "Hammersmith," which followed, is Mr Holst's latest work, first performed at London last November. There is no detailed program. The composer, wishing to give a musical impression of the district in London where he has long resided, had only two things in mind, "a district crowded with cockneys," and "the background of the river." In this tone poem Holst has not given his melodic and harmonic impulses the free rein he gave them in "The Planets." At a first hearing the piece sounded a bit labored, a bit crabbed. It failed to capture the listener's attention.

The ballet music from "The Perfect Fool" suffered, of course, from being heard out of its operatic context. The genuine, unforced harmonic originality of Holst, his flair for orchestral effects so admirably suited to their artistic purpose that one overlooks their uniqueness, his liking for robust rhythms and for harmonic clashes arrived at contrapuntally, make this ballet music characteristic of the best in his work.

"The Planets," very favorably remembered from the previous performances here under Mr Monteux, again impressed one yesterday as the finest music written by a living Englishman. The title comes from the astrological meaning of the planets, not from mythology. Jupiter, "the bringer of jollity," Saturn, "the bringer of old age," and Neptune, "the mystic," are the most impressive of the seven movements in the suite. The close of the last-named movement, a wordless chorus for women's voices off stage, is very fine. So are the harmonies in "Saturn" and the melodies in "Jupiter."

The suite as a whole is at times diffuse. There are occasional bits of conventionalism, such as the accompaniment figure for Uranus "the magician," which is akin to dozens of sorcerers in music, as for instances in the "Sorcerer's Apprentice," of Dukas.

Mr Holst's conducting yesterday was that of a well-routined orchestral player who happens also to be a first-rate musician. He began his career as a trombone player. His unassuming demeanor, his lack of what American press agents call "shownmanship," made one respect Mr Holst as a man and as a musician. But he lacked the theatrical instinct for the spotlight essential for a first-rate orchestral conductor.

His music, like that of his friend, Vaughan Williams, made one feel that there is something behind all the talk in London of a renascence of British music. Holst, despite his name, is English by birth, descent and by spiritual affinity. His music sounds an English note. It is not derived from French, German or Russian sources, as so much American orchestral music still is.

Next week Dr Koussevitzky will conduct a program which includes the first public performance of George Gershwin's new rhapsody for piano and orchestra. Mr Gershwin will be the pianist. P. R.

BOSTON EVENING T

Symphony --- Films

The Prose and The Poetry of Gustav Holst

As Guest-Composer He Fills The Symphony Concert With Four Pieces

Trans Jan 23

HOW very personal—as the French have it—is the art, or craft, or trade, or livelihood, of reviewing! The apple-cheeked recruit knows no such sensation. For the first times he is giving his impressions and opinions to as many as chance to read him. To himself he may think of them as the world. The pouched and wrinkled veteran is more inured. That questioning sensation, he found long since, is one of the sleeping dogs best left undisturbed. Now and then, however, it rises to bite him. . . . Friday afternoon a slave of his calling departed from his place in Symphony Hall in an agreeable state of satisfaction. He had enjoyed the Symphony Concert of Mr. Holst as guest-composer and conductor; by some strange throwback into the age of innocence took it for granted that most others were like-minded.

He first encountered in the lobby Alpha, his friend, who immediately complained that the concert had been "too long"—two hours of it. The engrossed reviewer had not given a thought to duration; but he hastened to apologize for the guest. English and European audiences—a tougher breed than ours—are accustomed to such length; Mr. Holst with them. . . . Under the marquise Beta, also his friend. The guest, it seemed, was no adept program-maker. Had he been such, he would have put first the long, exacting "Planets," not left that tapestry of tone-poems to the final hour. "A fresh audience is a receptive audience." The slave, thinking again of himself, could only mutter something about a program that advances steadily to climax warming all within earshot along the way. Again he would be true to the guest.

Omega, no more than acquaintance, was waiting on the sidewalk, dogmatic as usual. "All-Beethoven, all-Wagner, all-Chaikovsky is well enough" he said with a wag of a wise head; "but not all-anybody-else." You might suppose that he had conned the works of Mr. Holst, which are considerable, as fast as they fell from the press; whereas until that afternoon he was probably unaware of the distinguished composer's existence. And the silly reviewer had been pleased to hear three pieces hitherto outside his ken and to listen again to the manifold "Planets." . . . Just around the corner, like posterity in the musical play, was little Omicron. "Composers can't conduct," he affirmed succinctly. Yet the rather competent Boston Symphony Orchestra had played as though the guest could conduct; while to the slave he had seemed uncommonly lucid and direct, single-minded for his music.

"Trade-vicissitudes," the reviewer thought to himself. (He had once read the phrase in a financial column and fancied it). He would justify himself, albeit a little shaken, by his report of the afternoon. First, to warm welcome, had come Mr. Holst middle-aged, gray-haired, loose-clothed, accustomed to the concert-hall, modest, friendly, alert, evidently keen for the day's work. . . . Then to the "St. Paul's Suite for Strings," written for the orchestra of the girls' school in London at which he was long the music-master. (He must have taught apt pupils well, if they played what is here set down for them.) A jig, an "ostinato" haunted by a three-note figure, an intermezzo, the finale, ran lightly by. Mr. Holst had drawn material from English folk-song; used it frankly for melody that was close to tune; once touched it with exotic fancy. Rhythm and such color as he could risk from a string choir not to be overtaxed, were oftener his reliance. For instants the progress had seemed a little repetitious. Oftener the Suite was pleasant to hear for freshness and directness, for skill and scholarship unafraid to smile and take itself lightly. The mood was human, genial, sympathetic.

Next to "Hammersmith: Prelude and Scherzo," Mr. Holst's newest work, only two months from production in London. The composer dwells in that western suburb where the broad gray river, brightened or darkened, swift or sluggish, ruffled or smooth, slips endlessly by, unchanged beside the changing generations of men. And these generations are hearty, full-blooded, bustling folk taking this life as they find it, high-humoredly withal. Throughout, the musical progress and the expansion of these external promptings go hand in hand. The prelude is the river-music; the scherzo the music of the folk; toward the end they join together to round out both the design and the suggestion. Prelude and scherzo upspring from a life in which the composer shares, that he has come to cherish. It breeds in him, English-wise, both sentiment and humor; sets invention, imagination and skill in creative motion.

Note as well the richness and free choice of technical resource; the certainty of means; the transformation of scholarship and craft into a lucid, vivid music; the rhythmical impetus; the harmonic and instrumental color wrought into a flowing texture. With a head Mr. Holst composes, from the impulses of a heart. If a fugal structure beguiles him as it often does, it serves both musical and emotional expression. If almost to mannerism he courts abrupt transition, it whips up tonal progress.

Then to three numbers from the opera of 1923, "The Perfect Fool." The Wizard invokes the Spirits of Earth. They dance with feet cloven, as it were, by syncopation. He summons the Spirits of Water. They shimmer—in the higher registers of the orchestra—across the tonal air. He calls to his aid the Spirits of Fire. They come hot-footed and gleaming. All three dances are brief and theater-wise; alive with rhythm, aglow with color. Suffice it if the underlying motiv generates both. Each dance takes a fantastic turn; has no part in the mood of travesty that elsewhere infuses the opera. (The wise Holst writes in one act lest he exhaust it). Again scholarship and resource as means to ends. Again the unfailing lucidity and directness of expression. Again harmony and color that is born of the underlying melody, not grafted upon it. The hearer's mental image of the composing Holst has taken shape.

Last to the seven tone-poems of the planets, to make less the Symphonic Suite of the pedants than a seven-fold tonal fresco—upon one wall Mars and Venus and Mercury and Jupiter panelled; upon another Saturn and Uranus and Neptune. (The music dates from 1920 before there was a new-found Pluto.) . . . Mars the Bringer of War into the lives and destinies of men. For him Mr. Holst writes a ponderous music, grinding of rhythm, flaring with color. Through all the afternoon, it is his music of power. . . . Venus the Bringer of Peace to soothe those lives and soften those destinies. (Mr. Holst will not willingly lose his hold upon life as the source of music.) For her he writes graciously, serenely, limpidly. The rhythms sway; the colors glisten; out of lyrical mood flows luminous melody. It is his music of the lighter beauty. . . . Mercury the Winged Messenger—to bear the interchanged thoughts and tidings of men. A scherzo, if the hearer likes, of darting figures and interlacing melody. But what are these figures but ideas tossed into the common existence, there interchanged? The manifold Holst transfuses into tones the play and the wit of human minds. . . . Jupiter, the Bringer of Jollity. Holst for heartiness, Holst for humor, Holst to the making, not of melodies, but of a good round tune; Holst affirming his Englishry. The common man under spell of a jovial planet chortling it off on the village green. The composer likes him; out of liking writes exuberantly.

So to the contrasting tryptich. . . . Saturn, the Bringer of Old Age for end to human lives, for pause in human destinies. The melodic line thins and pales; the rhythm slows; the color grays. The music recedes from the ear rather than impinges upon it. After warmths, cold; after stir, calm. These are the outskirts of the universe. Holst quests for the graver beauty and finds it. . . . Uranus the Magician. He haunts this remote world; conjures up tumults; sweeps across it; shakes it in the hollow of his hand. And of a sudden the silence he has broken stills him. At least once in this seven-fold tone-poem, Holst must release his spirit of fantasy. Into matter, means, rhythm and color, he infuses it. . . .

Last Neptune the Mystic. Little by little a wan music loses shape, motion, color; dissolves into stirless wisps; fades into faint shimmer. The hushed voices of a hidden chorus of women wind across it, ghosts of human sound. On this utmost shore of the universe there is only silence. Over the sea of infinity there is only dark. The mystic in Holst has conjured into tones the vision; evoked a music that is speech to unutterable things. . . . Out of "The Planets" the image of this tone-poet rose full-rounded. His whole concert revealed and proclaimed him. There was no reproach.

H. T. P.

Jan 23

STON POST, SATURD

ALL HOLST PIECES BY SYMPHONY

English Composer as Conductor of Own Works

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Gustav Holst, distinguished English composer, who for the next few months will have his residence here as teacher of composition at Harvard University, yesterday afternoon led the Symphony Orchestra through a programme of his own music.

BUT ONE HEAD BEFORE

Of the pieces chosen by Mr. Holst for this programme of yesterday and also of this evening only one had already been heard at the Symphony Concerts; the astrological suite for enlarged orchestra, "The Planets." This aspiring composition filled the second division of the concert; before it came the St. Paul's Suite for strings, written in 1913 for the orchestra of the girls' school of that name where Holst was for several years instructor; the new Prelude and Scherzo, "Hammersmith"; and the ballet music from the opera, "The Perfect Fool," first produced in London nine years ago.

The St. Paul's Suite, played here last year by the orchestra of the MacDowell Club, runs in four divisions, Jig, Ostinato, Intermezzo and Finale; the first and last, and in measure the second as well, are essentially British in their bluff heartiness. The contrapuntal writing is firm and vigorous, scholarly without pedantry. In the Finale two folksongs, "The Dargason" and "Green Sleeves," are effectively treated, singly and in combination. The Intermezzo, on the other hand, is mildly and pleasingly exotic. On the whole a grateful piece, a welcome addition to the repertory for string orchestra.

"Hammersmith" Cheerful

In like manner "Hammersmith" is invigorating to hear, but the title which pins it down to the densely populated section of London should not be taken too literally. There is suggestion of the River Thames, though it might as well be the Charles, and of crowded, bustling, good-natured humanity.

The dances of the Spirit of Earth, Water and Fire from Mr. Holst's opera would gain, like most such excerpts, from association with scene and action. The musical interest in them is chiefly rhythmic and orchestral. Mr. Holst is hardly a salient melodist, though the programme book quoted him as saying that he "loves to write a tune."

Ambitious at Least

There are tunes in "The Planets:" one, oddly suggestive of Scotch folksong, in the fourth section, "Jupiter, the Bringer of Jollity," and a very jaunty one in the sixth, "Uranus, the Magician." The first movement, "Mars, the Bringer of War," is tame beside the orchestral savagery of Honegger's "Horace Victoreux," or Stravinsky's "Sacre;" it even pales beside the battle music in "Ein Heldenleben." There are measures of beauty in "Venus, the Bringer of Peace." "Mercury, the Winged Messenger" might be more mercurial; "Jupiter," more jovial. Yet the suggestion of sluggishness and decay in "Saturn, the Bringer of Old Age," is graphic enough, and there is a truly mystical flavor in "Neptune, the Mystic," particularly at the close, where a chorus of women's voices behind the scenes is joined to the orchestra and the music fades imperceptibly into silence.

As a whole, "The Planets" must be judged as an ambitious attempt that, as well it might, somewhat overtaxed Mr. Holst's creative powers. This is a programme for a musical superman.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

99

The Prose and The Poetry of Gustav Holst

As Guest-Composer He Fills The Symphony Concert With Four Pieces

TRANS. — JAN. 23

HOW very personal—as the French have it—is the art, or craft, or trade, or livelihood, of reviewing! The apple-cheeked recruit knows no such sensation. For the first times he is giving his impressions and opinions to as many as chance to read him. To himself he may think of them as the world. The pouched and wrinkled veteran is more inured. That questioning sensation, he found long since, is one of the sleeping dogs that it were best to leave undisturbed. Now and then, however, it rises to bite him. . . . Friday afternoon a slave of his calling departed from his place in Symphony Hall in an agreeable state of satisfaction. He had enjoyed the Symphony Concert of Mr. Holst as guest-composer and conductor; by some strange throwback into the age of innocence took it for granted that most others were like-minded.

He first encountered in the lobby Alpha, his friend, who immediately complained that the concert had been "too long"—two hours of it. The engrossed reviewer had not given a thought to duration; but he hastened to apologize for the guest. English and European audiences—a tougher breed than ours—are accustomed to such length; Mr. Holst with them. . . . Under the marquise Beta, also his friend. The guest, it seemed, was no adept program-maker. Had he been such, he would have put first the long, exacting "Planets," not left that tapestry of tone-poems to the final hour. "A fresh audience is a receptive audience." The slave, thinking again of himself, could only mutter something about a program that advances steadily to climax warning all within earshot along the way. Again he would be true to the guest.

Omega, no more than acquaintance, was waiting on the sidewalk, dogmatic as usual. "All-Beethoven, all-Wagner, all-Chaikovsky is well enough" he said with a wag of a wise head; "but not all-anybody-else." You might suppose that he had conned the works of Mr. Holst, which are considerable, as fast as they fell from the press; whereas until that afternoon he was probably unaware of the distinguished composer's existence. And the silly reviewer had been pleased to hear three pieces hitherto outside his ken and to listen again to the manifold "Planets." . . . Just around the corner, like posterity in the musical play, was little Omicron. "Composers can't conduct," he affirmed succinctly. Yet the rather competent Boston Symphony Orchestra had played as though the guest could conduct; while to the slave he had seemed uncommonly lucid and direct, single-minded for his music.

"Trade-vicissitudes," the reviewer thought to himself. (He had once read the phrase in a financial column and fancied it). He would justify himself, albeit a little shaken, by his report of the afternoon. First, to warm welcome, had come Mr. Holst middle-aged, gray-haired, loose-clothed, accustomed to the concert-hall, modest, friendly, alert, evidently ody. It is his music of the lighter beauty. . . . Mercury the Winged Messenger—to bear the interchanged thoughts and tidings of men. A scherzo, if the hearer likes, of darting figures and interlacing melody. But what are these figures but ideas tossed into the common existence, there interchanged? The manifold Holst transfuses into tones the play and the wit of human minds. . . . Jupiter, the Bringer of Jollity. Holst for heartiness, Holst for humor, Holst to the making, not of melodies, but of a good round tune; Holst affirming his Englishry. The common man under spell of a jovial planet chortling it off on the village screen. The composer likes him; out of liking writes exuberantly.

So to the contrasting tryptitch. . . . Saturn, the Bringer of Old Age for end to human lives, for pause in human destinies. The melodic line thins and pales; the rhythm slows; the color grays. The music recedes from the ear rather than impinges upon it. After warmths, cold; after stir, calm. These are the outskirts of the universe. Holst quests for the graver beauty and finds it. . . . Uranus the magician. He haunts this remote world; conjures up tumults; sweeps across it; shakes it in the hollow of his hand. And of a sudden the silence he has broken stills him. At least once in this seven-fold tone-poem, Holst must release his spirit of fantasy. Into matter, means rhythm and color, he infuses it. . . . it. . . .

Last Neptune the Mystic. Little by little a wan music loses shape, motion, color; dissolves into stirless wisps; fades into faint shimmer. The hushed voices of a hidden chorus of women wind across it, ghosts of human sound. On this utmost shore of the universe there is only silence. Over the sea of infinity there is only dark. The mystic in Holst has conjured into tones the vision; evoked a music that is speech to unutterable things. . . . Out of "T[illegible] Planets" the image of this tone-[illegible] full-rounded.

"Hammersmith," ballet music from the opera "The Perfect Fool," and the suite, "The Planets." Mr Holst, the latest of the long series of distinguished European composers to appear at these concerts, was warmly and deservedly applauded by both orchestra and audience. He has come to this country to be at Harvard during the second half year as visiting lecturer.

The "St Paul's Suite," for strings, which began the program, was written in 1913, for the student orchestra at St Paul's Girls' School, where Mr Holst then taught music. Its four movements are unpretentious, ingratiating music, in the spirit of the old English folk tunes from which the elder generation of living British composers draw the melodic inspiration their predecessors used to seek in Mendelssohn. The audience was especially delighted with the finale in this suite, where two folk tunes, "Dargason" and "Green Sleeves" are combined.

The prelude and scherzo "Hammersmith," which followed, is Mr Holst's latest work, first performed at London last November. There is no detailed program. The composer, wishing to give a musical impression of the district in London where he has long resided, had only two things in mind, "a district crowded with cockneys," and "the background of the river." In this tone poem Holst has not given his melodic and harmonic impulses the free rein he gave them in "The Planets." At a first hearing the piece sounded a bit labored, a bit crabbed. It failed to capture the listener's attention.

The ballet music from "The Perfect Fool" suffered, of course, from being heard out of its operatic context. The genuine, unforced harmonic originality of Holst, his flair for orchestral effects so admirably suited to their artistic purpose that one overlooks their uniqueness, his liking for robust rhythms and for harmonic clashes arrived at contrapuntally, make this ballet music characteristic of the best in his work.

"The Planets," very favorably remembered from the previous performances here under Mr Monteux, again impressed one yesterday as the finest music written by a living Englishman. The title comes from the astrological meaning of the planets, not from mythology. Jupiter, "the bringer of jollity," Saturn, "the bringer of old age," and Neptune, "the mystic," are the most impressive of the seven movements in the suite. The close of the last-named movement, a wordless chorus for women's voices off stage, is very fine. So are the harmonies in "Saturn" and the melodies in "Jupiter."

The suite as a whole is at times diffuse. There are occasional bits of conventionalism, such as the accompaniment figure for Uranus "the magician," which is akin to dozens of sorcerers in music, as for instances in the "Sorcerer's Apprentice," of Dukas.

Mr Holst's conducting yesterday was that of a well-routined orchestral player who happens also to be a first-rate musician. He began his career as a trombone player. His unassuming demeanor, his lack of what American press agents call "shownmanship," made one respect Mr Holst as a man and as a musician. But he lacked the theatrical instinct for the spotlight essential for a first-rate orchestral conductor.

His music, like that of his friend, Vaughan Williams, made one feel that there is something behind all the talk in London of a renascence of British music. Holst, despiite his name, is English by birth, descent and by spiritual affinity. His music sounds an English note. It is not derived from French, German or Russian sources, as so much American orchestral music still is.

Next week Dr Koussevitzky will conduct a program which includes the first public performance of George Gershwin's new rhapsody for piano and orchestra. Mr Gershwin will be the pianist.

P. R.

BOSTON EVENING T

Symphony --- Films

The Prose and The Poetry of Gustav Holst

As Guest-Composer He Fills The Symphony Concert With Four Pieces

Trans Jan 23

HOW very personal—as the French have it—is the art, or craft, or trade, or livelihood, of reviewing! The apple-cheeked recruit knows no such sensation. For the first times he is giving his impressions and opinions to as many as chance to read him. To himself he may think of them as the world. The pouched and wrinkled veteran is more inured. That questioning sensation, he found long since, is one of the sleeping dogs best left undisturbed. Now and then, however, it rises to bite him. . . . Friday afternoon a slave of his calling departed from his place in Symphony Hall in an agreeable state of satisfaction. He had enjoyed the Symphony Concert of Mr. Holst as guest-composer and conductor; by some strange throwback into the age of innocence took it for granted that most others were like-minded.

He first encountered in the lobby Alpha, his friend, who immediately complained that the concert had been "too long"—two hours of it. The engrossed reviewer had not given a thought to duration; but he hastened to apologize for the guest. English and European audiences—a tougher breed than ours—are accustomed to such length; Mr. Holst with them. . . . Under the marquise Beta, also his friend. The guest, it seemed, was no adept program-maker. Had he been such, he would have put first the long, exacting "Planets," not left that tapestry of tone-poems to the final hour. "A fresh audience is a receptive audience." The slave, thinking again of himself, could only mutter something about a program that advances steadily to climax warming all within earshot along the way. Again he would be true to the guest.

Omega, no more than acquaintance, was waiting on the sidewalk, dogmatic as usual. "All-Beethoven, all-Wagner, all-Chaikovsky is well enough" he said with a wag of a wise head; "but not all-anybody-else." You might suppose that he had conned the works of Mr. Holst, which are considerable, as fast as they fell from the press; whereas until that afternoon he was probably unaware of the distinguished composer's existence. And the silly reviewer had been pleased to hear three pieces hitherto outside his ken and to listen again to the manifold "Planets." . . . Just around the corner, like posterity in the musical play, was little Omicron. "Composers can't conduct," he affirmed succinctly. Yet the rather competent Boston Symphony Orchestra had played as though the guest could conduct; while to the slave he had seemed uncommonly lucid and direct, single-minded for his music.

"Trade-vicissitudes," the reviewer thought to himself. (He had once read the phrase in a financial column and fancied it). He would justify himself, albeit a little shaken, by his report of the afternoon. First, to warm welcome, had come Mr. Holst middle-aged, gray-haired, loose-clothed, accustomed to the concert-hall, modest, friendly, alert, evidently keen for the day's work. . . . Then to the "St. Paul's Suite for Strings," written for the orchestra of the girls' school in London at which he was long the music-master. (He must have taught apt pupils well, if they played what is here set down for them.) A jig, an "ostinato" haunted by a three-note figure, an intermezzo, the finale, ran lightly by. Mr. Holst had drawn material from English folk-song; used it frankly for melody that was close to tune; once touched it with exotic fancy. Rhythm and such color as he could risk from a string choir not to be overtaxed, were oftener his reliance. For instants the progress had seemed a little repetitious. Oftener the Suite was pleasant to hear for freshness and directness, for skill and scholarship unafraid to smile and take itself lightly. The mood was human, genial, sympathetic.

Next to "Hammersmith: Prelude and Scherzo," Mr. Holst's newest work, only two months from production in London. The composer dwells in that western suburb where the broad gray river, brightened or darkened, swift or sluggish, ruffled or smooth, slips endlessly by, unchanged beside the changing generations of men. And these generations are hearty, full-blooded, bustling folk taking this life as they find it, high-humoredly withal. Throughout, the musical progress and the expansion of these external promptings go hand in hand. The prelude is the river-music; the scherzo the music of the folk; toward the end they join together to round out both the design and the suggestion. Prelude and scherzo upspring from a life in which the composer shares, that he has come to cherish. It breeds in him, English-wise, both sentiment and humor; sets invention, imagination and skill in creative motion.

Note as well the richness and free choice of technical resource; the certainty of means; the transformation of scholarship and craft into a lucid, vivid music; the rhythmical impetus; the harmonic and instrumental color wrought into a flowing texture. With a head Mr. Holst composes, from the impulses of a heart. If a fugal structure beguiles him as it often does, it serves both musical and emotional expression. If almost to mannerism he courts abrupt transition, it whips up tonal progress.

Then to three numbers from the opera of 1923, "The Perfect Fool." The Wizard invokes the Spirits of Earth. They dance with feet cloven, as it were, by syncopation. He summons the Spirits of Water. They shimmer—in the higher registers of the orchestra—across the tonal air. He calls to his aid the Spirits of Fire. They come hot-footed and gleaming. All three dances are brief and theater-wise; alive with rhythm, aglow with color. Suffice it if the underlying motiv generates both. Each dance takes a fantastic turn; has no part in the mood of travesty that elsewhere infuses the opera. (The wise Holst writes in one act lest he exhaust it). Again scholarship and resource as means to ends. Again the unfailing lucidity and directness of expression. Again harmony and color that is born of the underlying melody, not grafted upon it. The hearer's mental image of the composing Holst has taken shape.

Last to the seven tone-poems of the planets, to make less the Symphonic Suite of the pedants than a seven-fold tonal fresco—upon one wall Mars and Venus and Mercury and Jupiter panelled; upon another Saturn and Uranus and Neptune. (The music dates from 1920 before there was a new-found Pluto.) . . . Mars the Bringer of War into the lives and destinies of men. For him Mr. Holst writes a ponderous music, grinding of rhythm, flaring with color. Through all the afternoon, it is his music of power. . . . Venus the Bringer of Peace to soothe those lives and soften those destinies. (Mr. Holst will not willingly lose his hold upon life as the source of music.) For her he writes graciously, serenely, limpidly. The rhythms sway; the colors glisten; out of lyrical mood flows luminous melody. It is his music of the lighter beauty. . . . Mercury the Winged Messenger—to bear the interchanged thoughts and tidings of men. A scherzo, if the hearer likes, of darting figures and interlacing melody. But what are these figures but ideas tossed into the common existence, there interchanged? The manifold Holst transfuses into tones the play and the wit of human minds. . . . Jupiter, the Bringer of Jollity. Holst for heartiness, Holst for humor, Holst to the making, not of melodies, but of a good round tune; Holst affirming his Englishry. The common man under spell of a jovial planet chortling it off on the village green. The composer likes him; out of liking writes exuberantly.

So to the contrasting tryptich. . . . Saturn, the Bringer of Old Age for end to human lives, for pause in human destinies. The melodic line thins and pales; the rhythm slows; the color grays. The music recedes from the ear rather than impinges upon it. After warmths, cold; after stir, calm. These are the outskirts of the universe. Holst quests for the graver beauty and finds it. . . . Uranus the Magician. He haunts this remote world; conjures up tumults; sweeps across it; shakes it in the hollow of his hand. And of a sudden the silence he has broken stills him. At least once in this seven-fold tone-poem, Holst must release his spirit of fantasy. Into matter, means, rhythm and color, he infuses it. . . .

Last Neptune the Mystic. Little by little a wan music loses shape, motion, color; dissolves into stirless wisps; fades into faint shimmer. The hushed voices of a hidden chorus of women wind across it, ghosts of human sound. On this utmost shore of the universe there is only silence. Over the sea of infinity there is only dark. The mystic in Holst has conjured into tones the vision; evoked a music that is speech to unutterable things. . . . Out of "The Planets" the image of this tone-poet rose full-rounded. His whole concert revealed and proclaimed him. There was no reproach.

H. T. P.

Jan 23

STON POST, SATURD

ALL HOLST PIECES BY SYMPHONY

English Composer as Conductor of Own Works

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Gustav Holst, distinguished English composer, who for the next few months will have his residence here as teacher of composition at Harvard University, yesterday afternoon led the Symphony Orchestra through a programme of his own music.

BUT ONE HEAD BEFORE

Of the pieces chosen by Mr. Holst for this programme of yesterday and also of this evening only one had already been heard at the Symphony Concerts; the astrological suite for enlarged orchestra, "The Planets." This aspiring composition filled the second division of the concert; before it came the St. Paul's Suite for strings, written in 1913 for the orchestra of the girls' school of that name where Holst was for several years instructor; the new Prelude and Scherzo, "Hammersmith"; and the ballet music from the opera, "The Perfect Fool," first produced in London nine years ago.

The St. Paul's Suite, played here last year by the orchestra of the MacDowell Club, runs in four divisions, Jig, Ostinato, Intermezzo and Finale; the first and last, and in measure the second as well, are essentially British in their bluff heartiness. The contrapuntal writing is firm and vigorous, scholarly without pedantry. In the Finale two folksongs, "The Dargason" and "Green Sleeves," are effectively treated, singly and in combination. The Intermezzo, on the other hand, is mildly and pleasingly exotic. On the whole a grateful piece, a welcome addition to the repertory for string orchestra.

"Hammersmith" Cheerful

In like manner "Hammersmith" is invigorating to hear, but the title which pins it down to the densely populated section of London should not be taken too literally. There is suggestion of the River Thames, though it might as well be the Charles, and of crowded, bustling, good-natured humanity.

The dances of the Spirit of Earth, Water and Fire from Mr. Holst's opera would gain, like most such excerpts, from association with scene and action. The musical interest in them is chiefly rhythmic and orchestral. Mr. Holst is hardly a salient melodist, though the programme book quoted him as saying that he "loves to write a tune."

Ambitious at Least

There are tunes in "The Planets:" one, oddly suggestive of Scotch folksong, in the fourth section, "Jupiter, the Bringer of Jollity," and a very jaunty one in the sixth, "Uranus, the Magician." The first movement, "Mars, the Bringer of War," is tame beside the orchestral savagery of Honegger's "Horace Victoreux," or Stravinsky's "Sacre;" it even pales beside the battle music in "Ein Heldenleben." There are measures of beauty in "Venus, the Bringer of Peace." "Mercury, the Winged Messenger" might be more mercurial; "Jupiter," more jovial. Yet the suggestion of sluggishness and decay in "Saturn, the Bringer of Old Age," is graphic enough, and there is a truly mystical flavor in "Neptune, the Mystic," particularly at the close, where a chorus of women's voices behind the scenes is joined to the orchestra and the music fades imperceptibly into silence.

As a whole, "The Planets" must be judged as an ambitious attempt that, as well it might, somewhat overtaxed Mr. Holst's creative powers. This is a programme for a musical superman.

100

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

Her. Jan 23

By PHILIP HALE

Gustav Holst of London was the guest conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra yesterday afternoon. The program comprised four of his compositions: St. Paul's Suite for strings (first time at these concerts); Prelude and Scherzo, "Hammersmith" (first time in Boston); Ballet from the opera "The Perfect Fool" (first time in Boston) and "The Planets," a suite of seven movements. When "The Planets" was first performed under Mr. Monteux there was no female chorus for "Neptune the Mystic." Yesterday there was a chorus which having been trained by Mr. Fiedler, sang unseen. The beauty of the ending was thereby enhanced.

To devote an orchestral concert of nearly two hours' length to any composer, whether he be Bach or Brahms, Beethoven or Honegger, is a doubtful venture. Mr. Holst stood the test well, yet if two or three of the "Planets" had been omitted, the others would have gained in effect. Certainly "Venus," "Mercury," "Uranus" and "Neptune" could not have been spared. "Mars" might be shortened; the warlike mood fortissimo leads one to wish at least an armistice. The jollity in "Jupiter" is distinctly English in character; like all jollity, one could wish that brought by Jupiter, to be less prolonged.

The suite for strings is a pleasing work that one would gladly hear again. The interest is unflagging; the thematic material is fresh; the treatment of it is scholarly without for a moment being pedantic i. e. dull. When there is counterpoint, it is not for the purpose of showing what a fine fellow the composer is If the jig; and if the finale with its use of the old tunes, "Dargason" and "Green Sleeves" are unmistakably English, the intermezzo is exotic, suggestive of the Orient, melodically and in the prevailing mood. This suite was brilliantly played. It was written for the orchestra of St. Paul's School for Girls. For practice or for performance? If for performance, these girls must be singularly accomplished in the use of stringed instruments.

"Hammersmith," which gives Mr. Holst a high position in the rank of contemporaneous composers, was played for the first time last November at a concert in London. The "Planets" as a whole were first heard in 1919-20. In the years between the composer has gained in depth of thought; conciseness and power of expression; control of imagination. The imperturbable prelude is, as he has said publicly, a background; the river, heedless of the cockneys swarming in the district; the river, knowing that it will flow long after the invaders are no more; as the river which will then be as unconcerned as it was when Romans were by its banks. Now other composers have felt the spell of a river; Wagner, Smetana, Balakirev, Griffes, Vaughan Williams among them; but Mr. Holst's river is his own, as is his music. There is more in "Hammersmith" than mere contrast between calm, serenity, peaceful indifference and the rough merriment of an unthinking crowd, "Arry" and "Arriet" enjoying life after their manner. This is not program music in the anecdotical or pictorial sense. There are two moods, eloquent in tonal expression. The searcher after symbolism in all art, might say: "Nature heedless of mortals's joys or sorrows." (Mr. Holst had already written his "Egdon Heath" after Thomas Hardy.) But Mr. Holst, a thinker even outside of music; and this cannot be said of every composer; a man fascinated by the poetry and the philosophy of India, when he girds up his loins to write music is first of all a musician. In "Hammersmith" there is no waste of notes, no undue elaboration of musical ideas; no districting elegancies; no incongruous ornamentation.

The ballet music for the dancing spirits of earth, water and fire is grateful to the ear, with fine effects in orchestration, rhythmically exciting—yet one would fain hear it in the theatre and see the elements obedient to the Wizard's incantation.

The composer of "Hammersmith," the ballet music, the suite for strings, "Venus," "Saturn," "Neptune" and pages of "Mercury" is modern in the best sense, as masters of the past are modern; not as the contemporaries who are futile experimenters: who, barren of truly musical ideas, without poetry in their soul, put their faith in rhythm, repetitions of insignificant phrases, eccentric harmonic schemes and instrumentation. Mr. Holst still has confidence in normal scales; to him dissonances have their rhetorical use and are of value, too good to be prodigally lavished on that which is in itself insignificant.

Warmly greeted, he was as warmly applauded throughout the concert. Dignified, modest, he conducted quietly and none the less effectively. He knew what he wanted and was able to share this knowledge with the sympathetic players.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct next week. These works: Taylor, Suite, "Through the Looking Glass"; Gershwin, Rhapsody No. 2 for orchestra with piano (Mr. Gershwin, pianist; first performance). Scriabin, "The Poem of Ecstasy."

Holst Presents Program of Own Works at Symphony

Amer Jan 23

By MOSES SMITH

Gustav Holst, English composer, appears as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week in a program which is devoted entirely to his own works. Mr. Holst has been represented on various choral and chamber music programs given in Boston during the past 10 years, but his orchestral work is still little known here.

Of the four compositions played yesterday, the Prelude and Scherzo, "Hammersmith," and the ballet from the opera, "The Perfect Fool," were new to Boston, while the St. Paul's Suite, for string orchestra, and "The Planets," a grand symphonic suite in seven movements, had been heard here only once previously. The result was a program almost entirely novel, and one not likely to stir up great anticipation in the minds of the uninformed.

In the actual hearing, at yesterday's matinee concert, this music proved that Holst is rightly placed among the leaders of the current English musical renaissance. Here is a man with a bounteous flow of musical ideas, one who speaks in music as simply and clearly and naturally as most mortals in language; a man who is not ashamed to own his "love to write a tune," and who proves, in his works his ability to do so. Often, too, he borrows quite frankly from the huge and rich literature of English folk-lore. In either event, the melodies are not forced, they are not introduced into the scores arbitrarily but are germane to the subject matter. The matter may be light and merely pleasant, as in the St. Paul's Suite, or it may be of weighty import, as in "The Planets." In any case it is treated masterfully, with such consummate knowledge of the orchestra that, as has been said, one forgets to speak of orchestration; with no discernible harmonic or idiomatic cliches or fashionable musical slang. Here is that rarity among modern composers—a man who writes unforced music, who writes because he likes to and must.

SYMPHONY UNDER OWN CONDUCTOR

Post Jan 26

Koussevitzky, Back from Vacation, Leads Third Concert

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Officially absent from Symphony Hall for two weeks less one day, Dr. Koussevitzky returned to his post last evening and led the Symphony Orchestra through the third concert of the Monday series. Music by Northern composers made the bulk of the programme; there was Sibelius' Fourth Symphony, the Concerto of Scriabin, in which Lilias Mackinnon, Scotch pianist, was the soloist, and Tchikovsky's Fantasia after Dante, "Francesca da Rimini"; while as preface to Finn and Russians came the "Coriolanus" Overture of Beethoven.

MISS MACKINNON SOLOIST

Dr. Koussevitzky's prowess with Overture and Symphony have already been revealed at the regular Symphony Concerts: his dramatic approach to the one, his sensitive response to the other. The Concerto of Scriabin, written a couple of years before that composer had turned 25, had been heard at minor orchestral concerts in this city, but not before at Symphony Hall. The piece is euphonious, well-made, highly creditable to so young a composer, but it contains little of the essential Scriabin. Miss Mackinnon, who last night made her first appearance in Boston, is said to be something of a Scriabin specialist, but her playing of the Concerto last evening lacked the sensuous quality of tone, the suppleness of phrasing, which his music, even in its earliest manifestations, requires. Her performance was otherwise musical and technically finished; the audience applauded her warmly.

Twice played by him at Pension Fund Concerts, Tchaikovsky's Fantasia, last evening, for the first time under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction found its way to a subscription concert. It is a work to tempt the conductor's powers of delineation, dramatization and fervent expression; yet even he cannot disguise the bombast and vulgarity of certain pages. When, however, Tchaikovsky is poet in tones and not mere musical melodramatist, as in the wailing chords for wind instruments in the passage for muted strings that tells of the remembered happiness of Francesca and her lover, Dr. Koussevitzky is his eloquent spokesman.

MUSIC

Globe Jan 26

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The third concert of the Monday series last evening was the occasion for the return both of Dr Koussevitzky and Mr Burgin, the former from his annual mid-Winter vacation, the latter from an absence of several weeks enforced by illness. Both were greeted very cordially when they first appeared on the stage.

The program, long and unusual, included Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture; Sibelius' fourth Symphony, in A minor; Scriabin's F-sharp minor piano concerto, and Tchaikovsky's fantasia 'Francesca da Rimini," after verses of Dante. Lilias MacKinnon was soloist in the Scriabin concerto, which had its first performance by the Boston Symphony.

If ever there was a musical work which demands repeated hearings for full appreciation of its content, its moods, and an even superficial mental cataloging of its merits of melody, harmony and instrumentation, it is Sibelius' fourth symphony. And repeated hearings serve to strengthen the impression that it is some of the noblest, most sincere and profoundly moving music ever penned.

Attempts at extracting a "meaning" or a "philosophy" or a "program" from absolute music, and then setting up such fancied results as fixed and unchangeable quantities, are as unfair as they are futile. Nevertheless all listeners are individually affected by music, and do find personal "meanings."

One impression fathered by this symphony is that of unusual spiritual peace and calm. The music seems as if it might have been written by a man old in years, still interested in but no longer troubled and shaken by life's conflicts. In originality of melody and harmony, and in beauty of instrumentation, the work deserves to be called a masterpiece.

Miss Mackinnon is a Scottish pianist from Aberdeen. She has played Scriabin extensively in Europe—including a concert with Dr Koussevitzky in London—but not until last season did she visit this country. She has a sound technique, obvious feeling for Scriabin's music, and both emotional fire and taste. Miss Mackinnon was applauded very enthusiastically, being recalled to the stage several times.

This concerto, at first hearing, impressed less than some other of Scriabin's piano music. It bears evidences of the composer's youth when he wrote it, for while many pages are intense in feeling, they lack the directness of expression which usually indicates maturity. On the other hand, the orchestral part is interestingly scored. The piano part seems both arduous and difficult.

Dr Koussevitzky gave the Beethoven overture an excellent and authoritative performance, as, indeed, he did of the entire program. That of "Francesca da Rimini" was one of the most intense and overwhelming that one has ever heard. It will be impossible to forget those last, demoniacal, shattering cords, with their din of raging elements and anguished shrieks of the damned.

The next Monday evening concert will be given Feb 15. Robert Goldsand, pianist, will be the soloist.

MONDAY SYMPHONY CONCERT

The third Monday evening concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra took place last evening, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting. The works performed were

Her. Jan 26

Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture, Op. 62, Sibelius's Fourth Symphony, Op. 63, in A minor, Scriabin's Concerto for pianoforte, Op. 20, in F sharp minor, and Tchaikovsky's Orchestral Fantasia (after Dante) "Francesca da Rimini," Op. 32. The soloist in Scriabin's pianoforte concerto was Lilias Mackinnon, an English pianist who has for several years specialized in the performance of Scriabin's music.

The concerto, which was written about 1894, has been heard in Boston only once before the present performance. It has none of the characteristics of the later Scriabin—the Scriabin of "Promethus," of the "Poeme de l'extase" or the "Poeme divin," or of the later pianoforte works. It belongs to the period during which the composer wrote preludes, etudes, mazurkas, nocturnes, and waltzes in the manner of Chopin—a manner which he assimilated very successfully and even enriched with something of his own. This concerto has a similar elegance tinged with a Slavonic melancholy, relieved by moments of an equally Chopinesque vigor, heightened—in the vein of the typical romantic concerto—with delicate filigree decoration and brilliant fioritura. Unimportant music, it is nevertheless pleasing enough to warrant its being heard occasionally. Miss Mackinnon's performance, fluent enough in passage work, was largely deficient in the elegance of style that is here indispensable. In vigorous passages her tone was forced and harsh, her phrasing angular and jerky. She was applauded with warmth, however. The accompanying orchestral part was played very sensitively.

Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra offered a performance of Beethoven's great "Coriolanus" overture that was nobly, imaginatively conceived and magnificently realized, with a perfect fusion of music and underlying drama. It was an interpretation worthy to rank with Dr. Koussevitzky's rendering of the Leonora No. 3 overture, heard frequently in recent seasons.

An equally admirable performance was given of the far more difficult Fourth Symphony of Sibelius. This symphony, one of the most uncompromisingly individual and aloof of all, both in its themes and in the manner of their development, inspires greater respect at each hearing. It is severely terse and economical in expression. Each movement says its say and ends, sometimes—as in the scherzo—with disconcerting abruptness. It is curiously self-centred, brooding music, full of sombre reflections and half-uttered comments. A legendary quality pervades it; a bleak northern grandeur ennobles it. Compared with this and with the rest of the program, Tchaikovsky's "Francesca da Rimini," for all its ingenious orchestral scene-painting, seemed merely blatant and trivial.

The very large audience, despite the unusual length of the program, listened attentively and applauded with enthusiasm.

S. S.

Concert-Chronicle

Trans - Jan 26

At Box-Office, Please

AN ill-informed contemporary pri editorially this bit of solemn n sense:

> The fact is that there is a far larger audience for Boston Symphony Concerts than the assembly (sic) can or cares to accommodate. If the hall were half again or double as large, the public would still fill all the seats. It is to be regretted that persons who would like to listen to the orchestra periodically and can afford a reasonable price for tickets are not given an opportunity to indulge their love for music.

"The fact is" that a considerable number of seats, many of them at "reasonable prices," have been available throughout the season for the six supplementary matinées of Tuesdays; while at the six supplementary concerts on Monday evenings, not all the places are taken by subscription. There will be four more Tuesday concerts—on Feb. 9, Feb. 23, Mar. 8, April 19: three more Monday concerts—on Feb. 15, Mar. 14, April 25. For any or all of these seven the management will welcome the thirsting multitude; while the box-office will do its best to provide seats—"at reasonable prices."

In Romantic Mold

Gershwin at Symphony

Amer Jan 30

By MOSES SMITH

George Gershwin's new Rhapsody, for piano and orchestra, was played in public for the first time yesterday at the matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with the composer playing the solo part and Serge Koussevitzky holding the conductor's stick.

A symphonic score from Gershwin is something of an occasion. In this instance the new work had been so eagerly awaited and publicized that it was natural to fear the composer would burst of a swelled head, and that the work itself would "flop." Neither thing happened fortunately. Mr. Gershwin, a most sensible as well as modest and charming young man, suffered in the actual performance from nothing more serious than a slight attack of nerves at the opening of the Rhapsody; while the composition itself seemed to please everybody, for it received a most hearty reception.

With the orchestra in fine fettle, and Mr. Koussevitzky almost consumed with ardor for his latest premiere, the listener heard a characteristically American score from a composer who says that he shuns traditions. Fortunately he does not; though he may not realize that fact. It is true that the speech is that of jazz; the ideas are Gershwinian, as is their expression. But this man has, in his third orchestrated work, a command of symphonic development quite remarkable, to say nothing of his mastery in instrumentation. He writes for the orchestra as if born with one in his mouth—well, perhaps that is saying a great deal!

Throughout, there is a conciseness of formal development, a neat way of saying something and then going on with other matter. Now and then the expression becomes unduly sentimental or bombastic. But this is the exception: for the most part Gershwin displays the taste, the intellectual command of the artist. We liked best, because it was most typical of Gershwin's music, the last section, especially the piano part. True, there is the inevitable resemblance to the Rhapsody in Blue, but what a development the man has undergone since then!

The rest of an uncommonly engrossing program was the Deems Taylor delightful "Looking Glass" Suite, occasioned by the centennial of Lewis Carroll, and the Scriabin "Poem of Ecstasy."

JAN. 27, '32 THE BOSTON HERALD, WE

Boston Symphony, with Gershwin, To Give Benefit Concert Saturday

George Gershwin will appear in an extra performance of his new Second Rhapsody with the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Saturday at noon in Symphony hall, the entire gross receipts to be devoted to the city's unemployment relief campaign. This concert is in part the result of the great demand to hear Gershwin's new score which is having its first public performances this week at the regular Symphony concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Since these concerts are fully subscribed by the season, the great number of people who have applied for seats at Symphony hall would otherwise be disappointed.

The concert will be given by the full Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, and George Gersh[illegible] playing the piano part in [illegible] score. Mr. Gershwin, Dr. [illegible]ky, and the members of the [illegible] have arranged this benefit performance and are voluntarily giving their services.

Tickets will go on sale this morning at the Symphony hall box office until the capacity of the auditorium is exhausted. No more than five seats will be sold to one person. The admission is $1. Since all expenses are contributed, the entire receipts will be given to the Boston unemployment relief fund.

Although this concert will doubtlessly yield $2500 for the unemployment fund, a voluntary meeting of the members of the orchestra promises a much greater return. The orchestra at yesterday's intermission voluntarily and unanimously voted to give one day's pay a month for the balance of the Symphony season. This contribution, together with that of the staff of Symphony hall, is expected to exceed $5000. These contributions and the concert should bring Symphony Hall's gift to the fund well above $7500.

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

Her. Jan. 23

By PHILIP HALE

Gustav Holst of London was the gues conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra yesterday afternoon. The program comprised four of his compositions: St. Paul's Suite for strings (firs time at these concerts); Prelude an Scherzo, "Hammersmith" (first time i Boston); Ballet from the opera "Th Perfect Fool" (first time in Boston) an "The Planets," a suite of seven movements. When "The Planets" was firs performed under Mr. Monteux ther was no female chorus for "Neptune th Mystic." Yesterday there was a choru which having been trained by Mr. Fiedler, sang unseen. The beauty of th ending was thereby enhanced.

To devote an orchestral concert c nearly two hours' length to any composer, whether he be Bach or Brahm Beethoven or Honegger, is a doubtfu venture. Mr. Holst stood the test wel yet if two or three of the "Planets had been omitted, the others woul have gained in effect. Certainl "Venus," "Mercury," "Uranus" an "Neptune" could not have been sparec "Mars" might be shortened; the warlike mood fortissimo leads one to wis at least an armistice. The jollity i "Jupiter" is distinctly English in character; like all jollity, one could wish that brought by Jupiter, to be less prolonged.

The suite for strings is a pleasing work that one would gladly hear again. The interest is unflagging; the thematic material is fresh; the treatment of it is scholarly without for a moment being pedantic i. e. dull. When there is counterpoint, it is not for the purpose of showing what a fine fellow the composer is If the jig; and if the finale with its use of the old tunes, "Dargason" and "Green Sleeves" are unmistakably English, the intermezzo is exotic, suggestive of the Orient, melodically and in the prevailing mood. This suite was brilliantly played. It was written for the orchestra of St. Paul's School for Girls. For practice or for performance? If for performance, these girls must be singularly accomplished in the use of stringed instruments.

"Hammersmith," which gives Mr. Holst a high position in the rank of contemporaneous composers, was played for the first time last November at a concert in London. The "Planets" as a whole were first heard in 1919-20. In the years between the composer has gained in depth of thought; conciseness and power of expression; control of imagination. The imperturbable prelude is, as he has said publicly, a background; the river, heedless of the cockneys swarming in the district; the river, knowing that it will flow long after the invaders are no more; as the river which will then be as unconcerned as it was when Romans were by its banks. Now other composers have felt the spell of a river; Wagner, Smetana, Balakirev, Griffes, Vaughan Williams among them; but Mr. Holst's river is his own, as is his music. There is more in "Hammersmith" than mere contrast between calm, serenity, peaceful indifference and the rough merriment of an unthinking crowd, "Arry" and "Arriet" enjoying life after their manner. This is not program music in the anecdotical or pictorial sense. There are two moods, eloquent in tonal expression. The searcher after symbolism in all art, might say: "Nature heedless of mortals's joys or sorrows." (Mr. Holst had already written his "Egdon Heath" after Thomas Hardy.) But Mr. Holst, a thinker even outside of music; and this cannot be said of every composer; a man fascinated by the poetry and the philosophy of India, when he girds up his loins to write music is first of all a musician. In "Hammersmith" there is no waste of notes, no undue elaboration of musical ideas; no districting elegancies; no incongruous ornamentation.

The ballet music for the dancing spirits of earth, water and fire is grateful to the ear, with fine effects in orchestration, rhythmically exciting—yet one would fain hear it in the theatre and see the elements obedient to the Wizard's incantation.

The composer of "Hammersmith," the ballet music, the suite for strings, "Venus," "Saturn," "Neptune" and pages of "Mercury" is modern in the best sense, as masters of the past are modern; not as the contemporaries who are futile experimenters; wh[illegible] barren of truly musical ideas, without poetry in their soul, put their faith in rhythm, repetitions of insignificant phrases, eccentric harmonic schemes and instrumentation. Mr. Holst still has confidence in normal scales; to him dissonances have their rhetorical use and are of value, too good to be prodigally lavished on that which is in itself insignificant.

Warmly greeted, he was as warmly applauded throughout the concert. Dignified, modest, he conducted quietly and none the less effectively. He knew what he wanted and was able to share this knowledge with the sympathetic players.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct next week. These works: Taylor, Suite, "Through the Looking Glass"; Gershwin, Rhapsody No. 2 for orchestra with piano (Mr. Gershwin, pianist; first performance). Scriabin, "The Poem of Ecstasy."

Holst Presents Program of Own Works at Symphony

Amer Jan 23

By MOSES SMITH

Gustav Holst, English composer, appears as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week in a program which is devoted entirely to his own works. Mr. Holst has been represented on various choral and chamber music programs given in Boston during the past 10 years, but his orchestral work is still little known here.

Of the four compositions played yesterday, the Prelude and Scherzo, "Hammersmith," and the ballet from the opera, "The Perfect Fool," were new to Boston, while the St. Paul's Suite, for string orchestra, and "The Planets," a grand symphonic suite in seven movements, had been heard here only once previously. The result was a program almost entirely novel, and one not likely to stir up great anticipation in the minds of the uninformed.

In the actual hearing, at yesterday's matinee concert, this music proved that Holst is rightly placed among the leaders of the current English musical renaissance. Here is a man with a bounteous flow of musical ideas, one who speaks in music as simply and clearly and naturally as most mortals in language; a man who is not ashamed to own his "love to write a tune," and who proves, in his works his ability to do so. Often, too, he borrows quite frankly from the huge and rich literature of English folk-lore. In either event, the melodies are not forced, they are not introduced into the scores arbitrarily but are germane to the subject matter. The matter may be light and merely pleasant, as in the St. Paul's Suite, or it may be of weighty import, as in "The Planets." In any case it is treated masterfully, with such consummate knowledge of the orchestra that, as has been said, one forgets to speak of orchestration; with no discernible harmonic or idiomatic cliches or fashionable musical slang. Here is that rarity among modern composers—a man who writes unforced music, who writes because he likes to and must.

MPHONY
NDER OWN
ONDUCTOR

A Jan 26

ssevitzky, Back Vacation. Leads Third Concert

ARREN STOREY SMITH

lly absent from Symphony two weeks less one day, Dr. tzky returned to his post ing and led the Symphony through the third concert Monday series. Music by composers made the bulk gramme; there was Sibelius' ymphony, the Concerto of in which Lilias Mackinnon, anist, was the soloist, and y's Fantasia after Dante, a da Rimini"; while as prefnn and Russians came the as" Overture of Beethoven.

MACKINNON SOLOIST

ussevitzky's prowess with and Symphony have already aled at the regular Symphony his dramatic approach to the ensitive response to the other. erto of Scriabin, written a years before that composer 25, had been heard at minor concerts in this city, but not ymphony Hall. The piece is , well-made, highly credio young a composer, but it ttle of the essential Scriabin. innon, who last night made ppearance in Boston, is said thing of a Scriabin specialplaying of the Concerto last cked the sensuous quality of uppleness of phrasing, which even in its earliest manifesequires. Her performance wise musical and technically he audience applauded her ayed by him at Pension Fund Tchaikovsky's Fantasia, last or the first time under Dr. ky's direction found its way ription concert. It is a work he conductor's powers of deramatization and fervent exet even he cannot disguise st and vulgarity of certain hen, however, Tchaikovsky tones and not mere musical tist, as in the wailing chords struments in the passage for ngs that tells of the rememiness of Francesca and her Koussevitzky is his eloquent

---

MUSIC

Globe Jan 26

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

The third concert of the Monday series last evening was the occasion for the return both of Dr Koussevitzky and Mr Burgin, the former from his annual mid-Winter vacation, the latter from an absence of several weeks enforced by illness. Both were greeted very cordially when they first appeared on the stage.

The program, long and unusual, included Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture; Sibelius' fourth Symphony, in A minor; Scriabin's F-sharp minor piano concerto, and Tchaikovsky's fantasia 'Francesca da Rimini," after verses of Dante. Lilias MacKinnon was soloist in the Scriabin concerto, which had its first performance by the Boston Symphony.

If ever there was a musical work which demands repeated hearings for full appreciation of its content, its moods, and an even superficial mental cataloging of its merits of melody, harmony and instrumentation, it is Sibelius' fourth symphony. And repeated hearings serve to strengthen the impression that it is some of the noblest, most sincere and profoundly moving music ever penned.

Attempts at extracting a "meaning" or a "philosophy" or a "program" from absolute music, and then setting up such fancied results as fixed and unchangeable quantities, are as unfair as they are futile. Nevertheless all listeners are individually affected by music, and do find personal "meanings."

One impression fathered by this symphony is that of unusual spiritual peace and calm. The music seems as if it might have been written by a man old in years, still interested in but no longer troubled and shaken by life's conflicts. In originality of melody and harmony, and in beauty of instrumentation, the work deserves to be called a masterpiece.

Miss Mackinnon is a Scottish pianist from Aberdeen. She has played Scriabin extensively in Europe—including a concert with Dr Koussevitzky in London—but not until last season did she visit this country. She has a sound technique, obvious feeling for Scriabin's music, and both emotional fire and taste. Miss Mackinnon was applauded very enthusiastically, being recalled to the stage several times.

This concerto, at first hearing, impressed less than some other of Scriabin's piano music. It bears evidences of the composer's youth when he wrote it, for while many pages are intense in feeling, they lack the directness of expression which usually indicates maturity. On the other hand, the orchestral part is interestingly scored. The piano part seems both arduous and difficult.

Dr Koussevitzky gave the Beethoven overture an excellent and authoritative performance, as, indeed, he did of the entire program. That of "Francesca da Rimini" was one of the most intense and overwhelming that one has ever heard. It will be impossible to forget those last, demoniacal, shattering cords, with their din of raging elements and anguished shrieks of the damned.

The next Monday evening concert will be given Feb 15. Robert Goldsand, pianist, will be the soloist.

MONDAY SYMPHONY CONCERT

The third Monday evening concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra took place last evening, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting. The works performed were

Her. Jan 26

Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture, Op. 62, Sibelius's Fourth Symphony, Op. 63, in A minor, Scriabin's Concerto for pianoforte, Op. 20, in F sharp minor, and Tchaikovsky's Orchestral Fantasia (after Dante) "Francesca da Rimini," Op. 32. The soloist in Scriabin's pianoforte concerto was Lilias Mackinnon, an English pianist who has for several years specialized in the performance of Scriabin's music.

The concerto, which was written about 1894, has been heard in Boston only once before the present performance. It has none of the characteristics of the later Scriabin—the Scriabin of "Prometheus," of the "Poeme de l'extase" or the "Poeme divin," or of the later pianoforte works. It belongs to the period during which the composer wrote preludes, etudes, mazurkas, nocturnes, and waltzes in the manner of Chopin—a manner which he assimilated very successfully and even enriched with something of his own. This concerto has a similar elegance tinged with a Slavonic melancholy, relieved by moments of an equally Chopinesque vigor, heightened—in the vein of the typical romantic concerto—with delicate filigree decoration and brilliant fioritura. Unimportant music, it is nevertheless pleasing enough to warrant its being heard occasionally. Miss Mackinnon's performance, fluent enough in passage work, was largely deficient in the elegance of style that is here indispensable. In vigorous passages her tone was forced and harsh, her phrasing angular and jerky. She was applauded with warmth, however. The accompanying orchestral part was played very sensitively.

Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra offered a performance of Beethoven's great "Coriolanus" overture that was nobly, imaginatively conceived and magnificently realized, with a perfect fusion of music and underlying drama. It was an interpretation worthy to rank with Dr. Koussevitzky's rendering of the Leonora No. 3 overture, heard frequently in recent seasons.

An equally admirable performance was given of the far more difficult Fourth Symphony of Sibelius. This symphony, one of the most uncompromisingly individual and aloof of all, both in its themes and in the manner of their development, inspires greater respect at each hearing. It is severely terse and economical in expression. Each movement says its say and ends, sometimes—as in the scherzo—with disconcerting abruptness. It is curiously self-centred, brooding music, full of sombre reflections and half-uttered comments. A legendary quality pervades it; a bleak northern grandeur ennobles it. Compared with this and with the rest of the program, Tchaikovsky's "Francesca da Rimini," for all its ingenious orchestral scene-painting, seemed merely blatant and trivial.

The very large audience, despite the unusual length of the program, listened attentively and applauded with enthusiasm.

S. S.

Concert-Chronicle

Trans - Jan 26

At Box-Office, Please

AN ill-informed contemporary pri editorially this bit of solemn n sense:

> The fact is that there is a far larger audience for Boston Symphony Concerts than the assembly (sic) can or cares to accommodate. If the hall were half again or double as large, the public would still fill all the seats. It is to be regretted that persons who would like to listen to the orchestra periodically and can afford a reasonable price for tickets are not given an opportunity to indulge their love for music.

"The fact is" that a considerable number of seats, many of them at "reasonable prices," have been available throughout the season for the six supplementary matinées of Tuesdays; while at the six supplementary concerts on Monday evenings, not all the places are taken by subscription. There will be four more Tuesday concerts—on Feb. 9, Feb. 23, Mar. 8, April 19: three more Monday concerts—on Feb. 15, Mar. 14, April 25. For any or all of these seven the management will welcome the thirsting multitude; while the box-office will do its best to provide seats—"at reasonable prices."

In Romantic Mold

Gershwin at Symphony

Amer Jan 30

By MOSES SMITH

George Gershwin's new Rhapsody, for piano and orchestra, was played in public for the first time yesterday at the matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with the composer playing the solo part and Serge Koussevitzky holding the conductor's stick.

A symphonic score from Gershwin is something of an occasion. In this instance the new work had been so eagerly awaited and publicized that it was natural to fear the composer would burst of a swelled head, and that the work itself would "flop." Neither thing happened fortunately. Mr. Gershwin, a most sensible as well as modest and charming young man, suffered in the actual performance from nothing more serious than a slight attack of nerves at the opening of the Rhapsody; while the composition itself seemed to please everybody, for it received a most hearty reception.

With the orchestra in fine fettle, and Mr. Koussevitzky almost consumed with ardor for his latest premiere, the listener heard a characteristically American score from a composer who says that he shuns traditions. Fortunately he does not; though he may not realize that fact. It is true that the speech is that of jazz; the ideas are Gershwinian, as is their expression. But this man has, in his third orchestrated work, a command of symphonic development quite remarkable, to say nothing of his mastery in instrumentation. He writes for the orchestra as if born with one in his mouth—well, perhaps that is saying a great deal!

Throughout, there is a conciseness of formal development, a neat way of saying something and then going on with other matter. Now and then the expression becomes unduly sentimental or bombastic. But this is the exception: for the most part Gershwin displays the taste, the intellectual command of the artist. We liked best, because it was most typical of Gershwin's music, the last section, especially the piano part. True, there is the inevitable resemblance to the Rhapsody in Blue, but what a development the man has undergone since then!

The rest of an uncommonly engrossing program was the Deems Taylor delightful "Looking Glass" Suite, occasioned by the centennial of Lewis Carroll, and the Scriabin "Poem of Ecstasy."

JAN. 27, '32 THE BOSTON HERALD, WE

Boston Symphony, with Gershwin, To Give Benefit Concert Saturday

George Gershwin will appear in an extra performance of his new Second Rhapsody with the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Saturday at noon in Symphony hall, the entire gross receipts to be devoted to the city's unemployment relief campaign. This concert is in part the result of the great demand to hear Gershwin's new score which is having its first public performances this week at the regular Symphony concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Since these concerts are fully subscribed by the season, the great number of people who have applied for seats at Symphony hall would otherwise be disappointed.

The concert will be given by the full Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, and George Gersh[illegible] playing the piano part in [illegible] score. Mr. Gershwin, Dr. [illegible] Orch[illegible] have arranged this benefit performance and are voluntarily giving their services.

Tickets will go on sale this morning at the Symphony hall box office until the capacity of the auditorium is exhausted. No more than five seats will be sold to one person. The admission is $1. Since all expenses are contributed, the entire receipts will be given to the Boston unemployment relief fund.

Although this concert will doubtlessly yield $2500 for the unemployment fund, a voluntary meeting of the members of the orchestra promises a much greater return. The orchestra at yesterday's intermission voluntarily and unanimously voted to give one day's pay a month for the balance of the Symphony season. This contribution, together with that of the staff of Symphony hall, is expected to exceed $5000. These contributions and the concert should bring Symphony Hall's gift to the fund well above $7500.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

101

-- The Scr

Trans Jan 28

As Gershwin Makes Ready His Rhapsody

Forward and Backward With The New Piece Through A Manifold Morning

IT IS safe to say that none of the novelties that Dr. Koussevitzky and his predecessors have introduced from time to time at Symphony Hall, has aroused more interest than that which he proposes to bring to first performance this week: George Gershwin's Second Rhapsodys for orchestra with Piano. (The composer will be the pianist. For the same pair of concerts the conductor re-members that the prseent year is the centenary of the birth of Lewis Carroll, in recognition of which he places on the program Deems Taylor's Suite sugg-sted by Carroll's "Through the Looking-Glass." A Koussevitzkian battle-horse, Skriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy," rounds out the concerts.

Background

Gershwin needs no introduction to any American public. Conversely, about his newest work or his freshest project, there is always widespread curiosity. The [illegible] is best prepared for his forthcoming rhapsody by a page or two in the only book about him—"George Gershwin" by Isaac Goldberg, himself frequent and valuable contributor to these columns. So recent and timely is the book that it reaches even on the origins of a music [illegible] no longer ago than last spring. Says Dr. Goldberg amusingly and provocatively:

"Gershwin's first Rhapsody had been [illegible] in the upper reaches of Gotham. His second or.ginated in the aphrodisiac atmosphere of Beverly Hills, California, [illegible] of oranges and Greta Garbo. It [illegible] born of an orchestral sequence [illegible]ed into the picture, 'Delicious.' The [illegible]ure, in part, is laid in many thoroughfares of New York, whence, to accentuate [illegible] rhythms of pursuit, Gershw.n hit up[illegible] so-called rivet theme. If Beethoven [illegible] be inspired by metronomes, and Chopin by raindrops, why not Gershwin [illegible] the eternal tattoo of the New York riveters, in their Babel-ascent to the skies?

"The picture, of course, asks but a few minutes of what, orig.nally, was christened, 'Rhapsody in Rivets.' Now [illegible] has been re-named simply, 'Second Rhapsody.' It was scored for full orches[illegible] plus piano, during the run of 'Girl Crazy.' It has no program.

"'I wrote it,' says the composer, 'mainly because I wanted to wr.te a serious composition and found the opportunity in California to do it. Nearly everybody comes back from California with a west [illegible] tan and a pocketful of moving-pictur money. I decided to come back with both these things, and a serious composition—[illegible] the climate would let me. I was under nc obligation to the Fox Company to do this. But, you know, the old artistic soul must every so often be appeased.'

"As in the case of his 'Concerto,' so for [illegible] trial-hearing of the 'Second Rhapsody' Gershwin hired an orchestra that, on Friday, June 26, 1931, went through the freshly completed score in one of the studios of the National Broadcast ng Company. As these studios have a wire connection with the Victor recording laboratories in Camden, a special record was made of the rehearsal. Here, indeed is an improvement upon the rehearsal idea; the composer may listen over and over again to the record, studying effects, comparing notes, and basing his revisions upon repeated performance."

Here in Boston

Between the rehearsal with the orchestra on Wednesday and the luncheon which Mr. Gershwin was to have with his friend, Charles Martin Loeffler, there was opportunity for an interview on the wing. First, there were at least half a dozen persons wanting something at nearly every moment. Did Gershwin become the least bit flustered by all this? The answer is an emhpatic No. Was there the slightest bit of evidence that this attention is "going to the head" of the young man? The "No" becomes even more emphatic. The stock phrase "modest and unassuming" does not begin to do justice to the case.

There were comments, after the rehearsal, upon the mastery shown in the orchestration of the new work. Unconsciously a twinkle of satisfaction crept into Gershwin's eyes. "And you know," he said, "it is only the third work I have ever scored. The Piano Concerto was the first." One recalled that the "Rhapsody in Blue" was not orchestrated by Gershwin, but by "Ferdy" Grofe, Paul Whiteman's aid.

"There is all the difference in the world between the way in which the other rhapsody was written and the way this one was composed. When I started on the earlier work, I had exactly five weeks to the time of performance. So I wrote it in three. I turned over page after page, knowing it was not as good as I would have liked it to be. But I knew also that it had to be finished and that I could waste no time on revisions. I kept saying to myself, 'Never mind, I'll fix that after the concert.' But the 'Rhapsody in Blue' was a success and its weak spots have never been 'fixed.'"

"Of course you don't want me to print that, Mr. Gershwin."

"Why, yes; I don't mind. Go ahead." Then, turning quickly to the subject in hand.

"With this rhapsody it was different. I had seven weeks in California. The amount of music which the picture required was small and was quickly written. The parties and the night-life of Hollywood did not interest me in the least. They bored me in fact. Here was my chance to do some serious work. Seven weeks of almost uninterrupted opportunity to write the b est music I could possibly think of! What a chance. The main theme came out of the picture, of course." Then he continued much in the manner of the quotation from Dr. Goldberg, adding, "So you see how much more time I had for it. Moreover, the picture was not to be released until Christmas, and I was requested not to bring out the Rhapsody until after the picture had been launched. All the while I have been revising and polishing. I have even made minor changes since coming to Boston. In this p'ece I have had the opportunity of doing pretty nearly what I wanted."

[illegible] the Manuscript

A gallop through the score with the composer showed that the "rivet theme," really the basis of the entire work, is heard at once. It is composed mostly of repeated notes, firmly accented, with a melodic turn at the end which is simon-pure Gershwin. No other musical brain could have conceived it. Soon the piano enters with a second theme, beautifully melodic, over a cross-rhythmed accompaniment. The "middle theme," as Gershwin calls his chief contrast material, is a purely melodic line given at first to the violins. "How would you characterize this theme?" was asked. A blank expression crept over the composer's face. Then, Just what do you mean? I wanted merely to write a broad, flowing melody, the same as Bach, Brahms or Wagner have done. That is all I can say about it." His broad flowing melody is probably all that he expected of it. Between repetitions of this theme, horns intone a two-measure syncopated motiv which is later considerably developed. Out of these four bits of material the whole rhapsody is made. The "rivet theme" probably receives the most transformations. It also acts as a sort of binder between different versions of the other themes, so contributing to the unity for the whole work.

The Rhapsody is not cast in any of the abstract forms. It is a Rhapsody in reality as well as in name. It proceeds in great surges toward ever larger and larger climaxes. The transformations of the themes are manifold. In them almost every known form of jazz has its turn, from the slowest blues to the wildest rhythmed dance-steps. At one point there is even suggestion of Spanish atmosphere. The piano is used variously. It sings melodies luminously; provides sparkling decoration; pounds out marked, percussive rhythms. But it is seldom used quite alone; almost always, in doing these things, it does them in some orchestral combination.

The orchestration will probably be a revelation to those who can think only of an earlier Gershwin. It is not seemly to anticipate performance; but one does not mind venturing a prophecy that the old line about Gershwin as talented and musical, "but lacking in science" will at last find a final resting place in the waste-basket. And the new-found "science" has play in polyphonic and harmonic treatment as well as in orchestration.

And the Conductor

As has many another composer, Gershwin commented on his good fortune in having a conductor like Koussevitzky and an orchestra like the Boston Symphony to produce the Rhapsody. "You know, he brings out things, and makes them sound like a million dollars, that I hardly knew were there!" And then, as an afterthought, "You know, he does things with pianissimos that I had not suspected. I guess I have never had a chance to know about pianissimos very well." (Laughter from the bystanders.) But it was evident during the rehearsal that there was one thing which he does know very well. Most of the halts that he requested, most of the suggestions that he made, were directed toward the percussion section, in which, by the way, he has some original and decidedly pertinent effects. Painstakingly he pointed out nuances and effects for this choir. And one thought, "Koussevitzky's pianissimos and Gershwin's percussion effects will make their mark in this rhapsody."

But we had arrived at the hotel by the time all this had been changed. One final impression is not to be omitted. On George Gershwin's piano one saw a single piece of music, which he was evidently studying during his stay in Boston. What was it? The latest song-hit? Or perhaps the newest musical comedy? We have heard somewhere that he is interested in these things. Prhaps; but his room gave no evidence. On the piano one saw Mozart's Symphony in G minor. Yes, this composer of popular music, by the evidence of his studies as well as of his latest score, is musician through and through.

Taylor and Carroll

The Suite, "Through the Looking Glass," is the work by which Deems Taylor first attained recognition beyond that accorded to a young, struggling composer. It was written in 1917-19 for small orchestra; then rescored in 1921-22 for full orchestra piano included. It has been widely played both in Europe and in America. Mr. Monteux introduced it to Boston on Feb. 16, 1924. It was of course suggested by Lewis Carroll's "Through the Looking-Glass and What Alice Found There."

The first movement is divided between a Dedication and "The Garden of Live Flowers." From Carroll's book, Mr. Taylor quotes two dedicatory verses. His own Dedication is a lyric movement beginning with a duet for violin and 'cello soli, supported by muted strings. The mood continues through a movement that leads without interruption into "The Garden of Live Flowers." Here Alice discovers that the Tiger-Lily (and the other flowers) can really talk. Delicate, scherzo-like touches suggest their chatter. A "Lento languido" forms a songful interlude.

Next comes "Jabberwocky," which contains, of course, the verses with the queer, queer words, such as

"'Twas brillig, and the slithy toves
Did gyre and gimble in the wabe;
All mimsy were the borogoves,
And the mome raths outgrabe."

The theme of the Jabberwock comes first. A clarinet solo is the music for the first verse (as above). A little fugue suggests the fight between the Jabberwock and our hero. The double-bass subject is the Jabberwock; the episodes his antagonist. Finally the Jabberwock is conquered (with xylophone for the "vorpal sword"). Through the voice of a bassoon in a sickly cadenza, he dies convulsively. There is great rejoicing, with ringing of bells and much tonal excitement. The music for the first verse brings conclusion.

"Looking-Glass Insects" is the section from the conversations with the "anything but a regular bee," the gnat "about the size of a chicken," the rocking-horse-fly, the bread-and-butter-fly. It is a scherzo mostly of the lightest possible texture. The score directs that a piece of tissue paper be laid across the strings of the piano to gain a characteristic effect. . . . Lastly the movement of "The White Knight," who is a sort of toy Don Quixote. [illegible] represented by a theme which Mr. Taylor's own program-note calls "a sort of [illegible]," and by another, "bland, mellifluous, a little sentimental; much more like the Knight as he really was."

A. H. M.

---

imitating him. These skits prove that he knows something about the art of self-defense in caricature. . . . A diverting personality and a complete artist in his neat little sphere of entertainment—such is the impression that you will carry away from Chevalier's show."

THURSDAY TRANSCRIPT

News of the Riflemen

SYMPHONY CROWDED TO HEAR GERSHWIN OPUS

BOSTON HEARS GERSHWIN'S RHAPSODY

Symphony Orchestra in First Performance of "Second Rhapsody"

By KATHARINE LYONS

No matter who the composer on yesterday's symphony concert program, George Gershwin held sway. For a month Boston's music public has awaited his new symphony, which he has called "Second Rhapsody."

With no less an authority than the esteemed symphony conductor, Serge Koussevitsky, singing its praises in advance, its way was paved with highest anticipation.

Mr. Gershwin is twice blessed it seems. First, for his talent to write a symphony that at the outset displays the great strides he has made in the musical world since he wrote his ever-popular "Rhapsody in Blue" eight years ago, and secondly, for having the good fortune of interesting Mr. Koussevitsky in his composition.

The young composer heard his "Second Rhapsody" played for the first time yesterday by an ensemble of musicians who, under the guidance of so skilful a director, gave it a treatment that must have made him even happier than he had even dreamed.

"The Second Rhapsody," written for a full symphony, is a masterful composition. The sound of riveting on New York skyscrapers gave Gershwin his theme, which he has developed and carried through the entire piece. It is written in one movement and played in 16 minutes. There is a repetition of notes, firmly accented.

It opens with the piano, but having been scored for a full orchestra, the piano is heard intermittently and variously in solo, duet with drums, or with the entire ensemble.

When the composer leaves his "rivet theme," the effects for which are accentuated by the trombones and allied instruments, he goes into a contrastingly sweeping melody, given first to the violins. While less brooding and not so sentimental as the langorous one he gave to his "Rhapsody in Blue," musical authorities will at once recognize how much more pure melody it has.

There are varied transformations of the "rivet theme" most of which surge into great climaxes that employ every possible kind of syncopation or jazz embellishment.

Its reception yesterday, with Mr. Gershwin himself at the piano, was tremendous, and an audience quite on the alert for it accorded the conductor as well as the composer a full appreciation of the merits of the composition and the manner in which it was so superbly performed.

Opening the program was Deems Taylor's descriptive suite "Through the Looking Glass," with its five varied pictures chosen for a timely performance on account of the anniversary of Lewis Carroll, who wrote the immortal fairy tale from which the composer took his theme.

Seriabin's "delightful "Poem of Ecstasy" closed it.

---

which was played for the first time in public and very warmly applauded.

Mr Gershwin, Dr Koussevitzky, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give today at noon in Symphony Hall a special performance of this much-discussed rhapsody, for the benefit of the United Boston Unemployed Relief Fund, to which the entire gross receipts will go, as the performers are giving their services and the management gives the use of the hall. The rhapsody will also be played, of course, in the Saturday subscription series tonight. There has been a great demand for single tickets, and the subscription concerts are sold out for the season, hence the extra performance this noon.

The performance of this work by a leading American writer of frankly popular music at the Boston Symphony concerts indicates that at last the absurd gap between what the man in the street calls "popular" music and what he calls "classical" music is being closed. This division into "popular" and "clasical," "jass" and "serious," "low-brow" and "high-brow" music is the greatest barrier in the way of the development of music in America.

The real division is between good music and bad music. Much of the imported European music played by the Boston Symphony turns out to be bad, and is not played again. Some, though not much, of the music written for Broadway and Hollywood and for the kind of performers who fill most radio programs, is good enough to be heard repeated for its own sake.

American "Jazz"

Some American "jazz" pieces have gone all over the world, and have profoundly influenced the leading European composers, Stravinsky, Honegger, Ravel, and the rest. Mr Gershwin, as perhaps the greatest talent among our popular composers, deserves a hearing at the Symphony concerts whenever he has anything to offer playable by the orchestra.

Mr Gershwin's music has, some of it, been played by other leading orchestras, and there are persistent rumors that he is to do an opera for the Metropolitan Opera. His "Rhapsody in Blue" has won wide and lasting popularity. His new rhapsody bids fair to do the same. It is music far more vital, far more beautiful than his piano concerto, or his "American in Paris."

He at first meant to call this rhapsody No. 2 either "Rhapsody in Rivets" or "Manhattan Rhapsody," because it was suggested by New York sights and sounds. The persistent rhythmic figures underlying much of it may, in fact, have come to him from memories of riveting machines. But he wisely avoided any definite suggestion of a program.

The music, scored for full modern orchestra, has the character of an improvisation. Mr Gershwin has never shown any gift for elaborating the architecture of his pieces. His best things are always episodic outbursts.

Sounded Genuine

This rhapsody, despite the frequent and regrettable failure yesterday of Dr Koussevitzky and the players to catch its rhythmic swing, impressed one deeply. It sounded genuine. Other composers, Stravinsky and Milhaud, for instance, have juggled "jazz" rhythms more cleverly, and avoided lapses from so-called "good taste" more successfully. Mr Gershwin is not as clever a musician as some of his admirers would have him, nor is his feeling for melody and harmony free from affinity for the vulgar. But he has creative imagination, more than a touch of sheer genius. Other and greater geniuses—Wagner, for example, in his "Tannhauser"—have lapsed into occasional vulgarity. There is something sterile about "good taste," particularly in America. Whitmanesque "barbaric yawps" are better, after all, than the gentilities of Longfellow or of MacDowell.

Deems Taylor's "Through the Looking Glass," also played yesterday, seemed pallid in its rather calculated prettiness beside Mr Gershwin's rhapsodic outbursts.

With Mr Taylor's suite, and with Skriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy," the remaining number on the program, Dr Koussevitzky was highly eloquent and very impressive, as usual. Even his remarkable interpretation does not, however, save Skriabin's tone poem from a suggestion of hysterical feebleness. It is less notable music than it seemed a dozen years back.

P. R.

Post Jan 30

Symphony Gives Taylor's "Alice" Suite

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

There are Symphony concerts that are that and nothing more, however excellent the music played, however admirable the performance. Others are, in their way, occasions; and to this class belongs that of yesterday afternoon.

MR. BURGIN RETURNS

First of all Dr. Koussevitzky, absent on midwinter holiday from the last two pairs of regular subscription concerts, yesterday returned to them and was greeted by a rising orchestra and an applauding audience. Mr. Burgin, absent from these same concerts for an even longer period, as the result of an automobile accident, was yesterday once more at his post as leader of the first violins, and applause welcomed him as well.

The 100th anniversary of the birth of Charles Lutwidge Dodgson, better known to lovers of "Alice in Wonderland" as Lewis Carroll, which occurred three days ago, was commemorated by a performance of the suite of Deems Taylor, inspired by the Oxford Don's second masterpiece of nonsense, "Through the Looking Glass." And finally George Gershwin's Second Rhapsody for pianoforte and orchestra, long awaited successor to the "Rhapsody in Blue," received its first public performance and with its composer as soloist.

Taylor's Charming Suite

It is not easy to think of any composer, living or dead, who would have been so well fitted as was Mr. Taylor to put Lewis Carroll into music. To that task, if what must have been so pleasurable an occupation can be so described, Mr. Taylor could bring the necessary humor, fantasy, sentiment and skill. Slight in its way this "Looking-Glass" Suite undoubtedly is, yet there is about it something precious as there is about the Alice books themselves. There are few scores by American composers that one would as unwillingly see disappear.

Dr. Koussevitzky yesterday conducted this suite for the first time here, and read it as sympathetically as though the Carrollian type of humor were not to him as Russian necessarily somewhat alien. Delightful detail in a thoroughly delightful performance was the clarinet playing of Mr. Polatschek, and Dr. Koussevitzky graciously included him in the applause which followed.

Stage Setting Lacking

In one respect Mr. Gershwin's new rhapsody was not a disappointment. It is much better made, from the technical standpoint, than its famous predecessor. Mr. Gershwin has here done his own scoring, for full symphony orchestra, and done it well. As a craftsman he makes progress, but his musical speech is still predominantly that of Tin Pan Alley, whence he emerged to figure in international music festivals and symphony concerts. Most of the new rhapsody calls out for a musical comedy setting. At a symphony concert it is as out of place as a one-piece bathing suit. Mr. Gershwin, who played his music with a glib dexterity, was warmly applauded, yet there was no outstanding demonstration of approval. One might easily record a "succes d'estime."

Scriabin's Poem of Ecstasy, music in which Dr. Koussevitzky has ever excelled, concluded the concert. The work itself begins to pall in places. Much of it is static. But still impressive is the end, in which are unloosed the floodgates of orchestral tone.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

-- The Sc

Tran Jan 3

As Gershwin Makes Ready His Rhapsody

Forward and Backward With The New Piece Through A Manifold Morning

IT IS safe to say that none of the novelties that Dr. Koussevitzky and his predecessors have introduced from time to time at Symphony Hall has aroused more interest than that which he proposes to bring to first performance this week: George Gershwin's Second Rhapsodys for orchestra with Piano. (The composer will be the pianist. For the same pair of concerts the conductor remembers that the prseent year is the centenary of the birth of Lewis Carroll, in recognition of which he places on the program Deems Taylor's Suite suggested by Carroll's "Through the Looking-Glass." A Koussevitzkian battle-horse, Skriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy," rounds out the concerts.

ckground

ershwin needs no introduction to any erican public. Conversely, about his est work or his freshest project, there always widespread curiosity. The is best prepared for his forthcoming psody by a page or two in the only k about him—"George Gershwin" by Isaac Goldberg, himself frequent and able contributor to these columns. So nt and timely is the book that it hes even on the origins of a music n no longer ago than last spring. Dr. Goldberg amusingly and pro- tively:

"Gershwin's first Rhapsody had been in the upper reaches of Gotham. His nd originated in the aphrodisiac at- phere of Beverly Hills, California, re- nt of oranges and Greta Garbo. It born of an orchestral sequence in- d into the picture, 'Delicious.' The ure, in part, is laid in many thorough- s of New York, whence, to accentuate rhythms of pursuit, Gershwin hit up- so-called rivet theme. If Beethoven be inspired by metronomes, and pin by raindrops, why not Gershwin the eternal tattoo of the New York veters, in their Babel-ascent to the s?

"The picture, of course, asks but a few nutes of what, originally, was stened, 'Rhapsody in Rivets.' Now has been re-named simply, 'Second psody.' It was scored for full orches- plus piano, during the run of 'Gir- zy.' It has no program.

"I wrote it,' says the composer, 'mainly ause I wanted to write a serious com- tion and found the opportunity in ifornia to do it. Nearly everybody mes back from California with a west tan and a pocketful of moving-pictur ney. I decided to come back with both se things, and a serious composition— he climate would let me. I was under no ligation to the Fox Company to do this. t, you know, the old artistic soul must very so often be appeased.'

"As in the case of his 'Concerto,' so for trial-hearing of the 'Second Rhapsody' Gershwin hired an orchestra that, on Friday, June 26, 1931, went through the freshly completed score in one of the studios of the National Broadcasting Company. As these studios have a wire connection with the Victor recording laboratories in Camden, a special record was made of the rehearsal. Here, indeed is an improvement upon the rehearsal idea; the composer may listen over and over again to the record, studying effects, comparing notes, and basing his revisions upon repeated performance."

Here in Boston

Between the rehearsal with the orchestra on Wednesday and the luncheon which Mr. Gershwin was to have with his friend, Charles Martin Loeffler, there was opportunity for an interview on the wing. First, there were at least half a dozen persons wanting something at nearly every moment. Did Gershwin become the least bit flustered by all this? The answer is an emhpatic No. Was there the slightest bit of evidence that this attention is "going to the head" of the young man? The "No" becomes even more emphatic. The stock phrase "modest and unassuming" does not begin to do justice to the case.

There were comments, after the rehearsal, upon the mastery shown in the orchestration of the new work. Unconsciously a twinkle of satisfaction crept into Gershwin's eyes. "And you know," he said, "it is only the third work I have ever scored. The Piano Concerto was the first." One recalled that the "Rhapsody in Blue" was not orchestrated by Gershwin, but by "Ferdy" Grofe, Paul Whiteman's aid.

"There is all the difference in the world between the way in which the other rhapsody was written and the way this one was composed. When I started on the earlier work, I had exactly five weeks to the time of performance. So I wrote it in three. I turned over page after page, knowing it was not as good as I would have liked it to be. But I knew also that it had to be finished and that I could waste no time on revisions. I kept saying to myself, 'Never mind, I'll fix that after the concert.' But the 'Rhapsody in Blue' was a success and its weak spots have never been 'fixed.'"

"Of course you don't want me to print that, Mr. Gershwin."

"Why, yes; I don't mind. Go ahead." Then, turning quickly to the subject in hand.

"With this rhapsody it was different. I had seven weeks in California. The amount of music which the picture required was small and was quickly written. The parties and the night-life of Hollywood did not interest me in the least. They bored me in fact. Here was my chance to do some serious work. Seven weeks of almost uninterrupted opportunity to write the best music I could possibly think of! What a chance. The main theme came out of the picture, of course." Then he continued much in the manner of the quotation from Dr. Goldberg, adding, "So you see how much more time I had for it. Moreover, the picture was not to be released until Christmas, and I was requested not to bring out the Rhapsody until after the picture had been launched. All the while I have been revising and polishing. I have even made minor changes since coming to Boston. In this piece I have had the opportunity of doing pretty nearly what I wanted."

the Manuscript

A gallop through the score with the composer showed that the "rivet theme," really the basis of the entire work, is heard at once. It is composed mostly of repeated notes, firmly accented, with a melodic turn at the end which is simon-pure Gershwin. No other musical brain could have conceived it. Soon the piano enters with a second theme, beautifully melodic, over a cross-rhythmed accompaniment. The "middle theme," as Gershwin calls his chief contrast material, is a purely melodic line given at first to the violins. "How would you characterize this theme?" was asked. A blank expression crept over the composer's face. Then, Just what do you mean? I wanted merely to write a broad, flowing melody, the same as Bach, Brahms or Wagner have done. That is all I can say about it." His broad flowing melody is probably all that he expected of it. Between repetitions of this theme, horns intone a two-measure syncopated motiv which is later considerably developed. Out of these four bits of material the whole rhapsody is made. The "rivet theme" probably receives the most transformations. It also acts as a sort of binder between different versions of the other themes, so contributing to the unity for the whole work.

The Rhapsody is not cast in any of the abstract forms. It is a Rhapsody in reality as well as in name. It proceeds in great surges toward ever larger and larger climaxes. The transformations of the themes are manifold. In them almost every known form of jazz has its turn, from the slowest blues to the wildest rhythmed dance-steps. At one point there is even suggestion of Spanish atmosphere. The piano is used variously. It sings melodies luminously; provides sparkling decoration; pounds out marked, percussive rhythms. But it is seldom used quite alone; almost always, in doing these things, it does them in some orchestral combination.

The orchestration will probably be a revelation to those who can think only of an earlier Gershwin. It is not seemly to anticipate performance; but one does not mind venturing a prophecy that the old line about Gershwin as talented and musical, "but lacking in science" will at last find a final resting place in the waste-basket. And the new-found "science" has play in polyphonic and harmonic treatment as well as in orchestration.

And the Conductor

As has many another composer, Gershwin commented on his good fortune in having a conductor like Koussevitzky and an orchestra like the Boston Symphony to produce the Rhapsody. "You know, he brings out things, and makes them sound like a million dollars, that I hardly knew were there!" And then, as an afterthought, "You know, he does things with pianissimos that I had not suspected. I guess I have never had a chance to know about pianissimos very well." (Laughter from the bystanders.) But it was evident during the rehearsal that there was one thing which he does know very well. Most of the halts that he requested, most of the suggestions that he made, were directed toward the percussion section, in which, by the way, he has some original and decidedly pertinent effects. Painstakingly he pointed out nuances and effects for this choir. And one thought, "Koussevitzky's pianissimos and Gershwin's percussion effects will make their mark in this rhapsody."

But we had arrived at the hotel by the time all this had been changed. One final impression is not to be omitted. On George Gershwin's piano one saw a single piece of music, which he was evidently studying during his stay in Boston. What was it? The latest song-hit? Or perhaps the newest musical comedy? We have heard somewhere that he is interested in these things. Prhaps; but his room gave no evidence. On the piano one saw Mozart's Symphony in G minor. Yes, this composer of popular music, by the evidence of his studies as well as of his latest score, is musician through and through.

Taylor and Carroll

The Suite, "Through the Looking Glass," is the work by which Deems Taylor first attained recognition beyond that accorded to a young, struggling composer. It was written in 1917-19 for small orchestra; then rescored in 1921-22 for full orchestra piano included. It has been widely played both in Europe and in America. Mr. Monteux introduced it to Boston on Feb. 16, 1924. It was of course suggested by Lewis Carroll's "Through the Looking-Glass and What Alice Found There."

The first movement is divided between a Dedication and "The Garden of Live Flowers." From Carroll's book, Mr. Taylor quotes two dedicatory verses. His own Dedication is a lyric movement beginning with a duet for violin and 'cello soli, supported by muted strings. The mood continues through a movement that leads without interruption into "The Garden of Live Flowers." Here Alice discovers that the Tiger-Lily (and the other flowers) can really talk. Delicate, scherzo-like touches suggest their chatter. A "Lento languido" forms a songful interlude.

Next comes "Jabberwocky," which contains, of course, the verses with the queer, queer words, such as

"'Twas brillig, and the slithy toves
Did gyre and gimble in the wabe;
All mimsy were the borogoves,
And the mome raths outgrabe."

The theme of the Jabberwock comes first. A clarinet solo is the music for the first verse (as above). A little fugue suggests the fight between the Jabberwock and our hero. The double-bass subject is the Jabberwock; the episodes his antagonist. Finally the Jabberwock is conquered (with xylophone for the "vorpal sword"). Through the voice of a bassoon in a sickly cadenza, he dies convulsively. There is great rejoicing, with ringing of bells and much tonal excitement. The music for the first verse brings conclusion.

"Looking-Glass Insects" is the section from the conversations with the "anything but a regular bee," the gnat "about the size of a chicken," the rocking-horse-fly, the bread-and-butter-fly. It is a scherzo mostly of the lightest possible texture. The score directs that a piece of tissue paper be laid across the strings of the piano to gain a characteristic effect. . . . Lastly the movement of "The White Knight," who is a sort of toy Don Quixote. He is represented by a theme which Mr. Taylor's own program-note calls "a sort of . . ." and by another, "bland, mellifluous, a little sentimental; much more like the Knight as he really was."

A. H. M.

---

imitating him. These skits prove that he knows something about the art of self-defense in caricature. . . . A diverting personality and a complete artist in his neat little sphere of entertainment—such is the impression that you will carry away from Chevalier's show."

THURSDAY TRANSCRIPT

News of the Riflemen

BOSTON TRAVELER, SATU

GAZIN

BOSTON HEARS GERSHWIN'S RHAPSODY

Symphony Orchestra in First Performance of "Second Rhapsody"

By KATHARINE LYONS

No matter who the composer on yesterday's symphony concert program, George Gershwin held sway. For a month Boston's music public has awaited his new symphony, which he has called "Second Rhapsody."

With no less an authority than the esteemed symphony conductor, Serge Koussevitsky, singing its praises in advance, its way was paved with highest anticipation.

Mr. Gershwin is twice blessed it seems. First, for his talent to write a symphony that at the outset displays the great strides he has made in the musical world since he wrote his ever-popular "Rhapsody in Blue" eight years ago, and secondly, for having the good fortune of interesting Mr. Koussevitsky in his composition.

The young composer heard his "Second Rhapsody" played for the first time yesterday by an ensemble of musicians who, under the guidance of so skilful a director, gave it a treatment that must have made him even happier than he had even dreamed.

"The Second Rhapsody," written for a full symphony, is a masterful composition. The sound of riveting on New York skyscrapers gave Gershwin his theme, which he has developed and carried through the entire piece. It is written in one movement and played in 16 minutes. There is a repetition of notes, firmly accented.

It opens with the piano, but having been scored for a full orchestra, the piano is heard intermittently and variously in solo, duet with drums, or with the entire ensemble.

When the composer leaves his "rivet theme," the effects for which are accentuated by the trombones and allied instruments, he goes into a contrastingly sweeping melody, given first to the violins. While less brooding and not so sentimental as the langorous one he gave to his "Rhapsody in Blue," musical authorities will at once recognize how much more pure melody it has.

There are varied transformations of the "rivet theme" most of which surge into great climaxes that employ every possible kind of syncopation or jazz embellishment.

Its reception yesterday, with Mr. Gershwin himself at the piano, was tremendous, and an audience quite on the alert for it accorded the conductor as well as the composer a full appreciation of the merits of the composition and the manner in which it was so superbly performed.

Opening the program was Deems Taylor's descriptive suite "Through the Looking Glass," with its five varied pictures chosen for a timely performance on account of the anniversary of Lewis Carroll, who wrote the immortal fairy tale from which the composer took his theme.

Scriabin's "delightful "Poem of Ecstasy" closed it.

Glob MUSIC Jan 30

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

George Gershwin appeared at yesterday afternoon's Symphony concert as piano soloist in his new "Rhapsody No. 2, for orchestra with pianoforte," which was played for the first time in public and very warmly applauded.

Mr Gershwin, Dr Koussevitzky, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give today at noon in Symphony Hall a special performance of this much-discussed rhapsody, for the benefit of the United Boston Unemployed Relief Fund, to which the entire gross receipts will go, as the performers are giving their services and the management gives the use of the hall. The rhapsody will also be played, of course, in the Saturday subscription series tonight. There has been a great demand for single tickets, and the subscription concerts are sold out for the season, hence the extra performance this noon.

The performance of this work by a leading American writer of frankly popular music at the Boston Symphony concerts indicates that at last the absurd gap between what the man in the street calls "popular" music and what he calls "classical" music is being closed. This division into "popular" and "clasical," "jass" and "serious," "low-brow" and "high-brow" music is the greatest barrier in the way of the development of music in America.

The real division is between good music and bad music. Much of the imported European music played by the Boston Symphony turns out to be bad, and is not played again. Some, though not much, of the music written for Broadway and Hollywood and for the kind of performers who fill most radio programs, is good enough to be heard repeated for its own sake.

American "Jazz"

Some American "jazz" pieces have gone all over the world, and have profoundly influenced the leading European composers, Stravinsky, Honegger, Ravel, and the rest. Mr Gershwin, as perhaps the greatest talent among our popular composers, deserves a hearing at the Symphony concerts whenever he has anything to offer playable by the orchestra.

Mr Gershwin's music has, some of it, been played by other leading orchestras, and there are persistent rumors that he is to do an opera for the Metropolitan Opera. His "Rhapsody in Blue" has won wide and lasting popularity. His new rhapsody bids fair to do the same. It is music far more vital, far more beautiful than his piano concerto, or his "American in Paris."

He at first meant to call this rhapsody No. 2 either "Rhapsody in Rivets" or "Manhattan Rhapsody," because it was suggested by New York sights and sounds. The persistent rhythmic figures underlying much of it may, in fact, have come to him from memories of riveting machines. But he wisely avoided any definite suggestion of a program.

The music, scored for full modern orchestra, has the character of an improvisation. Mr Gershwin has never shown any gift for elaborating the architecture of his pieces. His best things are always episodic outbursts.

Sounded Genuine

This rhapsody, despite the frequent and regrettable failure yesterday of Dr Koussevitzky and the players to catch its rhythmic swing, impressed one deeply. It sounded genuine. Other composers, Stravinsky and Milhaud, for instance, have juggled "jazz" rhythms more cleverly, and avoided lapses from so-called "good taste" more successfully. Mr Gershwin is not as clever a musician as some of his admirers would have him, nor is his feeling for melody and harmony free from affinity for the vulgar. But he has creative imagination, more than a touch of sheer genius. Other and greater geniuses—Wagner, for example, in his "Tannhauser"—have lapsed into occasional vulgarity. There is something sterile about "good taste," particularly in America. Whitmanesque "barbaric yawps" are better, after all, than the gentilities of Longfellow or of MacDowell.

Deems Taylor's "Through the Looking Glass," also played yesterday, seemed pallid in its rather calculated prettiness beside Mr Gershwin's rhapsodic outbursts.

With Mr Taylor's suite, and with Skriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy," the remaining number on the program, Dr Koussevitzky was highly eloquent and very impressive, as usual. Even his remarkable interpretation does not, however, save Skriabin's tone poem from a suggestion of hysterical feebleness. It is less notable music than it seemed a dozen years back.

P. R.

GERSHWIN PLAYS OWN RHAPSODY

Post Jan 30

Symphony Gives Taylor's "Alice" Suite

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

There are Symphony concerts that are that and nothing more, however excellent the music played, however admirable the performance. Others are, in their way, occasions; and to this class belongs that of yesterday afternoon.

MR. BURGIN RETURNS

First of all Dr. Koussevitzky, absent on midwinter holiday from the last two pairs of regular subscription concerts, yesterday returned to them and was greeted by a rising orchestra and an applauding audience. Mr. Burgin, absent from these same concerts for an even longer period, as the result of an automobile accident, was yesterday once more at his post as leader of the first violins, and applause welcomed him as well.

The 100th anniversary of the birth of Charles Lutwidge Dodgson, better known to lovers of "Alice in Wonderland" as Lewis Carroll, which occurred three days ago, was commemorated by a performance of the suite of Deems Taylor, inspired by the Oxford Don's second masterpiece of nonsense, "Through the Looking Glass." And finally George Gershwin's Second Rhapsody for pianoforte and orchestra, long awaited successor to the "Rhapsody in Blue," received its first public performance and with its composer as soloist.

Taylor's Charming Suite

It is not easy to think of any composer, living or dead, who would have been so well fitted as was Mr. Taylor to put Lewis Carroll into music. To that task, if what must have been so pleasurable an occupation can be so described, Mr. Taylor could bring the necessary humor, fantasy, sentiment and skill. Slight in its way this "Looking-Glass" Suite undoubtedly is, yet there is about it something precious as there is about the Alice books themselves. There are few scores by American composers that one would as unwillingly see disappear.

Dr. Koussevitzky yesterday conducted this suite for the first time here, and read it as sympathetically as though the Carrollian type of humor were not to him as Russian necessarily somewhat alien. Delightful detail in a thoroughly delightful performance was the clarinet playing of Mr. Polatschek, and Dr. Koussevitzky graciously included him in the applause which followed.

Stage Setting Lacking

In one respect Mr. Gershwin's new rhapsody was not a disappointment. It is much better made, from the technical standpoint, than its famous predecessor. Mr. Gershwin has here done his own scoring, for full symphony orchestra, and done it well. As a craftsman he makes progress, but his musical speech is still predominantly that of Tin Pan Alley, whence he emerged to figure in international music festivals and symphony concerts. Most of the new rhapsody calls out for a musical comedy setting. At a symphony concert it is as out of place as a one-piece bathing suit. Mr. Gershwin, who played his music with a glib dexterity, was warmly applauded, yet there was no outstanding demonstration of approval. One might easily record a "succes d'estime."

Scriabin's Poem of Ecstasy, music in which Dr. Koussevitzky has ever excelled, concluded the concert. The work itself begins to pall in places. Much of it is static. But still impressive is the end, in which are unloosed the floodgates of orchestral tone.

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, JANUARY 30, 1932

-Films

Many-Sided Symphonic Afternoon

Return of Koussevitzky, Gershwin's Rhapsody Coolly Received

THE EVENT of the day, at the Symphony Concert, fell below anticipation. All the week the prophetears of publicity had foretold a most exciting occasion, a veritable communal palpitation over the productio of Mr. George Gershwin's Second Rhapsody. None the less the roving eye surveyed the customary matinée audience wearing the customary aspect. When Mr. Gershwin crossed the stage to a piano placed under and immediately behind the conductor's stand, warm and general applause welcomed him. It was no warmer and no more general than many a composer-pianist, conductor-composer or "assisting artist" has received in similar circumstance. The whole audience listened eagerly; but in at least one quarter of the hall an ominous sign was noted. Close observers in American theaters, concert-rooms and opera houses are agreed that nervous hairdressing is clear token of restlessness under the given stage-experience. From one and another point of vantage it was in evidence during the performance of Mr. Gershwin's Rhapsody.

At the end of the piece as the composer-pianist rose from his place, hearty clapping rattled from every corner of the hall; but it was neither fervent nor prolonged. Mr. Gershwin returned uncommonly honest thanks to Dr. Koussevitzky, as from one genuinely moved; paid his compliments to the orchestra; left the stage. He returned once to renewed plaudits; again, with the customary pantomime over precedence, with the conductor. Together they made acknowledgment to the audience with the signalled and standing orchestra. They departed; the clapping quickly stilled; the despatch-writers of the news-agencies, whom neither Stravinsky nor Sibelius ever drew to a Symphony Concert, went their ways. The rites of the day stood adjourned. They were more ardent, a week ago, for Mr. Holst.

Of the quality of the Rhapsody it is difficult, for the moment, to write confidently. Throughout it suffered under over-anxious performance. Whoever has heard Mr. Gershwin play the piano-part in his First Rhapsody—"in Blue"— remembers the rhythmic élan, the ringing tone, the vitalizing ardor he then released. It was as though this eight-year-old music were springing anew from the mind and temperament that created it. On Friday with the Second Rhapsody, Mr. Gershwin, in comparison, proceeded cautiously; took thought, as it seemed, of every measure and every tone; was sedulous with each accent, each shading. At every turn, though for no more than for an instant, he first considered, then accomplished. Dr. Koussevitzky was in no better case. He had thoroughly studied and assiduously rehearsed every detail of the music. He was earnest to project it with the utmost fidelity. Like Mr. Gershwin, he reflected before he released.

The joint outcome was an exceedingly exact and exceedingly polished performance; but one lacking propulsion and vitality. A distinctive quality in both Mr. Gershwin's first Rhapsody and in his Piano-Concerto is vigor and ardor of creation and projection. Both proceed not only con spirito but con amore. The rhythm, the melody, the orchestral voices all speak out. To the contrary this Second Rhapsody seemed tempered and in degree de-natured by reflection and manipulation. It sounded over-often from the study-table and the piano-rack.

Whether this impression proceeded from over-anxious performance or is inherent in the music itself was hardly to be determined on Friday. A freer, more ardent repetition this evening may easily be corrective. But two circumstances, recounted to The Transcript by Mr. Gershwin, bear out the latter inference. The First Rhapsody—he told our representative on Wednesday—was written in haste, under pressure, with little time for revision and surface-polishing. The Second, it appeared, was composed in studious leisure; recorded on discs; there reconsidered and emended. Often Mr. Gershwin returned to it pen in hand.

In some instances the composing mind and temperament must make music meditatively; touch thought with measured emotion; revise and revise again. In others, they must be all eagerness; work at white heat and gustily; let the revising impulse cool until it is half-forgotten. By the evidence of the First Rhapsody, of the Concerto and of many a page in the musical plays, Mr. Gershwin works more naturally in the second vein. As it seemed yesterday, he tried in the Second Rhapsody to guide creation by reflection, to gain precision and polish by manipulation. The consequence is a lessening of the vitalizing élan that is his individual and conquering quality. He must beat high, sound full, flash hard and bright or he loses both. Unless second hearing revises first impression, he wrote this new Rhapsody subduing himself to reflection, bending too long and considerately over music-paper before he set down the just and final note. Both processes are at odds with the natural, the essential, play of his creative instinct.

A ripening as well as a studious Gershwin made this Second Rhapsody. The motivs that generate it are born of the only America that Mr. Gershwin knows—the urban and metropolitan America, incarnate in New York, that from his beginnings has run steadily and naturally in his blood and through his music. It has equal right to expression and characterization in tones with Mr. Hill's New England, Mr. Sowerby's West, Mr. Morris's South. His principal theme is of Manhattan rhythmically rivetting. One and another motiv smacks of our lighter theater at current best. In all honesty it has probably never occurred to Mr. Gershwin that such musical ideas, conveyed to the concert-hall, need transmuting quality. Unfortunately they do—of the sort that Mr. Carpenter bestows upon kindred matter in "Skyscrapers."

The motivs of the Second Rhapsody lack the arresting and driving quality of the themes of the First, but the rhythmical, melodic, harmonic and instrumental expansion is more inventive and skilful. The piano-part is written with a wider range and a finer sensibility to combination with the orchestra. Mr. Gershwin now treats the instrument in ensemble rather than for display. Though he still scores too thickly and bluntly, with thought of texture rather than sinew, with too little regard for isolated and individual timbres, his insight and craft are both bettered. With the percussion group his manipulation is often imaginative. The manifold and recurring jazz, be it for rhythm or color or both, is wrought into the symphonic web. The cultivated Carpenter of "Skyscrapers" jazzes more baldly than the jazz-born Gershwin of the Second Rhapsody. . . . In sum Mr. Gershwin waxes in craftsmanship but at the cost of earlier and irrestible élan; sounds from Theater-Street the voice of metropolitan America but forgets that it must have other distinctions; has need to thin and sharpen his orchestra; above all should fuse into the ardors of his symphonic past the studious acquisitions of his symphonic present. In good time each may complement the other.

An energetic Centenary Committee suggested to conductors that "about this time" they recall the memory of Lewis Carroll, born Jan. 27, 1832 to write "Alice in Wonderland." It indicated Deems Taylor's orchestral Suite, suggested by Carroll's other book, "Through the Looking Glass," as commemorative piece ready and waiting. Dr. Koussevitzky, who has a flair for anniversaries and who, like the rest of us, may read in Carroll for his own pleasure, readily complied. Possibly Mr. Taylor was most the gainer. For here at last, in this little Suite, emerged his true self from the operatic cloudbanks of "The King's Henchman" and "Peter Ibbetson." With a fresh mind gently stirred, he invented a fanciful or a humorous music; put it to paper with a light, deft hand; gave it grace of movement, charm of substance; stirred in a modicum of sentiment, yet kept it amusing throughout; seldom exhausted his matter; never stiffened it with a manner.

Heard only as music, regardless of the sub-titles from Carroll, the Suite pleases by these qualities. With the garden, Jabberwocky, the insects and the White Knight in the listener's mind, the humor shines brighter, the fancy is more playful, the technical dexterity more apt. Of course, it is miniature music, and music in a minor genre. Yet scarcely an American composer could have written it more sympathetically and adroitly; while very few could have written it at all. It is also a genre in which our symphonic music is persistently deficient. Mr. Taylor not only translates Carroll but also releases his younger self. In later years he has preferred to purvey the Metropolitan with opera on commission; but kind for kind "In the Looking Glass" is a little masterpiece beside "The King's Henchman" or "Peter Ibbetson." The gods give him joy. Neither the humor, the fancy, nor the flavors of the music escaped the conductor.

The afterpiece was Skriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy," from which Dr. Koussevitzky has held his hand these three years. Like no other conductor nowadays, he plays it as an act of faith in a kind of daimonic possession. Were he less familiar and his orchestra less accustomed with the music, it would be the truth to say that it conducts him rather than he conducts it. Gradually a like hypnotic possession enters into the hearer. Now advancing, now receding he tosses on Skriabin's orchestral billows, braces himself for the final surge of tone (Dr. Koussevitzky has been more exciting with the retard that for a suspensive instant stays it.) Stings and caresses; ecstasies sensuous and ecstasies spiritual; nervous reactions all. When Russians are celebrants, we ... happily by. H. T. P.

◆

In the current program-book of the Symphony Concerts the Trustees ask for a wider contribution to the Guarantee Fund that meets the annual deficit. "A much larger number of contributors is necessary to insure the permanence of the orchestra. Subscriptions vary from one dollar to several thousand a year. All are welcome." . . . For the current season the fund now stands at $50,177. The balance needed is $49,833. "There has been every effort to curtail expenses."

◆

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Herald Jan 30

By PHILIP HALE

When Mr. Burgin came on the platform of Symphony hall yesterday afternoon to take his seat as concertmaster after an absence of some weeks due to a motor car accident he was warmly greeted by the audience which completely filled the hall from floor to second balcony. There was enthusiastic and prolonged applause for Dr. Koussevitzky appearing after two guest conductors had had their appointed rule.

The program was as follows: Deems Taylor, Suite, "Through the Looking Glass"; Five Pictures from Lewis Carroll (born on Jan. 27, 1832); George Gershwin Rhapsody No. 2 for orchestra with piano (first performance; Mr. Gershwin, pianist); Scriabin, "The Poem of Ecstasy."

Seldom is a mere author honored in this country by having the centenary of his birth observed at a symphony concert. Was the idea of this celebration suggested to Dr. Koussevitzky by the zealous professor at Columbia University who is interested in the approaching exhibition there of Carrolliana, or by some devoted friend of Alice in Boston; or is it possible that Dr. Koussevitzky made the acquaintance of Alice in Moscow, for "Alice in Wonderland," has been translated into Russian.

Taylor's suite is pleasing music whether the hearer has read of Alice's adventures or not. Mr. Monteux brought out the suite eight years ago. The music has worn well, though the portion entitled, "Dedication," would gain by condensation. The chief theme does not bear so much repetition. Mr. Taylor has expressed the fitting mood for an introduction to the wondering Alice's strange adventures, but the mood is too long sustained, poetic as it is. "Jabberwocky" may well disappoint those who picture a more fearsome beast, but the two scherzos, "The Garden of Live Flowers," and "Looking Glass Insects," are delightfully in the Carrollian vein. (After all how should a composer picture a Jabberwock in tones? Ravel solved his problem neatly in his "Beauty and the Beast.") "The White Knight," rides bravely off in spite of his wretched horsemanship.

But suppose there were no printed program, not even a title for this suite? Would any one associate the music with Alice or any other heroine in fiction for women or children?

Mr. Gershwin's new rhapsody has not the sweeping irresistible lyric theme that distinguishes the preceding rhapsody. He has gained during the intervening years in the building of a musical structure, also in the art of instrumentation, although he has yet much to learn in combinations of instrumental timbres; in coloring the dress that should bedeck his musical thoughts. No one should cry out against his chief theme, which needs no verbal explanation, for its significance is unmistakable; its character is truly national, as are the dash and the recklessness of the better pages. The music has decided individuality, which, it is to be hoped, Mr. Gershwin will preserve, and not be frightened into the smug respectability approved by professors of music and easily shocked conservative hearers. The late George Chadwick, much more learned in the art than Mr. Gershwin, was never so American and original as when he forgot mythological subjects and hoary traditions to write an irreverent devil-me-care Scherzo and his "Vagrom Ballad." It would be painful to listen to Mr. Gershwin ill-at-ease in a strait-jacket fitted to him by a well meaning conservatory. Let him pay heed, as he has done in the past, to orchestral works of other men. Even his present crudities come from exuberance and independence. Musset said of his poetry that the glass from which he drank was small, but it was his own. Mr. Gershwin's glass is a large one; he drinks from it great draughts; perhaps he will later drink with more discretion and a somewhat finer beverage, but glass and liquor will still be his own.

Boston Symphony

Monitor Jan 30

Returning to his labors in Symphony Hall, Boston, after a midseason respite, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky received, on Jan. 29, a warm greeting. He then directed the fourteenth program of the Boston Symphony season, as follows: Taylor, Suite, "Through the Looking Glass;" Gershwin, Rhapsody No. 2 for piano and orchestra; Scriabin, "Poem of Ecstasy."

Mr. George Gershwin's new rhapsody was performed on this occasion for the first time. In an interview last fall, Dr. Koussevitzky was quoted as saying that "the experimental stage is definitely past and we know who among the new composers have something of interest to offer." And again: "I hold no brief for those 'modernists' whose work I cannot find serious enough to bring to a first hearing. I must feel the reason for the existence of a work before I can begin its study."

It seems to follow, then, that Mr. Gershwin is one of the new composers who have something of interest to offer, and that Dr. Koussevitzky has felt the reason for the existence of this rhapsody. Let us not presume to question the conductor's judgment on the first point; we can only regret that the performance of the rhapsody did not make the reason for its existence so clear to us as it must be to him.

You will gain a sufficient notion of the work when you learn that it was originally to be entitled "Manhattan Rhapsody," or "Rhapsody in Rivets." The main musical idea, which was inspired by the riveting machines of New York, was used in a motion picture score, and while he was yet in Hollywood Mr. Gershwin was moved to incorporate it in a symphonic piece. This theme is merely a rhythmic figure of a type easily imagined. The other material of the piece is taken from the rag bag of musical comedy. The composer has learned more about the orchestra since writing his "Rhapsody in Blue" and the Piano Concerto, but this is hardly enough to lift him from the theater to the concert hall. Nor is a great symphony orchestra the ideal communicator of his music, which belongs essentially to the dance hall bands.

The other American represented fared better. M Taylor's early Suite seems remain his principal contri musical literature, just as which inspired it remains th ment of its author, Lewis C honor of whose centenary was played. It is true that lor has written other music two operas which have be duced at the Metropolitan believe that this suite is m representative of his tale music which is happily wed text, and which after 13 seems witty and charming.

Dr. Koussevitzky, alon conductors, we are assure Leonid Sabaneev in his Russian Composers," is q officiate as high priest of tonal mysteries. We have n able to soar with some of mentators into the rarefie phere where Scriabin dwel were able to admire Dr.
vitzky's magnificent conc this score, and the superb sound that issued from th tra he guided through it.

BIG RELIEF FUND EXCEEDS MILLION

Drive Leaders Appeal to Persons with Private Incomes to Aid

PLEDGES FOR DAY LARGEST RECORDED

Herald Jan. 30

Contributions to Boston's $3,000,000 fund for unemployment relief went $60,000 over the $1,000,000 mark yesterday. For the third day in succession the total for the day surpassed the total of subscriptions for the previous day.

The subscriptions for yesterday totalled $150,886.69. This brings the total for the drive thus far to $1,060,513.61.

The drive is on its way to the second million, but not with the impetus that it should have at this stage of the campaign. The time, allotted for the drive, is half completed and the fund is over $400,000 short of the half-way mark for the $3,000,000 quota.

This noon George Gershwin will appear in an extra performance of his new Second Rhapsody with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony hall in a campaign benefit. The entire gross receipts will be devoted to the fund, all giving their services voluntarily. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct, the full orchestra will play and Mr. Gershwin will play the piano part in his own score.

Symphony Orchestra,
Koussevitzky's direction,
Brooklyn concert Thurs-and its evening concert all on Friday, transposing y days for these concerts.
concert will be on Satur-

Carnegie Hall concerts, win will be the soloist in psody for piano and orch was first performed in week. Besides the regular formances of Friday after-aturday evening, Mr. Gershoussevitzky and the orches-he rhapsody a special per-yesterday noon, contributing ces for unemployment relief.
of this rhapsody occurred ing music for a motion picture inding a scene depicting steel riveting

New York. It is scored for full phony orchestra. This is the first shwin work to be conducted by ssevitzky.

n Friday, Mr. Koussevitzky also will oduce to New York Paul Hin-ith's Konzertmusik for string and s instruments, written for the Bos-Symphony's fiftieth anniversary on and first performed in Boston spring. The novelty for Saturday, des the Gershwin rhapsody, is lai Tcherepnin's "Eight Miniatures er a Russian illustrated alphabet)" ed for the first time this fall in on under the composer's direction.

OPERAS AND CONCERTS

Herald Jan 31

By PHILIP HALE

It is not often that an author is honored by having the centenary of his birth celebrated at a symphony concert. This posthumous compliment has been paid to "Lewis Carroll." The "Through the Looking Glass" Suite by Deems Taylor was played in Symphony hall last Friday and yesterday. It was announced for performance on the same days by the Chicago and the Cincinnati orchestras. At Detroit the "Alice in Wonderland" Suite by Edgar Stillman Kelley was to be played. The Manhattan Orchestra of New York, unable to change its program in time, will play Taylor's Suite, led by the composer, early in February.

These performances will be as a prelude to an exhibition of Carrolliana at Columbia University which will be opened to the public on April 1st. Lists of music suggested by the adventures of Alice have been published recently. It apparently has not occurred to any one that Walter Slaughter wrote the music for Saville Clarke's play "Alice in Wonderland" which, produced at London in 1886, has been frequently revived in that city.

Dr. Koussevitzky has put Bruckner's 8th symphony on the program of Feb. 12-13. This reminds us that the Bruckner Society of New York has awarded a medal to Dr. Koussevitzky "in recognition of his devotion to the cause of Mahler's music in America." A Bruckner medal was awarded by this society to Toscanini last April. The Mahler medal has on it his own words: "My time will still come."

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, JANUARY 30, 1932

- Films

Many-Sided Symphonic Afternoon

Return of Koussevitzky, Gershwin's Rhapsody Coolly Received

THE EVENT of the day, at the Symphony Concert, fell below anticipation. All the week the propheteers of publicity had foretold a most exciting occasion, a veritable communal palpitation over the production of Mr. George Gershwin's Second Rhapsody. None the less the roving eye surveyed the customary matinée audience wearing the customary aspect. When Mr. Gershwin crossed the stage to a piano placed under and immediately behind the conductor's stand, warm and general applause welcomed him. It was no warmer and no more general than many a composer-pianist, conductor-composer or "assisting artist" has received in similar circumstance. The whole audience listened eagerly; but in at least one quarter of the hall an ominous sign was noted. Close observers in American theaters, concert-rooms and opera houses are agreed that nervous hairdressing is clear token of restlessness under the given stage-experience. From one and another point of vantage it was in evidence during the performance of Mr. Gershwin's Rhapsody.

At the end of the piece as the composer-pianist rose from his place, hearty clapping rattled from every corner of the hall; but it was neither fervent nor prolonged. Mr. Gershwin returned uncommonly honest thanks to Dr. Koussevitzky, as from one genuinely moved; paid his compliments to the orchestra; left the stage. He returned once to renewed plaudits; again, with the customary pantomime over precedence, with the conductor. Together they made acknowledgment to the audience with the signalled and standing orchestra. They departed; the clapping quickly stilled; the despatch-writers of the news-agencies, whom neither Stravinsky nor Sibelius ever drew to a Symphony Concert, went their ways. The rites of the day stood adjourned. They were more ardent, a week ago, for Mr. Holst.

Of the quality of the Rhapsody it is difficult, for the moment, to write confidently. Throughout it suffered under over-anxious performance. Whoever has heard Mr. Gershwin play the piano-part in his First Rhapsody—"in Blue"— remembers the rhythmic élan, the ringing tone, the vitalizing ardor he then released. It was as though this eight-year-old music were springing anew from the mind and temperament that created it. On Friday with the Second Rhapsody, Mr. Gershwin, in comparison, proceeded cautiously; took thought, as it seemed, of every measure and every tone; was sedulous with each accent, each shading. At every turn, though for no more than for an instant, he first considered, then accomplished. Dr. Koussevitzky was in no better case. He had thoroughly studied and assiduously rehearsed every detail of the music. He was earnest to project it with the utmost fidelity. Like Mr. Gershwin, he reflected before he released.

The joint outcome was an exceedingly exact and exceedingly polished performance; but one lacking propulsion and vitality. A distinctive quality in both Mr. Gershwin's first Rhapsody and in his Piano-Concerto is vigor and ardor of creation and projection. Both proceed not only con spirito but con amore. The rhythm, the melody, the orchestral voices all speak out. To the contrary this Second Rhapsody seemed tempered and in degree de-natured by reflection and manipulation. It sounded over-often from the study-table and the piano-rack.

Whether this impression proceeded from over-anxious performance or is inherent in the music itself was hardly to be determined on Friday. A freer, more ardent repetition this evening may easily be corrective. But two circumstances, recounted to The Transcript by Mr. Gershwin, bear out the latter inference. The First Rhapsody—he told our representative on Wednesday—was written in haste, under pressure, with little time for revision and surface-polishing. The Second, it appeared, was composed in studious leisure; recorded on discs; there reconsidered and emended. Often Mr. Gershwin returned to it pen in hand.

In some instances the composing mind and temperament must make music meditatively; touch thought with measured emotion; revise and revise again. In others, they must be all eagerness; work at white heat and gustily; let the revising impulse cool until it is half-forgotten. By the evidence of the First Rhapsody, of the Concerto and of many a page in the musical plays, Mr. Gershwin works more naturally in the second vein. As it seemed yesterday, he tried in the Second Rhapsody to guide creation by reflection, to gain precision and polish by manipulation. The consequence is a lessening of the vitalizing élan that is his individual and conquering quality. He must beat high, sound full, flash hard and bright or he loses both. Unless second hearing revises first impression, he wrote this new Rhapsody subduing himself to reflection, bending too long and considerately over music-paper before he set down the just and final note. Both processes are at odds with the natural, the essential, play of his creative instinct.

A ripening as well as a studious Gershwin made this Second Rhapsody. The motivs that generate it are born of the only America that Mr. Gershwin knows—the urban and metropolitan America, incarnate in New York, that from his beginnings has run steadily and naturally in his blood and through his music. It has equal right to expression and characterization in tones with Mr. Hill's New England, Mr. Sowerby's West, Mr. Morris's South. His principal theme is of Manhattan rhythmically rivetting. One and another motiv smacks of our lighter theater at current best. In all honesty it has probably never occurred to Mr. Gershwin that such musical ideas, conveyed to the concert-hall, need transmuting quality. Unfortunately they do—of the sort that Mr. Carpenter bestows upon kindred matter in "Skyscrapers."

The motivs of the Second Rhapsody lack the arresting and driving quality of the themes of the First, but the rhythmical, melodic, harmonic and instrumental expansion is more inventive and skilful. The piano-part is written with a wider range and a finer sensibility to combination with the orchestra. Mr. Gershwin now treats the instrument in ensemble rather than for display. Though he still scores too thickly and bluntly, with thought of texture rather than sinew, with too little regard for isolated and individual timbres, his insight and craft are both bettered. With the percussion group his manipulation is often imaginative. The manifold and recurring jazz, be it for rhythm or color or both, is wrought into the symphonic web. The cultivated Carpenter of "Skyscrapers" jazzes more baldly than the jazz-born Gershwin of the Second Rhapsody. . . . In sum Mr. Gershwin waxes in craftsmanship but at the cost of earlier and irrestible élan; sounds from Theater-Street the voice of metropolitan America but forgets that it must have other distinctions; has need to thin and sharpen his orchestra; above all should fuse into the ardors of his symphonic past the studious acquisitions of his symphonic present. In good time each may complement the other.

An energetic Centenary Committee suggested to conductors that "about this time" they recall the memory of Lewis Carroll, born Jan. 27, 1832 to write "Alice in Wonderland." It indicated Deems Taylor's orchestral Suite, suggested by Carroll's other book, "Through the Looking Glass," as commemorative piece ready and waiting. Dr. Koussevitzky, who has a flair for anniversaries and who, like the rest of us, may read in Carroll for his own pleasure, readily complied. Possibly Mr. Taylor was most the gainer. For here at last, in this little Suite, emerged his true self from the operatic cloudbanks of "The King's Henchman" and "Peter Ibbetson." With a fresh mind gently stirred, he invented a fanciful or a humorous music; put it to paper with a light, deft hand; gave it grace of movement, charm of substance; stirred in a modicum of sentiment, yet kept it amusing throughout; seldom exhausted his matter; never stiffened it with a manner.

Heard only as music, regardless of the sub-titles from Carroll, the Suite pleases by these qualities. With the garden, Jabberwocky, the insects and the White Knight in the listener's mind, the humor shines brighter, the fancy is more playful, the technical dexterity more apt. Of course, it is miniature music, and music in a minor genre. Yet scarcely an American composer could have written it more sympathetically and adroitly; while very few could have written it at all. It is also a genre in which our symphonic music is persistently deficient. Mr. Taylor not only translates Carroll but also releases his younger self. In later years he has preferred to purvey the Metropolitan with opera on commission; but kind for kind "In the Looking Glass" is a little masterpiece beside "The King's Henchman" or "Peter Ibbetson." The gods give him joy. Neither the humor, the fancy, nor the flavors of the music escaped the conductor.

The afterpiece was Skriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy," from which Dr. Koussevitzky has held his hand these three years. Like no other conductor nowadays, he plays it as an act of faith in a kind of daimonic possession. Were he less familiar and his orchestra less accustomed with the music, it would be the truth to say that it conducts him rather than he conducts it. Gradually a like hypnotic possession enters into the hearer. Now advancing, now receding he tosses on Skriabin's orchestral billows, braces himself for the final surge of tone (Dr. Koussevitzky has been more exciting with the retard that for a suspensive instant stays it.) Stings and caresses; ecstasies sensuous and ecstasies spiritual; nervous reactions all. When Russians are celebrants, we [illegible] it happily by. H. T. P.

In the current program-book of the Symphony Concerts the Trustees ask for a wider contribution to the Guarantee Fund that meets the annual deficit. "A much larger number of contributors is necessary to insure the permanence of the orchestra. Subscriptions vary from one dollar to several thousand a year. All are welcome." . . . For the current season the fund now stands at $50,177. The balance needed is $49,833. "There has been every effort to curtail expenses."

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Herald Jan 30

By PHILIP HALE

When Mr. Burgin came on the platform of Symphony hall yesterday afternoon to take his seat as concertmaster after an absence of some weeks due to a motor car accident he was warmly greeted by the audience which completely filled the hall from floor to second balcony. There was enthusiastic and prolonged applause for Dr. Koussevitzky appearing after two guest conductors had had their appointed rule.

The program was as follows: Deems Taylor, Suite, "Through the Looking Glass"; Five Pictures from Lewis Carroll (born on Jan. 27, 1832); George Gershwin Rhapsody No. 2 for orchestra with piano (first performance; Mr. Gershwin, pianist); Scriabin, "The Poem of Ecstasy."

Seldom is a mere author honored in this country by having the centenary of his birth observed at a symphony concert. Was the idea of this celebration suggested to Dr. Koussevitzky by the zealous professor at Columbia University who is interested in the approaching exhibition there of Carrolliana, or by some devoted friend of Alice in Boston; or is it possible that Dr. Koussevitzky made the acquaintance of Alice in Moscow, for "Alice in Wonderland," has been translated into Russian.

Taylor's suite is pleasing music whether the hearer has read of Alice's adventures or not. Mr. Monteux brought out the suite eight years ago. The music has worn well, though the portion entitled, "Dedication," would gain by condensation. The chief theme does not bear so much repetition. Mr. Taylor has expressed the fitting mood for an introduction to the wondering Alice's strange adventures, but the mood is too long sustained, poetic as it is. "Jabberwocky" may well disappoint those who picture a more fearsome beast, but the two scherzos, "The Garden of Live Flowers," and "Looking Glass Insects," are delightfully in the Carrollian vein. (After all how should a composer picture a Jabberwock in tones? Ravel solved his problem neatly in his "Beauty and the Beast.") "The White Knight," rides bravely off in spite of his wretched horsemanship.

But suppose there were no printed program, not even a title for this suite? Would any one associate the music with Alice or any other heroine in fiction for women or children?

Mr. Gershwin's new rhapsody has not the sweeping irresistible lyric theme that distinguishes the preceding rhapsody. He has gained during the intervening years in the building of a musical structure, also in the art of instrumentation, although he has yet much to learn in combinations of instrumental timbres; in coloring the dress that should bedeck his musical thoughts. No one should cry out against his chief theme, which needs no verbal explanation, for its significance is unmistakable; its character is truly national, as are the dash and the recklessness of the better pages. The music has decided individuality, which, it is to be hoped, Mr. Gershwin will preserve, and not be frightened into the smug respectability approved by professors of music and easily shocked conservative hearers. The late George Chadwick, much more learned in the art than Mr. Gershwin, was never so American and original as when he forgot mythological subjects and hoary traditions to write an irreverent devil-me-care Scherzo and his "Vagrom Ballad." It would be painful to listen to Mr. Gershwin ill-at-ease in a strait-jacket fitted to him by a well meaning conservatory. Let him pay heed, as he has done in the past, to orchestral works of other men. Even his present crudities come from exuberance and independence. Musset said of his poetry that the glass from which he drank was small, but it was his own. Mr. Gershwin's glass is a large one; he drinks from it great draughts; perhaps he will later drink with more discretion and a somewhat finer beverage, but glass and liquor will still be his own.

Boston Symphony

Monitor Jan 30

Returning to his labors in Symphony Hall, Boston, after a mid-season respite, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky received, on Jan. 29, a warm greeting. He then directed the fourteenth program of the Boston Symphony season, as follows: Taylor Suite, "Through the Looking Glass;" Gershwin, Rhapsody No. 2 for piano and orchestra; Scriabin, "Poem of Ecstasy."

Mr. George Gershwin's new rhapsody was performed on this occasion for the first time. In an interview last fall, Dr. Koussevitzky was quoted as saying that "the experimental stage is definitely past and we know who among the new composers have something of interest to offer." And again: "I hold no brief for those 'modernists' whose work I cannot find serious enough to bring to a first hearing. I must feel the reason for the existence of a work before I can begin its study."

It seems to follow, then, that Mr. Gershwin is one of the new composers who have something of interest to offer, and that Dr. Koussevitzky has felt the reason for the existence of this rhapsody. Let us not presume to question the conductor's judgment on the first point; we can only regret that the performance of the rhapsody did not make the reason for its existence so clear to us as it must be to him.

You will gain a sufficient notion of the work when you learn that it was originally to be entitled "Manhattan Rhapsody," or "Rhapsody in Rivets." The main musical idea, which was inspired by the riveting machines of New York, was used in a motion picture score, and while he was yet in Hollywood Mr. Gershwin was moved to incorporate it in a symphonic piece. This theme is merely a rhythmic figure of a type easily imagined. The other material of the piece is taken from the rag bag of musical comedy. The composer has learned more about the orchestra since writing his "Rhapsody in Blue" and the Piano Concerto, but this is hardly enough to lift him from the theater to the concert hall. Nor is a great symphony orchestra the ideal communicator of his music, which belongs essentially to the dance hall bands.

The other American composer represented fared better. Mr. Deems Taylor's early Suite seems likely to remain his principal contribution to musical literature, just as the story which inspired it remains the monument of its author, Lewis Carroll, in honor of whose centenary the suite was played. It is true that Mr. Taylor has written other music, notably two operas which have been produced at the Metropolitan; but we believe that this suite is more truly representative of his talent. It is music which is happily wedded to its text, and which after 13 years still seems witty and charming.

Dr. Koussevitzky, alone among conductors, we are assured by Mr. Leonid Sabaneev in his "Modern Russian Composers," is qualified to officiate as high priest of Scriabin's tonal mysteries. We have never been able to soar with some of the commentators into the rarefied atmosphere where Scriabin dwells, but we were able to admire Dr. Koussevitzky's magnificent conception of this score, and the superb texture of sound that issued from the orchestra he guided through it. L. A. S.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky's direction, will give its Brooklyn concert Thursday evening, and its evening concert at Carnegie Hall on Friday, transposing the customary days for these concerts. The afternoon concert will be on Saturday, as usual.

In both Carnegie Hall concerts, George Gershwin will be the soloist in his new rhapsody for piano and orchestra, which was first performed in Boston last week. Besides the regular Boston performances of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Mr. Gershwin, Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra gave the rhapsody a special performance yesterday noon, contributing their services for unemployment relief.

The idea of this rhapsody occurred to Mr. Gershwin while he was composing music for a motion picture including a scene depicting steel riveting in New York. It is scored for full symphony orchestra. This is the first Gershwin work to be conducted by Koussevitzky.

On Friday, Mr. Koussevitzky also will introduce to New York Paul Hindemith's Konzertmusik for string and brass instruments, written for the Boston Symphony's fiftieth anniversary season and first performed in Boston last spring. The novelty for Saturday, besides the Gershwin rhapsody, is Nicolai Tcherepnin's "Eight Miniatures (after a Russian illustrated alphabet)" played for the first time this fall in Boston under the composer's direction.

[illegible] N Y Jan 31

...st Japanese Action

details of the fighting by their Chinese agents.

The Chase bank's American staff numbers about 15, not including wives and families of the branch. Alfred S. Schumacher is general manager of the branch. His bride of a year is in Shanghai with him.

The National City branch has a British manager. American employes number about 10.

The American Baptist Foreign Mission Society announced receipt of the following cable from Shanghai:

"Last night Japanese occupied Greater Shanghai outside of the boundaries of international and French settlements.

"Among missionaries and University of Shanghai faculty, it is considered that there is no cause for anxiety. All are quite safe."

Missionaries of the society now stationed at Shanghai include Miss Dora Fensom, New York, and Miss Ruth Bugbee, Concord, N. H., and H. D. Lamson, Exeter, N. H., on the faculty of the University of Shanghai.

THE FIRE RECORD

Box Time Loss

EUROPE travel year!
Never before could you buy so much for so little . . . transatlantic rates are lower . . . hotels more anxious than ever to accommodate you. Let COOK'S

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. SUN
JAN 2 - 1932

Music and Musicians

By W. J. HENDERSON

The American Composer.

IN the list of compositions brought forward in the concert room it is gratifying to find a sound and healthy piano concerto by an American. But there are many reasons for fearing that Harold Morris's commendable work will not easily establish itself as a permanent fixture in the repertories of solo pianists. It is an American product; and it is no secret that the American composer has no partisans. When a foreign artist comes to this country he is sure of the active support of his countrymen. Indeed, an Italian tenor can safely shatter the most beautiful phrases of Verdi when singing at the Metropolitan, knowing that his countrymen, who would shout "cane" at him if he did the same thing on the stage of the San Carlo, will applaud him vociferously.

Americans, if there were enough of them, might do the very same thing for an American singing in Rome, but in New York he must earn every plaudit. As for the American composer, he has always to overcome the lurking suspicion of music lovers that he cannot write because composing music is an occupation followed only by an inferior type of human being. Truly great minds take up politics or big business and leave music to carpet knights and ladies' men. This subject is too serious to be followed at this moment But the ill-concealed contempt of social dignitaries and commercial barons for disciples of the muses and humble cultivators of the humanities is one of the mountainous obstacles in the path of art in these United States.

Nevertheless, among the novelties produced last year, Mr. Morris's concerto stands well up in the front rank. It will march forward with a struggle not only for the reason already stated, but also because it is not a virtuoso piece. Many pianists will shy at it because they will not discern in it any opportunity to "make a hit." The best music lovers will accord it their respect, but this is a period when respect is distinctly out of favor.

* * *

Some Final Musings.

RUTH BRETON, excellent violinist, introduced a newly found sonata of Tartini, whose "Devil's Trill" has bedevilled violinists for many years. The composition proved to possess little more than historical interest. It is a good violin piece, of course, and soloists may find it worth playing occasionally. But it disclosed nothing new and indeed suggested the thought that perhaps that little "trillo del diavolo" was Tartini's daily food.

It was well worth while to hear Mahler's ninth symphony if only to renew one's wonder at the unceasing industry of those who hold that there are no faults in his art. The highest flights of his fancy carried him into some lofty regions, but there are many pages in which he is surely speeding along the earth without succeeding in taking off.

So at the end we find ourselves where we started—confronting a barren record. It is not a productive hour. The world is too deeply concerned with preserving its mere existence. It can hardly be expected to turn out many creations of the imagination. Europe has contributed little to the general output, and may not contribute much more in the immediate future, since commercialization and the spread of materialistic ideas have pushed art into the background over there quite as much as they have here. However, a new year is beginning and we are permitted to hope that it will be a better one.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

JAN 2 - 1932

Boston Orchestra Plans Its Second Visit Here

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its second visit to Brooklyn this season for a concert in the Academy of Music, on Friday evening, Jan 8. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky announces two numbers for the program—Beethoven's Fourth Symphony in B major and Rimsky-Korsakov's Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade."

Beethoven's lyric score, which some consider to have been inspired by the composer's love for Therese Brunsvik, to whom he was engaged at the time, is one of the composer's greatest works in the romantic vein.

The interpretation by Dr. Koussevitzky of "Scheherazade" is considered one of his finest. The numerous solo passages, more particularly that of the concert master, reveals the virtuosity of the Boston Symphony personnel to brilliant advantage.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

JAN 2 - 1932

Stravinsky's violin concerto, produced under the composer's direction in Berlin last October, with Samuel Dushkin as soloist, had its American première at Boston yesterday, with Dushkin and the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

JAN 3 1932

George Gershwin's new composition, "The Second Rhapsody," which was announced for performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in that city on Jan. 29 and 30, will not be performed on those dates. It has been postponed to an unannounced date later in the season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. SUN
JAN 2 - 1932

The Boston Symphony Orchestra wil make its second visit of the season t New York to give concerts in Carnegie Hall, next Thursday evening, a 8:30 and Saturday afternoon, at 2:30

Serge Koussevitzky will present a the Thursday concert a Suite by Corelli, consisting of Sarabande, Gigue and Badinerie, the Fourth Symphony of Beethoven in G major, the Fourth Symphony of Sibelius, and a Suite by Geza Frid.

Geza Frid, the Hungarian composer, and Kodaly, he has composed several chamber wroks which have been performed in Europe. This suite had its first performance in Paris in 1930 under Pierre Monteux, and its first American performance under Koussevitzky in Boston on December 24. The movements consist of aria e allegro, passacaglia, scherzo, intermezzo and perpetuum mobile.

At the Saturday afternoon concert, Koussevitzky will repeat the ninth symphony of Mahler which he introduced to New York in November at the evening series. The other numbers will be Ravel's introduction and allegro for harp and orchestra, the solo part to be taken by Bernard Zighera; also the suite from Strawinsky's "Petrouchka," with Jesus Maria Sanroma as piano soloist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

JAN 3 1932

Gustav Holst, English composer, and Chalmers Clifton will appear as guest conductors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in that city during this month while Mr. Koussevitzky takes his usual midseason vacation. Mr. Clifton will lead the concerts during the week of Jan. 10 and Mr. Holst during the week of Jan. 17. The English composer is making his second visit to this country. He will be connected with the music department of Harvard for the remainder of the college year.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKYLN, N. Y.
EAGLE

gie Hall tomorrow night. Bottom, left to right—Mari Boston Orchestra in Brooklyn and Manhattan this wee at Town Hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SPRINGIELD, O.
NEWS-SUN
JAN 3 1932

Works of Hungarian Composers Are Heard

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in its recent concert, gave the first American performances of a suite by Geza Frid, a Hungarian composer unknown here. Other numbers were a Bach suite for flute, Ravel's Introduction and Allegro for harp and orchestra, and Schumann's third symphony.

Igor Stravinsky's violin concerto will be given for the first time in America in the Boston concerts of next Friday and Saturday, with Samuel Dushkin as the soloist. The second symphony of Vincent d'Indy will open the program, which closes with Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" suite.

While Serge Koussevitsky takes his annual January vacation, Chalmers Clifton and Gustav Holst will conduct the Boston Symphony, the former during the week of January 10 and the latter in the week of January 17. Mr. Holst, who is about to make his second visit to Boston, will be connected with the music department of Harvard University for the remainder of the college year.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald-Tribune

JAN 3 1932

and at the Brooklyn Academy of Music Friday evening.

Dr. Koussevitzky's novelty for Thursday night is a suite by Geza Frid, Hungarian composer, who was born at Marmarossziget in 1904. He took his first music lessons from his mother, and continued his studies with Kerri Szanto and Bela Bartook. In 1920 he entered the Academy of Music at Budapest, where he studied composition with Zoltan Kodaly. In 1925 he left Hungary and appeared as a pianist in many European countries, was accompanist for two years in the concerts of the violinist Zoltan Szekely, then settled in Holland and now lives in Amsterdam.

As a composer he became first known in 1927 when his string quartet was played in Budapest and London. Later works to be heard in Europe were the string trio, cello concerto, "Podium-Suite" for violin and piano, and Serenade for wind instruments.

The suite to be played here by the Boston Symphony was first performed in Paris in 1930 by the Orchestra Symphonique de Paris under Pierre Monteux. Dr. Koussevitzky introduced it to America in his Boston concert of December 24-26.

On Saturday afternoon the orchestra will repeat Mahler's ninth symphony, which it introduced to New York on November 19.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKYLN, N. Y.
EAGLE

JAN 3 - 1932

Boston Symphony

For his Manhattan concerts with the Boston Orchestra on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon Mr. Koussewitsky has arranged an interesting pair of programs. That to be played Thursday includes a Suite by Frid, not previously heard in New York; Sibelius' Fourth Symphony, Beethoven's Fourth and a Corelli Suite. On Saturday afternoon Mr. Koussewitsky will conduct Mahler's Ninth Symphony (which he recently introduced to New York at a concert occurring in his Thursday evening series), as well as Ravel's Introduction and Allegro for harp, strings, flute and clarinet, and a Suite from Strawinsky's "Petrouschka."

In Brooklyn the Boston Orchestra will offer Beethoven's Fourth Symphony and Rimsky-Korsakow's "Scheherazade."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald-Tribune
JAN 5 1932

MUSIC NOTES

The Finnish composer, Jan Sibeliu has chosen the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, give the first performance of his r cently completed eighth symphony, a cording to an announcement in "Th Boston Evening Transcript." It is considered probable that the Bosto orchestra will produce the new work considerable time before the end this season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE

JAN 5 - 1932

WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

Gustav Holst, English composer and Chalmers Clifton will appear as guest conductors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in that [illegible] during this month while Mr. Koussevitzky takes his usual midseason vacation. Mr. Clifton will lead the concerts during the week of January 10 and Mr. Holst during the week of January 17. The English composer is making his second visi to this country. He will be connected with the music department o Harvard for the remainder of th college year.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAPH

JAN 4 - 1932

Boston Band In Thursday

Hub Symphony to Make Second Visit of Season This Week.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its second visit of the season to New York to give concerts in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will present at the Thursday concert a Suite by Corelli, consisting of Sarabande, Gigue and Badinerie; the Fourth Symphony of Beethoven in G major; the Fourth Symphony of Sibelius, and a Suite by Geza Frid. Geza Frid, the Hungarian composer, was born in 1904. A pupil of Bartok and Kodaly, he has composed several chamber works which have been performed in Europe. This Suite had its first performance in Paris in 1930 under Pierre Monteux, and its first American performance under Koussevitzky in Boston on December 24. The movements consist of Aria e Allegro, Passacaglia, Scherzo, Intermezzo and Perpetum Mobile.

At the Saturday afternoon concert, Koussevitzky will repeat the Ninth Symphony of Mahler which he introduced to this country last November, having then played this score in the evening series. The other numbers will be Ravel's Introduction and Allegro for Harp and Orchestra, the solo part to be taken by Bernard Zighera; also the Suite from Stravinsky's "Petrouchka," with Jesus Maria Sanroma as piano soloist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
JAN 7 - 1932

JUDGE F. P. CABOT OF BOSTON DEAD

Had Presided in Juvenile Court of the City for the Last Fifteen Years.

CHILD DELINQUENCY EXPERT

Won Nation-Wide Recognition in His Field—On Board of Harvard and Radcliffe College.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, Jan. 6.—Judge Frederick P. Cabot of the Boston Juvenile Court, a national authority on child delinquency, died tonight at Phillips House of the Massachusetts General Hospital, where he had undergone an operation. He was in his sixty-fourth year.

Born in Brookline, he was prepared in a private school in Boston for Harvard, graduating from the school in 1886 and the university in 1890. Three years later he took the degree of A. M. and simultaneously the degree of Bachelor of Laws. While a law student, he was editor of The Harvard Law Review. In 1893 he was admitted to practice in the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, and in February, 1896, in the United States Circuit Court and the Circuit Court of Appeals. During the latter year he was Assistant United States Attorney for Massachusetts, serving until 1897. For the next nineteen years he practiced law as a member of the firm of Hurlburt, Jones & Cabot. From 1916 to his death he was judge of the Juvenile Court, achieving distinction.

Judge Cabot was an overseer of Harvard College. In 1924 he was president of the governing board of Harvard Union. He was president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a member of the council of Radcliffe College and for eighteen years a member of various visiting committees of the Harvard overseers. He also was a trustee of the Wentworth Institute.

He was a member of the Bar Association of Boston. His club memberships included the Tavern, Union and Harvard of Boston and New York, and the Pokanoket of Dover, Mass.

At the White House Conference on Child Health and Protection held two years ago Judge Cabot was chairman of the committee on the socially handicapped and delinquent.

104

THIS CLIPPING FROM

HARTFORD, CONN.

COURANT

JAN 7 - 1932

Judge Frederick P. Cabot Dies.

Boston, Jan. 6. — (AP.) — Judge Frederick P. Cabot of the Boston Juvenile court, died suddenly tonight at the Phillips House where he underwent an operation a month ago. He was 63.

Judge Cabot was graduated from Harvard in 1890 and was admitted to the bar in 1893. He was an assistant United States attorney in Massachusetts from 1896 to 1897 when he became a member of the law firm of Hurlburt, Jones and Cabot.

He was president of the Judg Baker foundation, president of th trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, overseer of Harvard Colleg and a member of the council of Ra cliffe College.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

HOLYOKE, MASS.

Transcript Telegram

JAN 7 - 1932

FREDERICK P. CABOT, JUDGE OF BOSTON JUVENILE COURT, DIES

BOSTON, Jan. 7—Frederick Pickering Cabot, 63, judge of the Boston juvenile court and nationally famous expert on the handling of delinquent children, died at Massachusetts General Hospital last night after a month's illness.

A Harvard graduate, Judge Cabot practised law and served for two years as assistant U. S. district attorney here before being appointed in 1915 as judge of the juvenile court to succeed Judge Harvey Baker.

He was president of the Judge Baker Foundation, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, an overseer of Harvard College, and a director in several corporations.

Judge Cabot was unmarried. He leaves four sisters and two brothers.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.

GAZETTE

JAN 7 1932

Judge Cabot Dies Suddenly

BOSTON, Jan. 6 (AP).—Judge Frederick P. Cabot of the Boston Juvenile Court died Suddenly tonight at the Phillips House where he underwent an operation a month ago. He was 63.

He was president of the Judge Baker Foundation, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, overseer of Harvard College and a member of the council of Radcliffe College.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

ROCHESTER, N. Y.

Democrat Chronicle

JAN 8 1932

FREDERICK P. CABOT

Boston, Jan. 7—(AP)—Judge Frederick P. Cabot of the Boston Juvenile Court died suddenly last night at the Phillips House where he underwent an operation a month ago. He was 63. He was president of the Judge Baker Foundation, president of the Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, overseer of Harvard College and a member of the council of Radcliffe College.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

N. Y. JOURNAL

JAN 8 - 1932

BOSTON PLAYERS IN CONCERT HERE

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra gave their second Thursday subscription concert at Carnegie Hall last night. The novelty of the evening was a suite by Geza Frid, a young Hungarian still under 30. The work is in five movements, and while revealing unmistakable talent, is derivative in the type of its ideas and their expression.

Mr. Koussevitzky's more seasoned fare consisted of a suite by Corelli, Beethoven's Fourth Symphony and the similarly numbered symphony of Jan Sibelius. Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra gave a particularly striking performance of the Sibelius work.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BROOKYLN, N. Y.

EAGLE

JAN 8 1932

Music of the Day

By EDWARD CUSHING

The Boston Orchestra Plays a Sibelius Symphony — Lotta Lehmann's New York Debut

THE fact that Jan Sibelius has never been associated with what is known vaguely as the modern movement in music has often struck us as exceedingly odd. At this moment, having just heard a performance of the A-minor Symphony by Mr. Koussewitsky and his Bostonians, it strikes as more than odd—as being, in fact, downright unaccountable.

The mystery, of course, is not that Sibelius himself should have shunned active participation in some phase of the movement, but simply that passive participation should never have been forced upon him. His music tells us clearly enough that he is not the sort of man who would be likely to go in for campaigning on the side of any ism; a few notable exceptions only prove the rule that in the life of a bona-fide creative musician there is not much time for theory-mongering or log-rolling or any other of the diversions that so many of Sibelius' contemporaries find irresistibly fascinating.

On the other hand, there has been nothing to prevent any one from identifying Sibelius with this or that modern school, claiming him as a proselyte of this or that modernist dogma—or, for that matter, making him willy-nilly the head of a school of his own. But he has, miraculously, escaped this fate—miraculously because, when you come down to it, he is a modern among moderns, one of the most original as he is certainly one of the most gifted of contemporaries.

The symphony that Mr. Koussewitsky played at Carnegie Hall last night embodies, for example, many of the principles of modernism. The brevity of the work, its lack of conventional form, the concentration of the material, the directness of its presentation, together with the fragmentary character of the themes, the harshness of the harmonic idiom, the peculiar instrumental scheme—all of this should make for the symphony's popularity among the leaders and camp followers of the left, and that it has failed to do so admits, we think, of only one explanation.

A majority of Sibelius' contemporaries who might otherwise find themselves in sympathy with him are probably prejudiced by envy of a man who has achieved the thing that they have attempted and failed to do—a man who has written music which, by virtue of the simplicity, the directness with which it expresses a point of view at once individual and ponderable, is destined to long life. Isolated by the main musical currents of the day, ignored by his contemporaries, Sibelius still remains the only living creative musician of whom one dares risk saying, with conviction, that he is a genius.

Mr. Koussewitsky and the Boston orchestra gave a thoughtfully considered performance of the A-minor Symphony. The evening's other music consisted of a suite by Corelli, Beethoven's B-flat Symphony and a suite by Geza Frid, a young Hungarian of whom little is known to us. This latter work was a novelty, heard for the first time in New York. It is a good example of what cleverness can achieve where talent is absent—a brilliant,

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

N. Y. AMERICAN

JAN 8 1932

At Carnegie Hall last evening Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented a varied program to a large and appreciative audience. The novelty on the list was a suite in five movements by the Hungarian composer Geza Frid. The work had its first public performance in Paris less than two years ago and was introduced locally, last night.

Two symphonies were included in the Bostonian's program. They were Beethoven's fourth and the A minor by Sibelius. That portion heard by this writer was a reflection of the high standard of musicianship that has always been maintained by Mr. Koussevitzky and his men; the clear indication of the conductor's beat and the splendid response of the instrumentalists. The suite by Corelli was the opening number.

Two soloists will take part in the orchestra's concert in Carnegie Hall tomorrow afternoon. Bernard Zighera will play the solo harp in Ravel's Introduction and Allegro; and Jesus Maria Sanroma will play the piano part in the suite from Stravinsky's Petrouchka.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

N. Y. EVE. POST

JAN 8 - 1932

tions, played masterfully, as programs are played by this great orchestra, are seldom in a state of mind to be edified or to enjoy to the full. We are all too busy, and then at the end of a tiring day we enter a hall and sit, for two hours, in air which certainly does not tend to freshen the faculties.

There is an intermission, but that is misused. The members of the audience either stay in their places or repair to the corridors, almost as stuffy, or to a lounge cloudy with smoke. It would be a fine idea, except on rainy nights, if audiences were shooed out of the hall at this time, locked out and compelled to walk around the block. They would return with quickened minds and a new eagerness for the rest of the concert.

As to last night's concert, its vitality and interest were such that despite the conditions mentioned and despite a run of sluggish weather the audience gave every evidence of being moved and of willingness for the physical and mental ordeal which a really fine symphony concert always involves in its drain upon the energies of people who are sensitive and capable of being moved.

This concert opened with a slow, mellow air, an air which grew in the mind of an Italian gentleman by the name of Arcangelo Corelli, who played the violin for the Elector of Bavaria, lived in Heidelberg and Rome and was hurt to find that the public preferred an oboe virtuoso. Philip Hale says that he was "modest, amiable, simple in his life; almost shabbily dressed; always going on foot instead of taking a carriage." Somehow that scrap of information much increased our pleasure in his gentle, dignified suite, which was arranged by Ettore Pinelli. At the end there were many little exclamations of delight all over the house.

Beethoven followed. The playing was both firm and elastic. It was unified and also superb in detail. The grave fervors of the adagio waxed and waned with an exquisite feeling for values, and the tremulous agitation of the finale gave that impression of cosmic utterance ever associated with Beethoven.

Sibelius was next. His fourth symphony also opens with a suggestion of momentous matters, but is uncouth, barren, primitive, as compared with the civilized, although austerely powerful opening of Beethoven. We consider it a tremendous symphony, sometimes mournful, surly, sullen, grim, with the strings swept by a stern wind from the north.

The impression which this symphony has made on several reviewers for this newspaper incidentally affords an example of how taste and perception do change with the times.

According to Philip Hale, the critic of this newspaper in 1913 declared the symphony "as inconsequential as the ravings of a drunken man." Last spring, when Arturo Toscanini led the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra in a performance of it, Royal J. Davis said here: "The symphony was particularly pleasing and might profitably be more often performed. The composer knew what he was about. The piece is musical even when fantastic."

Last night's program closed with a suite by Geza Frid, a piece not heard here before. How different from the Corelli suite! Instead of conveying themes and clothing melody in soft tonal garments, it seeks brilliant and novel orchestral effects, and gets them. There is a bit of a grave chorale for horns, and the harp has some slithery notes. Entertaining and original in orchestration, we should say, and not important.

HENRY BECKETT.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

N. Y. SUN

JAN 8 - 1932

Boston Symphony Plays

By Oscar Thompson

the second mid-week concert of its New York series last evening at Carnegie Hall. The program was planned on a scale of broad dimensions and in content, generally solid. The works as listed were, by Corelli, suite arranged by Pinelli; Beethoven, his fourth symphony; by Jan Sibelius, his fourth symphony, in A minor; Geza Frid, a suite for orchestra. The last-named composition was a novelty in New York. The orchestra introduced it to America at a home concert on December 24 of this season.

The two symphonies stood forth, as presented under Mr. Koussevitzky's masterful baton, in the light of striking contrast. The fourth symphony of Sibelius is less frequently heard than are others among seven works by him in the same form. It was first produced in 1911 at Helsingfors and in New York by the Symphony Society on March 2, 1913, under Walter Damrosch. The year following, Dr. Muck and the Boston men played the work in New York, and early this season the orchestra revived it after a fourteen years' sleep in Boston.

Probably a Finnish memorial, which depicts in music, finely made, the contemplation of nature as observed by Sibelius when on his native soil, this symphony, on hearing, brings varying impressions of impressive grandeur, while not entirely free from moments of imaginative lapse. As intimated above, the Sibelius symphony was superbly set forth by the orchestra, as had been the beautiful classic score of the preceding Beethoven symphony.

The two suites, which opened and closed the program, were likewise foils to each other. The old Corelli music was full of charm and grace and served as a happy medium for the display of the orchestra's remark- choir of strings. The Frid Suite brought to light a Hungarian composer, born in 1904, and a pupil of Bartok and Kodaly. The suite was played under Monteux in Paris last season. The movements are an aria E allegro, passacaglia, scherzo, intermezzo and perpetuum mobile. The suite as a whole proved on hearing to be of varying importance. The scoring is by an able craftsman, especially in the first parts. There are suggestions of folk tunes and other melody, and creative power is not always wanting. The orchestra played the suite with great finesse, and imparted, where needed, a full measure of Hungarian dash and rhythmic fire.

S. A. D.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

N. Y. Herald-Tribune

AN 8 - 1932

Koussevitzky Conducts 2d Evening Concert Here

Presents Boston Symphony in Varied Carnegie Hall Program

Mr. Koussevitzky, usually a judicious and skillful program-maker, offered his Carnegie Hall audience at last night's Boston Symphony concert a singularly maladroit arrangement of music. The program was excessively long. Two hours after it began at ten minutes to nine, with a Suite by Corelli, it was still unfinished; and the novelty of the evening, a work of none too easily digestible character for the average listener, was its concluding number.

Beethoven once offered the excellent advice to concert givers that works making an unusual demand upon the attention of listeners should come in the earlier part of a concert, when the hearers were unfatigued. This advice Mr. Koussevitzky might advantageously have followed last night. Instead, he placed in the latter part of his program its two least accessible works—the new Suite by the young Hungarian modernist, Geza Frid, and the forbidding, dark-hued, enigmatical Fourth Symphony of Sibelius.

This symphony has been known in New York for nineteen years. Mr. Damrosch introduced it here in 1913 and Mr. Toscanini played it last season. It is a grim and acrid score, but a powerful one, curiously original. It was superbly played last night. Mr. Koussevitzky lavished infinite care upon it and the great orchestra lent it every eloquence.

The Suite of young Mr. Frid is a carefree and ingenious piece of writing, which might have been more attractive to the audience if it had been heard under different circumstances.

Mr. Koussevitzky devoted the first half of his program to the most easily assimilable music on his list—the charming old Suite by Corelli and Beethoven's inexhaustibly beautiful Fourth Symphony. Both were superlatively performed, to the manifest delight of the audience.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

N. Y. TIMES

JAN 8 - 1932

Boston Symphony Reappears.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, headed by its conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, began its second visit of the season to this city at Carnegie Hall last night, giving the second concert of the evening series. The program was characteristically provocative, including a suite by Corelli, Beethoven's and Sibelius's Fourth Symphonies, and a first performance here of a suite for orchestra by Geza Frid, young Hungarian composer.

The reasons that prompted Dr. Koussevitzky's juxtaposing these particular symphonies and suites on the same program were not made known. Aside from the obvious reason that he considered their value as music, he must have planned the contrasting, in the symphonies, of the work of two men of genius of different periods, different methods, and perhaps different visions.

Unquestionably in these symphonies the visions of Beethoven and Sibelius were not the same. Beethoven's symphony, coming after the "Eroica" and after the C minor had been started, is almost a return to the classicism of Haydn, with the reservation that Beethoven in many ways remains the audacious, path-breaking Beethoven. There are moving pages in the opening introduction and in the second movement that rise over the level of most of the work, which in its conception, in its rhythms, bears, of course, the stamp of the composer, but which has not the struggles, the passions, the intensities of the symphonies that carry the preceding and succeeding numbers. Dr. Koussevitzky led the orchestra in a finely shaded performance that etched clearly the elements that went into the work's making

The Sibelius symphony is essentially inward, the work of an introspective man whose environment is not divorced from his feeling and thinking. It is conceived with rigorous simplicity. In it are strange, original harmonies which remain always almost transparent. Beethoven in his other symphonies storms at fate and is unbowed. Sibelius, too, is unbowed, but he does not storm here; his struggle resolves itself into an inner tautness that becomes at times almost unendurable and finally ends in a gray, dull, unavailing rage.

The orchestra gave the work a brilliant performance. From the opening notes, Dr. Koussevitzky had complete command of the orchestra. There was just balance; the resources of the ensemble were conserved; the climaxes had inevitability; the reading was prevailingly tight and tense. There were suggestions of sweetness and Spring in the second movement, not oversweetened. The broad, expressive melody that is the crest of the third movement was sung with opulent tone. The closing was dull and gray as the composer's conception.

Dr. Koussevitzky, by his continued interest in Sibelius and by his frequent performances of his works, has distinguished himself as a friend of the Finnish composer. The conductor expects to perform in this country for the first time Sibelius's new symphony, the Eighth, late this season, it is understood.

The Corelli suite, graceful yet dignified, was a charming beginning of the evening's program. The Frid suite revealed a writer who knows the orchestra, as indeed he should, being a pupil of Bartok and Kodaly. The first movement was partly in rhythm dangerously close to jazz; the second was sometimes saccharine; later movements were longer than their ideas warranted. This, on the whole, was the chief trouble with the composition; there was more of it than was necessary for the themes, which were not of great significance.

The capacity audience gave Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra enthusiastic receptions after each work. If any measure is possible for the amount of applause, the Sibelius symphony received the least. But its closing pages do not move to high spirits.

H. T.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

REPUBLICAN

JAN 8 - 1932

JUDGE CABOT DIES AT BOSTON

Boston, Jan. 7—Judge Frederick P. Cabot, nationally known juvenile courtjurist, was dead today in his 64th year. He died at Massachusetts General hospital as a result of complications following an operation.

Judge Cabot was best known for his work among delinquent children and was invited in 1929 to serve as a member of President Hoover's committee on the White House conference on child welfare and protection. Judge Cabot was unmarried. He is survived by four sisters and two brothers.

Judge Cabot was an overseer of Harvard college and a member of the council of Radcliffe college, president of the governing board of the Harvard Union, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra, president of the Judge Baker foundation and connected with various other organizations.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

104

JAN 7 - 1932

Judge Frederick P. Cabot Dies.

Boston, Jan. 6. — (AP.) — Judge Frederick P. Cabot of the Boston Juvenile court, died suddenly tonight at the Phillips House where he underwent an operation a month ago. He was 63.

Judge Cabot was graduated from Harvard in 1890 and was admitted to the bar in 1893. He was an assistant United States attorney in Massachusetts from 1896 to 1897 when he became a member of the law firm of Hurlburt, Jones and Cabot.

He was president of the Judge Baker foundation, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, overseer of Harvard College and a member of the council of Radcliffe College.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
Transcript Telegram

JAN 7 - 1932

FREDERICK P. CABOT, JUDGE OF BOSTON JUVENILE COURT, DIES

BOSTON, Jan. 7—Frederick Pickering Cabot, 63, judge of the Boston juvenile court and nationally famous expert on the handling of delinquent children, died at Massachusetts General Hospital last night after a month's illness.

A Harvard graduate, Judge Cabot practised law and served for two years as assistant U. S. district attorney here before being appointed in 1915 as judge of the juvenile court to succeed Judge Harvey Baker.

He was president of the Judge Baker Foundation, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, an overseer of Harvard College, and a director in several corporations.

Judge Cabot was unmarried. He leaves four sisters and two brothers.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE

JAN 7 1932

Judge Cabot Dies Suddenly

BOSTON, Jan. 6 (AP).—Judge Frederick P. Cabot of the Boston Juvenile Court died Suddenly tonight at the Phillips House where he underwent an operation a month ago. He was 63.

He was president of the Judge Baker Foundation, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, overseer of Harvard College and a member of the council of Radcliffe College.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat Chronicle

JAN 8 1932

FREDERICK P. CABOT

Boston, Jan. 7—(AP)—Judge Frederick P. Cabot of the Boston Juvenile Court died suddenly last night at the Phillips House where he underwent an operation a month ago. He was 63. He was president of the Judge Baker Foundation, president of the Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, overseer of Harvard College and a member of the council of Radcliffe College.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. JOURNAL

JAN 8 - 1932

BOSTON PLAYERS IN CONCERT HERE

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra gave their second Thursday subscription concert at Carnegie Hall last night. The novelty of the evening was a suite by Geza Frid, a young Hungarian still under 30. The work is in five movements, and while revealing unmistakable talent, is derivative in the type of its ideas and their expression.

Mr. Koussevitzky's more seasoned fare consisted of a suite by Corelli, Beethoven's Fourth Symphony and the similarly numbered symphony of Jan Sibelius. Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra gave a particularly striking performance of the Sibelius work.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKYLN, N. Y.
EAGLE

JAN 8 1932

gers—American

By

Paris, Jan. 1—A gr named Rodier has publis magnificent story of weav
That Mrs. Gilbert Hi long resident in France, is real author, is a secret Polichinelle. It is a thril story; for the history of w ing and the history of Euro civilization are inextricably tangled.

The Bos

THE f kno us formance tonians, i accountab
The shunned

that passive participation should never have been forced upon him. His music tells us clearly enough that he is not the sort of man who would be likely to go in for campaigning on the side of any ism; a few notable exceptions only prove the rule that in the life of a bona-fide creative musician there is not much time for theory-mongering or log-rolling or any other of the diversions that so many of Sibelius' contemporaries find irresistibly fascinating.

On the other hand, there has been nothing to prevent any one from identifying Sibelius with this or that modern school, claiming him as a proselyte of this or that modernist dogma—or, for that matter, making him willy-nilly the head of a school of his own. But he has, miraculously, escaped this fate—miraculously because, when you come down to it, he is a modern among moderns, one of the most original as he is certainly one of the most gifted of contemporaries.

The symphony that Mr. Koussewitsky played at Carnegie Hall last night embodies, for example, many of the principles of modernism. The brevity of the work, its lack of conventional form, the concentration of the material, the directness of its presentation, together with the fragmentary character of the themes, the harshness of the harmonic idiom, the peculiar instrumental scheme—all of this should make for the symphony's popularity among the leaders and camp followers of the left, and that it has failed to do so admits, we think, of only one explanation.

A majority of Sibelius' contemporaries who might otherwise find themselves in sympathy with him are probably prejudiced by envy of a man who has achieved the thing that they have attempted and failed to do—a man who has written music which, by virtue of the simplicity, the directness with which it expresses a point of view at once individual and ponderable, is destined to long life. Isolated by the main musical currents of the day, ignored by his contemporaries, Sibelius still remains the only living creative musician of whom one dares risk saying, with conviction, that he is a genius.

Mr. Koussewitsky and the Boston orchestra gave a thoughtfully considered performance of the A-minor Symphony. The evening's other music consisted of a suite by Corelli. Beethoven's B-flat Symphony and a suite by Geza Frid, a young Hungarian of whom little is known to us. This latter work was a novelty, heard for the first time in New York. It is a good example of what cleverness can achieve where talent is absent—a brilliant, effective, inconsequential concert piece for orchestra.

---

was a suite in five movements by the Hungarian composer Geza Frid. The work had its first public performance in Paris less than two years ago and was introduced locally last night.

Two symphonies were included in the Bostonian's program. They were Beethoven's fourth and the A minor by Sibelius. That portion heard by this writer was a reflection of the high standard of musicianship that has always been maintained by Mr. Koussevitzky and his men; the clear indication of the conductor's beat and the splendid response of the instrumentalists. The suite by Corelli was the opening number.

Two soloists will take part in the orchestra's concert in Carnegie Hall tomorrow afternoon. Bernard Zighera will play the solo harp in Ravel's Introduction and Allegro; and Jesus Maria Sanroma will play the piano part in the suite from Stravinsky's Petrouchka.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST

JAN 8 - 1932

Other Music

Two Symphonies and Two Suites on Boston Program Under Koussevitzky

THE concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky last night began with a suite from the works of an Italian who died in 1713 and ended with another suite by a Hungarian still alive. In between were the fourth symphonies of Beethoven and Sibelius. A massive program, lasting until 11 o'clock and taxing for audience as well as orchestra.

It is unfortunate that audiences at concerts of such important compositions, played masterfully, as programs are played by this great orchestra, are seldom in a state of mind to be edified or to enjoy to the full. We are all too busy, and then at the end of a tiring day we enter a hall and sit, for two hours, in air which certainly does not tend to freshen the faculties.

There is an intermission, but that is misused. The members of the audience either stay in their places or repair to the corridors, almost as stuffy, or to a lounge cloudy with smoke. It would be a fine idea, except on rainy nights, if audiences were shooed out of the hall at this time, locked out and compelled to walk around the block. They would return with quickened minds and a new eagerness for the rest of the concert.

As to last night's concert, its vitality and interest were such that despite the conditions mentioned and despite a run of sluggish weather the audience gave every evidence of being moved and of willingness for the physical and mental ordeal which a really fine symphony concert always involves in its drain upon the energies of people who are sensitive and capable of being moved.

This concert opened with a slow, mellow air, an air which grew in the mind of an Italian gentleman by the name of Arcangelo Corelli, who played the violin for the Elector of Bavaria, lived in Heidelberg and Rome and was hurt to find that the public preferred an oboe virtuoso. Philip Hale says that he was "modest, amiable, simple in his life; almost shabbily dressed; always going on foot instead of taking a carriage." Somehow that scrap of information much increased our pleasure in his gentle, dignified suite, which was arranged by Ettore Pinelli. At the end there were many little exclamations of delight all over the house.

Beethoven followed. The playing was both firm and elastic. It was unified and also superb in detail. The grave fervors of the adagio waxed and waned with an exquisite feeling for values, and the tremulous agitation of the finale gave that impression of cosmic utterance ever associated with Beethoven.

Sibelius was next. His fourth symphony also opens with a suggestion of momentous matters, but is uncouth, barren, primitive, as compared with the civilized, although austerely powerful opening of Beethoven. We consider it a tremendous symphony, sometimes mournful, surly, sullen, grim, with the strings swept by a stern wind from the north.

The impression which this symphony has made on several reviewers for this newspaper incidentally affords an example of how taste and perception do change with the times.

According to Philip Hale, the critic of this newspaper in 1913 declared the symphony "as inconsequential as the ravings of a drunken man." Last spring, when Arturo Toscanini led the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra in a performance of it, Royal J. Davis said here: "The symphony was particularly pleasing and might profitably be more often performed. The composer knew what he was about. The piece is musical even when fantastic."

Last night's program closed with a suite by Geza Frid, a piece not heard here before. How different from the Corelli suite! Instead of conveying themes and clothing melody in soft tonal garments, it seeks brilliant and novel orchestral effects, and gets them. There is a bit of a grave chorale for horns, and the harp has some slithery notes. Entertaining and original in orchestration, we should say, and not important.

HENRY BECKETT.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. SUN

JAN 8 - 1932

Boston Symphony Plays

By Oscar Thompson

the second mid-week concert of its New York series last evening at Carnegie Hall. The program was planned on a scale of broad dimensions and in content, generally solid. The works as listed were, by Corelli, suite arranged by Pinelli; Beethoven, his fourth symphony; by Jan Sibelius, his fourth symphony, in A minor; Geza Frid, a suite for orchestra. The last-named composition was a novelty in New York. The orchestra introduced it to America at a home concert on December 24 of this season.

The two symphonies stood forth, as presented under Mr. Koussevitzky's masterful baton, in the light of striking contrast. The fourth symphony of Sibelius is less frequently heard than are others among seven works by him in the same form. It was first produced in 1911 at Helsingfors and in New York by the Symphony Society on March 2, 1913, under Walter Damrosch. The year following, Dr. Muck and the Boston men played the work in New York, and early this season the orchestra revived it after a fourteen years' sleep in Boston.

Probably a Finnish memorial, which depicts in music, finely made, the contemplation of nature as observed by Sibelius when on his native soil, this symphony, on hearing, brings varying impressions of impressive grandeur, while not entirely free from moments of imaginative lapse. As intimated above, the Sibelius symphony was superbly set forth by the orchestra, as had been the beautiful classic score of the preceding Beethoven symphony.

The two suites, which opened and closed the program, were likewise foils to each other. The old Corelli music was full of charm and grace and served as a happy medium for the display of the orchestra's remarkable choir of strings. The Frid Suite brought to light a Hungarian composer, born in 1904, and a pupil of Bartok and Kodaly. The suite was played under Monteux in Paris last season. The movements are an aria E allegro, passacaglia, scherzo, intermezzo and perpetuum mobile. The suite as a whole proved on hearing to be of varying importance. The scoring is by an able craftsman, especially in the first parts. There are suggestions of folk tunes and other melody, and creative power is not always wanting. The orchestra played the suite with great finesse, and imparted, where needed, a full measure of Hungarian dash and rhythmic fire. S. A. D.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald-Tribune

JAN 8 - 1932

Koussevitzky Conducts 2d Evening Concert Here

Presents Boston Symphony in Varied Carnegie Hall Program

Mr. Koussevitzky, usually a judicious and skillful program-maker, offered his Carnegie Hall audience at last night's Boston Symphony concert a singularly maladroit arrangement of music. The program was excessively long. Two hours after it began at ten minutes to nine, with a Suite by Corelli, it was still unfinished; and the novelty of the evening, a work of none too easily digestible character for the average listener, was its concluding number.

Beethoven once offered the excellent advice to concert givers that works making an unusual demand upon the attention of listeners should come in the earlier part of a concert, when the hearers were unfatigued. This advice Mr. Koussevitzky might advantageously have followed last night. Instead, he placed in the latter part of his program its two least accessible works—the new Suite by the young Hungarian modernist, Geza Frid, and the forbidding, dark-hued, enigmatical Fourth Symphony of Sibelius.

This symphony has been known in New York for nineteen years. Mr. Damrosch introduced it here in 1913 and Mr. Toscanini played it last season. It is a grim and acrid score, but a powerful one, curiously original. It was superbly played last night. Mr. Koussevitzky lavished infinite care upon it and the great orchestra lent it every eloquence.

The Suite of young Mr. Frid is a carefree and ingenious piece of writing, which might have been more attractive to the audience if it had been heard under different circumstances.

Mr. Koussevitzky devoted the first half of his program to the most easily assimilable music on his list—the charming old Suite by Corelli and Beethoven's inexhaustibly beautiful Fourth Symphony. Both were superlatively performed, to the manifest delight of the audience.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

JAN 8 - 1932

Boston Symphony Reappears.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, headed by its conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, began its second visit of the season to this city at Carnegie Hall last night, giving the second concert of the evening series. The program was characteristically provocative, including a suite by Corelli, Beethoven's and Sibelius's Fourth Symphonies, and a first performance here of a suite for orchestra by Geza Frid, young Hungarian composer.

The reasons that prompted Dr. Koussevitzky's juxtaposing these particular symphonies and suites on the same program were not made known. Aside from the obvious reason that he considered their value as music, he must have planned the contrasting, in the symphonies, of the work of two men of genius of different periods, different methods, and perhaps different visions.

Unquestionably in these symphonies the visions of Beethoven and Sibelius were not the same. Beethoven's symphony, coming after the "Eroica" and after the C minor had been started, is almost a return to the classicism of Haydn, with the reservation that Beethoven in many ways remains the audacious, path-breaking Beethoven. There are moving pages in the opening introduction and in the second movement that rise over the level of most of the work, which in its conception, in its rhythms, bears, of course, the stamp of the composer, but which has not the struggles, the passions, the intensities of the symphonies that carry the preceding and succeeding numbers. Dr. Koussevitzky led the orchestra in a finely shaded performance that etched clearly the elements that went into the work's making

The Sibelius symphony is essentially inward, the work of an introspective man whose environment is not divorced from his feeling and thinking. It is conceived with rigorous simplicity. In it are strange, original harmonies which remain always almost transparent. Beethoven in his other symphonies storms at fate and is unbowed. Sibelius, too, is unbowed, but he does not storm here; his struggle resolves itself into an inner tautness that becomes at times almost unendurable and finally ends in a gray, dull, unavailing rage.

The orchestra gave the work a brilliant performance. From the opening notes, Dr. Koussevitzky had complete command of the orchestra. There was just balance; the resources of the ensemble were conserved; the climaxes had inevitability; the reading was prevailingly tight and tense. There were suggestions of sweetness and Spring in the second movement, but not oversweetened. The broad, expressive melody that is the crest of the third movement was sung with opulent tone. The closing was dull and gray as the composer's conception.

Dr. Koussevitzky, by his continued interest in Sibelius and by his frequent performances of his works, has distinguished himself as a friend of the Finnish composer. The conductor expects to perform in this country for the first time Sibelius's new symphony, the Eighth, late this season, it is understood.

The Corelli suite, graceful yet dignified, was a charming beginning of the evening's program. The Frid suite revealed a writer who knows the orchestra, as indeed he should, being a pupil of Bartok and Kodaly. The first movement was partly in rhythm dangerously close to jazz; the second was sometimes saccharine; later movements were longer than their ideas warranted. This, on the whole, was the chief trouble with the composition; there was more of it than was necessary for the themes, which were not of great significance.

The capacity audience gave Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra enthusiastic receptions after each work. If any measure is possible for the amount of applause, the Sibelius symphony received the least. But its closing pages do not move to high spirits. H. T.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

JAN 8 - 1932

JUDGE CABOT DIES AT BOSTON

Boston, Jan. 7—Judge Frederick P. Cabot, nationally known juvenile courtjurist, was dead today in his 64th year. He died at Massachusetts General hospital as a result of complications following an operation.

Judge Cabot was best known for his work among delinquent children and was invited in 1929 to serve as a member of President Hoover's committee on the White House conference on child welfare and protection. Judge Cabot was unmarried. He is survived by four sisters and two brothers.

Judge Cabot was an overseer of Harvard college and a member of the council of Radcliffe college, president of the governing board of the Harvard Union, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra, president of the Judge Baker foundation and connected with various other organizations.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

104

JAN 7 - 1932

Judge Frederick P. Cabot Dies.

Boston, Jan. 6. — (AP.) — Judge Frederick P. Cabot of the Boston Juvenile court, died suddenly tonight at the Phillips House where he underwent an operation a month ago. He was 63.

Judge Cabot was graduated from Harvard in 1890 and was admitted to the bar in 1893. He was an assistant United States attorney in Massachusetts from 1896 to 1897 when he became a member of the law firm of Hurlburt, Jones and Cabot.

He was president of the Judg Baker foundation, president of th trustees of the Boston Symphony Or chestra, overseer of Harvard Colleg and a member of the council of Ra cliffe College.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
Transcript Telegram

JAN 7 - 1932

FREDERICK P. CABOT, JUDGE OF BOSTON JUVENILE COURT, DIES

BOSTON, Jan. 7—Frederick Pickering Cabot, 63, judge of the Boston juvenile court and nationally famous expert on the handling of delinquent children, died at Massachusetts General Hospital last night after a month's illness.

A Harvard graduate, Judge Cabot practised law and served for two years as assistant U. S. district attorney here before being appointed in 1915 as judge of the juvenile court to succeed Judge Harvey Baker.

He was president of the Judge Baker Foundation, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, an overseer of Harvard College, and a director in several corporations.

Judge Cabot was unmarried. He leaves four sisters and two brothers.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE

JAN 7 1932

Judge Cabot Dies Suddenly

BOSTON, Jan. 6 (AP).—Judge Frederick P. Cabot of the Boston Juvenile Court died Suddenly tonight at the Phillips House where he underwent an operation a month ago. He was 63.

He was president of the Judge Baker Foundation, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, overseer of Harvard College and a member of the council of Radcliffe College.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat Chronicle

JAN 8 1932

FREDERICK P. CABOT

Boston, Jan. 7—(AP)—Judge Frederick P. Cabot of the Boston Juvenile Court died suddenly last night at the Phillips House where he underwent an operation a month ago. He was 63. He was president of the Judge Baker Foundation, president of the Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, overseer of Harvard College and a member of the council of Radcliffe College.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. JOURNAL

JAN 8 - 1932

BOSTON PLAYERS IN CONCERT HERE

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra gave their second Thursday subscription concert at Carnegie Hall last night. The novelty of the evening was a suite by Geza Frid, a young Hungarian still under 30. The work is in five movements, and while revealing unmistakable talent, is derivative in the type of its ideas and their expression.

Mr. Koussevitzky's more seasoned fare consisted of a suite by Corelli, Beethoven's Fourth Symphony and the similarly numbered symphony of Jan Sibelius. Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra gave a particularly striking performance of the Sibelius work.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKYLN, N. Y.
EAGLE

N 8 1932

gers—American

o

By

Paris, Jan. 1—A gr named Rodier has publis magnificent story of weav

That Mrs. Gilbert Hi long resident in France, is real author, is a secret Polichinelle. It is a thril story; for the history of w ing and the history of Euro civilization are inextricably tangled.

The Bos

THE f kno us formance tonians, i accountab

The shunned that passive participation should never have been forced upon him. His music tells us clearly enough that he is not the sort of man who would be likely to go in for campaigning on the side of any ism; a few notable exceptions only prove the rule that in the life of a bonafide creative musician there is not much time for theory-mongering or log-rolling or any other of the diversions that so many of Sibelius' contemporaries find irresistibly fascinating.

On the other hand, there has been nothing to prevent any one from identifying Sibelius with this or that modern school, claiming him as a proselyte of this or that modernist dogma—or, for that matter, making him willy-nilly the head of a school of his own. But he has, miraculously, escaped this fate—miraculously because, when you come down to it, he is a modern among moderns, one of the most original as he is certainly one of the most gifted of contemporaries.

The symphony that Mr. Koussewitsky played at Carnegie Hall last night embodies, for example, many of the principles of modernism. The brevity of the work, its lack of conventional form, the concentration of the material, the directness of its presentation, together with the fragmentary character of the themes, the harshness of the harmonic idiom, the peculiar instrumental scheme—all of this should make for the symphony's popularity among the leaders and camp followers of the left, and that it has failed to do so admits, we think, of only one explanation.

A majority of Sibelius' contemporaries who might otherwise find themselves in sympathy with him are probably prejudiced by envy of a man who has achieved the thing that they have attempted and failed to do—a man who has written music which, by virtue of the simplicity, the directness with which it expresses a point of view at once individual and ponderable, is destined to long life. Isolated by the main musical currents of the day, ignored by his contemporaries, Sibelius still remains the only living creative musician of whom one dares risk saying, with conviction, that he is a genius.

Mr. Koussewitsky and the Boston orchestra gave a thoughtfully considered performance of the A-minor Symphony. The evening's other music consisted of a suite by Corelli, Beethoven's B-flat Symphony and a suite by Geza Frid, a young Hungarian of whom little is known to us. This latter work was a novelty, heard for the first time in New York. It is a good example of what cleverness can achieve where talent is absent—a brilliant, effective, inconsequential concert piece for orchestra.

---

was a suite in five movements by the Hungarian compose Geza Frid. The work had its first public performance in Paris less than two years ag and was introduced locally, las night.

Two symphonies were included in the Bostonian's pro gram. They were Beethoven' fourth and the A minor b Sibelius. That portion heard b this writer was a reflection o the high standard of musician ship that has always been main tained by Mr. Koussevitzky an his men; the clear indication o the conductor's beat and th splendid response of the instrumentalists. The suite by Corelli was the opening number.

Two soloists will take part in the orchestra's concert in Carnegie Hall tomorrow afternoon. Bernard Zighera will play the solo harp in Ravel's Introduction and Allegro; and Jesus Maria Sanroma will play the piano part in the suite from Stravinsky's Petrouchka.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST

o More,

JAN 8 - 1932

Two Symphonies and Two Suites on Boston Program Under Koussevitzky

THE concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky last night began with a suite from the works of an Italian who died in 1713 and ended with another suite by a Hungarian still alive. In between were the fourth symphonies of Beethoven and Sibelius. A massive program, lasting until 11 o'clock and taxing for audience as well as orchestra.

It is unfortunate that audiences at concerts of such important compositions, played masterfully, as programs are played by this great orchestra, are seldom in a state of mind to be edified or to enjoy to the full. We are all too busy, and then at the end of a tiring day we enter a hall and sit, for two hours, in air which certainly does not tend to freshen the faculties.

There is an intermission, but that is misused. The members of the audience either stay in their places or repair to the corridors, almost as stuffy, or to a lounge cloudy with smoke. It would be a fine idea, except on rainy nights, if audiences were shooed out of the hall at this time, locked out and compelled to walk around the block. They would return with quickened minds and a new eagerness for the rest of the concert.

As to last night's concert, its vitality and interest were such that despite the conditions mentioned and despite a run of sluggish weather the audience gave every evidence of being moved and of willingness for the physical and mental ordeal which a really fine symphony concert always involves in its drain upon the energies of people who are sensitive and capable of being moved.

This concert opened with a slow, mellow air, an air which grew in the mind of an Italian gentleman by the name of Arcangelo Corelli, who played the violin for the Elector of Bavaria, lived in Heidelberg and Rome and was hurt to find that the public preferred an oboe virtuoso. Philip Hale says that he was "modest, amiable, simple in his life; almost shabbily dressed; always going on foot instead of taking a carriage." Somehow that scrap of information much increased our pleasure in his gentle, dignified suite, which was arranged by Ettore Pinelli. At the end there were many little exclamations of delight all over the house.

Beethoven followed. The playing was both firm and elastic. It was unified and also superb in detail. The grave fervors of the adagio waxed and waned with an exquisite feeling for values, and the tremulous agitation of the finale gave that impression of cosmic utterance ever associated with Beethoven.

Sibelius was next. His fourth symphony also opens with a suggestion of momentous matters, but is uncouth, barren, primitive, as compared with the civilized, although austerely powerful opening of Beethoven. We consider it a tremendous symphony, sometimes mournful, surly, sullen, grim, with the strings swept by a stern wind from the north.

The impression which this symphony has made on several reviewers for this newspaper incidentally affords an example of how taste and perception do change with the times.

According to Philip Hale, the critic of this newspaper in 1913 declared the symphony "as inconsequential as the ravings of a drunken man." Last spring, when Arturo Toscanini led the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra in a performance of it, Royal J. Davis said here: "The symphony was particularly pleasing and might profitably be more often performed. The composer knew what he was about. The piece is musical even when fantastic."

Last night's program closed with a suite by Geza Frid, a piece not heard here before. How different from the Corelli suite! Instead of conveying themes and clothing melody in soft tonal garments, it seeks brilliant and novel orchestral effects, and gets them. There is a bit of a grave chorale for horns, and the harp has some slithery notes. Entertaining and original in orchestration, we should say, and not important.

HENRY BECKETT.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. SUN

JAN 8 - 1932

Boston Symphony Plays Novelty in Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave the second mid-week concert of its New York series last evening at Carnegie Hall. The program was planned on a scale of broad dimensions and in content, generally solid. The works as listed were, by Corelli, suite arranged by Pinelli; Beethoven, his fourth symphony; by Jan Sibelius, his fourth symphony, in A minor; Geza Frid, a suite for orchestra. The last-named composition was a novelty in New York. The orchestra introduced it to America at a home concert on December 24 of this season.

The two symphonies stood forth, as presented under Mr. Koussevitzky's masterful baton, in the light of striking contrast. The fourth symphony of Sibelius is less frequently heard than are others among seven works by him in the same form. It was first produced in 1911 at Helsingfors and in New York by the Symphony Society on March 2, 1913, under Walter Damrosch. The year following, Dr. Muck and the Boston men played the work in New York, and early this season the orchestra revived it after a fourteen years' sleep in Boston.

Probably a Finnish memorial, which depicts in music, finely made, the contemplation of nature as observed by Sibelius when on his native soil, this symphony, on hearing, brings varying impressions of impressive grandeur, while not entirely free from moments of imaginative lapse. As intimated above, the Sibelius symphony was superbly set forth by the orchestra, as had been the beautiful classic score of the preceding Beethoven symphony.

The two suites, which opened and closed the program, were likewise foils to each other. The old Corelli music was full of charm and grace and served as a happy medium for the display of the orchestra's remarkable choir of strings. The Frid Suite brought to light a Hungarian composer, born in 1904, and a pupil of Bartok and Kodaly. The suite was played under Monteux in Paris last season. The movements are an aria E allegro, passacaglia, scherzo, intermezzo and perpetuum mobile. The suite as a whole proved on hearing to be of varying importance. The scoring is by an able craftsman, especially in the first parts. There are suggestions of folk tunes and other melody, and creative power is not always wanting. The orchestra played the suite with great finesse, and imparted, where needed, a full measure of Hungarian dash and rhythmic fire.

S. A. D.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald-Tribune

AN 8 - 1932

Koussevitzky Conducts 2d Evening Concert Here

Presents Boston Symphony in Varied Carnegie Hall Program

Mr. Koussevitzky, usually a judicious and skillful program-maker, offered his Carnegie Hall audience at last night's Boston Symphony concert a singularly maladroit arrangement of music. The program was excessively long. Two hours after it began at ten minutes to nine, with a Suite by Corelli, it was still unfinished; and the novelty of the evening, a work of none too easily digestible character for the average listener, was its concluding number.

Beethoven once offered the excellent advice to concert givers that works making an unusual demand upon the attention of listeners should come in the earlier part of a concert, when the hearers were unfatigued. This advice Mr. Koussevitzky might advantageously have followed last night. Instead, he placed in the latter part of his program its two least accessible works—the new Suite by the young Hungarian modernist, Geza Frid, and the forbidding, dark-hued, enigmatical Fourth Symphony of Sibelius.

This symphony has been known in New York for nineteen years. Mr. Damrosch introduced it here in 1913 and Mr. Toscanini played it last season. It is a grim and acrid score, but a powerful one, curiously original. It was superbly played last night. Mr. Koussevitzky lavished infinite care upon it and the great orchestra lent it every eloquence.

The Suite of young Mr. Frid is a carefree and ingenious piece of writing, which might have been more attractive to the audience if it had been heard under different circumstances.

Mr. Koussevitzky devoted the first half of his program to the most easily assimilable music on his list—the charming old Suite by Corelli and Beethoven's inexhaustibly beautiful Fourth Symphony. Both were superlatively performed, to the manifest delight of the audience.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

JAN 8 - 1932

Boston Symphony Reappears.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, headed by its conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, began its second visit of the season to this city at Carnegie Hall last night, giving the second concert of the evening series. The program was characteristically provocative, including a suite by Corelli, Beethoven's and Sibelius's Fourth Symphonies, and a first performance here of a suite for orchestra by Geza Frid, young Hungarian composer.

The reasons that prompted Dr. Koussevitzky's juxtaposing these particular symphonies and suites on the same program were not made known. Aside from the obvious reason that he considered their value as music, he must have planned the contrasting, in the symphonies, of the work of two men of genius of different periods, different methods, and perhaps different visions.

Unquestionably in these symphonies the visions of Beethoven and Sibelius were not the same. Beethoven's symphony, coming after the "Eroica" and after the C minor had been started, is almost a return to the classicism of Haydn, with the reservation that Beethoven in many ways remains the audacious, pathbreaking Beethoven. There are moving pages in the opening introduction and in the second movement that rise over the level of most of the work, which in its conception, in its rhythms, bears, of course, the stamp of the composer, but which has not the struggles, the passions, the intensities of the symphonies that carry the preceding and succeeding numbers. Dr. Koussevitzky led the orchestra in a finely shaded performance that etched clearly the elements that went into the work's making.

The Sibelius symphony is essentially inward, the work of an introspective man whose environment is not divorced from his feeling and thinking. It is conceived with rigorous simplicity. In it are strange, original harmonies which remain always almost transparent. Beethoven in his other symphonies storms at fate and is unbowed. Sibelius, too, is unbowed, but he does not storm here; his struggle resolves itself into an inner tautness that becomes at times almost unendurable and finally ends in a gray, dull, unavailing rage.

The orchestra gave the work a brilliant performance. From the opening notes, Dr. Koussevitzky had complete command of the orchestra. There was just balance; the resources of the ensemble were conserved; the climaxes had inevitability; the reading was prevailingly tight and tense. There were suggestions of sweetness and Spring in the second movement, not oversweetened. The broad, expressive melody that is the crest of the third movement was sung with opulent tone. The closing was dull and gray as the composer's conception.

Dr. Koussevitzky, by his continued interest in Sibelius and by his frequent performances of his works, has distinguished himself as a friend of the Finnish composer. The conductor expects to perform in this country for the first time Sibelius's new symphony, the Eighth, late this season, it is understood.

The Corelli suite, graceful yet dignified, was a charming beginning of the evening's program. The Frid suite revealed a writer who knows the orchestra, as indeed he should, being a pupil of Bartok and Kodaly. The first movement was partly in rhythm dangerously close to jazz; the second was sometimes saccharine; later movements were longer than their ideas warranted. This, on the whole, was the chief trouble with the composition; there was more of it than was necessary for the themes, which were not of great significance.

The capacity audience gave Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra enthusiastic receptions after each work. If any measure is possible for the amount of applause, the Sibelius symphony received the least. But its closing pages do not move to high spirits.

H. T.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

JAN 8 - 1932

JUDGE CABOT DIES AT BOSTON

Boston, Jan. 7—Judge Frederick P. Cabot, nationally known juvenile courtjurist, was dead today in his 64th year. He died at Massachusetts General hospital as a result of complications following an operation.

Judge Cabot was best known for his work among delinquent children and was invited in 1929 to serve as a member of President Hoover's committee on the White House conference on child welfare and protection. Judge Cabot was unmarried. He is survived by four sisters and two brothers.

Judge Cabot was an overseer of Harvard college and a member of the council of Radcliffe college, president of the governing board of the Harvard Union, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra, president of the Judge Baker foundation and connected with various other organizations.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. World-Telegram
JAN 8 - 1932

NEW FRID SUITE MAKES DEBUT

Young Hungarian Composer's Work Included in Boston Symphony Concert Here.

The concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night was perilously long, and yet its program provided a balanced study in contrasts. Each half contained a suite and a symphony.

A sarabande, a gigue, and a badinerie by Arcangelo Corelli, as assembled and edited by Ettore Pinelli, made the suite of the first half. The symphony was Beethoven's fourth

The fourth symphony of Sibelius figured in the second half, plus a suite, heard for the first time in New York, by the young Hungarian composer, Geza Frid.

String Section Wins Praise.

The Corelli work, with which the concert opened, is scored only for strings, and great credit goes to that section of the Boston orchestra because of its smooth, euphonious playing of this ravishing music, which was introduced in this country by Bernardino Molinari and the St. Louis Symphony in 1927.

It would be hard to match the current of exquisite, purling tone pro-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN
JAN 9 1932

Boston Symphony Concert

duced by the body of muted strings in the delightful "Badinerie."

The blustering modern suite of Frid commands attention largely through its unconventionality. The scoring is deft and pictorially vivid. In the first section there is a reminiscence of Debussy's "Fetes." The passacaglia (second movement) is a whirlwind of lashing, oscillating tone.

At Best with Beethoven.

The performance of the Beethoven symphony was the prize of the evening. Mr. Koussevitzky read the work with a care and a sympathy that evoked all its poetry. In particular one must mention his surpassingly lovely and imaginative treatment of the adagio. The response of the audience was unanimous.

Less warm and cordial was that to the Sibelius symphony. Which bears witness to the fact that the public ear has not yet become fully accommodated to the sounds that Sibelius has used here to communicate the splendor of his panoramic vision.

Another Tribute to Sibelius.

Often his eloquence is abortive, abrupt, like the beetling edge of a jagged cliff. But over it all there is the mastery of a sensitive tone painter and a commanding individuality.

Mr. Koussevitzky will always be remembered as an indefatigable explorer of the vast, wild territory that is Sibelius' music. His searching and authoritative conducting of the fourth last evening was another striking tribute to the genius of the man who broods over Finland's runic days.

L. B.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAPH
JAN 9 - 1932

Boston Band Is Pleasing

Koussevitzky Returns in Usual Magnificent Mood With Grand Program.

by Walter D. Shackleton

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the gentle, and to this mind, the paramount director in America, both from a point of sincerity, honesty and avoidance of showmanship, as well as ability, again brought his magnificent and closely knit band from Boston to Carnegie Hall. It was the second visit in the two-concert series the Boston Symphony makes here. It is a distinct pleasure to know that the band will be back on three more occasions.

Dr. Koussevitzky gave us a well balanced program of Corelli, Beethoven, Sibelius and the modernist, Frid. Despite it being somewhat long, the program was far from being dull at any moment.

Corelli's tantalizing suite of Sarbande, Gigue and Badinere opened the program and was fittingly enlivening and stirring. It put the audience immediately into a good mood, a receptive mood. It showed to a fullness the stylist Corelli was.

Then followed Beethoven's beloved Fourth Symphony with its happiness in its quiet contentment, almost foreign to the beset and driven Beethoven. In comparison was Sibelius' Fourth Symphony with its nature tones, reminiscent of Wagner's depth and searching qualities. It has such a simplicity that it is apt to be misjudged as lacking a definite substance, an opinion far from correct.

Geza Frid's ghostly suite concluded the program. It is purely modern, in object, thought and color. Possibly somewhat shallow, but nevertheless, even as modern music seems to be inherently surface, like the present age, it has appeal. There is a desire to hear it more, a good study.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW YORK MIRROR
JAN 9 - 1932

Koussevitzky Again.

Chronological programs, such as that presented by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky at the second Thursday evening appearance in this city of the Boston Symphony, seem to be outmoded, judging from the general run of programs of other symphonic organizations. Last evening's program at Carnegie Hall, nevertheless, proved interesting from both the historic and the intrinsically musical standpoints. The first three numbers: A Suite by Corelli, Beethoven's Fourth Symphony and Sibelius' Symphony No. 4, were composed at interims of 105 years. The concluding number, a Suite for orchestra, by Geza Frid (first time in New York) brought the list up to date.

Notwithstanding Koussevitzky's felicitous excursions into musical realms of the 18th and early 19th century, the Russian maestro is at heart a spokesman of the modern era, and of the music which hails from the latter half of the 19th century (that period which, to Englishmen, is known as the Victorian age). Last evening, his reading of the Beethoven Symphony, though not wanting in ardor during certain passages of the second movement and throughout the last movement, suffered when placed beside his sublime rendition of the Sibelius opus, or that even more transcendent presentation of the Mahler Symphony, which, though offered weeks ago, still remains vivid in our memory.

Sibelius' Fourth Symphony, performed here last March by Toscanini, at a time when the Finnish composer seemed to be coming into his own in this country, loses nothing of its mystic appeal after repeated hearings. One often wonders why this composer is not heard here more frequently.—A. V. B.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. SUN
JAN 11 1932

Koussevitzky Offers Mahler

Includes Ninth Symphony in Boston Orchestra Concert Program at Carnegie Hall.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra worked hard for two hours Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall to concentrate the interest of a typical matinee audience. What is a typical matinee audience? That is not easy to tell, except that it always contains many elderly persons who wear an air of astonishment.

Somehow you fancy they all went to orchestral concerts in the palmy days of Theodore Thomas, when the program contained such dainty morsels as the slow movement from the fifth symphony and Johann Strauss's "Village Swallows" waltz. Saturday afternoon these typical survivors of the musical age of innocence were required to bend their minds to a mortal hour of Mahler.

Mr. Koussevitzy was not content with giving this prolonged panorama of tones one presentation. He must needs repeat it in order that people who do not sit up late of nights listening to symphonies might hear it in the afternoon and get to bed early. Those who shake the air with their complaints that Mahler and Bruckner do not get fair play, but are crowded off the stage to make room for such mere entertainers as Brahms and Richard Strauss, must have felt that for once a conductor was doing the square thing.

But why would it not be better, if Mahler's ninth symphony is to be given at two concerts, to give it in sections, two movements on Thursdays and the other two on Saturday? This proposition should be seriously considered. It has definable merits. Meanwhile, let it be recorded that the typical matinee audience of Saturday afternoon sat it out bravely and applauded with great resolution. We do not believe that any one really likes a symphony which lasts over an hour, but if any dare to say they do not, they are roundly rebuked by the Mahlerites and the Brucknerites, who are frevent worshipers of heavenly lengths.

After the ninth symphony the typical matinee audience heard Ravel's introduction and allegro for harp with string orchestra, flute and clarinet. Bernard Zighera played the harp and received much applause. The concluding number on the program was the suite from Stravinsky's "Petrouchka," which we still perversely suspect of being his masterpiece. What a pity this ballet does not linger in repertoire of the Metropolitan! But, alas, there is no one to dance it. There was a time—but what is the use of talking about that? The Boston musicians played the music very well indeed, as they naturally would, and the typical matinee audience—most of which probably never saw Karsavina or Nijinsky, Rosina Galli or Bolm—expressed its approval by the customary show of hands.

THIS CLIPPING FROM GREENFIELD, MASS.
RECORDER
JAN 8 1932

land was the most optimistic of all.

JUDGE CABOT DEAD

BOSTON, Jan. 8 (US)—Judge Frederick Cabot, nationally known juvenille court justice, was dead Thursday in his 64th year. He died at the Massachusetts General hospital after an operation. He was an overseer of Harvard college and a member of Radcliffe college, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra, president of the Judge Baker foundation and connected prominently with various other Massachusetts organizations.

LEGISLATION PIGEONHOLED

Treasurer of Winthrop Mills Co. and Fisher Mfg. Co. Dies at Age of 64

BOSTON BUREAU
DAILY NEWS RECORD

Boston, Jan. 8. — Judge Frederick Pickering Cabot, treasurer of the Winthrop Mills Co. and the Fisher Manufacturing Co., who died Wednesday evening here, will be buried this afternoon following funeral services at the King's Chapel at 2:30.

Judge Cabot, who was 64 years of age, died at the Phillip's House, Massachusetts General Hospital, after having been treated for about four weeks. Death was due to complications following an operation.

Although Judge Cabot was treasurer of the mills mentioned and was chairman of the board of F. H. Cabot & Co., selling agents for the Winthrop mill, his principal interests were in the field of child delinquency in which he was well known. He was a judge in the Boston Juvenile Court. In 1929 he was invited to serve on the President's committee in the White House conference on child welfare and was made chairman of one of its sub-committees for which $500,000 was made available for research.

Judge Cabot was unmarried. He was one of 11 children and is survived by two brothers Stephen P. Cabot and Francis H. Cabot, and four sisters, Miss Amy Cabot (with whom he lived), Mrs. James J. Putnam, Mrs. Arthur Lyman, and Mrs. John Richardson.

He was graduated from Harvard 1886 and was admitted to the Massachusetts Bar in 1893. He served as an assistant district attorney for one year and then practiced law with Hurburt, Jones & Cabot.

He was an overseer of Harvard college, member of the council of Radcliffe College, president of the governing board of the Harvard Union, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra, president of the Judge Baker Foundation, trustee of Wentworth Institute and Gov. Dummer Academy, a member of the Tavern, Union and Harvard clubs of Boston, Harvard Club of New York and the Pokanoket Club of Dover.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald-Tribune
JAN 10 1932

Mahler's Ninth Offered Again By Koussevitzky

Leads Boston Symphony in Magnificent Reading of Much-Discussed Work

By Jerome D. Bohm

At the second matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's yesterday in Carnegie Hall, Mr. Koussevitzky once more performed the ninth symphony of Gustav Mahler which he introduced to local audiences last November. The second part of the program was given over to the Introduction and Allegro for harp, with string, flute and clarinet accompaniment and the orchestral suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "Petrouchka."

Paul Bekker, who writes less sentimentally about Mahler than he does about Beethoven and Wagner, has said in his monumental analyses of Mahler's symphonic work that the unwritten title of the ninth symphony might well be. "What Death Has To Tell Me." In its four long movements, in three of which the conductor again made liberal excisions, Mahler has reenvisioned the "Inferno" and "Paradiso" of Dante. Perhaps in the ultimate adagio it is more Buddha's "Nirvana" than Dante's more concrete imagery that is invoked.

After the excoriating human anguish of the andante commodo, the macabre grotesqueries of the "Laendler" movement and the contemptuous ironisation of himself as well of artists in general, of the Rondo, Burlesque, the super-earthly renunciation and transfiguration of the adagio leave the hearer with the sensation of having shared for the time being the composer's titanic quest for the absolute.

There is less dross in this work than in many of Mahler's other symphonies. Theer are fewer of those disturbing juxtapositions of the eloquent with the banal. In the final adagio, he has cast aside all sentimentality and his inspiration remains elevated and profoundly moving. Too little has been written in appreciation of Mahler's superb instrumentation; of its eschewing of filling-in effects such as often clutter up the scores of Strauss and of his great skill in saying much with little means. Although he calls for a huge orchestra, he is sparing in its use. Polytonallity may be traced here to its original source and his poignant use of disonance is that of a master.

After the profound utterances of Mahler, Ravel's pretty work seemed doubly trivial. Even the witticisms and fantasy of "Petrouchka" sounded unimportant, though they stem from the same Stravinsky who still had an idea worth publishing in his head. Mr. Koussevitzky and his fine orchestra gave the symphony a tonally magnificent reading: one emotionally stirring and worthy of the composer's puissant conception. Bernard Zigheria performed the solo part in the Ravel work capably and Mr. Koussevitzky, as always, did justice to Stravinsky's clever score. The audience was warm in its expressions of approval through the afternoon.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
JAN 10 1932

Koussevitzky Repeats Mahler.

Gustav Mahler, a leader of New York's opera and Philharmonic concerts a quarter-century ago, held the lion's share of attention at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's matinée in Carnegie Hall yesterday. Though the start was delayed owing were many standing in a crowded house. To not a few this latest among Mahler's strange, fourth-dimensional musings on infinity has seemed to be, perhaps, the most fairly representative of a man whose passionate musical earnestness still casts shadows over some later meteoric luminaries.

The genial Laendler of the symphony's well-knit second part, the "Owlglass" humor of the Rondo, the deep singing strings of the finale, captured yesterday's hearers. More was the pity that the composer's quest of absolute beauty could not find rest in a full stop, and that a longer and inconclusive first movement strained attention to the breaking point.

A lonely greatness of thought the work had. And again a virtuoso orchestra's performance earned three recalls for the conductor, his hearty handshake with the first violin, and a rising ovation for all the band. First and last the triumph was Mahler's.

Mrs. Wilhelm Gericke, whose husband led the Boston orchestra through two administrations, now on a visit here from Vienna with her daughter, was guest in a box yesterday.

The matinée audience applauded Mr. Zighera in Ravel's harp music of exotic flavor and remained almost to 5 o'clock for Stravinsky's suite from the ballet. The men of Boston, after playing well over two hours, took their journey homeward for once by a late train. W. B. C.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES
JAN 9 - 1932

MUSIC

KOUSSEVITZKY RETURNS

Dr. Serge Koussevitzy brought his Boston Symphony Orchestra to the Academy of Music last night for his second concert of the season and delighted a crowded house with his interpretation of Beethoven's Symphony No. 4 and Rimsky-Korsakov's symphonic suite, 'Schererazade.

Koussevitzky brought to the "Fourth," the strong, yet tutored sweep, with which he always encompasses the classic works of Beethoven. In the second movement, the orchestra's playing, steady, deep and moving, left one grateful for the dignity of the Boston leader, which prevents him from playing the baton-waver's tricks with Beethoven's grandeur.

The second half of the program, showed the orchestra in another mood as it unfolded Rimsky's tale from The Thousand Nights and a Night. This narrative suite, a musical interpretation of Sinbad's adventures, brought the Boston conductor another well-deserved ovation from the audience. W.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN
JAN 9 1932

Boston Symphony Orchestra Heard Here in Second Concert

The second concert of a series of five by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, in the Brooklyn Academy of Music, was given last night. Adrian Van Sinderen was chairman of the committee of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, sponsor of the affair.

The program comprised Beethoven's Symphony 4 in B-flat major, Op. 60, and the Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade," Op. 35, of Rimsky-Korsakov. The next concert will be Thursday, Feb. 4.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NATION
JAN 1932

Books in Brief

Sergei Koussevitzky and His Epoch. By Arthur Lourié. Translated from the Russian by S. W. Pring. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.50.

If the padding were removed from this book, the residue would be an inadequate biographical sketch. The author presents his observations on the "epoch" and his opinions about various composers to the detriment of his subject. He justifies these divagations by pleading that there are no tragic shades in Koussevitzky's life. "Fate has always been kind to him; from the very beginning of his artistic career everything has gone smoothly and happily. . . . Confronted with this, one hardly knows which way to turn. One writes a biography and suddenly perceives that there is essentially no biography." On the contrary, the materials for an interesting "life" are ready to hand. The kindness of fate has smothered in many a man the possibilities of development. In Koussevitzky artistic sensitiveness, dynamic personality, and unflagging energy carried him from an obscure provincial town to the heights of his profession. Abundant drama lies in the story of the boy who arrived in Moscow penniless at the age of fourteen, mastered the most unwieldy of the fiddle family so rapidly that at eighteen he was first double-bass in the Imperial Theater orchestra, and at twenty-four won European recognition as one of the three greatest double-bass virtuosi of musical history. When he could have retired with fame and fortune, he made a fresh start as a conductor. Fate has indeed been kind to a man who has shown no fear of fate.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. World-Telegram
JAN 8 - 1932

NEW M

Young Work
Sym

The Symph
Hall la and ye anced contai
A sa nerie semble nell, half.
thoven
The figured suite,
New compo
S
The concer string sectio cause playin which try by
St. L
It w rent o

The First

By HARRY HA

IT seems quite natural th that deal with London ten in that swift, staccato with the whirr of taxicabs corner and the screech of Farringdon Road. But whe the countryside, amid the woods even the pursuit of crime de pastoral tempo. There is tim doors, to think it over.

Perhaps that is why Eden erate style goes so well with th
"A Clue from the Stars" (M tale is more like a novel than yarn. It deals with life in landed gentry and the tenantry have lived long on the land.
than hurried, nervous, city m

The mystery surrounds the Julian Marchant, a Devonshire living happily in his mansion w disappeared completely one eve across the fields of his estate pointment at a neighboring ma hounds put on the trail lost reached the middle of the field.
body was found, packed away-where—the mystery was all the

* * *

Draws Characters of De

HERE Mr. Philipotts had the orate the characters of the in studying two brothers he get

THIS CLIPPING FROM GREENFIELD, MASS.
RECORDER
JAN 8 1932

land was the most optimistic of all.

JUDGE CABOT DEAD

BOSTON, Jan. 8 (US)—Judge Frederick Cabot, nationally known juvenile court justice, was dead Thursday in his 64th year. He died at the Massachusetts General hospital after an operation. He was an overseer of Harvard college and a member of Radcliffe college, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra, president of the Judge Baker foundation and connected prominently with various other Massachusetts organizations.

LEGISLATION PIGEONHOLED

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BRROKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES
JAN 9 - 1932

MUSIC

KOUSSEVITZKY RETURNS

Dr. Serge Koussevitzy brought his Boston Symphony Orchestra to the Academy of Music last night for his second concert of the season and delighted a crowded house with his interpretation of Beethoven's Symphony No. 4 and Rimsky-Korsakov's symphonic suite, Schererazade.

Koussevitzky brought to the "Fourth," the strong, yet tutored sweep, with which he always encompasses the classic works of Beethoven. In the second movement, the orchestra's playing, steady, deep and moving, left one grateful for the dignity of the Boston leader, which prevents him from playing the baton-waver's tricks with Beethoven's grandeur.

The second half of the program, showed the orchestra in another mood as it unfolded Rimsky's tale from The Thousand Nights and a Night. This narrative suite, a musical interpretation of Sinbad's adventures, brought the Boston conductor another well-deserved ovation from the audience. W.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN
JAN 9 1932

Boston Symphony Concert Attracts Large Audience

The Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, Department of Music, last evening brought the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, to the Academy of Music for the second of a series of five concerts to be given there this season by that orchestra. The program included Beethoven's Symphony No. 4 in B-flat major, Op. 60, and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade" symphonic suite. The audience was both large and enthusiastic, recalling the conductor to the stage many times at the conclusion of each work.

Adrian Van Sinderen is at the head of a Citizens' Committee, organized to promote interest in the concert series by the Boston organization. Vice-chairmen of the committee include: Frank L. Babbott, Mrs. Edward C. Blum, Judge Frederick E. Crane, Walter H. Crittenden, Mrs. H. Edward Dreier, Mrs. William H. Good, Herbert F. Gunnison, Henry A. Ingraham, Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mrs. B. Herbert Smith, R. Huntington Woodman.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
NEWS RECORD
JAN 9 - 1932

RITES TODAY FOR JUDGE F. P. CABOT

Treasurer of Winthrop Mills Co. and Fisher Mfg. Co. Dies at Age of 64

BOSTON BUREAU
DAILY NEWS RECORD

Boston, Jan. 8. — Judge Frederick Pickering Cabot, treasurer of the Winthrop Mills Co. and the Fisher Manufacturing Co., who died Wednesday evening here, will be buried this afternoon following funeral services at the King's Chapel at 2:30.

Judge Cabot, who was 64 years of age, died at the Phillip's House, Massachusetts General Hospital, after having been treated for about four weeks. Death was due to complications following an operation.

Although Judge Cabot was treasurer of the mills mentioned and was chairman of the board of F. H. Cabot & Co., selling agents for the Winthrop mill, his principal interests were in the field of child delinquency in which he was well known. He was a judge in the Boston Juvenile Court. In 1929 he was invited to serve on the President's committee in the White House conference on child welfare and was made chairman of one of its sub-committees for which $500,000 was made available for research.

Judge Cabot was unmarried. He was one of 11 children and is survived by two brothers Stephen P. Cabot and Francis H. Cabot, and four sisters, Miss Amy Cabot (with whom he lived). Mrs. James J. Putnam, Mrs. Arthur Lyman, and Mrs. John Richardson.

He was graduated from Harvard 1886 and was admitted to the Massachusetts Bar in 1893. He served as an assistant district attorney for one year and then practiced law with Hurburt, Jones & Cabot.

He was an overseer of Harvard college, member of the council of Radcliffe College, president of the governing board of the Harvard Union, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra, president of the Judge Baker Foundation, trustee of Wentworth Institute and Gov. Dummer Academy, a member of the Tavern, Union and Harvard clubs of Boston, Harvard Club of New York and the Pokanoket Club of Dover.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN
JAN 9 1932

Boston Symphony Orchestra Heard Here in Second Concert

The second concert of a series of five by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, in the Brooklyn Academy of Music, was given last night. Adrian Van Sinderen was chairman of the committee of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, sponsor of the affair.

The program comprised Beethoven's Symphony 4 in B-flat major, Op. 60, and the Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade," Op. 35, of Rimsky-Korsakov. The next concert will be Thursday, Feb. 4.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAPH
JAN 9 - 1932

Boston Band Is Pleasing

Koussevitzky Returns in Usual Magnificent Mood With Grand Program.

by Walter D. Shackleton

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the gentle, and to this mind, the paramount director in America, both from a point of sincerity, honesty and avoidance of showmanship, as well as ability, again brought his magnificent and closely knit band from Boston to Carnegie Hall. It was the second visit in the two-concert series the Boston Symphony makes here. It is a distinct pleasure to know that the band will be back on three more occasions.

Dr. Koussevitzky gave us a well balanced program of Corelli, Beethoven, Sibelius and the modernist, Frid. Despite it being somewhat long, the program was far from being dull at any moment.

Corelli's tantalizing suite of Sarbande, Gigue and Badinere opened the program and was fittingly enlivening and stirring. It put the audience immediately into a good mood, a receptive mood. It showed to a fullness the stylist Corelli was.

Then followed Beethoven's beloved Fourth Symphony with its happiness in its quiet contentment, almost foreign to the beset and driven Beethoven. In comparison was Sibelius' Fourth Symphony with its nature tones, reminiscent of Wagner's depth and searching qualities. It has such a simplicity that it is apt to be misjudged as lacking a definite substance, an opinion far from correct.

Geza Frid's ghostly suite concluded the program. It is purely modern, in object, thought and color. Possibly somewhat shallow, but nevertheless, even as modern music seems to be inherently surface, like the present age, it has appeal. There is a desire to hear it more, a good study.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald-Tribune
JAN 1 0 1932

Herald; Artur Bodanzk
The last act of the o cast over WEAF, and, a Taylor introduced the lined the action from was the Metropolitan's cast; an act of each S noon performance is to the radio during the rest season.

'Mignon' Opera

Raises $7,000 for Fund for Bab

Thomas's "Mignon" was p the third time this season the Metropolitan Opera H annual benefit for the Free for Babies, Inc. With a cast box-office appeal, includin
Bori in the title role, Li Philine, Beniamino Gigli a and Leon Rothier as Lothar

Ma
O

Lea
M

A
the ter vit sym introduced to vember. The second part of gram was given over to the Introduction and Allegro for harp, with string, flute and clarinet accompaniment and the orchestral suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "Petrouchka."

Paul Bekker, who writes less sentimentally about Mahler than he does about Beethoven and Wagner, has said in his monumental analyses of Mahler's symphonic work that the unwritten title of the ninth symphony might well be. "What Death Has To Tell Me." In its four long movements, in three of which the conductor again made liberal excisions, Mahler has re-envisioned the "Inferno" and "Paradiso" of Dante. Perhaps in the ultimate adagio it is more Buddha's "Nirvana" than Dante's more concrete imagery that is invoked.

After the excoriating human anguish of the andante commodo, the macabre grotesqueries of the "Laendler" movement and the contemptuous ironisation of himself as well of artists in general, of the Rondo, Burlesque, the super-earthly renunciation and transfiguration of the adagio leave the hearer with the sensation of having shared for the time being the composer's titanic quest for the absolute.

There is less dross in this work than in many of Mahler's other symphonies. Theer are fewer of those disturbing juxtapositions of the eloquent with the banal. In the final adagio, he has cast aside all sentimentality and his inspiration remains elevated and profoundly moving. Too little has been written in appreciation of Mahler's superb instrumentation; of its eschew-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK MIRROR
JAN 9 - 1932

Koussevitzky Again.

Chronological programs, such as that presented by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky at the second Thursday evening appearance in this city of the Boston Symphony, seem to be outmoded, judging from the general run of programs of other symphonic organizations. Last evening's program at Carnegie Hall, nevertheless, proved interesting from both the historic and the intrinsically musical standpoints. The first three numbers: A Suite by Corelli, Beethoven's Fourth Symphony and Sibelius' Symphony No. 4, were composed at interims of 105 years. The concluding number, a Suite for orchestra, by Geza Frid (first time in New York) brought the list up to date.

Notwithstanding Koussevitzky's felicitous excursions into musical realms of the 18th and early 19th century, the Russian maestro is at heart a spokesman of the modern era, and of the music which hails from the latter half of the 19th century (that period which, to Englishmen, is known as the Victorian age). Last evening, his reading of the Beethoven Symphony, though not wanting in ardor during certain passages of the second movement and throughout the last movement, suffered when placed beside his sublime rendition of the Sibelius opus, or that even more transcendent presentation of the Mahler Symphony, which, though offered weeks ago, still remains vivid in our memory.

Sibelius' Fourth Symphony, performed here last March by Toscanini, at a time when the Finnish composer seemed to be coming into his own in this country, loses nothing of its mystic appeal after repeated hearings. One often wonders why this composer is not heard here more frequently.—A. V. B.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
JAN 1 0 1932

Koussevitzky Repeats Mahler.

Gustav Mahler, a leader of New York's opera and Philharmonic concerts a quarter-century ago, held the lion's share of attention at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's matinée in Carnegie Hall yesterday. Though the start was delayed owing to weather, half a hundred late subscribers heard the first half-hour movement of Mahler's Ninth Symphony over the radio reproducer in the hall's new and spacious lounge.

Coupled in a lighter musical aftermath were Ravel's graceful Introduction and Allegro for harp and orchestra, with Bernard Zighera as soloist, and Stravinsky's popular "Petrouchka," with J. M. Sanroma at the piano. In the last, Conductor Koussevitsky, who had well served Stravinsky as advocate in Paris, fairly stole a march on the Metropolitan's coming revival of a favorite Russian ballet.

Mahler's Ninth had been first heard here in Koussevitsky's evening concert on Nov. 19 last. Musicians welcomed a second hearing made possible by the matinée, and there were many standing in a crowded house. To not a few this latest among Mahler's strange, fourth-dimensional musings on infinity has seemed to be, perhaps, the most fairly representative of a man whose passionate musical earnestness still casts shadows over some later meteoric luminaries.

The genial Laendler of the symphony's well-knit second part, the "Owlglass" humor of the Rondo, the deep singing strings of the finale, captured yesterday's hearers. More was the pity that the composer's quest of absolute beauty could not find rest in a full stop, and that a longer and inconclusive first movement strained attention to the breaking point.

A lonely greatness of thought the work had. And again a virtuoso orchestra's performance earned three recalls for the conductor, his hearty handshake with the first violin, and a rising ovation for all the band. First and last the triumph was Mahler's.

Mrs. Wilhelm Gericke, whose husband led the Boston orchestra through two administrations, now on a visit here from Vienna with her daughter, was guest in a box yesterday.

The matinée audience applauded Mr. Zighera in Ravel's harp music of exotic flavor and remained almost to 5 o'clock for Stravinsky's suite from the ballet. The men of Boston, after playing well over two hours, took their journey homeward for once by a late train. W. B. C.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. SUN
JAN 1 1 1932 105

Koussevitzky Offers Mahler

Includes Ninth Symphony in Boston Orchestra Concert Program at Carnegie Hall.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra worked hard for two hours Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall to concentrate the interest of a typical matinee audience. What is a typical matinee audience? That is not easy to tell, except that it always contains many elderly persons who wear an air of astonishment.

Somehow you fancy they all went to orchestral concerts in the palmy days of Theodore Thomas, when the program contained such dainty morsels as the slow movement from the fifth symphony and Johann Strauss's "Village Swallows" waltz. Saturday afternoon these typical survivors of the musical age of innocence were required to bend their minds to a mortal hour of Mahler.

Mr. Koussevitzy was not content with giving this prolonged panorama of tones one presentation. He must needs repeat it in order that people who do not sit up late of nights listening to symphonies might hear it in the afternoon and get to bed early. Those who shake the air with their complaints that Mahler and Bruckner do not get fair play, but are crowded off the stage to make room for such mere entertainers as Brahms and Richard Strauss, must have felt that for once a conductor was doing the square thing.

But why would it not be better, if Mahler's ninth symphony is to be given at two concerts, to give it in sections, two movements on Thursdays and the other two on Saturday? This proposition should be seriously considered. It has definable merits. Meanwhile, let it be recorded that the typical matinee audience of Saturday afternoon sat it out bravely and applauded with great resolution. We do not believe that any one really likes a symphony which lasts over an hour, but if any dare to say they do not, they are roundly rebuked by the Mahlerites and the Brucknerites, who are frevent worshipers of heavenly lengths.

After the ninth symphony the typical matinee audience heard Ravel's introduction and allegro for harp with string orchestra, flute and clarinet. Bernard Zighera played the harp and received much applause. The concluding number on the program was the suite from Stravinsky's "Petrouchka," which we still perversely suspect of being his masterpiece. What a pity this ballet does not linger in repertoire of the Metropolitan! But, alas, there is no one to dance it. There was a time—but what is the use of talking about that? The Boston musicians played the music very well indeed, as they naturally would, and the typical matinee audience—most of which probably never saw Karsavina or Nijinsky, Rosina Galli or Bolm—expressed its approval by the customary show of hands.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NATION
JAN 1 3 1932

Books in Brief

Sergei Koussevitzky and His Epoch. By Arthur Lourié. Translated from the Russian by S. W. Pring. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.50.

If the padding were removed from this book, the residue would be an inadequate biographical sketch. The author presents his observations on the "epoch" and his opinions about various composers to the detriment of his subject. He justifies these divagations by pleading that there are no tragic shades in Koussevitzky's life. "Fate has always been kind to him; from the very beginning of his artistic career everything has gone smoothly and happily. . . . Confronted with this, one hardly knows which way to turn. One writes a biography and suddenly perceives that there is essentially no biography." On the contrary, the materials for an interesting "life" are ready to hand. The kindness of fate has smothered in many a man the possibilities of development. In Koussevitzky artistic sensitiveness, dynamic personality, and unflagging energy carried him from an obscure provincial town to the heights of his profession. Abundant drama lies in the story of the boy who arrived in Moscow penniless at the age of fourteen, mastered the most unwieldy of the fiddle family so rapidly that at eighteen he was first double-bass in the Imperial Theater orchestra, and at twenty-four won European recognition as one of the three greatest double-bass virtuosi of musical history. When he could have retired with fame and fortune, he made a fresh start as a conductor. Fate has indeed been kind to a man who has shown no fear of fate.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION
JAN 14 1932

Boston Symphony Gets $20,000 from Cabot Estate

BOSTON, Jan. 14—(AP) Bequests of $20,000 each to the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Judge Baker Foundation for Boys, were contained in the will of Judge Frederick P. Cabot of the Juvenile Court of Boston filed for probate today. The value of the estate was not given.

After several private bequests, the residue is to be held in trust for a sister and after her death is to be divided between the orchestra, the foundation and Radcliffe College.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE ATTLEBORO, MASS.
SUN
JAN 14 1932

PUBLIC BEQUESTS IN CABOT WILL

Boston, Jan. 14—(AP)—Bequests of $20,000 each to the Boston Symphony orchestra and the Judge Baker Foundation for boys were contained in the will of Judge Frederick P. Cabot of the juvenile court of Boston filed for probate today. The value of the estate was not given.

After several private bequests, the residue is to be held in trust for a sister and after her death is to be divided between the orchestra, the Foundation and Radcliffe college.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ATTLEBORO, MASS.
SUN
JAN 14 1932

PUBLIC BEQUESTS IN CABOT WILL

Boston, Jan. 14—(AP)—Bequests of $20,000 each to the Boston Symphony orchestra and the Judge Baker Foundation for boys were contained in the will of Judge Frederick P. Cabot of the juvenile court of Boston filed for probate today. The value of the estate was not given.

After several private bequests, the residue is to be held in trust for a sister and after her death is to be divided between the orchestra, the Foundation and Radcliffe college.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
UNION
JAN 15 1932

Boston Symphony Gets $20,000 from Cabot Estate

BOSTON, Jan. 14—(AP) Bequests of $20,000 each to the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Judge Baker Foundation for Boys, were contained in the will of Judge Frederick P. Cabot of the Juvenile Court of Boston filed for probate today. The value of the estate was not given.

After several private bequests, the residue is to be held in trust for a sister and after her death is to be divided between the orchestra, the foundation and Radcliffe College.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MONTPELIER, VT.
EVE. ARGUS
JAN 15 1932

LARGE BEQUEST MADE

Boston, Jan. 15, (AP)—Bequests of $20,000 each to the Boston symphony orchestra and the Judge Baker foundation for boys were contained in the will of Judge Frederick P. Cabot of the juvenile court of Boston filed for probate. The value of the estate was not given.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWPORT, R. I.
NEWS
JAN 15 1932

SEVERAL PUBLIC BEQUESTS.

Cabot Leaves $20,000 to Boston Symphony, Judge Baker Foundation

BOSTON, Jan. 15 (AP)—Bequests of $20,000 each to the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Judge Baker Foundation for Boys were contained in the will of Judge Frederick P. Cabot of the juvenile court of Boston, filed for probate. The value of the estate was not given. After several private bequests, the residue is to be held in trust for a sister and after her death is to be divided between the orchestra, the Foundation and Radcliffe College.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
JAN 16 1932

completes the programme.

Boston Symphony

Next Tuesday evening in the Albee Theatre, Providence, Gustav Holst will make his first appearance in Providence as the notable guest conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. The famous Englishman arrived in America last week and will make his first public appearance as conductor in this country next Tuesday. He will also conduct the concerts in Boston on the following Friday and Saturday.

His programme for Providence will include the Symphony in E-flat by Haydn, the third of the Saloman series. The rest of the programme will consist of music of his own composition: "St. Paul's Suite" for string orchestra; "Somerset Rhapsody," based on English folk tunes; Ballet from the opera, "The Perfect Fool;" the prelude and scherzo, "Hammersmith," inspired by a historic section of London, which is to have its first American performance on this occasion and a Fugue a la Gigue, by Bach, which Holst has arranged for orchestra.

Gustav Holst is considered one of the foremost of living British composers. Born in 1874, he derives his name from a remote Swedish ancestry, but his forebears are preponderantly English. Early in his career, he attained fame as a pianist, as an organist, and as a trombone player, but at length devoted most of his energies to conducting, particularly choral music. Holst has composed a large number of works in almost every musical form, of which his orchestral "Planets" and his choral "Ode to Death," have been performed by the Boston Symphony orchestra. He visited America in 1923. He is to be connected with the music division at Harvard University during its second semester.

Broadway Theatre

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
JAN 16 1932

HOLST WILL CONDUCT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Next Tuesday evening in the Albee Theatre, Gustav Holst will make his first appearance in Providence as the notable guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The famous Englishman arrived in America this week and will make his first public appearance as conductor in this country next Tuesday. He will also conduct the concerts in Boston on the following Friday and Saturday.

His program for Providence will include The Symphony in E-flat by Haydn, the third of the Saloman series. The rest of the program will consist of music of his own composition: "St. Paul Suite" for String Orchestra; "Somers Rhapsody," based on English folk tune Ballet from the opera, "The Perfe Fool;" the Prelude and Scherzo "Hammersmith," inspired by a historic sectio of London, which is to have its fir American performance on this occasio and a Fugue a la Gigue by Bach whi Holst has arranged for orchestra.

Gustav Holst is considered one of t foremost of living British compose Born in 1874, he derives his name fro a remote Swedish ancestry, but his for bears are preponderantly English. Ear in his career, he attained fame as pianist, as an organist, and as a tron bone player, but at length devoted mo of his energies to conducting, partic larly choral music. Holst has compos a large number of works in almost ever musical form, of which his orchestra "Planets" and his choral "Ode to Death have been performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He visited America i 1923. He is to be connected with th Music Division at Harvard Universit during its second semester.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HANOVER, PA.
SUN
JAN 16 1932

* * *

The Boston Symphony Orchestra honored the memory of the late Frederick P. Cabot, President of the Board of Trustees, by a free concert in Symphony Hall last Tuesday afternoon. The orchestra and the choir of the Bach Cantata Club were heard in four numbers from Mozart's Requiem; the orchestra alone in Chaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND, ORE.
OREGONIAN

Myra Hess, Pianist, Found Pleasing Artist.

New York Audience Acclaims Woman Who Is to Appear Here.

BY DOROTHY DUNIWAY RYAN.

NEW YORK, Jan. 16.-(Special.)-Myra Hess, pianist, who makes her Portland debut this season under the management of Steers & Coman, delighted an audience which crowded Town hall January 9 to hear her first New York recital of the season. Miss Hess was enthusiastically received. Her recital had been eagerly awaited, and she fulfilled all expectations in a program which showed the full range of her power and musicianship.

In a rather unusual program arrangement, Miss Hess confined her selections to two Beethoven sonatas and the Fantasie Stucke and the symphonic studies of Schumann. She demonstrated, however, that a pianist of her interpretive gifts can find plenty of inspiration and material in these two composers to present a program of variety and brilliance.

Tributes to Miss Hess' musicianship were paid by the city's leading music critics following the recital. Olin Downes, in a long review in the New York Times, said: "To her exceptional gifts she adds the constant growth of a real artist—one never satisfied with a given level of achievement, however high. At no time did the mere rewards of a virtuoso tempt her."

"The Lone Prairie," by Arthur Shepherd, American composer born in Paris, Idaho, was given for the first time in Europe early this month by the Orchestra Symphonique de Paris. The work, which was cordially received, was repeated January 13 by the Berlin Philharmonic. Both presentations were conducted by Fabien Sevitsky, well-known young Russian director of the Philadlphia Chamber String sinfonietta and nephew of Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

"The Lone Prairie" is the second of four western pieces for orchestra, called "Horizons," written in 1927 by Mr. Shepherd, who is assistant conductor of the Cleveland orchestra. The piece begins with the cowboy song, "The Dying Cowboy," its uncouth mournfulness expressed by the tenor saxophone. Arthur Loesser writes: "After the beginning of the movement, the composer goes into a kind of free fantasy, derivative of fragments of the tune. Other material is added, ascending and descending chromatics in the woodwinds suggest the shriek of the wind and the howl of the coyotes—the saxophone again bleats the tune in its original form, closing the movement."

At the Paris and Berlin concerts Mr. Sevitsky also introduced another American work, new to Europe, "Money Musk," by Leo Sowerby of Grand Rapids, Mich., who won the American academy's prix de Rome for foreign study in 1921.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE NEWPORT, R. I.
NEWS
JAN 15 1932

SEVERAL PUBLIC BEQUESTS.

Cabot Leaves $20,000 to Boston Symphony, Judge Baker Foundation

BOSTON, Jan. 15 (AP)—Bequests of $20,000 each to the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Judge Baker Foundation for Boys were contained in the will of Judge Frederick P. Cabot of the juvenile court of Boston, filed for probate. The value of the estate was not given. After several private bequests, the residue is to be held in trust for a sister and after her death is to be divided between the orchestra, the Foundation and Radcliffe College.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
JAN 17 1932

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
JAN 17 1932

Boston Symphony to Present Third Concert Here Tuesday

Gustav Holst, Noted English Composer, to Appear as Guest Conductor.—Rata Present to Be Heard in Lecture-Recital Wednesday

Boston Symphony subscribers will see a noted figure in the musical world Tuesday night when Gustav Holst appears as guest conductor in place of Serge Koussevitzky at the concert in the Albee Theatre.

Arriving from England last week, Mr. Holst is to make his first public appearance as conductor in this country at Tuesday's concert. Then and there the audience will not only see a foremost composer of the day but will listen to a program which, with the exception of Haydn's Symphony in E-flat, the third of the Saloman series, consists entirely of his works.

One of them is to have its first performance in this country, a Prelude and Scherzo, "Hammersmith," which takes its title and inspiration from an historic section of London. Others will be "St. Paul's Suite," for string orchestra; "Somerset Rhapsody," based on English folk tunes; Ballet from the opera, "The Perfect Fool," an an orchestral arrangement of a Fugue a la Gigue, by Bach.

Mr. Holst visited America in 1923 and has had his orchestral "Planets" and his choral "Ode to Death" performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He is to lead the orchestra again at the coming Friday and Saturday concerts in Boston. During Harvard's second semester he will be connected with the music division. As guest conductor in Providence with the Symphony he has been preceded in recent years by the Britishers, Goossens and Beecham, and by the Spanish conductor, Arbos, who have taken charge of the orchestra during Dr. Koussevitzky's mid-season vacation.

Instead of lecturing on the program numbers, which the lateness of the announcement has given him insufficient time to prepare, Dr. W. Louis Chapman announces that he will speak on the orchestra and the functions of its instruments at his customary lecture in the Providence Public Library this afternoon. This will be the third in the series arranged by the Monday Morning Musical Club and is free to the public. It will begin at 4 o'clock.

Programs for the week follow:

TOMORROW.

MacDowell Club, home of Mrs. Percy R. Patterson, 160 Columbia avenue, Edgewood, 8 o'clock, Mrs. William S. Ide in charge.

Violin:
Mazurka .... Volpe
"Ave Maria" .... Schubert
"Humoresque" .... Tschaikowski-Kreisler
Miss Bertha L. Bixby.
Miss Lydia Bell, accompanist.

Soprano:
"The Violet" .... Mozart
"Die Forelle" .... Schubert
"Come Into the Spring Night" .... Vanderstucken
Amalia Strobl Hill.
Mrs. Raymond W. Perry, accompanist.

Piano:
"May Night" .... Palmgren
Rhapsody in G-minor .... Brahms
Miss Annie Reinstra.

Instrumental ensemble, directed by Miss Mildred L. Copeland.
Trio in G-major .... Haydn
Andante-Poco adagio, cantabile
Rondo all'Ongarese
"Chanson Triste" .... Tschaikowski
"Danish Folk Dance" .... Sandby
Miss Mildred L. Copeland, violinist.
Miss Gladys H. Mulcahey, 'cellist.
Mrs. Louise Farnum Durfee, pianist.

TUESDAY

Boston Spmphony Orchestra, Gustav Holst, conductor, E. F. Albee Theatre, 8:15 o'clock.

Symphony in E-flat major .... Haydn
- I. Adagio; Allegro con spirito
- II. Andante
- III. Menuetto; Trio
- IV. Allegro con spirito

"St. Paul's Sutie," for string orchestra .... Holst
"Somerset Rhapsody" .... Holst
Ballet from the opera, "The Perfect Fool" .... Holst
- I. Invocation
- II. Dance of the Spirits of Earth
- III. Dance of the Spirits of Water
- IV. Dance of the Spirits of Fire

Prelude and Scherzo, "Hammersmith" .. Holst
(First performance in America)
Fugue a la Gigue .... Bach
(arranged for orchestra by Holst)

WEDNESDAY

Rata Present, lecture piano rectial, auspices Rhode Islnd Federation of Music Clubs, Memorial Hall, 8:15 o'clock.

I. "Variations Serieuses"...—Mendelssohn
"Invitation a la Valse"...Weber-Tausig
II. Three Preludes .... Chopin
M-minor
D-major
E-major.
Barcarolle.
III. Prelude, Chorale and Fugue. Cesar Franck

THURSDAY.

Chaminade Club, Chopin program, Froebel Hall, 11 o'clock.

Trio, opus 8, First Movement, Allegro.
Dorothy Joslin Pearce, piano;
Benjamin Premack, violin;
Barbara Smith, 'cello.

Soprano:
a. "Madchen Wunsch"
b. "Mir aus den Blicken"
c. "Miene Frenden"
Sarah Henley Ide.
Grace S. Regester, accompanist.

Violin:
a. Prelude, opus 28, No. 13
b. Mazurka in A-minor
Grace Pierpont Hey.
Ruth Tripp, accompanist.

Piano:
a. Valse
b. Ballade in D-minor
Fannie Levis Friedlanden.

Gustav Holst, who will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert in the Albee Theatre Tuesday night, is an Englishman of Swedish descent on the paternal side. The name was originally Von Holst, but in that form it had a suspiciously Teutonic sound and, in the early years of the World War, Holst dropped the von lest he be suspected of having German blood. The place of his birth was Cheltenham, and the year 1874.

In company with many other prominent English composers—for he is better known as composer than as conductor—Holst was a pupil of Sir Charles Villiers Stanford at the Royal College of Music, where he, himself, is now professor of composition. As a boy he aspired to be a pianist, but a tendency to neuritis made such a career impossible. So he mastered the trombone, and thus he was given opportunity to learn the orchestra from the inside, an experience invaluable to him both as composer and as conductor. As occasional choral conductor, too, Holst has acquired a command of choral composition, and he handles both media, the orchestra and the chorus, with brilliant mastery.

In Boston Gustav Holst is known by his large-scaled astrological suite for orchestra, "The Planets," by his earlier Oriental suite, "Beni Mora," by his "Hymn of Jesus" for chorus and orchestra, by his singularly impressive setting for male chorus and wind and percussion instruments of Walt Whitman's "Dirge for Two Veterans," by certain of his choral Hymns from the "Rig Veda," and by a few songs.

Among the other works of Holst which have brought him renown at home may be mentioned a choral symphony and a satirical opera, "The Perfect Fool." A recent piece enthusiastically acclaimed at its London premiere is "Hammersmith," an orchestral description of a London crowd making holiday on the Thames. Details of Mr. Holst's programs for Providence and for Boston are not yet at hand, but it is probable that "Hammersmith" will be included for one or the other, or perhaps for both cities.

Holst has once before visited America, in 1923. His present trip is in response to an invitation to teach composition at Harvard University for the remainder of the present academic year, an invitation made possible by the request of Mrs. Horatio Lamb.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
JAN 18 1932

CARROLL CENTENARY DELAY

Chief Event Postponed to May 4 at Request of Original Alice.

Many symphony orchestras will join Columbia University in celebrating the centenary of Lewis Carroll's birth, it was announced yesterday by Professor J. Enrique Zanetti, chairman of the centenary committee.

The chief celebration, which was to have been held here on Jan. 27, Carroll's birthday, has been postponed to May 4, so that Mrs. Reginald Hargreaves, the original Alice, may be present at the opening ceremonies. Mrs. Hargreaves, who is 80 years old, requested the postponement, to be spared the hardships of a transatlantic trip in January.

The orchestras will play at their regular concerts during the week of Jan. 27 or early in February compositions based on Carroll's immortal books. The Boston, Chicago and Cincinnati Symphony Orchestras, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Dr. Frederick A. Stock and Dr. Eugene Goossens, respectively, will play the Deems Taylor suite, "Through the Looking-Glass," at their regular concert

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE RECORD
Norwichtown
JAN 14 1932

BEQUEST OF $20,000 TO BOSTON SYMPHONY

BOSTON, Jan. 14—(AP)—Bequests of $20,000 each to the Boston Symphony orchestra and the Judge Baker Foundation for Boys were contained in the will of Judge Frederick P. Cabot of the juvenile court of Boston, filed for probate today. The value of the estate was not given.

After several private bequests, the residue is to be held in trust for a sister and after her death is to be divided between the orchestra, the foundation and Radcliffe college.

106

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION
JAN 14 1932

Boston Symphony Gets $20,000 from Cabot Estate

BOSTON, Jan. 14—(AP) Bequests of $20,000 each to the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Judge Baker Foundation for Boys, were contained in the will of Judge Frederick P. Cabot of the Juvenile Court of Boston filed for probate today. The value of the estate was not given.

After several private bequests, the residue is to be held in trust for a sister and after her death is to be divided between the orchestra, the foundation and Radcliffe College.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE ATTLEBORO, MASS.
SUN
JAN 14 1932

PUBLIC BEQUESTS IN CABOT WILL

Boston, Jan. 14—(AP)—Bequests of $20,000 each to the Boston Symphony orchestra and the Judge Baker Foundation for boys were contained in the will of Judge Frederick P. Cabot of the juvenile court of Boston filed for probate today. The value of the estate was not given.

After several private bequests, the residue is to be held in trust for a sister and after her death is to be divided between the orchestra, the Foundation and Radcliffe college.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ATTLEBORO, MASS.
SUN
JAN 14 1932

PUBLIC BEQUESTS IN CABOT WILL

Boston, Jan. 14—(AP)—Bequests of $20,000 each to the Boston Symphony orchestra and the Judge Baker Foundation for boys were contained in the will of Judge Frederick P. Cabot of the juvenile court of Boston filed for probate today. The value of the estate was not given.

After several private bequests, the residue is to be held in trust for a sister and after her death is to be divided between the orchestra, the Foundation and Radcliffe college.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
UNION
JAN 15 1932

Boston Symphony Gets $20,000 from Cabot Estate

BOSTON, Jan. 14—(AP) Bequests of $20,000 each to the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Judge Baker Foundation for Boys, were contained in the will of Judge Frederick P. Cabot of the Juvenile Court of Boston filed for probate today. The value of the estate was not given.

After several private bequests, the residue is to be held in trust for a sister and after her death is to be divided between the orchestra, the foundation and Radcliffe College

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM MONTPELIER, VT.
EVE. ARGUS
JAN 15 1932

LARGE BEQUEST MADE

Boston, Jan. 15, (AP)—Bequests of $20,000 each to the Boston symphony orchestra and the Judge Baker foundation for boys were contained in the will of Judge Frederick P. Cabot of the juvenile court of Boston filed for probate. The value of the estate was not given.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWPORT, R. I.
NEWS
JAN 15 1932

SEVERAL PUBLIC BEQUESTS.

Cabot Leaves $20,000 to Boston Symphony, Judge Baker Foundation

BOSTON, Jan. 15 (AP)—Bequests of $20,000 each to the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Judge Baker Foundation for Boys were contained in the will of Judge Frederick P. Cabot of the juvenile court of Boston, filed for probate. The value of the estate was not given. After several private bequests, the residue is to be held in trust for a sister and after her death is to be divided between the orchestra, the Foundation and Radcliffe College.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
JAN 16 1932

completes the programme.

Boston Symphony

Next Tuesday evening in the Albee Theatre, Providence, Gustav Holst will make his first appearance in Providence as the notable guest conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. The famous Englishman arrived in America last week and will make his first public appearance as conductor in this country next Tuesday. He will also conduct the concerts in Boston on the following Friday and Saturday.

His programme for Providence will include the Symphony in E-flat by Haydn, the third of the Saloman series. The rest of the programme will consist of music of his own composition; "St. Paul's Suite" for string orchestra; "Somerset Rhapsody," based on English folk tunes; Ballet from the opera, "The Perfect Fool;" the prelude and scherzo, "Hammersmith," inspired by a historic section of London, which is to have its first American performance on this occasion and a Fugue a la Gigue, by Bach, which Holst has arranged for orchestra.

Gustav Holst is considered one of the foremost of living British composers. Born in 1874, he derives his name from a remote Swedish ancestry, but his forebears are preponderantly English. Early in his career, he attained fame as a pianist, as an organist, and as a trombone player, but at length devoted most of his energies to conducting, particularly choral music. Holst has composed a large number of works in almost every musical form, of which his orchestral "Planets" and his choral "Ode to Death," have been performed by the Boston Symphony orchestra. He visited America in 1923. He is to be connected with the music division at Harvard University during its second semester.

Broadway Theatre

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
JAN 16 1932

HOLST WILL CONDUCT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Next Tuesday evening in the Albee Theatre, Gustav Holst will make his first appearance in Providence as the notable guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The famous Englishman arrived in America this week and will make his first public appearance as conductor in this country next Tuesday. He will also conduct the concerts in Boston on the following Friday and Saturday.

His program for Providence will include The Symphony in E-flat by Haydn, the third of the Saloman series. The rest of the program will consist of music of his own composition: "St. Paul's Suite" for String Orchestra; "Somerset Rhapsody," based on English folk tunes; Ballet from the opera, "The Perfect Fool;" the Prelude and Scherzo "Hammersmith," inspired by a historic section of London, which is to have its first American performance on this occasion; and a Fugue a la Gigue by Bach which Holst has arranged for orchestra.

Gustav Holst is considered one of the foremost of living British composers. Born in 1874, he derives his name from a remote Swedish ancestry, but his forebears are preponderantly English. Early in his career, he attained fame as a pianist, as an organist, and as a trombone player, but at length devoted most of his energies to conducting, particularly choral music. Holst has composed a large number of works in almost every musical form, of which his orchestral "Planets" and his choral "Ode to Death" have been performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He visited America in 1923. He is to be connected with the Music Division at Harvard University during its second semester.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HANOVER, PA.
SUN
JAN 16 1932

* * * *

The Boston Symphony Orchestra honored the memory of the lat Frederick P. Cabot, President Board of Trustees, by a fre cert in Symphony Hall last day afternoon. The orchestr the choir of the Bach Cantat were heard in four numbers Mozart's Requiem; the orc alone in Chaikovsky's "Pa Symphony. Dr. Koussevitzky ducted.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND, ORE.
OREGONIAN

Myra Hess, Pianist, Found Pleasing Artist.

New York Audience Acclaims Woman Who Is to Appear Here.

BY DOROTHY DUNIWAY RYAN.

NEW YORK, Jan. 16.—(Special.)—Myra Hess, pianist, who makes her Portland debut this season under the management of Steers & Coman, delighted an audience which crowded Town hall January 9 to hear her first New York recital of the season. Miss Hess was enthusiastically received. Her recital had been eagerly awaited, and she fulfilled all expectations in a program which showed the full range of her power and musicianship.

In a rather unusual program arrangement, Miss Hess confined her selections to two Beethoven sonatas and the Fantasie Stucke and the symphonic studies of Schumann. She demonstrated, however, that a pianist of her interpretive gifts can find plenty of inspiration and material in these two composers to present a program of variety and brilliance.

Tributes to Miss Hess' musicianship were paid by the city's leading music critics following the recital. Olin Downes, in a long review in the New York Times, said: "To her exceptional gifts she adds the constant growth of a real artist—one never satisfied with a given level of achievement, however high. At no time did the mere rewards of a virtuoso tempt her."

"The Lone Prairie," by Arthur Shepherd, American composer born in Paris, Idaho, was given for the first time in Europe early this month by the Orchestra Symphonique de Paris. The work, which was cordially received, was repeated January 13 by the Berlin Philharmonic. Both presentations were conducted by Fabien Sevitsky, well-known young Russian director of the Philadlphia Chamber String sinfonietta and nephew of Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

"The Lone Prairie" is the second of four western pieces for orchestra, called "Horizons," written in 1927 by Mr. Shepherd, who is assistant conductor of the Cleveland orchestra. The piece begins with the cowboy song, "The Dying Cowboy," its uncouth mournfulness expressed by the tenor saxophone. Arthur Loesser writes: "After the beginning of the movement, the composer goes into a kind of free fantasy, derivative of fragments of the tune. Other material is added, ascending and descending chromatics in the woodwinds suggest the shriek of the wind and the howl of the coyotes—the saxophone again bleats the tune in its original form, closing the movement."

At the Paris and Berlin concerts Mr. Sevitsky also introduced another American work, new to Europe, "Money Musk," by Leo Sowerby of Grand Rapids, Mich., who won the American academy's prix de Rome for foreign study in 1921.

---

death orches cliffe Co

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
JAN 17 1932

Boston Symphony subscribers will see a noted figure in the musical world Tuesday night when Gustav Holst appears as guest conductor in place of Serge Koussevitzky at the concert in the Albee Theatre.

Arriving from England last week, Mr. Holst is to make his first public appearance as conductor in this country at Tuesday's concert. Then and there the audience will not only see a foremost composer of the day but will listen to a program which, with the exception of Haydn's Symphony in E-flat, the third of the Saloman series, consists entirely of his works.

One of them is to have its first performance in this country, a Prelude and Scherzo, "Hammersmith," which takes its title and inspiration from an historic section of London. Others will be "St. Paul's Suite," for string orchestra; "Somerset Rhapsody," based on English folk tunes; Ballet from the opera, "The Perfect Fool," an an orchestral arrangement of a Fugue a la Gigue, by Bach.

Mr. Holst visited America in 1923 and has had his orchestral "Planets" and his choral "Ode to Death" performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He is to lead the orchestra again at the coming Friday and Saturday concerts in Boston. During Harvard's second semester he will be connected with the music division. As guest conductor in Providence with the Symphony he has been preceded in recent years by the Britishers, Goossens and Beecham, and by the Spanish conductor, Arbos, who have taken charge of the orchestra during Dr. Koussevitzky's mid-season vacation.

Instead of lecturing on the program numbers, which the lateness of the announcement has given him insufficient time to prepare, Dr. W. Louis Chapman announces that he will speak on the orchestra and the functions of its instruments at his customary lecture in the Providence Public Library this afternoon. This will be the third in the series arranged by the Monday Morning Musical Club and is free to the public. It will begin at 4 o'clock.

Programs for the week follow:

TOMORROW.

MacDowell Club, home of Mrs. Percy R. Patterson, 160 Columbia avenue, Edgewood, 8 o'clock, Mrs. William S. Ide in charge.

Violin:
Mazurka .... Volpe
"Ave Maria" .... Schubert
"Humoresque" ...... Tschaikowski-Kreisler
Miss Bertha L. Bixby.
Miss Lydia Bell, accompanist.

Soprano:
"The Violet" .... Mozart
"Die Forelle" .... Schubert
"Come Into the Spring Night" .... Vanderstucken
Amalia Strobl Hill.
Mrs. Raymond W. Perry, accompanist.

Piano:
"May Night" .... Palmgren
Rhapsody in G-minor .... Brahms
Miss Annie Reinstra.

Instrumental ensemble, directed by Miss Mildred L. Copeland.
Trio in G-major .... Haydn
Andante-Poco adagio, cantabile
Rondo all'Ongarese
"Chanson Triste" .... Tschaikowski
"Danish Folk Dance" .... Sandby
Miss Mildred L. Copeland, violinist.
Miss Gladys H. Mulcahey, 'cellist.
Mrs. Louise Farnum Durfee, pianist.

TUESDAY

Boston Spmphony Orchestra, Gustav Holst, conductor, E. F. Albee Theatre, 8:15 o'clock.

Symphony in E-flat major .... Haydn
- I. Adagio: Allegro con spirito
- II. Andante
- III. Menuetto: Trio
- IV. Allegro con spirito

"St. Paul's Sutie," for string orchestra .... Holst
"Somerset Rhapsody" .... Holst
Ballet from the opera, "The Perfect Fool" .... Holst
- I. Invocation
- II. Dance of the Spirits of Earth
- III. Dance of the Spirits of Water
- IV. Dance of the Spirits of Fire

Prelude and Scherzo, "Hammersmith" .. Holst
(First performance in America)
Fugue a la Gigue .... Bach
(arranged for orchestra by Holst)

WEDNESDAY

Rata Present, lecture piano rectial, auspices Rhode Islnd Federation of Music Clubs, Memorial Hall, 8:15 o'clock.

I. "Variations Serieuses"...—Mendelssohn
"Invitation a la Valse"...Weber-Tausig
II. Three Preludes .... Chopin
M-minor
D-major
E-major.
Barcarolle.
III. Prelude, Chorale and Fugue. Cesar Franck

THURSDAY.

Chaminade Club, Chopin program, Froebel Hall, 11 o'clock.

Trio, opus 8, First Movement, Allegro,
Dorothy Joslin Pearce, piano;
Benjamin Premack, violin;
Barbara Smith, 'cello.

Soprano:
a. "Madchen Wunsch"
b. "Mir aus den Blicken"
c. "Miene Frenden"
Sarah Henley Ide,
Grace S. Regester, accompanist.

elude ,opus 28, No. 13
rka in A-minor
Grace Pierpont Hey,
Tripp, accompanist.

inor Friedlanden.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
JAN 17 1932

Holst Best Known for Compositions

Symphony Leader Began Professional Career as Trombonist

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Gustav Holst, who will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert in the Albee Theatre Tuesday night, is an Englishman of Swedish descent on the paternal side. The name was originally Von Holst, but in that form it had a suspiciously Teutonic sound and, in the early years of the World War, Holst dropped the von lest he be suspected of having German blood. The place of his birth was Cheltenham, and the year 1874.

In company with many other prominent English composers—for he is better known as composer than as conductor—Holst was a pupil of Sir Charles Villiers Stanford at the Royal College of Music, where he, himself, is now professor of composition. As a boy he aspired to be a pianist, but a tendency to neuritis made such a career impossible. So he mastered the trombone, and thus he was given opportunity to learn the orchestra from the inside, an experience invaluable to him both as composer and as conductor. As occasional choral conductor, too, Holst has acquired a command of choral composition, and he handles both media, the orchestra and the chorus, with brilliant mastery.

In Boston Gustav Holst is known by his large-scaled astrological suite for orchestra, "The Planets," by his earlier Oriental suite, "Beni Mora," by his "Hymn of Jesus" for chorus and orchestra, by his singularly impressive setting for male chorus and wind and percussion instruments of Walt Whitman's "Dirge for Two Veterans," by certain of his choral Hymns from the "Rig Veda," and by a few songs.

Among the other works of Holst which have brought him renown at home may be mentioned a choral symphony and a satirical opera, "The Perfect Fool." A recent piece enthusiastically acclaimed at its London premiere is "Hammersmith," an orchestral description of a London crowd making holiday on the Thames. Details of Mr. Holst's programs for Providence and for Boston are not yet at hand, but it is probable that "Hammersmith" will be included for one or the other, or perhaps for both cities.

Holst has once before visited America, in 1923. His present trip is in response to an invitation to teach composition at Harvard University for the remainder of the present academic year, an invitation made possible by the request of Mrs. Horatio Lamb.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
JAN 18 1932

CARROLL CENTENARY DELAY

Chief Event Postponed to May 4 at Request of Original Alice.

Many symphony orchestras will join Columbia University in celebrating the centenary of Lewis Carroll's birth, it was announced yesterday by Professor J. Enrique Zanetti, chairman of the centenary committee.

The chief celebration, which was to have been held here on Jan. 27, Carroll's birthday, has been postponed to May 4, so that Mrs. Reginald Hargreaves, the original Alice, may be present at the opening ceremonies. Mrs. Hargreaves, who is 80 years old, requested the postponement, to be spared the hardships of a transatlantic trip in January.

The orchestras will play at their regular concerts during the week of Jan. 27 or early in February compositions based on Carroll's immortal books. The Boston, Chicago and Cincinnati Symphony Orchestras, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Dr. Frederick A. Stock and Dr. Eugene Goossens, respectively, will play the Deems Taylor suite, "Through the Looking-Glass," at their regular concerts on Jan. 28 and 29.

The Detroit Symphony will play the Stillman-Kelly suite, "Alice in Wonderland," under the direction of Victor Kolar, associate director, who is conducting in the absence of Dr. Ossip Gabrilowitsch. The Manhattan Symphony, which could not alter its program in time, will play the Deems Taylor suite under the direction of Mr. Taylor himself early in February.

After several private bequests, the residue is to be held in trust for a sister and after her death is to be divided between the orchestra, the foundation and Radcliffe college.

IN TERMS OF MUSIC, Comment in Season

Gershwin
—2d Rhapsody

Gu… Conducting
…eted in
…tre.

…t Mozart, Bach …or that does not …ss they contain …rit. The life of …some works that …nd we are pleased …these.

…r from across the …literary prepara- …horough, thus as- …um for the pres- …s. These are un- …ied and of a high …terial is often rich …nd his harmony is …rnism that is so …may be said to be

…mmonplace about … This, too, has per- …lity and if it is …e it recalls Edward …ative of the keyed …suggestion of musi- …phone now coming …stral music, of the …the bass clarinet …nforcement of the …these facilities he …er the older com- …ited as to orches- …quently one notes …are suggestive of …member these are …in music that are …exposition and …s borrowed of the …is no reason for …of the musical …to distinguish between the splendid and the cheap. In his orchestration Holst brings to us much that is apparently in the jazz idiom, but it clothes fine thematic material and is well worthy of sympathetic attention.

…heard is very interesting, … is carrying on the torch of musical learning worthily and that his compositions are of a very high order of esthetic and musical thought.

The time for the unreserved worship of the compositions of the old masters

The St. Paul's Suite is not an ecclesiastical work as its name might imply, but was composed for the girl's orchestra of St. Paul's School. It is strongly Celtic in character with a rhythmic jig, a brilliant presto and impressive intermezzo and for finale another reel with the accent on the off beat. Our salute to the girl's orchestra which can play this vivacious piece of unusual music.

The last movement of this suite is strongly reminiscent of the "Irish Washerwoman" of our youth, and very good thematic material it is, too. This contrapuntal study would become wearisome were it not for the remarkable fugal "working out" of the orchestra, which gave a notable exhibition of impeccable bowing and unity of rhythm which pleased the eye as well as the ear.

The "Somerset Rhapsody" is more elegiac than rhapsodic. It is very fully scored. Mr. Ritter presided over four kettle drums instead of two. Mr. Speyer was particularly eloquent in a long lamentoso upon the English horn with the Celtic sentiment again much in evidence. Despite the many evidences of remarkable orchestral resources there are in this and in the "Hammersmith" Prelude and Scherzo some very long paths of tonal aridity which might have blossomed into greater beauty had the composer abandoned his avowed purpose of studied atonality and watered the desert with the life-giving springs of melody and harmony of the less advanced type.

It seemed quite appropriate that the part of the Wizard in "The Perfect Fool" should be taken by Bedetti, that truly great 'cellist who was heard in several solo parts during Holst's compositions. It was he who gave life, beauty and vigor to the charming arrangement of the "Fugue a la Gigue" by Bach as well as distinction to the parlando recitatives in the "Invocation" in the Ballet.

Mr. Theodorowicz, acting as concertmaster for Mr. Burgin, who is happily now well on the way to convalescence after his automobile accident, was heard with grace and beauty in short episodes … solo violin and in ex- …ring …con- …y of …light … His …retto …e accustomed. In his own compositions, however, he was much more alert, more exacting in his beat and more vivacious in his manner. The orchestra gave its very best efforts and undivided attention and assisted his artistic efforts to the fullest, which is a quality of the highest type of musicianship and of personality.

This brief hearing of Holst shows him to be an able conductor of the classics, an original thinker in orchestration, a highly individual and personal composer of significant music in characteristic, but not entirely exclusive idiom, and one capable and vital in his appreciation of Bach in his lighter vein.

Mr. Holst was received with the warmest cordiality by the capacity house. He was recalled after each offering and more than once called upon the orchestra to share the acknowledgement of his success.

The program:

Haydn—
  Symphony in E flat major (B. & H. No. 3)
    I. Adagio: Allegro con spirito
    II. Andante
    III. Menuetto: Trio
    IV. Allegro con spirito
Holst…St. Paul's Suite, for String Orchestra
Holst……………………Somerset Rhapsody
Holst—
  Ballet from the opera, "The Perfect Fool."
    I. Invocation
    II. Dance of the Spirits of Earth
    III. Dance of the Spirits of Water
    IV. Dance of the Spirits of Fire
Holst..Prelude and Scherzo, "Hammersmith"
  (First performance in America)
Bach……………………Fugue a la Gigue
  (Arranged for Orchestra by Holst)

DR. W. LOUIS CHAPMAN.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DALLAS, TEX.
TIMES-HERALD

1 91932

GEORGE GERSHWIN'S "SECOND RHAPSODY" READY FOR RECITAL

New York, Jan. 19 (AP).—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore.

"The Second Rhapsody," it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra on Jan. 29 and 30, and will be heard in Carnegie hall in New York on Feb. 5, almost eight years to the day from the time his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian hall.

The New York, which like the 1924 Opus will employ some syncopation, some blue embellishments and some jazz, started out as incidental music to a motion picture, but broadened into its present form as Gershwin developed his theme. The preliminarly title was "Rhapsody of Rivets," but this was outgrown as the work progressed.

The composer began the composition last year in Hollywood while under contract to supply music for a talkie. As this required only a few songs Gershwin decided also to do a serious piece of work, and put seven weeks into it.

"The new rhapsody is not a continuation of my first," the composer said. "It is broader and deeper. It has but four movements, whereas the 'Rhapsody in Blue' was a pot pouri of a number of themes, written hurriedly for a set event.

As a relaxation Gershwin has turned to painting. He took it up just the other day, and his first oil, a portrait, was turned out in three days. Previously he had done some pen and ink work.

THIS CLIPPING FROM McALESTER, OKLA.
NEWS CAPITAL

JAN 1 91932

Gershwin Offers Second Rhapsody

NEW YORK, (AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore.

"The Second Rhapsody," it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Jan. 29 and 30, and will be heard in Carnegie Hall in New York on Feb. 5, almost eight years to the day from the time his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian Hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BEATRICE, NEB.
SUN

N 1 91

MAESTRO OF BLUES WRITES ANOTHER

By Charles Honce

NEW YORK, Jan. 19 (AP) — George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore.

"The Second Rhapsody," it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra almost eight years to the day Paul Whiteman's baton.

The new work, which like the 1924 opus will employ some syncopation, some blue embellishments and some jazz, started out as incidental music to a motion picture, but broadened into its present form as Gershwin developed his theme.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DES MOINES, IA.
TRIBUNE

JAN 1 9 1932

Encore Added To Rhapsody

New Gershwin Work Ready Jan. 29.

NEW YORK (AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in development of modern American music, has written an encore.

"The Second Rhapsody," it is called. It will be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra Jan. 29 and 30, and will be heard in Carnegie hall in New York Feb 5, almost eight years to the day from the time his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton in Aeolian hall.

Rivets.

The new work, which like the 1924 opus will employ some syncopation, some blue embellishments and some jazz, started ou as incidental music to a motio picture, but broadened into it present form as Gershwin deve oped his theme. The preliminar title was "Rhapsody of Rivets, but this was outgrown as the wor progressed.

The composer began the con position last year in Hollywoo while under contract to suppl music for a talkie. As this re quired only a few songs, Gershwi decided also to do a serious piec of work, and put seven weeks int it.

15 Minutes.

"In the picture a compose comes to the United States, Gershwin said as he turned fror the piano in his modernistic pent house apartment overlooking th broad sweep of the Hudson, "an I decided to write some musi which would express the com poser's emotional reaction to New York. The music was to run a an underlying theme through a certain part of the picture.

"The sound of riveting on New York skyscrapers provided the theme. The movie producer was to use as much of the material as he wished, and he took about four minutes of it. The entire rhapsody now runs about 15 minutes.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
YPSILANTI, MICH.
DAILY PRESS

JAN 1 9 1932

NEW YORK—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore. "The Second Rhapsody" it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Jan. 29 and 30.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PHILADELPHIA, PA.
EVE. PUBLIC LEDGER

JAN 1 9 1932

RIVETERS INSPIRE GERSHWIN WORK

Composer's 'Second Rhapsody' to Have Premiere by Boston Symphony January 29

New York, Jan. 19.—(AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development in modern American music, has written an encore.

"The Second Rhapsody" it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on January 29 and 30, and will be heard in Carnegie Hall in New York on February 5, almost eight years to the day from the time his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian Hall.

The new work, which like the 1924 opus, employed some syncopation, some blue embellishments and some jazz, started out as incidental music to a motion picture, but broadened into its present form as Gershwin developed his theme. The preliminary title was "Rhapsody of Rivets," but this was outgrown as the work progressed.

"In the picture a composer comes to the United States," said Mr. Gershwin, as he turned from the piano in his modernistic penthouse apartment overlooking the broad sweep of the Hudson, and I decided to write some music which would express the composer's emotional reaction to New York. The music was to run as an underlying theme through a certain part of the picture.

"The sound of riveting on New York skyscrapers provided the theme. The movie producer was to use as much of the material as he wished, and he took about four minutes of it. The entire rhapsody now runs about fifteen minutes.

"After I had finished the 'rivets' theme, I got into a broad, flowing movement which strikes me as almost religious in effect. The work developed beyond the first conception and so the title was changed.

"The new rhapsody is not a continuation of my first," the composer said. "It is broader and deeper. It has but four movements, whereas the 'Rhapsody in Blue' was a pot pourri of a number of themes, written hurriedly for a set event.

"And it will not be as popular."

The new work will be played by the regulation orchestra, including pianos. There will be no saxophones. The riveting effects will be taken by the trombones and allied instruments.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JAN 1 9 1932

GERSHWIN WRITES SECOND RHAPSODY

Boston Symphony to Play It for First Time January 29.

BY CHARLES HONCE.

New York, Jan. 19.—(AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore.

"The Second Rhapsody," it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra on January 29 and 30, and will be heard in Cornegie hall in New York on February 5, almost eight years to the day from the time his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian hall.

The new work, which, like the 1924 opus, will employ some syncopation, some blue embellishments and some jazz(started out as incidental music to a motion picture, but broadened into its present form as Gershwin developed his theme. The preliminary title was "Rhapsody of Rivets," but this was outgrown as the work progressed.

The composer began the composition last year in Hollywood while under contract to supply music for a talkie. As this required only a few songs Gershwin decided also to do a serious piece of work, and put seven weeks into it.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WORCESTER, MASS.
POST

JAN 1 9 1932

Rivets Inspired George Gershwin's New Rhapsody

Music Will Be Played by Boston Symphony on Jan. 29 and 30

By CHARLES HONCE

NEW YORK, Jan. 19 (AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore.

"The Second Rhapsody," it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Jan. 29 and 30, and will be heard in Carnegie Hall in New York on Feb. 5, almost eight years to the day from the time his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian Hall.

The new work, which like the 1924 opus, will employ some syncopation, some blue embellishments and somo jazz, started out as incidental music to a motion picture, but broadened into its present form as Gershwin developed his theme. The preliminary title was "Rhapsody of Rivets," but this was outgrown as the work progressed.

The composer began the composition last year in Hollywood while under contract to supply music for a talkie. As this required only a few songs Gershwin decided also to do a serious piece of work, and put seven weeks into it.

"In the picture a composer comes to the United States," said Mr. Gershwin, as he turned from the piano in his modernistic pent house apartment overlooking the broad sweep of the Hudson, and I decided to write some music which would express the composer's emotional reaction to New York. The music was to run as an underlying theme through a certain part of the picture.

The Theme

"The sound of riveting on New York skyscrapers provided the theme. The movie producer was to use as much of the material as he wished, and he took about four minutes of it. The entire rhapsody now runs about 15 minutes.

"After I had finished the 'Rivets' theme I got into a broad, flowing movement which strikes me as almost religious in effect. The work developed beyond the first conception and so the title was changed.

"A composer shouldn't try to make a title mean too much. Take the 'Rhapsody in Blue' for instance. Everybody has read a meaning into it except me."

Gershwin wrote only the piano score in Hollywood. The orchestration was developed after his return to New York.

"The new rhapsody is not a continuation of my first," the composer said. "It is broader and deeper. It has but four movements, whereas the 'Rhapsody in Blue' was a pot pourri of a number of themes, written hurriedly for a set event.

"And it will not be as popular."

The new work will be played by the regulation orchestra, including pianos. There will be no saxophones. The riveting effects will be taken by the trombones and allied instruments.

Gershwin, who never touched a piano until he was 12 years old, and who set himself to a serious study of musical technique and orchestration after he already had won success in Tin Pan Alley, was born in Brooklyn Sept. 26, 1898, in a non-musical family. At 16 he was a piano pounder in Remick's at $15 a week and his first active contract with the theater was playing the piano at rehearsals of "Miss 1917."

Fame and Fortune

In 1919, the song "Swanee," sung by Al Jolson in "Sinbad," lifted Gershwin into face and fortune overnight. A succession of musical comedy successes followed, down to the current hit "Of Thee I Sing."

The now historic concert by Paul Whiteman and his band on Feb. 12, 1924, introduced Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue," undoubtedly his best known and best liked composition.

Later came "The Concert in F," the "Jazz Preludes" and "An American in Paris."

Gershwin constantly is working, studying, pressing toward a higher musical goal.

"Yes, I would like to write a grand opera," he said, "but the difficulty is in getting a good libretto. Even in musical comedy the libretto is the main thing. Good music cannot carry a poor libretto."

As a relaxation Gershwin has turned to painting. He took it up just the other day, and his first oil, a portrait, was turned out in three days. Previously he had done some pen work.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
IONIA, MICH.
SENTINEL STANDARD

JAN 1 9 1932

Gershwin Symphony

New York, Jan. 19.—(AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore.

"The Second Rhapsody" it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra on Jan. 29 and 30, and will be heard in Carnegie hall in New York on Feb. 5, almost eight years to the day from the time his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian hall.

Prov Jan 19 Prov. Journal

IN TERMS OF MUSIC, Comment in Season

Gustav Holst, Noted English Composer, Conducting Boston Symphony Orchestra, Warmly Greeted in Praiseworthy Concert at Albee Theatre.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening gave the third of its concert series in the Albee Theatre. The concert was directed by Gustav Holst, distinguished English composer.

Only occasionally is the Boston Symphony Orchestra presided over by a guest conductor during Dr. Koussevitzsky's mid-season siesta, whereas the New York Philharmonic Orchestra has three or four guests during the season. It is not to be expected that any visiting conductor will make any particular impression upon his men in a brief season. The claims of personality and the many features that combine to make genius require time to make themselves felt, and it is imposible to throw off the habits of many months in a few days.

It is probably no easier for the conductor than it is for the men. He, too, is accustomed to another team; he, too, must become adjusted to other tonal qualities, and notwithstanding the cordiality of his reception by the band, he must feel strange and somewhat ill at ease.

Holst comes to a magnificent instrument; he handles it ably; he accomplishes highly artistic results. Haydn, Bach and Holst receive their meed of performance and praise. Consciously and unconsciously we compare their merits and graces and to most persons the concert is over. But there is much more to be said, there are many features to contemplate. There are divers values to be appreciated and, after all is done and said, we realize that the music we have heard is very interesting; that our visitor is carrying on the torch of musical learning worthily and that his compositions are of a very high order of esthetic and musical thought.

The time for the unreserved worship of the compositions of the old masters has gone. The fact that Mozart, Bach or Beethoven wrote this or that does not make them good unless they contain true and intrinsic merit. The life of every composer contains some works that are better than others and we are pleased to admire the best of these.

Comes now a composer from across the seas whose musical and literary preparation has been most thorough, thus assuring a capable medium for the presentation of his talents. These are unusual, his gifts are varied and of a high order, his thematic material is often rich and highly original and his harmony is tinctured by a modernism that is so much his own that it may be said to be his idiom.

There is nothing commonplace about Holst's orchestration. This, too, has personality and originality and if it is reminiscent of anyone it recalls Edward Elgar. He is appreciative of the keyed glockenspiel with its suggestion of musical glasses, the xylophone now coming into its own in orchestral music, of the matchless baritone of the bass clarinet and the resonant reinforcement of the double bassoon. In these facilities he has the advantage over the older composers who were limited as to orchestral possibilities. Frequently one notes trumpet figures which are suggestive of jazz, but we must remember these are not the only episodes in music that are debased by unworthy exposition and that because jazz has borrowed of the best in music there is no reason for belittling the value of the musical timbre or for failing to distinguish between the splendid and the cheap. In his orchestration Holst brings to us much that is apparently in the jazz idiom, but it clothes fine thematic material and is well worthy of sympathetic attention.

The St. Paul's Suite is not an ecclesiastical work as its name might imply, but was composed for the girl's orchestra of St. Paul's School. It is strongly Celtic in character with a rhythmic jig, a brilliant presto and impressive intermezzo and for finale another reel with the accent on the off beat. Our salute to the girl's orchestra which can play this vivacious piece of unusual music.

The last movement of this suite is strongly reminiscent of the "Irish Washerwoman" of our youth, and very good thematic material it is, too. This contrapuntal study would become wearisome were it not for the remarkable fugal "working out" of the orchestra, which gave a notable exhibition of impeccable bowing and unity of rhythm which pleased the eye as well as the ear.

The "Somerset Rhapsody" is more elegiac than rhapsodic. It is very fully scored. Mr. Ritter presided over four kettle drums instead of two. Mr. Speyer was particularly eloquent in a long lamentoso upon the English horn with the Celtic sentiment again much in evidence. Despite the many evidences of remarkable orchestral resources there are in this and in the "Hammersmith" Prelude and Scherzo some very long paths of tonal aridity which might have blossomed into greater beauty had the composer abandoned his avowed purpose of studied atonality and watered the desert with the life-giving springs of melody and harmony of the less advanced type.

It seemed quite appropriate that the part of the Wizard in "The Perfect Fool" should be taken by Bedetti, that truly great 'cellist who was heard in several solo parts during Holst's compositions. It was he who gave life, beauty and vigor to the charming arrangement of the "Fugue a la Gigue" by Bach as well as distinction to the parlando recitatives in the "Invocation" in the Ballet.

Mr. Theodorowicz, acting as concertmaster for Mr. Burgin, who is happily now well on the way to convalescence after his automobile accident, was heard with grace and beauty in short episodes that fell to the solo violin and in extremely fine passages where the string trio and quartet served as pleasing contrast to the full orchestra.

In the exquisite old time Symphony of Haydn, Mr. Holst conducted with a light hand and with only few directions. His adagio is more rapid and his allegretto more slow than that to which we are accustomed. In his own compositions, however, he was much more alert, more exacting in his beat and more vivacious in his manner. The orchestra gave its very best efforts and undivided attention and assisted his artistic efforts to the fullest, which is a quality of the highest type of musicianship and of personality.

This brief hearing of Holst shows him to be an able conductor of the classics, an original thinker in orchestration, a highly individual and personal composer of significant music in characteristic, but not entirely exclusive idiom, and one capable and vital in his appreciation of Bach in his lighter vein.

Mr. Holst was received with the warmest cordiality by the capacity house. He was recalled after each offering and more than once called upon the orchestra to share the acknowledgement of his success.

The program:

Haydn—
Symphony in E flat major (B. & H. No. 3)
I. Adagio; Allegro con spirito
II. Andante
III. Menuetto; Trio
IV. Allegro con spirito
Holst...St. Paul's Suite, for String Orchestra
Holst....................Somerset Rhapsody
Holst—
Ballet from the opera, "The Perfect Fool."
I. Invocation
II. Dance of the Spirits of Earth
III. Dance of the Spirits of Water
IV. Dance of the Spirits of Fire
Holst..Prelude and Scherzo, "Hammersmith"
(First performance in America)
Bach....................Fugue a la Gigue
(Arranged for Orchestra by Holst)

DR. W. LOUIS CHAPMAN.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DALLAS, TEX.
TIMES-HERALD

9 1932

GEORGE GERSHWIN'S "SECOND RHAPSODY" READY FOR RECITAL

New York, Jan. 19 (AP).—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore.

"The Second Rhapsody," it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra on Jan. 29 and 30, and will be heard in Carnegie hall in New York on Feb. 5, almost eight years to the day from the time his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian hall.

The New York, which like the 1924 Opus will employ some syncopation, some blue embellishments and some jazz, started out as incidental music to a motion picture, but broadened into its present form as Gershwin developed his theme. The preliminarly title was "Rhapsody of Rivets," but this was outgrown as the work progressed.

The composer began the composition last year in Hollywood while under contract to supply music for a talkie. As this required only a few songs Gershwin decided also to do a serious piece of work, and put seven weeks into it.

"The new rhapsody is not a continuation of my first," the composer said. "It is broader and deeper. It has but four movements, whereas the 'Rhapsody in Blue' was a pot pouri of a number of themes, written hurriedly for a set event.

As a relaxation Gershwin has turned to painting. He took it up just the other day, and his first oil, a portrait, was turned out in three days. Previously he had done some pen and ink work.

THIS CLIPPING FROM McALESTER, OKLA.
NEWS CAPITAL

JAN 1 9 1932

Gershwin Offers Second Rhapsody

NEW YORK, (AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore.

"The Second Rhapsody," it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Jan. 29 and 30, and will be heard in Carnegie Hall in New York on Feb. 5, almost eight years to the day from the time his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian Hall.

---

arles Honce

NEW YORK, Jan. 19 (AP) — George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore.

"The Second Rhapsody," it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra almost eight years to the day Paul Whiteman's baton.

The new work, which like the 1924 opus will employ some syncopation, some blue embellishments and some jazz, started out as incidental music to a motion picture, but broadened into its present form as Gershwin developed his theme.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DES MOINES, IA.
TRIBUNE

JAN 1 9 1932

Encore Added To Rhapsody

New Gershwin Work Ready Jan. 29.

NEW YORK (AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in development of modern American music, has written an encore.

"The Second Rhapsody," it is called. It will be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra Jan. 29 and 30, and will be heard in Carnegie hall in New York Feb 5, almost eight years to the day from the time his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton in Aeolian hall.

Rivets.

The new work, which like th 1924 opus will employ some syn copation, some blue embellish ments and some jazz, started ou as incidental music to a motio picture, but broadened into it present form as Gershwin deve oped his theme. The preliminar title was "Rhapsody of Rivets, but this was outgrown as the wor progressed.

The composer began the con position last year in Hollywoo while under contract to suppl music for a talkie. As this re quired only a few songs, Gershwi decided also to do a serious piec of work, and put seven weeks int it.

15 Minutes.

"In the picture a compos comes to the United States, Gershwin said as he turned fror the piano in his modernistic pent house apartment overlooking th broad sweep of the Hudson, "an I decided to write some musi which would express the com poser's emotional reaction to New York. The music was to run as an underlying theme through a certain part of the picture.

"The sound of riveting on New York skyscrapers provided the theme. The movie producer was to use as much of the material as he wished, and he took about four minutes of it. The entire rhapsody now runs about 15 minutes.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
YPSILANTI, MICH.
DAILY PRESS

JAN 1 9 1932

NEW YORK—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore. "The Second Rhapsody" it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Jan. 29 and 30.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PHILADELPHIA, PA.
EVE. PUBLIC LEDGER

JAN 1 9 1932

RIVETERS INSPIRE GERSHWIN WORK

Composer's 'Second Rhapsody' to Have Premiere by Boston Symphony January 29

New York, Jan. 19.—(AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development in modern American music, has written an encore.

"The Second Rhapsody" it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on January 29 and 30, and will be heard in Carnegie Hall in New York on February 5, almost eight years to the day from the time his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian Hall.

The new work, which like the 1924 opus, employed some syncopation, some blue embellishments and some jazz, started out as incidental music to a motion picture, but broadened into its present form as Gershwin developed his theme. The preliminary title was "Rhapsody of Rivets," but this was outgrown as the work progressed.

"In the picture a composer comes to the United States," said Mr. Gershwin, as he turned from the piano in his modernistic penthouse apartment overlooking the broad sweep of the Hudson, and I decided to write some music which would express the composer's emotional reaction to New York. The music was to run as an underlying theme through a certain part of the picture.

"The sound of riveting on New York skyscrapers provided the theme. The movie producer was to use as much of the material as he wished, and he took about four minutes of it. The entire rhapsody now runs about fifteen minutes.

"After I had finished the 'rivets' theme, I got into a broad, flowing movement which strikes me as almost religious in effect. The work developed beyond the first conception and so the title was changed.

"The new rhapsody is not a continuation of my first," the composer said. "It is broader and deeper. It has but four movements, whereas the 'Rhapsody in Blue' was a pot pourri of a number of themes, written hurriedly for a set event.

"And it will not be as popular."

The new work will be played by the regulation orchestra, including pianos. There will be no saxophones. The riveting effects will be taken by the trombones and allied instruments.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JAN 1 9 1932

GERSHWIN WRITES SECOND RHAPSODY

Boston Symphony to Play It for First Time January 29.

BY CHARLES HONCE.

New York, Jan. 19.—(AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore.

"The Second Rhapsody," it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra on January 29 and 30, and will be heard in Cornegie hall in New York on February 5, almost eight years to the day from the time his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian hall.

The new work, which, like the 1924 opus, will employ some syncopation, some blue embellishments and some jazz(started out as incidental music to a motion picture, but broadened into its present form as Gershwin developed his theme. The preliminary title was "Rhapsody of Rivets," but this was outgrown as the work progressed.

The composer began the composition last year in Hollywood while under contract to supply music for a talkie. As this required only a few songs Gershwin decided also to do a serious piece of work, and put seven weeks into it.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WORCESTER, MASS.
POST

107

JAN 1 9 1932

Rivets Inspired George Gershwin's New Rhapsody

Music Will Be Played by Boston Symphony on Jan. 29 and 30

By CHARLES HONCE

NEW YORK, Jan. 19 (AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore.

"The Second Rhapsody," it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Jan. 29 and 30, and will be heard in Carnegie Hall in New York on Feb. 5, almost eight years to the day from the time his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian Hall.

The new work, which like the 1924 opus, will employ some syncopation, some blue embellishments and some jazz, started out as incidental music to a motion picture, but broadened into its present form as Gershwin developed his theme. The preliminary title was "Rhapsody of Rivets," but this was outgrown as the work progressed.

The composer began the composition last year in Hollywood while under contract to supply music for a talkie. As this required only a few songs Gershwin decided also to do a serious piece of work, and put seven weeks into it.

"In the picture a composer comes to the United States," said Mr. Gershwin, as he turned from the piano in his modernistic pent house apartment overlooking the broad sweep of the Hudson, and I decided to write some music which would express the composer's emotional reaction to New York. The music was to run as an underlying theme through a certain part of the picture.

The Theme

"The sound of riveting on New York skyscrapers provided the theme. The movie producer was to use as much of the material as he wished, and he took about four minutes of it. The entire rhapsody now runs about 15 minutes.

"After I had finished the 'Rivets' theme I got into a broad, flowing movement which strikes me as almost religious in effect. The work developed beyond the first conception and so the title was changed.

"A composer shouldn't try to make a title mean too much. Take the 'Rhapsody in Blue' for instance. Everybody has read a meaning into it except me."

Gershwin wrote only the piano score in Hollywood. The orchestration was developed after his return to New York.

"The new rhapsody is not a continuation of my first," the composer said. "It is broader and deeper. It has but four movements, whereas the 'Rhapsody in Blue' was a pot pourri of a number of themes, written hurriedly for a set event.

"And it will not be as popular."

The new work will be played by the regulation orchestra, including pianos. There will be no saxophones. The riveting effects will be taken by the trombones and allied instruments.

Gershwin, who never touched a piano until he was 12 years old, and who set himself to a serious study of musical technique and orchestration after he already had won success in Tin Pan Alley, was born in Brooklyn Sept. 26, 1898, in a non-musical family. At 16 he was a piano pounder in Remick's at $15 a week and his first active contract with the theater was playing the piano at rehearsals of "Miss 1917."

Fame and Fortune

In 1919, the song "Swanee," sung by Al Jolson in "Sinbad," lifted Gershwin into face and fortune overnight. A succession of musical comedy successes followed, down to the current hit "Of Thee I Sing."

The now historic concert by Paul Whiteman and his band on Feb. 12, 1924, introduced Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue," undoubtedly his best known and best liked composition.

Later came "The Concert in F," the "Jazz Preludes" and "An American in Paris."

Gershwin constantly is working, studying, pressing toward a higher musical goal.

"Yes, I would like to write a grand opera," he said, "but the difficulty is in getting a good libretto. Even in musical comedy the libretto is the main thing. Good music cannot carry a poor libretto."

As a relaxation Gershwin has turned to painting. He took it up just the other day, and his first oil, a portrait, was turned out in three days. Previously he had done some pen work.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
IONIA, MICH.
SENTINEL STANDARD

JAN 1 9 1932

Gershwin Symphony

New York, Jan. 19.—(AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore.

"The Second Rhapsody" it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra on Jan. 29 and 30, and will be heard in Carnegie hall in New York on Feb. 5, almost eight years to the day from the time his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION
168 JAN 19 1932

Gershwin Says New Work Will Surpass "Rhapsody in Blue"

Piece, First Known as "Rhapsody of Rivest," Will Be Played by Boston Symphony Later in Month; Hopes to Write Grand Opera.

NEW YORK, Jan. 19—(AP) George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore.

"The Second Rhapsody," it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Jan. 29 and 30, and will be heard in Carnegie Hall in New York on Feb. 5, almost eight years to the day from the time his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian Hall.

The new work, which like the 1924 opus will employ some syncopation, some blue embellishments and some jazz, started out as incidental music to a motion picture, but broadened into its present form as Gershwin developed his theme. The preliminary title was "Rhapsody of Rivets," but this was outgrown as the work progressed.

The composer began the composi- Gershwin, as he turned from the piano in his modernistic penthouse apartment overlooking the broad sweep of the Hudson, "and I decided to write some music which would express the composer's emotional reaction to New York. The music was to run as an underlying theme through a certain part of the picture.

"The sound of riveting on New York skyscrapers provided the theme. The movie producer was to use as much of the material as he wished, and he took about four minutes of it. The entire rhapsody now runs about 15 minutes.

"After I had finished the 'rivets' theme I got into a broad, flowing movement which strikes me as almost religious in effect. The work developed beyond the first conception and so the title was changed.

"A composer shouldn't try to make a title mean too much. Take the 'Rhapsody in Blue' for instance. Everybody has read a meaning into it except me."

Gershwin wrote only the piano score in Hollywood. The orchestration was developed after his return to New York.

"The new rhapsody is not a continuation of my first," the composer said. "It is broader and deeper. It has but four movements, whereas the 'Rhapsody in Blue' was a potpourri of a number of themes, written hurriedly for a set event.

"And it will not be as popular."

The new work will be played by the regulation orchestra, including pianos. There will be no saxophones. The riveting effects will be taken by the trombones and allied instruments.

Gershwin, who never touched a piano until he was 12 years old, and who set himself to a serious study of musical technique and orchestration after he already had won success in Tin Pan Alley, was born in Brooklyn Sept. 26, 1898, in a nonmusical family. At 16 he was a piano pounder in Remick's at $15 a week and his first active contact with the theater was playing the piano at rehearsals of "Miss 1917."

In 1919, the son "Swanee," sung by Al Jolson in "Sinbad," lifted Gershwin into fame and fortune overnight. A succession of musical comedy successes followed, down to the current hit "Of Thee I Sing."

The now historic concert by Paul Whiteman and his band on Feb. 12, 1924, introduced Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue," undoubtedly his best known and best liked composition. Later came "The Concerto in F," the "Jazz Preludes," and "An American in Paris."

Gershwin constantly is working, studying, pressing toward a higher musical goal.

"Yes, I would like to write a grand opera," he said, "but the difficulty is in getting a good libretto. Even in musical comedy the libretto is the main thing. Good music cannot carry a poor libretto."

As a relaxation Gershwin has turned to painting. He took it up just the other day, and his first oil, a portrait, was turned out in three days. Previously he had done some pen and ink work.

THIS CLIPPING FROM FLINT, MICH.
JOURNAL

JAN 19 1932

'Rhapsody in Blue' Writer Offers 'Second Rhapsody'

New York, Jan. 19.—(By AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore.

"The Second Rhapsody," it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra on Jan. 29 and 30, and will be heard in Carnegie hall in New York on Feb 5, almost eight years to the day from the time his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian hall.

The new work, which like the 1924 opus will employ some syncopation, some blue embellishments and some jazz, started out as incidental music to a motion picture, but broadened into its present form as Gershwin developed his theme. The preliminary title was "Rhapsody of Rivets," but this was outgrown as the work progressed.

The composer began the composition last year in Hollywood while under contract to supply music for a talkie. As this required only a few songs Gershwin decided also to do a serious piece of work, and put seven weeks into it.

Uses Four Minutes

"In the picture a composer comes to the United States," said Mr. Gershwin, as he turned from the piano in his modernistic penthouse apartment overlooking the broad sweep of the Hudson, "and I decided to write some music which would express the composer's emotional reaction to New York. The music was to run as an underlying theme through a certain part of the picture.

"The sound of riveting on New York skyscrapers provided the theme. The movie producer was to use as much of the material as he wished, and he took about four minutes of it. The entire rhapsody now runs about 15 minutes.

"After I had finished the 'rivets' theme I got into a broad, flowing movement which strikes me as almost religious in effect. The work developed beyond the first conception and so the title was changed.

Title Means Little

"A composer shouldn't try to make a title mean too much. Take the 'Rhapsody in Blue' for instance. Everybody has read a meaning into it except me."

Gershwin wrote only the piano score in Hollywood. The orchestration was developed after his return to New York.

"The new rhapsody is not a continuation of my first," the composer said. "It is broader and deeper. It has but four movements, whereas the 'Rhapsody in Blue' was a pot pouri of a number of themes, written hurriedly for a set event.

"And it will not be as popular."

The new work will be played by the regulation orchestra, including pianos. There will be no saxophones. The riveting effects will be taken by the trombones and allied instruments.

Gershwin, who never touched a piano until he was 12 years old, and who set himself to a serious study of musical technique and orchestration after he already had won success in tin pan alley, was born in Brooklyn Sept. 26, 1898, in a non-musical family. At 16 he was a piano pounded in Remick's at $15 a week and his first active contact with the theater was playing the piano at rehearsals of "Miss 1917."

Success with "Swanee"

In 1919. the song "Swanee," sung by Al Jolson in "Sinbad," lifted Gershwin into fame and fortune overnight. A succession of musical comedy successes followed, down to the current hit "Of Thee I Sing."

The now historic concert by Paul Whiteman and his band on Feb. 12, 1924 introduced the Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue," undoubtedly his best known and best liked composition. Later came "the Concerto in F," the "Jazz Preludes," and "An American in Paris."

Gershwin constantly is working, studying, pressing toward a higher musical goal.

"Yes, I would like to write a grand opera," he said, "but the difficulty is in getting a good libretto. Even in musical comedy the libretto is the main thing. Good music cannot carry a poor libretto."

As a relaxation Gershwin has turned to painting. He took it up just the other day, and his first oil, a portrait, was turned out in three days. Previously he had done some pen and ink work.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE, MD.
NEWS
JAN 19 1932

GERSHWIN IN 'RIVETS' RHAPSODY

Encore for "Blue" Theme to be Presented in Boston, New York

By Associated Press.

NEW YORK, Jan. 19.—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore.

"The Second Rhapsody," it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on January 29 and 30, and will be heard in Carnegie Hall in New York on February 5, almost eight years to the day from the time his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian Hall.

"RHAPSODY OF RIVETS"

The New York work, which, like the 1924 opus, will employ some syncopation, some blue embellishments and some jazz, started out as incidental music to a motion picture, but broadened into its present form as Gershwin developed his theme. The preliminary title was "Rhapsody of Rivets," but this was outgrown as the work progressed.

GEORGE GERSHWIN

The composer began the composition last year in Hollywood while under contract to supply music for a talkie. As this required only a few songs, Gershwin decided also to do a serious piece of work, and put seven weeks into it.

Composer Sees Serious Quality in Work He Started for Movie

Said Mr. Gershwin, as he turned from the piano in his modernistic penthouse apartment overlooking the broad sweep of the Hudson:

"In the picture, a composer comes to the United States and I decided to write some music which would express the composer's emotional reaction to New York.

RELIGIOUS IN EFFECT

"The sound of riveting on New York skyscrapers provided the theme. After I had finished the 'rivets' theme I got into a broad, flowing movement which strikes me as almost religious in effect. The work developed beyond the first conception and so the title was changed."

The new work will be played by the regulation orchestra, incluing pianos. There will be no saxophones. The riveting effects will be taken by the trombones and allied instruments.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SARATOGA SPRINGS, N. Y.
SARATOGIAN

JAN 19 1932

Gershwin Writes New Rapsody With Riveters Providing Theme

NEW YORK, Jan. 19. (AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore.

"The Second Rhapsody," it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra on January 29 and 30, and will be heard in Carnegie Hall, New York, on February 5, almost eight years to the day from the time his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian Hall.

The new work, which like the 1924 opus will employ some syncopation, some blue embellishments and some jazz, started out as incidental music to a motion picture, but broadened into its present form as Gershwin developed his theme. The preliminary title was "Rhapsody of Rivets," but this was outgrown as the work progressed.

The composer began the composition last year in Hollywood while under contract to supply music for a talkie. As this required only a few songs, Gershwin decided also to do a serious piece of work, and put seven weeks into it.

"In the picture a composer comes to the United States," said Mr. Gershwin, as he turned from the piano in his modernistic pent house apartment overlooking the broad sweep of the Hudson, "and I decided to write some music which would express the composer's emotional reaction to New York. The music was to run as an underlying theme through a certain part of the picture.

"The sound of riveting on New York skyscrapers provided the theme. The movie producer was to use as much of the material as he wished, and he took about four minutes of it. The entire rhapsody now runs about 15 minutes.

"After I had finished the 'rivets' theme I got into a broad, flowing movement which strikes me as almost religious in effect. The work developed beyond the first conception and so the title was changed."

THIS CLIPPING FROM ELKART, IND.
TRUTH

JAN 19 1932

'SECOND RHAPSODY' OF GERSHWIN TO BE PLAYED JAN. 29-30

NEW YORK, Jan. 19.—(AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore.

"The Second Rhapsody" it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra on Jan. 29 and 30, and will be heard in Carnegie hall in New York on Feb. 5. almost eight years to the day from the time his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian hall

The new work, which like the 1924 opus will employ some syncopation, some blue embellishments and some jazz, started out as incidental music to a motion picture, but broadened into its present form as Gershwin developed his theme. The preliminary title was "Rhapsody of Rivets," but this was outgrown as the work progressed.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKYLN, N. Y.
EAGLE

JAN 19 1932

Rivets Give Gershwin His 'Second Rhapsody'

Starting With Skyscraper Building Din for Talkie Scene, Composer Broadens Into Encore for Piece That Gave Him Fame

George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore.

"The Second Rhapsody," it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Jan. 29 and 30, and will be heard in Carnegie Hall in New York on Feb. 5, almost eight years to the day from the time his first "Rhapsody" created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian Hall.

The new work, which like the 1924 opus will employ some syncopation, some blue embellishments and some jazz, started out as incidental music to a motion picture, but broadened into its present form as Gershwin developed his theme.

The preliminary title was "Rhapsody of Rivets," but this was outgrown as the work progressed.

"In the picture I was working on in Hollywood a year ago, a composer comes to the United States," said Mr. Gershwin, "and I decided to write some music which would express the composer's emotional reaction to New York.

"The sound of riveting on New York skyscrapers provided the theme. The movie producer took about four minutes of it. The entire "Rhapsody" now runs about 15 minutes.

"After I had finished the 'Rivets' theme I got into a broad, flowing movement which strikes me as almost religious in effect.

"The new 'Rhapsody' is not a continuation of my first. It is broader and deeper. It has but four movements, whereas the 'Rapsody in Blue' was a pot pouri of a number of themes.

"And it will not be as popular."

The new work will be played by the regulation orchestra, including pianos. There will be no saxophones. The riveting effects will be taken by the trombones and allied instruments, according to the Assocaited Press.

Gershwin, who never touched a piano until he was 12 years old and who set himself to a serious study of musical technique and orchestration after he already had won success in Tin Pan Alley, was born inBrooklyn Sept. 26, 1898, in a nonmusical family.

At 16 he was a piano pounder in Remick's at $15 a week and his first active contact with the theater was playing the piano at rehearsals of "Miss 1917."

In 1919 the song "Swanee," sung by Al Jolson in "Sinbad," lifted Gershwin into fame and fortune overnight. A succession of musical comedy successes followed, down to the current hit "Of Thee I sing."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION
168 JAN 19 1932

Gershwin Says New Work Will Surpass "Rhapsody in Blue"

Piece, First Known as "Rhapsody of Rivest," Will Be Played by Boston Symphony Later in Month; Hopes to Write Grand Opera.

NEW YORK, Jan. 19—(AP) George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore.

"The Second Rhapsody," it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Jan. 29 and 30, and will be heard in Carnegie Hall in New York on Feb. 5, almost eight years to the day from the time his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian Hall.

The new work, which like the 1924 opus will employ some syncopation, some blue embellishments and some jazz, started out as incidental music to a motion picture, but broadened into its present form as Gershwin developed his theme. The preliminary title was "Rhapsody of Rivets," but this was outgrown as the work progressed.

The composer began the composition last year in Hollywood while under contract to supply music for a talkie. As this required only a few songs Gershwin decided also to do a serious piece of work, and put seven weeks into it.

"In the picture a composer comes to the United States," said Mr. Gershwin, as he turned from the piano in his modernistic penthouse apartment overlooking the broad sweep of the Hudson, "and I decided to write some music which would express the composer's emotional reaction to New York. The music was to run as an underlying theme through a certain part of the picture.

"The sound of riveting on New York skyscrapers provided the theme. The movie producer was to use as much of the material as he wished, and he took about four minutes of it. The entire rhapsody now runs about 15 minutes.

"After I had finished the 'rivets' theme I got into a broad, flowing movement which strikes me as almost religious in effect. The work developed beyond the first conception and so the title was changed.

"A composer shouldn't try to make a title mean too much. Take the 'Rhapsody in Blue' for instance. Everybody has read a meaning into it except me."

Gershwin wrote only the piano score in Hollywood. The orchestration was developed after his return to New York.

"The new rhapsody is not a continuation of my first," the composer said. "It is broader and deeper. It has but four movements, whereas the 'Rhapsody in Blue' was a potpourri of a number of themes, written hurriedly for a set event.

"And it will not be as popular."

The new work will be played by the regulation orchestra, including pianos. There will be no saxophones. The riveting effects will be taken by the trombones and allied instruments.

Gershwin, who never touched a piano until he was 12 years old, and who set himself to a serious study of musical technique and orchestration after he already had won success in Tin Pan Alley, was born in Brooklyn Sept. 26, 1898, in a nonmusical family. At 16 he was a piano pounder in Remick's at $15 a week and his first active contact with the theater was playing the piano at rehearsals of "Miss 1917."

In 1919, the son "Swanee," sung by Al Jolson in "Sinbad," lifted Gershwin into fame and fortune overnight. A succession of musical comedy successes followed, down to the current hit "Of Thee I Sing."

The now historic concert by Paul Whiteman and his band on Feb. 12, 1924, introduced Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue," undoubtedly his best known and best liked composition. Later came "The Concerto in F," the "Jazz Preludes," and "An American in Paris."

Gershwin constantly is working, studying, pressing toward a higher musical goal.

"Yes, I would like to write a grand opera," he said, "but the difficulty is in getting a good libretto. Even in musical comedy the libretto is the main thing. Good music cannot carry a poor libretto."

As a relaxation Gershwin has turned to painting. He took it up just the other day, and his first oil, a portrait, was turned out in three days. Previously he had done some pen and ink work.

THIS CLIPPING FROM FLINT, MICH.
JOURNAL

JAN 19 1932

'Rhapsody in Blue' Writer Offers 'Second Rhapsody'

New York, Jan. 19.—(By AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore.

"The Second Rhapsody," it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra on Jan. 29 and 30, and will be heard in Carnegie hall in New York on Feb 5, almost eight years to the day from the time his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian hall.

The new work, which like the 1924 opus will employ some syncopation, some blue embellishments and some jazz, started out as incidental music to a motion picture, but broadened into its present form as Gershwin developed his theme. The preliminary title was "Rhapsody of Rivets," but this was outgrown as the work progressed.

The composer began the composition last year in Hollywood while under contract to supply music for a talkie. As this required only a few songs Gershwin decided also to do a serious piece of work, and put seven weeks into it.

Uses Four Minutes

"In the picture a composer comes to the United States," said Mr. Gershwin, as he turned from the piano in his modernistic penthouse apartment overlooking the broad sweep of the Hudson, "and I decided to write some music which would express the composer's emotional reaction to New York. The music was to run as an underlying theme through a certain part of the picture.

"The sound of riveting on New York skyscrapers provided the theme. The movie producer was to use as much of the material as he wished, and he took about four minutes of it. The entire rhapsody now runs about 15 minutes.

"After I had finished the 'rivets' theme I got into a broad, flowing movement which strikes me as almost religious in effect. The work developed beyond the first conception and so the title was changed.

Title Means Little

"A composer shouldn't try to make a title mean too much. Take the 'Rhapsody in Blue' for instance. Everybody has read a meaning into it except me."

Gershwin wrote only the piano score in Hollywood. The orchestration was developed after his return to New York.

"The new rhapsody is not a continuation of my first," the composer said. "It is broader and deeper. It has but four movements, whereas the 'Rhapsody in Blue' was a pot pouri of a number of themes, written hurriedly for a set event.

"And it will not be as popular."

The new work will be played by the regulation orchestra, including pianos. There will be no saxophones. The riveting effects will be taken by the trombones and allied instruments.

Gershwin, who never touched a piano until he was 12 years old, and who set himself to a serious study of musical technique and orchestration after he already had won success in tin pan alley, was born in Brooklyn Sept. 26, 1898, in a non-musical family. At 16 he was a piano pounded in Remick's at $15 a week and his first active contact with the theater was playing the piano at rehearsals of "Miss 1917."

Success with "Swanee"

In 1919, the song "Swanee," sung by Al Jolson in "Sinbad," lifted Gershwin into fame and fortune overnight. A succession of musical comedy successes followed, down to the current hit "Of Thee I Sing."

The now historic concert by Paul Whiteman and his band on Feb. 12, 1924 introduced the Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue," undoubtedly his best known and best liked composition. Later came "the Concerto in F," the "Jazz Preludes," and "An American in Paris."

Gershwin constantly is working, studying, pressing toward a higher musical goal.

"Yes, I would like to write a grand opera," he said, "but the difficulty is in getting a good libretto. Even in musical comedy the libretto is the main thing. Good music cannot carry a poor libretto."

As a relaxation Gershwin has turned to painting. He took it up just the other day, and his first oil, a portrait, was turned out in three days. Previously he had done some pen and ink work.

IN 'RIVETS' RHAPSODY

To be Presented in Boston, New York

By Associated Press.

NEW YORK, Jan. 19.—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore.

"The Second Rhapsody," it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on January 29 and 30, and will be heard in Carnegie Hall in New York on February 5, almost eight years to the day from the time his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian Hall.

"RHAPSODY OF RIVETS"

The New York work, which, like the 1924 opus, will employ some syncopation, some blue embellishments and some jazz, started out as incidental music to a motion picture, but broadened into its present form as Gershwin developed his theme. The preliminary title was "Rhapsody of Rivets," but this was outgrown as the work progressed.

GEORGE GERSHWIN

The composer began the composition last year in Hollywood while under contract to supply music for a talkie. As this required only a few songs, Gershwin decided also to do a serious piece of work, and put seven weeks into it.

Composer Sees Serious Quality in Work He Started for Movie

Said Mr. Gershwin, as he turned from the piano in his modernistic penthouse apartment overlooking the broad sweep of the Hudson:

"In the picture, a composer comes to the United States and I decided to write some music which would express the composer's emotional reaction to New York.

RELIGIOUS IN EFFECT

"The sound of riveting on New York skyscrapers provided the theme. After I had finished the 'rivets' theme I got into a broad, flowing movement which strikes me as almost religious in effect. The work developed beyond the first conception and so the title was changed."

The new work will be played by the regulation orchestra, incluing pianos. There will be no saxophones. The riveting effects will be taken by the trombones and allied instruments.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SARATOGA SPRINGS, N. Y.
SARATOGIAN

JAN 19 1932

Gershwin Writes New Rapsody With Riveters Providing Theme

NEW YORK, Jan. 19. (AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore.

"The Second Rhapsody," it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra on January 29 and 30, and will be heard in Carnegie Hall, New York, on February 5, almost eight years to the day from the time his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian Hall.

The new work, which like the 1924 opus will employ some syncopation, some blue embellishments and some jazz, started out as incidental music to a motion picture, but broadened into its present form as Gershwin developed his theme. The preliminary title was "Rhapsody of Rivets," but this was outgrown as the work progressed.

The composer began the composition last year in Hollywood while under contract to supply music for a talkie. As this required only a few songs, Gershwin decided also to do a serious piece of work, and put seven weeks into it.

"In the picture a composer comes to the United States," said Mr. Gershwin, as he turned from the piano in his modernistic pent house apartment overlooking the broad sweep of the Hudson, "and I decided to write some music which would express the composer's emotional reaction to New York. The music was to run as an underlying theme through a certain part of the picture.

"The sound of riveting on New York skyscrapers provided the theme. The movie producer was to use as much of the material as he wished, and he took about four minutes of it. The entire rhapsody now runs about 15 minutes.

"After I had finished the 'rivets' theme I got into a broad, flowing movement which strikes me as almost religious in effect. The work developed beyond the first conception and so the title was changed."

THIS CLIPPING FROM ELKART, IND.
TRUTH

JAN 19 1932

'SECOND RHAPSODY' OF GERSHWIN TO BE PLAYED JAN. 29-30

NEW YORK, Jan. 19.—(AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore.

"The Second Rhapsody" it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra on Jan. 29 and 30, and will be heard in Carnegie hall in New York on Feb. 5. almost eight years to the day from the time his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian hall

The new work, which like the 1924 opus will employ some syncopation, some blue embellishments and some jazz, started out as incidental music to a motion picture, but broadened into its present form as Gershwin developed his theme. The preliminary title was "Rhapsody of Rivets," but this was outgrown as the work progressed.

---

9 1932

Rivets Give Gershwin His 'Second Rhapsody'

Starting With Skyscraper Building Din for Talkie Scene, Composer Broadens Into Encore for Piece That Gave Him Fame

George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore.

"The Second Rhapsody," it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Jan. 29 and 30, and will be heard in Carnegie Hall in New York on Feb. 5, almost eight years to the day from the time his first "Rhapsody" created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian Hall.

The new work, which like the 1924 opus will employ some syncopation, some blue embellishments and some jazz, started out as incidental music to a motion picture, but broadened into its present form as Gershwin developed his theme.

The preliminary title was "Rhapsody of Rivets," but this was outgrown as the work progressed.

"In the picture I was working on in Hollywood a year ago, a composer comes to the United States," said Mr. Gershwin, "and I decided to write some music which would express the composer's emotional reaction to New York.

"The sound of riveting on New York skyscrapers provided the theme. The movie producer took about four minutes of it. The entire "Rhapsody" now runs about 15 minutes.

"After I had finished the 'Rivets' theme I got into a broad, flowing movement which strikes me as almost religious in effect.

"The new 'Rhapsody' is not a continuation of my first. It is broader and deeper. It has but four movements, whereas the 'Rapsody in Blue' was a pot pouri of a number of themes.

"And it will not be as popular."

The new work will be played by the regulation orchestra, including pianos. There will be no saxophones. The riveting effects will be taken by the trombones and allied instruments, according to the Assocaited Press.

Gershwin, who never touched a piano until he was 12 years old and who set himself to a serious study of musical technique and orchestration after he already had won success in Tin Pan Alley, was born inBrooklyn Sept. 26, 1898, in a nonmusical family.

At 16 he was a piano pounder in Remick's at $15 a week and his first active contact with the theater was playing the piano at rehearsals of "Miss 1917."

In 1919 the song "Swanee," sung by Al Jolson in "Sinbad," lifted Gershwin into fame and fortune overnight. A succession of musical comedy successes followed, down to the current hit "Of Thee I sing."

THIS CLIPPING FROM WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

JAN 19 1932

NEW SCORE BY GERSHWIN TO HAVE PREMIERE JAN. 29

Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Play "The Second Rhapsody" First Time in Public — Opus Started as Incidental Film Music

NEW YORK, Jan. 19 (AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore. "The Second Rhapsody," it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra on Jan. 29 and 30, and will be heard in ~~Carnegie hall~~ in New York on Feb. 5, almost eight years to the day from the time his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian hall.

RIVETING PROVIDES THEME FOR MUSIC

GEORGE GERSHWIN

The new work, which like the 1924 opus will employ some syncopation, some blue embellishments and some jazz, started out as incidental music to a motion picture, but broadened into its present form as Gershwin developed his theme. The preliminary title was "Rhapsody of Rivets" but this was outgrown as the work progressed.

Began As Film Music

The composer began the composition last year in Hollywood while under contract to supply music for a talkie. As this required only a few songs Gershwin decided also to do a serious piece of work, and put seven weeks into it.

"In the picture a composer comes to the United States," said Mr. Gershwin, as he turned from the piano in his modernistic pent house apartment overlooking the broad sweep of the Hudson, "and I decided to write some music which would express the composer's emotional reaction to New York. The music was to run as an underlying theme through a certain part of the picture.

"The sound of riveting on New York skyscrapers provided the theme. The movie producers was to use as much of the material as he wished, and he took about four minutes of it. The entire rhapsody now runs about 15 minutes.

"After I had finished the 'rivets' theme I got into a broad, flowing movement which strikes me as almost religious in effect. The work developed beyond the first conception and so the title was changed.

"A composer shouldn't try to make a title mean too much. Take the 'Rhapsody in Blue' for instance. Everybody has read a meaning into it except me."

Gershwin wrote only the piano score in Hollywood. The orchestration was developed after his return to New York.

Broader Than First

"The new rhapsody is not a continuation of my first," the composer said. "It is broader and deeper. It has but four movements, whereas the 'Rhapsody in Blue' was a pot pourri of a number of themes, written hurriedly for a set event."

"And it will not be as popular."

The New Work will be played by the regulation orchestra, including pianos. There will be no saxophones. The riveting effects will be taken by the trombones and allied instruments.

Gershwin, who never touched a piano until he was 12 years old, and who set himself to a serious study of musical technique and orchestration after he already had won success in Tin Pan Alley was born in Brooklyn, Sept. 26, 1898, in a non-musical family. At 16 he was a piano pounder in Remick's at $15 a week and his first active contact with the theater was playing the piano at rehearsals of "Miss 1917."

First Song Hit

In 1919, the song "Swanee," sung by Al Jolson in "Sinbad" lifted Gershwin into fame and fortune overnight. A succession of musical comedy successes followed, down to the current hit "Of Thee I Sing."

The now historic concert by Paul Whiteman and his band on Feb. 12, 1924, introduced Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue," undoubtedly his best known and best liked composition. Later came "The Concerto in F," the "Jazz Preludes," and "An American in Paris."

Gershwin constantly is working, studying, pressing toward a higher musical goal.

"Yes, I would like to write a grand opera," he said, "but the difficulty is in getting a good libretto. Even in musical comedy the libretto is the main thing. Good music cannot carry a poor libretto."

As a relaxation Gershwin has turned to painting. He took it up just the other day, and his first oil, a portrait, was turned out in three days. Previously he had done some pen and ink work.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

JAN 19 1932

George Gershwin Writes Encore, "Second Rhapsody"

Riveting Sounds on N. Y. Skyscrapers Provide His Theme

New York, Jan. 19.—(AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore.

"The Second Rhapsody," it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Jan. 29 and 30, and will be heard in Carnegie Hall in New York on Feb. 5, almost eight years to the day from the time his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian Hall.

The new work, which like the 1924 opus will employ some syncopation, some blue embellishments and some jazz, started out as incidental music to a motion picture, but broadened into its present form as Gershwin developed his theme. The preliminary title was "Rhapsody of Rivets," but this was outgrown as the work progressed.

The composer began the composition last year in Hollywood while under contract to supply music for a talkie. As this required only a few songs Gershwin decided also to do a serious piece of work, and put seven weeks into it.

"In the picture a composer comes to the United States," said Mr. Gershwin, as he turned from the piano in his modernistic pent house apartment overlooking the broad sweep of the Hudson, and I decided to write some music which would express the composer's emotional reaction to New York. The music was to run as an underlying theme through a certain part of the picture.

GEORGE GERSHWIN.

"The sound of riveting on New York skyscrapers provided the theme. The movie producer was to use as much of the material as he wished, and he took about four minutes of it. The entire rhapsody now runs about 15 minutes.

"After I had finished the 'rivets' theme I got into a broad, flowing movement which strikes me as almost religious in effect. The work developed beyond the first conception and so the title was changed.

"A composer shouldn't try to make a title mean too much. Take the 'Rhapsody in Blue' for instance. Everybody has read a meaning into it except me."

Gershwin wrote only the piano score in Hollywood. The orchestration was developed after his return to New York.

"The new rhapsody is not a continuation of my first," the composer said. "It is broader and deeper. It has but four movements, whereas the 'Rhapsody in Blue' was a pot pourri of a number of themes, written hurriedly for a set event."

"And it will not be as popular."

The new work will be played by the regulation orchestra, including pianos. There will be no saxophones. The riveting effects will be taken by the trombones and allied instruments.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
OMAHA, NEB.
EVE. BEE NEWS

JAN 19 1932

NEW YORK, Jan. 19, (AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore.

"The Second Rhapsody," it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra Jan. ~~29 and 30, an~~d will be heard in Carnegie hall in New York Feb. 5, almost eight years to the day his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian hall.

The New York, which like the 1924 opus will employ some syncopation, some blue embellishments and some jazz, started out as incidental music to a motion picture, but broadened into its present form as Gershwin developed his theme. The preliminary title was "Rhapsody of Rivets."

The composer began the composition last year in Hollywood while under contract to supply music for a talkie. As this required only a few songs, Gershwin decided also to do a serious piece of work, and put seven weeks into it.

"In the picture a composer comes to the United States," said Gershwin, "and I decided to write some music which would express the composer's emotional reaction to New York.

"The sound of riveting on New York skyscrapers provided the theme. The movie producer was to use as much of the material as he wished, and he took about 4 minute of it. The entire rhapsody now runs about 15 minutes.

"After I finished the 'Rivets' theme I got into a broad, flowing movement which strikes me as almost religious in effect. The work developed beyond the first conception and so the title was changed."

The work will be played by the regulation orchestra, including pianos. There will be no saxophones. The riviting effect will be taken by the trombones and allied instruments.

Gershwin, who never touched a piano until he was 12 years old, and who set himself to a serious study of musical technique and orchestration after he already had won success in Tin Pan alley, was born in Brooklyn, Sept. 26, 1898. At 16, he was a piano pounder in Remick's at $15 a week and his first active contact with the theater was playing the piano at rehearsals of "Miss 1917."

In 1919, the song "Swanee," sung by Al Jolson in "Sinbad," lifted Gershwin into fame and fortune. A succession of musical comedy followed.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ST. JOSEPH, MICH.
HERALD PRESS

JAN 19 1932

Gershwin Follows Through With "Second Rhapsody"

NEW YORK, Jan. 19 (AP).—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore.

"The Second Rhapsody," it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra on Jan. 29 ~~and 30, and~~ will be heard in Carnegie hall in New York on Feb. 5, almost eight years to the day from the time his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian hall.

The new work, which like the 1924 opus will employ some syncopation, some blue embellishments and some jazz, started out as incidental music to a motion picture, but broadened into its present form as Gershwin developed his theme. The preliminary title was "Rhapsody of Rivets," but this was outgrown as the work progressed.

The composer began the composition last year in Hollywood while under contract to supply music for a talkie. As this required only a few songs Gershwin decided also to do a serious piece of work, and put seven weeks into it.

Rivets to Religion

"In the picture a composer comes to the United States," said Mr. Gershwin, as he turned from the piano in his modernistic pent house apartment overlooking the broad sweep of the Hudson, "and I decided to write some music which would express the composer's emotional reaction to New York. The music was to run as an underlying theme through a certain part of the picture.

"The sound of riveting on New York skyscrapers provided the theme. The movie producer was to use as much of the material as he wished, and he took about four minutes of it. The entire rhapsody now runs about 15 minutes.

"After I had finished the 'rivets' theme I got into a broad, flowing movement which strikes me as almost religious in effect. The work developed beyond the first conception and so the title was changed.

"A composer shouldn't try to make a title mean too much. Take the 'Rhapsody in Blue' for instance. Everybody has read a meaning into it except me."

THIS CLIPPING FROM POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y.
STAR

JAN 19 1932

Riveters Inspire Another George Gershwin Rhapsody

NEW YORK. — (AP) — George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore.

"The Second Rhapsody," it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra Janu~~ary 29 and 30,~~ and will be heard in Carnegie hall in New York February 5, almost eight years to the day from the time his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian hall.

The new work, which like the 1924 opus will employ some syncopation, some blue embellishments and some jazz, started out as incidental music to a motion picture, but broadened into its present form as Gershwin developed his theme. The preliminary title was "Rhapsody of Rivets," but this was outgrown as the work progressed.

The composer began the composition last year in Hollywood while under contract to supply music for a talkie. As this required only a few songs Gershwin decided also to do a serious piece of work, and put seven weeks into it.

"In the picture a composer comes to the United States," said Mr. Gershwin, as he turned from the piano in his modernistic penthouse apartment overlooking the broad sweep of the Hudson, "and I decided to write some music which would express the composer's emotional reaction to New York. The music was to run as an underlying theme through a certain part of the picture.

"The sound of riveting on New York skyscrapers provided the theme. The movie producer was to use as much of the material as he wished, and he took about four minutes of it. The entire rhapsody now runs about 15 minutes.

"After I had finished the 'rivets' theme I got into a broad, floating movement which strikes me as almost religious in effect. The work developed beyond the first conception and so the title was changed.

"A composer shouldn't try to make a title mean too much. Take the "Rhapsody in Blue' for instance. Everybody has read a meaning into it except me."

THIS CLIPPING FROM BINGHAMTON, N. Y.
PRESS

JAN 19 1932

Gershwin Writes New Rhapsody, Inspired by Clatter of Riveting

New York, Jan. 19 — (Associated Press) — George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore.

"The Second Rhapsody," it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra on Jan. ~~29~~ and 30, and will be heard in Carnegie Hall in New York on Feb. 5, almost eight years to the day from the time his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian Hall.

The New York, which like the 1924 opus will employ some syncopation, some blue embellishments and some jazz, started out as incidental music to a motion picture, but broadened into its present form as Gershwin developed his theme. The sound of riveting machines on New York skyscrapers provided the original theme.

The composer began the composition last year in Hollywood while under contract to supply music for a talkie. As this required only a few songs Gershwin decided also to do a serious piece of work, and put seven weeks into it.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DULUTH, MINN.
HERALD

JAN 19 1932

GERSHWIN HAS NEW ORCHESTRAL WORK

New York, Jan. 19.—(AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore.

"The Second Rhapsody," it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra on Ja~~n. 29 and~~ 30, and will be heard in Carnegie hall in New York on Feb. 5, almost eight years to the day from the time his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian hall.

The new work, which, like the 1924 opus, will employ some syncopation, some blue embellishments and some jazz, started out as incidental music to a motion picture, but broadened into its present form as Gershwin developed his theme. The preliminary title was "Rhapsody of Rivets," but this was outgrown as the work progressed,

THIS CLIPPING FROM WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

JAN 19 1932

NEW SCORE BY GERSHWIN TO HAVE PREMIERE JAN. 29

Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Play "The Second Rhapsody" First Time in Public — Opus Started as Incidental Film Music

NEW YORK, Jan. 19 (AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore. "The Second Rhapsody," it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra on Jan. 29 and 30, and will be heard in ~~Carnegie hall~~ in New York on Feb. 5, almost eight years to the day from the time his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian hall.

RIVETING PROVIDES THEME FOR MUSIC

GEORGE GERSHWIN

The new work, which like the 1924 opus will employ some syncopation, some blue embellishments and some jazz, started out as incidental music to a motion picture, but broadened into its present form as Gershwin developed his theme. The preliminary title was "Rhapsody of Rivets" but this was outgrown as the work progressed.

Began As Film Music

The composer began the composition last year in Hollywood while under contract to supply music for a talkie. As this required only a few songs Gershwin decided also to do a serious piece of work, and put seven weeks into it.

"In the picture a composer comes to the United States," said Mr. Gershwin, as he turned from the piano in his modernistic pent house apartment overlooking the broad sweep of the Hudson, "and I decided to write some music which would express the composer's emotional reaction to New York. The music was to run as an underlying theme through a certain part of the picture.

"The sound of riveting on New York skyscrapers provided the theme. The movie producers was to use as much of the material as he wished, and he took about four minutes of it. The entire rhapsody now runs about 15 minutes.

"After I had finished the 'rivets' theme I got into a broad, flowing movement which strikes me as almost religious in effect. The work developed beyond the first conception and so the title was changed.

"A composer shouldn't try to make a title mean too much. Take the 'Rhapsody in Blue' for instance. Everybody has read a meaning into it except me."

Gershwin wrote only the piano score in Hollywood. The orchestration was developed after his return to New York.

Broader Than First

"The new rhapsody is not a continuation of my first," the composer said. "It is broader and deeper. It has but four movements, whereas the 'Rhapsody in Blue' was a pot pourri of a number of themes, written hurriedly for a set event."

"And it will not be as popular."

The New Work will be played by the regulation orchestra, including pianos. There will be no saxophones. The riveting effects will be taken by the trombones and allied instruments.

Gershwin, who never touched a piano until he was 12 years old, and who set himself to a serious study of musical technique and orchestration after he already had won success in Tin Pan Alley was born in Brooklyn, Sept. 26, 1898, in a non-musical family. At 16 he was a piano pounder in Remick's at $15 a week and his first active contact with the theater was playing the piano at rehearsals of "Miss 1917."

First Song Hit

In 1919, the song "Swanee," sung by Al Jolson in "Sinbad" lifted Gershwin into fame and fortune overnight. A succession of musical comedy successes followed, down to the current hit "Of Thee I Sing."

The now historic concert by Paul Whiteman and his band on Feb. 12, 1924, introduced Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue," undoubtedly his best known and best liked composition. Later came "The Concerto in F." the "Jazz Preludes," and "An American in Paris."

Gershwin constantly is working, studying, pressing toward a higher musical goal.

"Yes, I would like to write a grand opera," he said, "but the difficulty is in getting a good libretto. Even in musical comedy the libretto is the main thing. Good music cannot carry a poor libretto."

As a relaxation Gershwin has turned to painting. He took it up just the other day, and his first oil, a portrait, was turned out in three days. Previously he had done some pen and ink work.

THIS CLIPPING FROM POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y.
STAR

JAN 19 1932

Riveters Inspire Another George Gershwin Rhapsody

NEW YORK.—(AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore.

"The Second Rhapsody," it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra January ~~29 and 30~~, and will be heard in Carnegie hall in New York February 5, almost eight years to the day from the time his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian hall.

The new work, which like the 1924 opus will employ some syncopation, some blue embellishments and some jazz, started out as incidental music to a motion picture, but broadened into its present form as Gershwin developed his theme. The preliminary title was "Rhapsody of Rivets," but this was outgrown as the work progressed.

The composer began the composition last year in Hollywood while under contract to supply music for a talkie. As this required only a few songs Gershwin decided also to do a serious piece of work, and put seven weeks into it.

"In the picture a composer comes to the United States," said Mr. Gershwin, as he turned from the piano in his modernistic penthouse apartment overlooking the broad sweep of the Hudson, "and I decided to write some music which would express the composer's emotional reaction to New York. The music was to run as an underlying theme through a certain part of the picture.

"The sound of riveting on New York skyscrapers provided the theme. The movie producer was to use as much of the material as he wished, and he took about four minutes of it. The entire rhapsody now runs about 15 minutes.

"After I had finished the 'rivets' theme I got into a broad, floating movement which strikes me as almost religious in effect. The work developed beyond the first conception and so the title was changed.

"A composer shouldn't try to make a title mean too much. Take the 'Rhapsody in Blue' for instance. Everybody has read a meaning into it except me."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

JAN 19 1932

George Gershwin W Encore, "Second warrants. More than this the ba say they will not accept.

The General Assembly of Illino been asked for relief. A plan rev ing the tax machinery has been pre ed which carries the approval o officials and has the backing of a number of the Cook county delegat the Assembly.

TALL CEDARS OF LEBANO

Riveting Sounds on N. Y. Skyscrapers Provide His Theme

GEORGE GERSHWIN.

New York, Jan. 19.—(AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore.

"The Second Rhapsody," it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Jan. 29 and 30, and will be heard in Carnegie Hall in New York on Feb. 5, almost eight years to the day from the time his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian Hall.

The new work, which like the 1924 opus will employ some syncopation, some blue embellishments and some jazz, started out as incidental music to a motion picture, but broadened into its present form as Gershwin developed his theme. The preliminary title was "Rhapsody of Rivets," but this was outgrown as the work progressed.

The composer began the composition last year in Hollywood while under contract to supply music for a talkie. As this required only a few songs Gershwin decided also to do a serious piece of work, and put seven weeks into it.

"In the picture a composer comes to the United States," said Mr. Gershwin, as he turned from the piano in his modernistic pent house apartment overlooking the broad sweep of the Hudson, and I decided to write some music which would express the composer's emotional reaction to New York. The music was to run as an underlying theme through a certain part of the picture.

"The sound of riveting on New York skyscrapers provided the theme. The movie producer was to use as much of the material as he wished, and he took about four minutes of it. The entire rhapsody now runs about 15 minutes.

"After I had finished the 'rivets' theme I got into a broad, flowing movement which strikes me as almost religious in effect. The work developed beyond the first conception and so the title was changed.

"A composer shouldn't try to make a title mean too much. Take the 'Rhapsody in Blue' for instance. Everybody has read a meaning into it except me."

Gershwin wrote only the piano score in Hollywood. The orchestration was developed after his return to New York.

"The new rhapsody is not a continua-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ST. JOSEPH, MICH.
HERALD PRESS

JAN 19 1932

Gershwin Follows Through With "Second Rhapsody"

NEW YORK, Jan. 19 (AP).—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore.

"The Second Rhapsody," it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra on Jan. 29 ~~and 30, and~~ will be heard in Carnegie hall in New York on Feb. 5, almost eight years to the day from the time his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian hall.

The new work, which like the 1924 opus will employ some syncopation, some blue embellishments and some jazz, started out as incidental music to a motion picture, but broadened into its present form as Gershwin developed his theme. The preliminary title was "Rhapsody of Rivets," but this was outgrown as the work progressed.

The composer began the composition last year in Hollywood while under contract to supply music for a talkie. As this required only a few songs Gershwin decided also to do a serious piece of work, and put seven weeks into it.

Rivets to Religion

"In the picture a composer comes to the United States," said Mr. Gershwin, as he turned from the piano in his modernistic pent house apartment overlooking the broad sweep of the Hudson, "and I decided to write some music which would express the composer's emotional reaction to New York. The music was to run as an underlying theme through a certain part of the picture.

"The sound of riveting on New York skyscrapers provided the theme. The movie producer was to use as much of the material as he wished, and he took about four minutes of it. The entire rhapsody now runs about 15 minutes.

"After I had finished the 'rivets' theme I got into a broad, flowing movement which strikes me as almost religious in effect. The work developed beyond the first conception and so the title was changed.

"A composer shouldn't try to make a title mean too much. Take the 'Rhapsody in Blue' for instance. Everybody has read a meaning into it except me."

THIS CLIPPING FROM BINGHAMTON, N. Y.
PRESS

JAN 19 1932

Gershwin Writes New Rhapsody, Inspired by Clatter of Riveting

New York, Jan. 19—(Associated Press)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore.

"The Second Rhapsody," it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra on Jan. 29 and 30, and will be heard in Carnegie Hall in New York on Feb. 5, almost eight years to the day from the time his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian Hall.

The New York, which like the 1924 opus will employ some syncopation, some blue embellishments and some jazz, started out as incidental music to a motion picture, but broadened into its present form as Gershwin developed his theme. The sound of riveting machines on New York skyscrapers provided the original theme.

The composer began the composition last year in Hollywood while under contract to supply music for a talkie. As this required only a few songs Gershwin decided also to do a serious piece of work, and put seven weeks into it.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
OMAHA, NEB.
EVE. BEE NEWS

JAN 19 1932

NEW GERSHWIN RHAPSODY HAS RIVET THEME

NEW YORK, Jan. 19, (AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore.

"The Second Rhapsody," it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra Jan. ~~29 and 30, and~~ will be heard in Carnegie hall in New York Feb. 5, almost eight years to the day his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian hall.

The New York, which like the 1924 opus will employ some syncopation, some blue embellishments and some jazz, started out as incidental music to a motion picture, but broadened into its present form as Gershwin developed his theme. The preliminary title was "Rhapsody of Rivets."

The composer began the composition last year in Hollywood while under contract to supply music for a talkie. As this required only a few songs, Gershwin decided also to do a serious piece of work, and put seven weeks into it.

"In the picture a composer comes to the United States," said Gershwin, "and I decided to write some music which would express the composer's emotional reaction to New York.

"The sound of riveting on New York skyscrapers provided the theme. The movie producer was to use as much of the material as he wished, and he took about 4 minute of it. The entire rhapsody now runs about 15 minutes.

"After I finished the 'Rivets' theme I got into a broad, flowing movement which strikes me as almost religious in effect. The work developed beyond the first conception and so the title was changed."

The work will be played by the regulation orchestra, including pianos. There will be no saxophones. The riviting effect will be taken by the trombones and allied instruments.

Gershwin, who never touched a piano until he was 12 years old, and who set himself to a serious study of musical technique and orchestration after he already had won success in Tin Pan alley, was born in Brooklyn, Sept. 26, 1898. At 16, he was a piano pounder in Remick's at $15 a week and his first active contact with the theater was playing the piano at rehearsals of "Miss 1917."

In 1919, the song "Swanee," sung by Al Jolson in "Sinbad," lifted Gershwin into fame and fortune. A succession of musical comedy followed.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DULUTH, MINN.
HERALD

JAN 19 1932

GERSHWIN HAS NEW ORCHESTRAL WORK

New York, Jan. 19.—(AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore.

"The Second Rhapsody," it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra on Jan. ~~29 and~~ 30, and will be heard in Carnegie hall in New York on Feb. 5, almost eight years to the day from the time his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian hall.

The new work, which, like the 1924 opus, will employ some syncopation, some blue embellishments and some jazz, started out as incidental music to a motion picture, but broadened into its present form as Gershwin developed his theme. The preliminary title was "Rhapsody of Rivets," but this was outgrown as the work progressed.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH TELEGRAM

110

JAN 19 1932

Gershwin, Whose 'Rhapsody in Blue' Marked High Point in Development Of Modern Music, Composes Encore

New Work Will Be Given Premiere by Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CHARLES HONCE
Associated Press Staff Writer

NEW YORK, Jan. 19—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore.

"The Second Rhapsody," it is called, and it will be played by the Boston symphony orchestra on ~~January 29~~ and 30, and will be heard in Carnegie hall in New York on February 5, almost eight years to the day from the time his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian hall.

The new work, which like the 1924 opus will employ some syncopation, some blue embellishments and some jazz, started out as incidental music to a motion picture, but broadened into its present form as Gershwin developed his theme. The preliminary title was "Rhapsody of Rivets," but this was outgrown as the work progressed.

The composer began the position last year in Hollywood while under contract to supply music for a talkie. As this required only a few songs, Gershwin decided also to do a serious piece of work, and put seven weeks into it.

EXPLAINS THEME

"In the picture a composer comes to the United States," said Mr. Gershwin, as he turned from the piano in his modernistic penthouse apartment overlooking the broad sweep of the Hudson, "and I decided to write some music which would express the composer's emotional reaction to New York. The music was to run as an underlying theme through a certain part of the picture.

"The sound of riveting on New York skyscrapers provided the theme. The movie producer was to use as much of the material as he wished, and he took four minutes of it. The entire rhapsody now runs about 15 minutes.

"After I had finished the 'rivets' theme I got into a broad, flowing movement which strikes me as almost religious in effect. The work developed beyond the first conception and so the title was changed.

"A composer shouldn't try to make a title mean too much. Take the 'Rhapsody in Blue,' for instance. Everybody has read a meaning into it except me."

Gershwin wrote only the piano score in Hollywood. The orchestration was developed after his return to New York.

"The new rhapsody is not a continuation of my first," the composer said. "It is broader and deeper. It has but four movements, whereas the 'Rhapsody in Blue' was a potpouri of a number of themes, written hurriedly for a set event.

WON'T BE AS POPULAR

"And it will not be as popular."

The new work will be played by the regulation orchestra, including pianos. There will be no saxophones. The riveting effects will be taken by the trombones and allied instruments.

Gershwin, who never touched a piano until he was 12 years old, and who set himself to a serious study of musical technique and orchestration after he already had won success in Tin Pan alley, was born in Brooklyn September 26, 1898, in a non-musical family. At 16 he was a piano pounder in Remick's at $15 a week and his first active contact with the theater was playing the piano at rehearsals of "Miss 1917."

"Rhapsody in Blue," undoubtedly his best known and best liked composition. Later came "The Concerto in F," the "Jazz Preludes," and "An American in Paris."

CONSTANTLY WORKING

Gershwin constantly is working, studying, pressing toward a higher musical goal.

"Yes, I would like to write a grand opera," he said, "but the difficulty is in getting a good libretto. Even in musical comedy the libretto is the main thing. Good music cannot carry

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ST. JOSEPH, MO.
NEWS-PRESS

JAN 19 1932

NEW RHAPSODY OUT

Gershwin Produces Another Work in Blue.

Second One Is Broader and Deeper—Boston Symphony to Introduce It.

NEW YORK, Jan. 19.—(AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore.

"The Second Rhapsody" it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on ~~Jan.~~ 29 and 30, and will be heard in Carnegie Hall in New York on Feb. 5, almost eight years to the day from the time his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian Hall.

The new work, which like the 1924 opus will employ some syncopation, some blue embellishments and some jazz, started out as incidental music to a motion picture, but broadened into its present form as Gershwin developed his theme. The preliminary title was "Rhapsody of Rivets," but this was outgrown as the work progressed.

The composer began the composition last year in Hollywood while under contract to supply music for a talkie. As this required only a few songs Gershwin decided also to do a serious piece of work, and put seven weeks into it.

Riveters Inspired Theme.

"In the picture a composer comes to the United States," said Mr. Gershwin, as he turned from the piano in his modernistic penthouse apartment overlooking the broad sweep of the Hudson, "and I decided to write some music which would express the composer's emotional reaction to New York. The music was to run as an underlying theme through a certain part of the picture.

"The sound of riveting on New York skyscrapers provided the movie producer was to turned to painting. He took it up just the other day, and his first oil, a portrait, was turned out in three days. Previously he had done some pen and ink work.

movement which strikes me as almost religious in effect. The work developed beyond the first conception and so the title was changed.

In Four Movements.

"A composed shouldn't try to make a title mean too much. Take the 'Rhapsody in Blue' for instance. Everybody has read a meaning into it except me."

Gershwin wrote only the piano score in Hollywood. The orchestration was developed after his return to New York.

"The new rhapsody is not a continuation of my first," the composer said. "It is broader and deeper. It has but four movements, whereas the 'Rhapsody in Blue' was a potpouri of a number of themes, written hurriedly for a set event.

"And it will not be as popular."

The new work will be played by the regulation orchestra, including pianos. There will be no saxophones. The riveting effects will be taken by the trombones and allied instruments.

Fame Came in 1919.

Gershwin, who never touched a piano until he was twelve years old, and who set himself to a serious study of musical technique and orchestration after he already had won success in tin pan alley, was born in Brooklyn, Sept. 26, 1898, in a non-musical family. At sixteen he was a piano pounder in Remick's at $15 a week, and his first active contract with the theater was playing the piano at rehearsals of "Miss 1917."

In 1919 the song "Swanee," sung by Al Jolson in "Sinbad," lifted Gershwin into fame and fortune overnight. A succession of musical comedy successes followed, down to the current hit "Of Thee I Sing."

THIS CLIPPING FROM AKRON, OHIO
BEACON-JOURNAL

JAN 19 1932

PRESENTATION PLANNED

By CHARLES HONCE
Associated Press Staff Writer

NEW YORK, Jan. 19. — George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore.

"The Second Rhapsody," it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra on Jan. ~~29~~ and 30, and will be heard in Carnegie hall in New York on Feb. 5, almost eight years to the day from the time his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian hall.

Develops Theme

The New York, which like the 1924 opus will employ some syncopation, some blue embellishments and some jazz, started out as incidental music to a motion picture, but broadened into its present form as Gershwin developed his theme. The preliminary title was "Rhapsody in Rivets," but this was outgrown as the work progressed.

The composer began the composition last year in Hollywood while under contract to supply music for a talkie. As this required only a few songs Gershwin decided also to do a serious piece of work, and put seven weeks into it.

"In the picture a composer comes to the United States," said Mr. Gershwin, as he turned from the piano in his modernistic pent house apartment overlooking the broad sweep of the Hudson, "and I decided to write some music which would express the composer's emotional reaction to New York. The music was to run as an underlying theme throughout a certain part of the picture.

Runs 15 Minutes

"The sound of riveting on New York skyscrapers provided the theme. The movie producer was to use as much of the material as he wished, and he took about four minutes of it. The entire rhapsody now runs about 15 minutes.

"After I had finished the 'rivets' theme I got into a broad flowing movement which strikes me as almost religious in effect. The work developed beyond the first conception and so the title was changed.

"A composer shouldn't try to make a title mean too much. Take the 'Rhapsody in Blue,' for instance. Everybody has read a meaning into it except me."

Gershwin wrote only the piano score in Hollywood. The orchestration was developed after his return to New York.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CORSICANA, TEXAS
SUN

JAN 19 1932

THE SECOND RHAPSODY BY GEO. GERSHWIN EXPECTED TO MARK NEW MUSICAL HIGH

By CHARLES HONCE.

NEW YORK, Jan. 19.—(AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore.

"The Second Rhapsody," it is called, and it will be played by the Boston symphony orchestra Jan. 29 and 30, and will be heard in Carnegie Hall in New York Feb. 5, almost eight years to the day from the time his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian Hall.

The new work, which like the 1924 opus will employ some syncopation, some blue embellishments and some jazz, started out as incidental music to a motion picture but broadened into its present form as Gershwin developed his theme. The preliminary title was "Rhapsody of Rivets," but this was outgrown as the work progressed.

The composer began the composition last year in Hollywood while under contract to supply music for a talkie. As this required only a few songs Gershwin decided also to do a serious piece of work and put seven weeks into it.

"In the picture a composer comes to the United States," said Mr. Gershwin, "and I decided to write some music which would express the composer's emotional reaction to New York. The music was to run as an underlying theme through a certain part of the picture.

"The sound of riveting on New York skyscrapers provided the theme. The movie producer was to use as much of the material as he wished, and he took about four minutes of it. The entire rhapsody now runs about 15 minutes.

"After I had finished the 'Rivets' theme I got into a broad, flowing movement which strikes me as almost religious in effect. The work developed beyond the first conception and so the title was changed.

"The new rhapsody is not a continuation of my first," the composer said. "It is broader and deeper. It has but four movements, whereas the 'Rhapsody in Blue' was a pot pouri of a number of themes, written hurriedly for a set event.

THIS CLIPPING FROM JAMESTOWN, N. Y.
EVE. JOURNAL

JAN 19 1932

Boston Symphony Orchestra To Play George Gershwin's Encore to 'Rapsody In Blue'

NEW YORK—(AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore.

"The Second Rhapsody," it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra on Jan. 29 and 30, and will be heard in Carnegie hall in New York on Feb. 5, almost eight years to the day from the time his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aelian hall.

The New York, which like the 1924 opue will employ some syncopation, some blue embellishments and some jazz, started out as incidental music to a motion picture, but broadened into its present form as Gershwin developed his theme. The preliminary title was "Rhapsody of Rivets," but this was outgrown as the work progressed.

The composer began the composition last year in Hollywood while under contract to supply music for a talkie. As this required only a few songs Gershwin decided also to do a serious piece of work, and put seven weeks into it.

"In the picture a composer comes to the United States," said Mr. Gershwin, as he turned from the piano in his modernistic pent house apartment overlooking the broad sweep of the Hudson, and I decided to write some music which would express the composer's emotional reaction to New York. The music was to run as an underlying theme thru a certain part of the picture.

"The sound of riveting on New York skyscrapers provided the theme. The movie producer was to use as much of the material as he wished, and he took about four minutes of it. The entire rhapsody now runs about 15 minutes.

"After I had finished the 'rivets' theme I got into a broad flowing movement which strikes me as almost religious in effect. The work developed beyond the first conception and so the title was changed.

"A composer shouldn't try to make a title mean too much. Take the 'Rapsody in Blue' for instance Everybody has read a meaning into it except me."

JAN 19 1932

Spotlight

Gershwin's Newest Piece to Be Played by Boston Symphony. — Crook Who Fled from Devil's Island Dies.—No Spare Pants in New York.

GEORGE GERSHWIN, composer of the much-radioed "Rhapsody in Blue." has written another piece. After suffering through a variety of names, as it was developed, it has come to be called simply "The Second Rhapsody." Paul Whiteman introduced the first of Gershwin's major compositions. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is to play this new one Jan. 29 and again on Jan. 30. With all due respect to Whiteman, that shows you how Gershwin has come along in the eight years since the "Rhapsody in Blue" first burst upon the amazed public. "The Second Rhapsody" was originally the "Rhapsody of Rivets." One of the revolutionary features of the orchestration is that there will be no saxophones. Trombones will supply the riveting noises, confirming ideas lots of people have had all along about trombones. It expresses the reaction of an immigrant composer to New York. It was first done as incidental music for a motion picture, but outgrew itself, Gershwin is anxious to write a grand opera, but cannot find a good libretto. He has also taken up painting, and in the past three days has turned out his first masterpiece, which he found a great relaxation.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST

JAN 19 1932

New Rhapsody by George Gershwin

George Gershwin has written a second rhapsody which will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in that city ~~January 29 and 30~~ and in this city in Carnegie Hall at its concert of February 5. According to Mr. Gershwin, the theme of the rhapsody, which runs fifteen minutes, was at first the sound of riveting on New York skyscrapers, and the preliminary title was "Rhapsody of Rivets." Later, as the theme was expanded, the composer dropped the title as a misnomer.

"The new rhapsody is not a continuation of my first 'Rhapsody in Blue,'" says Mr. Gershwin, "it is broader and deeper. It has but four movements, whereas the other was a potpourri of a number of themes, written hurriedly for a set event.

"And it will not be as popular."

THIS CLIPPING FROM OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.
TIMES

JAN 19 1932

George Gershwin Has New Rhapsody Written

NEW YORK, Jan. 19.—(AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore.

"The Second Rhapsody," it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra on January 29 and 30, and will be heard in Carnegie hall in New York on February 5, almost eight years to the day from

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
NEWS

JAN 19 1932

Gershwin Writes Rhapsody Encore.

NEW YORK, January 19 (A.P.)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore. "The Second Rhapsody," it is termed, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on ~~January 29~~ and 30, and will be heard in Carnegie hall in New York on February 5.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CINCINNATI, OHIO
TIMES-STAR

JAN 19 1932

Gershwin Writes Another Rhapsody

Will Be Given Premiere by Boston Symphony Orchestra.

NEW YORK, January 19—(AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore.

"The Second Rhapsody," it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on ~~January 29~~ and 30, and will be heard in Carnegie Hall in New York on February 5, almost eight years to the day from the time his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian Hall.

The new work, which like the 1924 opus, will employ some syncopation, some blue embellishments and some jazz, started out as incidental music to a motion picture, but broadened into its present form as Gershwin developed his theme. The preliminary title was "Rhapsody of Rivets," but this was outgrown as the work progressed.

The composer began the composition last year in Hollywood, while under contract to supply music for a talkie. As this required only a few songs Gershwin decided also to do a serious piece of work, and put seven weeks into it.

Gershwin wrote only the piano score in Hollywood. The orchestration was developed after his return to New York.

"The new rhapsody is not a continuation of my first," the composer said. "It is broader and deeper. It has ony four movements, whereas the 'Rhapsody in Blue' was a pot pouri of a number of themes, written hurriedly for a set event.

The number of motor vehicles in use in Switzerland has more than doubled since 1925.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
TELEGRAM

110 JAN 1 9 1932

Gershwin, Whose 'Rhapsody in Blue' Marked High Point in Development Of Modern Music, Composes Encore

New Work Will Be Given Premiere by Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CHARLES HONCE
Associated Press Staff Writer

NEW YORK, Jan. 19—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore.

"The Second Rhapsody," it is called, and it will be played by the Boston symphony orchestra on Janu~~ary 29~~ and 30, and will be heard in Carnegie hall in New York on February 5, almost eight years to the day from the time his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian hall.

The new work, which like the 1924 opus will employ some syncopation, some blue embellishments and some jazz, started out as incidental music to a motion picture, but broadened into its present form as Gershwin developed his theme. The preliminary title was "Rhapsody of Rivets," but this was outgrown as the work progressed.

The composer began the position last year in Hollywood while under contract to supply music for a talkie. As this required only a few songs, Gershwin decided also to do a serious piece of work, and put seven weeks into it.

EXPLAINS THEME

"In the picture a composer comes to the United States," said Mr. Gershwin, as he turned from the piano in his modernistic penthouse apartment overlooking the broad sweep of the Hudson, "and I decided to write some music which would express the composer's emotional reaction to New York. The music was to run as an underlying theme through a certain part of the picture.

"The sound of riveting on New York skyscrapers provided the theme. The movie producer was to use as much of the material as he wished, and he took four minutes of it. The entire rhapsody now runs about 15 minutes.

"After I had finished the 'rivets' theme I got into a broad, flowing movement which strikes me as almost religious in effect. The work developed beyond the first conception and so the title was changed.

"A composer shouldn't try to make a title mean too much. Take the 'Rhapsody in Blue,' for instance. Everybody has read a meaning into it except me."

Gershwin wrote only the piano score in Hollywood. The orchestration was developed after his return to New York.

"The new rhapsody is not a continuation of my first," the composer said. "It is broader and deeper. It has but four movements, whereas the 'Rhapsody in Blue' was a potpouri of a number of themes, written hurriedly for a set event.

WON'T BE AS POPULAR

"And it will not be as popular."

The new work will be played by the regulation orchestra, including pianos. There will be no saxophones. The riveting effects will be taken by the trombones and allied instruments.

Gershwin, who never touched a piano until he was 12 years old, and who set himself to a serious study of musical technique and orchestration after he already had won success in Tin Pan alley, was born in Brooklyn September 26, 1898, in a nonmusical family. At 16 he was a [illegible] pounder in Remick's at $15 a week and his first active contact with the theater was playing the piano at rehearsals of "Miss 1917."

In 1919, the song "Swanee," sung by Al Jolson in "Sinbad," lifted Gershwin into fame and fortune overnight. A succession of musical comedy successes followed down to the current hit "Of Thee I Sing."

The now historic concert by Paul Whiteman and his band on February 12, 1924, introduced Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue," undoubtedly his best known and best liked composition. Later came "The Concerto in F," the "Jazz Preludes," and "An American in Paris."

CONSTANTLY WORKING

Gershwin constantly is working, studying, pressing toward a higher musical goal.

"Yes, I would like to write a grand opera," he said, "but the difficulty is in getting a good libretto. Even in musical comedy the libretto is the main thing. Good music cannot carry a poor libretto."

As a relaxation Gershwin has color, size or quantity; highest grade materials; lowest prices in west. For quotations. Was. 7995: 848 State.

126 Lost and Found

PUPPY—Female wire-hair fox terrier, lost. Body black and white, head brown and almost eight years to the day from the time his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aelian hall.

---

The New York, which like the 1924 opus will employ some syncopation, some blue embellishments and some jazz, started out as incidental music to a motion picture, but broadened into its present form as Gershwin developed his theme. The preliminary title was "Rhapsody of Rivets," but this was outgrown as the work progressed.

The composition began the composition last year in Hollywood while under contract to supply music for a talkie. As this required only a few songs Gershwin decided also to do a serious piece of work, and put seven weeks into it.

"In the picture a composer comes to the United States," said Mr. Gershwin, as he turned from the piano in his modernistic pent house apartment overlooking the broad sweep of the Hudson, and I decided to write some music which would express the composer's emotional reaction to New York. The music was to run as an underlying theme thru a certain part of the picture.

"The sound of riveting on New York skyscrapers provided the theme. The movie producer was to use as much of the material as he wished, and he took about four minutes of it. The entire rhapsody now runs about 15 minutes.

"After I had finished the 'rivets' theme I got into a broad flowing movement which strikes me as almost religious in effect. The work developed beyond the first conception and so the title was changed.

"A composer shouldn't try to make a title mean too much. Take the 'Rapsody in Blue' for instance Everybody has read a meaning into it except me."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ST. JOSEPH, MO.
NEWS-PRESS

JAN 1 9 1932

INDICATED VALUES BASED ON TODAY'S SALES.

Cash Wheat.

No. 1 Dark hard	$0.52	@	.84
Hard, ord to ch	.51½	@	.84
No. 2 Dark hard	.51½	@	.83
Hard, ord to ch	.51	@	.83
No. 3 Dark hard	.51	@	.82
Hard, ord to ch	.50	@	.82
No. 4 Dark hard	.50	@	.80
Hard, ord to ch	.49	@	.80
No. 5 Dark hard	.49	@	.78
Hard, ord to gd	.48	@	.78
No. 1 Soft red	.53	@	.58
No. 2 Soft red	.52	@	.57
No. 3 Soft red	.51	@	.56
No. 4 Soft red	.50	@	.55
No. 5 Soft red	.48	@	.54

Corn.

No. 2 Yellow	$0.39½	@	.42
No. 3 Yellow	.38	@	.41

sody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore.

"The Second Rhapsody" it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on ~~Jan.~~ 29 and 30, and will be heard in Carnegie Hall in New York on Feb. 5, almost eight years to the day from the time his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian Hall.

The new work, which like the 1924 opus will employ some syncopation, some blue embellishments and some jazz, started out as incidental music to a motion picture, but broadened into its present form as Gershwin developed his theme. The preliminary title was "Rhapsody of Rivets," but this was outgrown as the work progressed.

The composer began the composition last year in Hollywood while under contract to supply music for a talkie. As this required only a few songs Gershwin decided also to do a serious piece of work, and put seven weeks into it.

Riveters Inspired Theme.

"In the picture a composer comes to the United States," said Mr. Gershwin, as he turned from the piano in his modernistic penthouse apartment overlooking the broad sweep of the Hudson, "and I decided to write some music which would express the composer's emotional reaction to New York. The music was to run as an underlying theme through a certain part of the picture.

"The sound of riveting on New York skyscrapers provided the theme. The movie producer was to use as much of the material as he wished, and he took about four minutes of it. The entire rhapsody now runs about fifteen minutes.

"After I had finished the 'rivets' theme I got into a broad, flowing movement which strikes me as almost religious in effect. The work developed beyond the first conception and so the title was changed.

In Four Movements.

"A eomposed shouldn't try to make a title mean too much. Take the 'Rhapsody in Blue' for instance. Everybody has read a meaning into it except me."

Gershwin wrote only the piano score in Hollywood. The orchestration was developed after his return to New York.

"The new rhapsody is not a continuation of my first," the composer said. "It is broader and deeper. It has but four movements, whereas the 'Rhapsody in Blue' was a potpouri of a number of themes, written hurriedly for a set event.

"And it will not be as popular."

The new work will be played by the regulation orchestra, including pianos. There will be no saxophones. The riveting effects will be taken by the trombones and allied instruments.

Fame Came in 1919.

Gershwin, who never touched a piano until he was twelve years old, and who set himself to a serious study of musical technique and orchestration after he already had

---

JAN 1 9 1932

Spotlight

Gershwin's Newest Piece to Be Played by Boston Symphony. — Crook Who Fled from Devil's Island Dies.—No Spare Pants in New York.

GEORGE GERSHWIN, composer of the much-radioed "Rhapsody in Blue," has written another piece. After suffering through a variety of names, as it was developed, it has come to be called simply "The Second Rhapsody." Paul Whiteman introduced the first of Gershwin's major compositions. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is to play this new one Jan. 29 and again on Jan. 30. With all due respect to Whiteman, that shows you how Gershwin has come along in the eight years since the "Rhapsody in Blue" first burst upon the amazed public. "The Second Rhapsody" was originally the "Rhapsody of Rivets." One of the revolutionary features of the orchestration is that there will be no saxophones. Trombones will supply the riveting noises, confirming ideas lots of people have had all along about trombones. It expresses the reaction of an immigrant composer to New York. It was first done as incidental music for a motion picture, but outgrew itself. Gershwin is anxious to write a grand opera, but cannot find a good libretto. He has also taken up painting, and in the past three days has turned out his first masterpiece, which he found a great relaxation.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST

JAN 1 9 1932

New Rhapsody by George Gershwin

George Gershwin has written a second rhapsody which will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in that city ~~January 29 and 30~~ and in this city in Carnegie Hall at its concert of February 5. According to Mr. Gershwin, the theme of the rhapsody, which runs fifteen minutes, was at first the sound of riveting on New York skyscrapers, and the preliminary title was "Rhapsody of Rivets." Later, as the theme was expanded, the composer dropped the title as a misnomer.

"The new rhapsody is not a continuation of my first 'Rhapsody in Blue,'" says Mr. Gershwin, "it is broader and deeper. It has but four movements, whereas the other was a potpourri of a number of themes, written hurriedly for a set event.

"And it will not be as popular."

THIS CLIPPING FROM AKRON, OHIO
BEACON-JOURNAL

JAN 1 9 1932

GERSHWIN'S NEW RHAPSODY READY

Develops Theme Of Latest Musical Score From Film Number

PRESENTATION PLANNED

By CHARLES HONCE
Associated Press Staff Writer

NEW YORK, Jan. 19. — George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore.

"The Second Rhapsody," it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra on Jan. ~~29 and~~ 30, and will be heard in Carnegie hall in New York on Feb. 5, almost eight years to the day from the time his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian hall.

Develops Theme

The New York, which like the 1924 opus will employ some syncopation, some blue embellishments and some jazz, started out as incidental music to a motion picture, but broadened into its present form as Gershwin developed his theme. The preliminary title was "Rhapsody in Rivets," but this was outgrown as the work progressed.

The composer began the composition last year in Hollywood while under contract to supply music for a talkie. As this required only a few songs Gershwin decided also to do a serious piece of work, and put seven weeks into it.

"In the picture a composer comes to the United States," said Mr. Gershwin, as he turned from the piano in his modernistic pent house apartment overlooking the broad sweep of the Hudson, "and I decided to write some music which would express the composer's emotional reaction to New York. The music was to run as an underlying theme throughout a certain part of the picture.

Runs 15 Minutes

"The sound of riveting on New York skyscrapers provided the theme. The movie producer was to use as much of the material as he wished, and he took about four minutes of it. The entire rhapsody now runs about 15 minutes.

"After I had finished the 'rivets' theme I got into a broad flowing movement which strikes me as almost religious in effect. The work developed beyond the first conception and so the title was changed.

"A composer shouldn't try to make a title mean too much. Take the 'Rhapsody in Blue,' for instance. Everybody has read a meaning into it except me."

Gershwin wrote only the piano score in Hollywood. The orchestration was developed after his return to New York.

THIS CLIPPING FROM OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.
TIMES

JAN 1 9 1932

George Gershwin Has New Rhapsody Written

NEW YORK, Jan. 19.—(AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore.

"The Second Rhapsody," it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra on January 29 and 30, and will be heard in Carnegie hall in New York on February 5, almost eight years to the day from the time his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian hall.

---

in Blue [illegible] development of [illegible] music, has written an encore. [illegible] he Second Rhapsody," it is termed, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on ~~January 29 and~~ 30, and will be heard in Carnegie hall in New York on February 5.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CORSICANA, TEXAS
SUN

JAN 1 9 1932

THE SECOND RHAPSODY BY GEO. GERSHWIN EXPECTED TO MARK NEW MUSICAL HIGH

By CHARLES HONCE.

NEW YORK, Jan. 19.—(AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore.

"The Second Rhapsody," it is called, and it will be played by the Boston symphony orchestra Jan. 29 and 30, and will be heard in Carnegie Hall in New York Feb. 5, almost eight years to the day from the time his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian Hall.

The new work, which like the 1924 opus will employ some syncopation, some blue embellishments and some jazz, started out as incidental music to a motion picture but broadened into its present form as Gershwin developed his theme. The preliminary title was "Rhapsody of Rivets," but this was outgrown as the work progressed.

The composer began the composition last year in Hollywood while under contract to supply music for a talkie. As this required only a few songs Gershwin decided also to do a serious piece of work and put seven weeks into it.

"In the picture a composer comes to the United States," said Mr. Gershwin, "and I decided to write some music which would express the composer's emotional reaction to New York. The music was to run as an underlying theme through a certain part of the picture.

"The sound of riveting on New York skyscrapers provided the theme. The movie producer was to use as much of the material as he wished, and he took about four minutes of it. The entire rhapsody now runs about 15 minutes.

"After I had finished the 'Rivets' theme I got into a broad, flowing movement which strikes me as almost religious in effect. The work developed beyond the first conception and so the title was changed.

"The new rhapsody is not a continuation of my first," the composer said. "It is broader and deeper. It has but four movements, whereas the 'Rhapsody in Blue' was a pot pouri of a number of themes, written hurriedly for a set event.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CINCINNATI, OHIO
TIMES-STAR

JAN 1 9 1932

Gershwin Writes Another Rhapsody

Will Be Given Premiere by Boston Symphony Orchestra.

NEW YORK, January 19—(AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore.

"The Second Rhapsody," it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Janu~~ary 29~~ and 30, and will be heard in Carnegie Hall in New York on February 5, almost eight years to the day from the time his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian Hall.

The new work, which like the 1924 opus, will employ some syncopation, some blue embellishments and some jazz, started out as incidental music to a motion picture, but broadened into its present form as Gershwin developed his theme. The preliminary title was "Rhapsody of Rivets," but this was outgrown as the work progressed.

The composer began the composition last year in Hollywood, while under contract to supply music for a talkie. As this required only a few songs Gershwin decided also to do a serious piece of work, and put seven weeks into it.

Gershwin wrote only the piano score in Hollywood. The orchestration was developed after his return to New York.

"The new rhapsody is not a continuation of my first," the composer said. "It is broader and deeper. It has ony four movements, whereas the 'Rhapsody in Blue' was a pot pouri of a number of themes, written hurriedly for a set event.

The number of motor vehicles in use in Switzerland has more than doubled since 1925.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS

JAN 19 1932

GEORGE GERSHWIN WRITES 'THE SECOND RHAPSODY'

NEW YORK, Jan. 19.—(AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore. "The Second Rhapsody," it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Jan. 29 and 30, and will be heard in Carnegie Hall in New York, on Feb. 5.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ALBANY, N. Y.
NEWS

JAN 19 1932

GERSHWIN ENCORES HIS BLUE RHAPSODY

New York—(AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music has written an encore. "The Second Rhapsody," it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Jan. 29 ~~and 30, and~~ will be heard in Carnegie Hall in New York Feb. 5. The preliminary title was "Rhapsody of Rivets," but this was outgrown as the work progressed.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS TRIBUNE

JAN 20 1932

-:- MUSIC -:-

A GUEST CONDUCTOR

It is not so many years since Providence used to have the privilege of hearing the Boston Symphony Orchestra five times every season. For reasons over which no one in this city has control, this number has been cut down in recent years to four. To add to local trials, it has become the practice to send us a "guest conductor" for one of the four.

Last night came Gustav Holst of England, who is better known as a composer than he is as a conductor—so we are informed. We grant readily that Mr. Holst is an accomplished musician, even if we are not prepared to concede that his distinction is such as to justify a program made up of four of his original compositions, one arrangement which he has made of a Bach fugue and one not-very-important Haydn symphony. Nor is it to be ignored that the Haydn came first, that it was played listlessly and that Mr. Holst seemed much less interested in it than in what followed.

We do not see any need to go in detail into the merits of Mr. Holst as a composer. He is an accomplished technician with a fine sense of melody, but when he gets hold of a theme or a tune he never seems to know when to let go. He never challenges anything deep within us, never dazzles us with brilliancy; he is precise, lustreless, and reminiscent.

Of course we are aware that in saying all this, we are remembering that Mr. Holst was trying to pinch-hit for Serge Koussevitzky, one of the most brilliant, glamorous and adventurous of present-day conductors. But in saying what we do say, we are, perhaps, pointing out what other people will regard as meritorious in Mr. Holst. Certainly there was plenty of applause for him last night and, in other circumstances, we might have enjoyed the unexciting fare he offered us. But this was a Boston Symphony concert, we repeat, one of only four we get in a season, and what is the use of asking any lover of great music to take anything less than music worthy of its attention from that splendid organization which has thrilled us for so many years?

—X.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
OMAHA, NEB.
MORN. BEE NEWS

JAN 20 1932

NEW GERSHW RHAPSODY HA RIVET THEME

NEW YORK, Jan. 19, (A George Gershwin, whose "Rh sody in Blue" marked a high p in the development of mod American music, has written encore.

"The Second Rhapsody," it called, and it will be played the Boston Symphony orche Jan. 29 and 30, and will be he in Carnegie hall in New York Feb. 5, almost eight years to the day his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian hall.

The New York, which like the 1924 opus will employ some syncopation, some blue embellishments and some jazz, started out as incidental music to a motion picture, but broadened into its present form as Gershwin developed his theme. The preliminary title was "Rhapsody of Rivets."

The composer began the composition last year in Hollywood while under contract to supply music for a talkie. As this required only a few songs, Gershwin decided also to do a serious piece of work, and put seven weeks into it.

"In the picture a composer comes to the United States," said Gershwin, "and I decided to write some music which would express the composer's emotional reaction to New York.

"The sound of riveting on New York skyscrapers provided the theme. The movie producer was to use as much of the material as he wished, and he took about 4 minute of it. The entire rhapsody now runs about 15 minutes.

"After I finished the 'Rivets' theme I got into a broad, flowing movement which strikes me as almost religious in effect. The work developed beyond the first conception and so the title was changed."

The work will be played by the regulation orchestra, including pianos. There will be no saxophones. The riviting effect will be taken by the trombones and allied instruments.

Gershwin, who never touched a piano until he was 12 years old, and who set himself to a serious study of musical technique and orchestration after he already had won success in Tin Pan alley, was born in Brooklyn, Sept. 26, 1898. At 16, he was a piano pounder in Remick's at $15 a week and his

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION-STAR

JAN 20 1932

SOUND OF RIVETS RHAPSODY THEME

Gershwin Opus to Be Given in Carnegie Hall Feb. 5

NEW YORK, Jan. 20—(AP)—George Gershwin, whose "rapsody in blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore.

"The second rhapsody," it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on January 29 and 30, and will be heard in Carnegie hall in New York on February 5, almost eight years to the day from the time his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian hall.

The new work, which like the 1924 opus will employ some syncopation, some blue embellishments and some jazz, started out as incidental music to a motion picture, but broadened into its present form as Gershwin developed his theme. The preliminary title was "Rhapsody of Rivets," but this was outgrown as the work progressed.

The composer began the composition last year in Hollywood while under contract to supply music for a talkie. As this required only a few songs, Gershwin decided also to do a serious piece of work, and put seven weeks into it.

"In the picture a composer comes to the United States," said Mr. Gershwin, as he turned from the piano in his modernistic Pent House apartment overlooking the broad sweep of the Hudson, and I decided to write some music which would express the composer's emotional reaction to New York. The music was to run as an underlying theme through a certain part of the picture.

"The sound of riveting on New York skyscrapers provided the theme. The movie producer was to use as much of the material as he wished, and he took about four minutes of it. The entire rhapsody now runs about 15 minutes.

"After I had finished the 'rivets' theme I got into a broad, flowing movement which strikes me as almost religious in effect. The work developed beyond the first conception and so the title was changed.

"A composer shouldn't try to make a title mean too much. Take the 'Rapsody in Blue' for instance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE OUTLOOK

JAN 2 1932

TRUTH in advertising having become such a rare quality, the term "all-star cast" has not only lost its proper meaning almost entirely but has frequently come to connote the absence of anybody any one ever heard of in a play. However, if it's names you want, The Devil Passes, the prolific Benn W. Levy's latest gift to the American stage, has no fewer than eight players of international repute. What's more, they can all act, or, at any rate, do in this play. They are Arthur Byron, Mary Nash, Cecilia Loftus, Er-possess the largeness of conception, th sweeping eloquence and the intensely in dividual flavor which this symphony re veals in such full measure.

When Jan Sibelius, at his home in th mighty forests of his native Finland, com posed this work, he was under the spel of Nature to such a degree that the musi may almost be said to be Nature herself the goddess with whom he daily communes. In celebrating her, he gives himself no concern whether the style in which he works be ancient or modern—he simply writes music. His Fourth Symphony shows us Nature, magnificent, gloomy and austere. No element of sensualism invades these terse, sombre and astringent pages, orchestrated with an economy of means which makes every note count to the full. To the hearer who is repelled by the lack of facile surface appeal, we would recommend these lines by Walt Whitman:

> "Nature is rude and incomprehensible at > first;
> Be not discouraged—keep on—there are > divine things, well envelop'd;
> I swear to you there are divine things > more beautiful than words can tell."

THE symphony, if you will, is pessimistic; its finest movement, the Largo, carrying a suggestion of titanic yet abortive human striving against irresistible natural forces. Joyless, too, is the unforgettable close of the final movement; the music seems to grow gradually thinner and more remote till it fades away into the cold and the greyness.

The performance, while not a perfect one, had many fine qualities. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted with an evident affection for the work. His tempi were admirable throughout and he built up climaxes of genuine power, as distinguished from mere volume.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

JAN 20 1932

[illegible] Von, Friday.

A new symphony by an American composer, Allan Lincoln Langley, was played for the first time by the National Orchestral Association in Carnegie hall, New York, last evening. Mr. Langley is a native of Newport, R. I. and studied at the New England Conservatory of Music under such musicians as Chadwick, Minternitz and Josef Adamowski. He was formerly a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER

JAN 20 1932

NEW RHAPSODY

By Gershwin Is Ready

Boston Symphony Orchestra To Present Composition Before New York Hears It.

New York, January 19—(AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore.

"The Second Rhapsody," it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra January 29 ~~and 30,~~ and will be heard in Carnegie Hall in New York February 5, almost eight years to the day from the time his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian Hall.

The new work, which, like the 1924 opus, will employ syncopation, blue embellishments and jazz, started out as incidental music to a motion picture, but broadened into its present form as Gershwin developed his theme. The preliminary title was "Rhapsody of Rivets," but this was outgrown as the work progressed.

The composer began the composition last year in Hollywood when under contract to supply music for a talkie. As this required only a few songs Gershwin decided also to do a serious piece of work, and put seven weeks into it.

"In the picture a composer comes to the United States," said Mr. Gershwin, as he turned from the piano in his modernistic pent house apartment overlooking the broad sweep of the Hudson, "and I decided to write some music which would express the composer's emotional reaction to New York. The music was to run as an underlying theme through a certain part of the picture.

"The sound of riveting on New York skyscrapers provided the theme. The movie producer was to use as much of the material as he wished, and he took about four minutes of it. The entire rhapsody now runs about 15 minutes.

"After I had finished the 'rivets' theme I got into a broad, flowing movement which strikes me as almost religious in effect. The work developed beyond the first conception and so the title was changed.

"A composer shouldn't try to make a title mean too much. Take the 'Rhapsody in Blue,' for instance. Everybody has read a meaning into it but me."

Gershwin wrote only the piano score in Hollywood. The orchestration was developed after his return to New York.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MONROE, MICH.
EVE. NEWS

JAN 20 1932

Gershwin Offers Second Rhapsody

(By The Associated Press)

NEW YORK, Jan. 20 — George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore.

"The Second Rhapsody", it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on January 29 and 30, and will be heard in Carnegie Hall in New York on February 5, almost eight years to the day from the time his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian Hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW BERN, N. C.
SUN-JOURNAL

JAN 20 1932

ANOTHER "RHAPSODY"

NEW YORK, Jan. 19—(By Associated Press)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore. "The Second Rhapsody," it is called, and it will be played by the Boston symphony orchestra on Jan. 29 and 30, and will be heard in Carnegie Hall in New York on Feb. 5. almost eight years to the day from the time his first rhapsody created history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian Hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
AMSTERDAM, N. Y.
RECORDER

JAN 20 1932 111

GERSHWIN WRITES "SECOND RHAPSODY"

Creator of "Rhapsody in Blue" to Play Composition in Boston Recital.

NEW YORK, Jan. 20.—(AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore.

"The Second Rhapsody," it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra on Jan. 29 and 30, and will be heard in Carnegie hall in New York on Feb. 5, almost eight years to the day from the time his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian hall.

The new work, which like the 1924 opus will employ some syncopation, some blue embellishments and some jazz, started out as incidental music to a motion picture, but broadened into its present form as Gershwin developed his theme. The preliminary title was "Rhapsody of Rivets," but this was outgrown as the work progressed.

The composer began the composition last year in Hollywood while under contract to supply music for a talkie. As this required only a few songs Gershwin decided also to do a serious piece of work, and put seven weeks into it.

"In the picture a composer comes to the United States," said Mr. Gershwin, as he turned from the piano in his modernistic pent house apartment overlooking the broad sweep of the Hudson, and I decided to write some music which would express the composer's emotional reaction to New York. The music was to run as an underlying theme through a certain part of the picture.

"The sound of riveting on New York skyscrapers provided the theme. The movie producer was to use as much of the material as he wished, and he took about four minutes of it. The entire rhapsody now runs about 15 minutes.

"After I had finished the 'Rivets' theme I got into a broad, flowing movement which strikes me as almost religious in effect. The work developed beyond the first conception and so the title was changed.

"A composer shouldn't try to make a title mean too much. Take the 'Rhapsody In Blue,' for instance. [illegible] has read a meaning into

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

JAN 21 1932

ORCHESTRA TO OFFER NEW GERSHWIN WORK

Boston Symphony Will Introduce Second Rhapsody in Boston and at Concert Here.

George Gershwin's Second Rhapsody will be played for the first time anywhere by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Jan. 29 and 30, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, and will be performed for the first time in New York by the same orchestra at Carnegie Hall on Feb. 5. Mr. Gershwin will be the piano soloist here and in Boston.

Mr. Gershwin's first work of this kind, the "Rhapsody in Blue," was performed eight years ago for the first time under Paul Whiteman's direction. Other compositions he has written for orchestra are "An American in Paris" and the Concerto in F.

The new work began as incidental music to a motion picture but broadened in scope as the composer developed his ideas. The preliminary title was "Rhapsody of Rivets," but this was outgrown. The theme of the rivets occupies only the first part of the work. The piano score was written in Hollywood last year. It is scored for full symphony orchestra. It does not call for saxophones.

Mr. Gershwin said that while he planned to continue writing for musical shows, he was contemplating devoting more time to music of a serious nature. He said he had in mind ideas for another work for orchestra or for string quartet, which he would begin working on soon. He is also eager to write a grand opera, but has not yet found a libretto to his liking. "The Green Pastures," "Porgy" and "Frankie and Johnny" were considered, but none was selected definitely. Mr. Gershwin said that he wanted to write an opera on "The Dybbuk" but found that an Italian composer, Ludovico Rocca, had the exclusive rights to do a musical setting for this play.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS

JAN 19 1932

GEORGE GERSHWIN WRITES 'THE SECOND RHAPSODY'

NEW YORK, Jan. 19.—(AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore. "The Second Rhapsody," it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Jan. 29 and 30, and will be heard in Carnegie Hall in New York, on Feb. 5.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ALBANY, N. Y.
NEWS

JAN 19 1932

GERSHWIN ENCORES HIS BLUE RHAPSODY

New York—(AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music has written an encore. "The Second Rhapsody," it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Jan. 29 [illegible] will be heard in Carnegie Hall in New York Feb. 5. The preliminary title was "Rhapsody of Rivets," but this was outgrown as the work progressed.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS TRIBUNE

JAN 20 1932

-:- MUSIC -:-

A GUEST CONDUCTOR

It is not so many years since Providence used to have the privilege of hearing the Boston Symphony Orchestra five times every season. For reasons over which no one in this city has control, this number has been cut down in recent years to four. To add to local trials, it has become the practice to send us a "guest conductor" for one of the four.

Last night came Gustav Holst of England, who is better known as a composer than he is as a conductor—so we are informed. We grant readily that Mr. Holst is an accomplished musician, even if we are not prepared to concede that his distinction is such as to justify a program made up of four of his original compositions, one arrangement which he has made of a Bach fugue and one not-very-important Haydn symphony. Nor is it to be ignored that the Haydn came first, that it was played listlessly and that Mr. Holst seemed much less interested in it than in what followed.

We do not see any need to go in detail into the merits of Mr. Holst as a composer. He is an accomplished technician with a fine sense of melody, but when he gets hold of a theme or a tune he never seems to know when to let go. He never challenges anything deep within us, never dazzles us with brilliancy; he is precise, lustreless, and reminiscent.

Of course we are aware that in saying all this, we are remembering that Mr. Holst was trying to pinch-hit for Serge Koussevitzky, one of the most brilliant, glamorous and adventurous of present-day conductors. But in saying what we do say, we are, perhaps, pointing out what other people will regard as meritorious in Mr. Holst. Certainly there was plenty of applause for him last night and, in other circumstances, we might have enjoyed the unexciting fare he offered us. But this was a Boston Symphony concert, we repeat, one of only four we get in a season, and what is the use of asking any lover of great music to take anything less than music worthy of its attention from that splendid organization which has thrilled us for so many years?

—X.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
OMAHA, NEB.
MORN. BEE NEWS

JAN 20 1932

NEW GERSHWIN RHAPSODY HAS RIVET THEME

NEW YORK, Jan. 19. (AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore.

"The Second Rhapsody," it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra Jan. 29 and 30, and will be heard in Carnegie hall in New York Feb. 5, almost eight years to the day his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian hall.

The New York, which like the 1924 opus will employ some syncopation, some blue embellishments and some jazz, started out as incidental music to a motion picture, but broadened into its present form as Gershwin developed his theme. The preliminary title was "Rhapsody of Rivets."

The composer began the composition last year in Hollywood while under contract to supply music for a talkie. As this required only a few songs, Gershwin decided also to do a serious piece of work, and put seven weeks into it.

"In the picture a composer comes to the United States," said Gershwin, "and I decided to write some music which would express the composer's emotional reaction to New York.

"The sound of riveting on New York skyscrapers provided the theme. The movie producer was to use as much of the material as he wished, and he took about 4 minute of it. The entire rhapsody now runs about 15 minutes.

"After I finished the 'Rivets' theme I got into a broad, flowing movement which strikes me as almost religious in effect. The work developed beyond the first conception and so the title was changed."

The work will be played by the regulation orchestra, including pianos. There will be no saxophones. The riviting effect will be taken by the trombones and allied instruments.

Gershwin, who never touched a piano until he was 12 years old, and who set himself to a serious study of musical technique and orchestration after he already had won success in Tin Pan alley, was born in Brooklyn, Sept. 26, 1898. At 16, he was a piano pounder in Remick's at $15 a week and his first active contact with the theater was playing the piano at rehearsals of "Miss 1917."

In 1919, the song "Swanee," sung by Al Jolson in "Sinbad," lifted Gershwin into fame and fortune. A succession of musical comedy followed.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
THE OUTLOOK

JAN 20 1932

▶▶ Notable Music ◀◀

▶▶Concerts of the Week

THE most noteworthy event of the past musical week in New York was the performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Koussevitzky's baton, of Sibelius' Fourth Symphony, acclaimed by many musicians as the Finnish master's greatest work. The writer is in unqualified agreement with this estimate, and feels disposed to go still further by saying that he knows of few works of the past twenty years which possess the largeness of conception, the sweeping eloquence and the intensely individual flavor which this symphony reveals in such full measure.

When Jan Sibelius, at his home in the mighty forests of his native Finland, composed this work, he was under the spell of Nature to such a degree that the music may almost be said to be Nature herself, the goddess with whom he daily communes. In celebrating her, he gives himself no concern whether the style in which he works be ancient or modern—he simply writes music. His Fourth Symphony shows us Nature, magnificent, gloomy and austere. No element of sensualism invades these terse, sombre and astringent pages, orchestrated with an economy of means which makes every note count to the full. To the hearer who is repelled by the lack of facile surface appeal, we would recommend these lines by Walt Whitman:

> "Nature is rude and incomprehensible at >   first;
> Be not discouraged—keep on—there are
>   divine things, well envelop'd;
> I swear to you there are divine things
>   more beautiful than words can tell."

THE symphony, if you will, is pessimistic; its finest movement, the Largo, carrying a suggestion of titanic yet abortive human striving against irresistible natural forces. Joyless, too, is the unforgettable close of the final movement; the music seems to grow gradually thinner and more remote till it fades away into the cold and the greyness.

The performance, while not a perfect one, had many fine qualities. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted with an evident affection for the work. His tempi were admirable throughout and he built up climaxes of genuine power, as distinguished from mere volume.

The other numbers were three delightful little Corelli pieces, well done, and Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, which received a reading refined to the point of tameness. There was also a suite of lighter character by Frid, which, perhaps, did not get a fair hearing from an audience jaded by two important symphonies and the heavy air of Carnegie Hall, whose management should, some day, do something about its ventilation.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER

JAN 20 1932

Boston Symphony Orchestra January 29 [illegible] and will be heard in Carnegie Hall in New York February 5, almost eight years to the day from the time his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian Hall.

The new work, which, like the 1924 opus, will employ syncopation, blue embellishments and jazz, started out as incidental music to a motion picture, but broadened into its present form as Gershwin developed his theme. The preliminary title was "Rhapsody of Rivets," but this was outgrown as the work progressed.

The composer began the composition last year in Hollywood when under contract to supply music for a talkie. As this required only a few songs Gershwin decided also to do a serious piece of work, and put seven weeks into it.

"In the picture a composer comes to the United States," said Mr. Gershwin, as he turned from the piano in his modernistic pent house apartment overlooking the broad sweep of the Hudson, "and I decided to write some music which would express the composer's emotional reaction to New York. The music was to run as an underlying theme through a certain part of the picture.

"The sound of riveting on New York skyscrapers provided the theme. The movie producer was to use as much of the material as he wished, and he took about four minutes of it. The entire rhapsody now runs about 15 minutes.

"After I had finished the 'rivets' theme I got into a broad, flowing movement which strikes me as almost religious in effect. The work developed beyond the first conception and so the title was changed.

"A composer shouldn't try to make a title mean too much. Take the 'Rhapsody in Blue,' for instance. Everybody has read a meaning into it but me."

Gershwin wrote only the piano score in Hollywood. The orchestration was developed after his return to New York.

"The new rhapsody is not a continuation of my first," the compos said. "It is broader and deeper. has but four movements, whereas t 'Rhapsody in Blue' was a pot pou of a number of themes, written hu riedly for a set event. And it w not be popular."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
AMSTERDAM, N. Y.
RECORDER

JAN 20 1932 111

SHWIN WRITES ECOND RHAPSODY" or of "Rhapsody in Blue" Play Composition in Boston Recital.

Y YORK, Jan. 20.—(AP)— Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody e" marked a high point in velopment of modern Amer- usic, has written an encore. Second Rhapsody," it is and it will be played by the Symphony orchestra on Jan. 30, and will be heard in le hall in New York on Feb. almost eight years to the day from the time his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian hall.

The new work, which like the 1924 opus will employ some syncopation, some blue embellishments and some jazz, started out as incidental music to a motion picture, but broadened into its present form as Gershwin developed his theme. The preliminary title was "Rhapsody of Rivets," but this was outgrown as the work progressed.

The composer began the composition last year in Hollywood while under contract to supply music for a talkie. As this required only a few songs Gershwin decided also to do a serious piece of work, and put seven weeks into it.

"In the picture a composer comes to the United States," said Mr. Gershwin, as he turned from the piano in his modernistic pent house apartment overlooking the broad sweep of the Hudson, and I decided to write some music which would express the composer's emotional reaction to New York. The music was to run as an underlying theme through a certain part of the picture.

"The sound of riveting on New York skyscrapers provided the theme. The movie producer was to use as much of the material as he wished, and he took about four minutes of it. The entire rhapsody now runs about 15 minutes.

"After I had finished the 'Rivets' theme I got into a broad, flowing movement which strikes me as almost religious in effect. The work developed beyond the first conception and so the title was changed.

"A composer shouldn't try to make a title mean too much. Take the 'Rhapsody In Blue,' for instance. Everybody has read a meaning into it except me."

Gershwin Opus to Be Given in Carnegie Hall Feb. 5

NEW YORK, Jan. 20—(AP)—George Gershwin, whose "rapsody in blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore.

"The second rhapsody," it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on January [illegible] and 30, and will be heard in Carnegie hall in New York on February 5, almost eight years to the day from the time his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian hall.

The new work, which like the 1924 opus will employ some syncopation, some blue embellishments and some jazz, started out as incidental music to a motion picture, but broadened into its present form as Gershwin developed his theme. The preliminary title was "Rhapsody of Rivets," but this was outgrown as the work progressed.

The composer began the composition last year in Hollywood while under contract to supply music for a talkie. As this required only a few songs, Gershwin decided also to do a serious piece of work, and put seven weeks into it.

"In the picture a composer comes the United States," said Mr. rshwin, as he turned from the no in his modernistic Pent House rtment overlooking the broad ep of the Hudson, and I decided to e some music which would express the composer's emotional reac to New York. The music was to run as an underlying theme through a certain part of the picture.

"The sound of riveting on New York skyscrapers provided the theme. The movie producer was to use as much of the material as he wished, and he took about four minutes of it. The entire rhapsody now runs about 15 minutes.

"After I had finished the 'rivets' theme I got into a broad, flowing movement which strikes me as almost religious in effect. The work developed beyond the first conception and so the title was changed.

"A composer shouldn't try to make a title mean too much. Take the 'Rapsody in Blue' for instance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

JAN 20 1932

A new symphony by an American composer, Allan Lincoln Langley, was played for the first time by the National Orchestral Association in Carnegie hall, New York, last evening. Mr. Langley is a native of Newport, R. I. and studied at the New England Conservatory of Music under such musicians as Chadwick, Minternitz and Josef Adamowski. He was formerly a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore.

"The Second Rhapsody", it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on January 29 and 30, and will be heard in Carnegie Hall in New York on February 5, almost eight years to the day from the time his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian Hall.

Second Rhapsody in Boston and at Concert Here.

George Gershwin's Second Rhapsody will be played for the first time anywhere by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Jan. 29 and 30, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, and will be performed for the first time in New York by the same orchestra at Carnegie Hall on Feb. 5. Mr. Gershwin will be the piano soloist here and in Boston.

Mr. Gershwin's first work of this kind, the "Rhapsody in Blue," was performed eight years ago for the first time under Paul Whiteman's direction. Other compositions he has written for orchestra are "An American in Paris" and the Concerto in F.

The new work began as incidental music to a motion picture but broadened in scope as the composer developed his ideas. The preliminary title was "Rhapsody of Rivets," but this was outgrown. The theme of the rivets occupies only the first part of the work. The piano score was written in Hollywood last year. It is scored for full symphony orchestra. It does not call for saxophones.

Mr. Gershwin said that while he planned to continue writing for musical shows, he was contemplating devoting more time to music of a serious nature. He said he had in mind ideas for another work for orchestra or for string quartet, which he would begin working on soon. He is also eager to write a grand opera, but has not yet found a libretto to his liking. "The Green Pastures," "Porgy" and "Frankie and Johnny" were considered, but none was selected definitely. Mr. Gershwin said that he wanted to write an opera on "The Dybbuk" but found that an Italian composer, Ludovico Rocca, had the exclusive rights to do a musical setting for this play.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW BERN, N. C.
SUN-JOURNAL

JAN 20 1932

ANOTHER "RHAPSODY"

NEW YORK, Jan. 19—(By Associated Press)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore. "The Second Rhapsody," it is called, and it will be played by the Boston symphony orchestra on Jan. 29 and 30, and will be heard in Carnegie Hall in New York on Feb. 5. almost eight years to the day from the time his first rhapsody created history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian Hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JAN 20 1932

IN TERMS OF MUSIC, Comment in Season

Gustav Holst, Noted English Composer, Conducting Boston Symphony Orchestra, Warmly Greeted in Praiseworthy Concert at Albee Theatre.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening gave the third of its concert series in the Albee Theatre. The concert was directed by Gustav Holst, distinguished English composer.

Only occasionally is the Boston Symphony Orchestra presided over by a guest conductor during Dr. Koussevitzsky's mid-season siesta, whereas the New York Philharmonic Orchestra has three or four guests during the season. It is not to be expected that any visiting conductor will make any particular impression upon his men in a brief season. The claims of personality and the many features that combine to make genius require time to make themselves felt, and it is imposible to throw off the habits of many months in a few days.

It is probably no easier for the conductor than it is for the men. He, too, is accustomed to another team; he, too, must become adjusted to other tonal qualities, and notwithstanding the cordiality of his reception by the band, he must feel strange and somewhat ill at ease.

Holst comes to a magnificent instrument; he handles it ably; he accomplishes highly artistic results. Haydn, Bach and Holst receive their meed of performance and praise. Consciously and unconsciously we compare their merits and graces and to most persons the concert is over. But there is much more to be said, there are many features to contemplate. There are divers values to be appreciated and, after all is done and said, we realize that the music we have heard is very interesting; that our visitor is carrying on the torch of musical learning worthily and that his compositions are of a very high order of esthetic and musical thought.

The time for the unreserved worship of the compositions of the old masters has gone. The fact that Mozart, Bach or Beethoven wrote this or that does not make them good unless they contain true and intrinsic merit. The life of every composer contains some works that are better than others and we are pleased to admire the best of these.

Comes now a composer from across the seas whose musical and literary preparation has been most thorough, thus assuring a capable medium for the presentation of his talents. These are unusual, his gifts are varied and of a high order, his thematic material is often rich and highly original and his harmony is tinctured by a modernism that is so much his own that it may be said to be his idiom.

There is nothing commonplace about Holst's orchestration. This, too, has personality and originality and if it is reminiscent of anyone it recalls Edward Elgar. He is appreciative of the keyed glockenspiel with its suggestion of musical glasses, the xylophone now coming into its own in orchestral music, of the matchless baritone of the bass clarinet and the resonant reinforcement of the double bassoon. In these facilities he has the advantage over the older composers who were limited as to orchestral possibilities. Frequently one notes trumpet figures which are suggestive of jazz, but we must remember these are not the only episodes in music that are debased by unworthy exposition and that because jazz has borrowed of the best in music there is no reason for belittling the value of the musical timbre or for failing to distinguish between the splendid and the cheap. In his orchestration Holst brings to us much that is apparently in the jazz idiom, but it clothes fine thematic material and is well worthy of sympathetic attention.

The St. Paul's Suite is not an ecclesiastical work as its name might imply, but was composed for the girl's orchestra of St. Paul's School. It is strongly Celtic in character with a rhythmic jig, a brilliant presto and impressive intermezzo and for finale another reel with the accent on the off beat. Our salute to the girl's orchestra which can play this vivacious piece of unusual music.

The last movement of this suite is strongly reminiscent of the "Irish Washerwoman" of our youth, and very good thematic material it is, too. This contrapuntal study would become wearisome were it not for the remarkable fugal "working out" of the orchestra, which gave a notable exhibition of impeccable bowing and unity of rhythm which pleased the eye as well as the ear.

The "Somerset Rhapsody" is more elegiac than rhapsodic. It is very fully scored. Mr. Ritter presided over four kettle drums instead of two. Mr. Speyer was particularly eloquent in a long lamentoso upon the English horn with the Celtic sentiment again much in evidence. Despite the many evidences of remarkable orchestral resources there are in this and in the "Hammersmith" Prelude and Scherzo some very long paths of tonal aridity which might have blossomed into greater beauty had the composer abandoned his avowed purpose of studied atonality and watered the desert with the life-giving springs of melody and harmony of the less advanced type.

It seemed quite appropriate that the part of the Wizard in "The Perfect Fool" should be taken by Bedetti, that truly great 'cellist who was heard in several solo parts during Holst's compositions. It was he who gave life, beauty and vigor to the charming arrangement of the "Fugue a la Gigue" by Bach as well as distinction to the parlando recitatives in the "Invocation" in the Ballet.

Mr. Theodorowicz, acting as concertmaster for Mr. Burgin, who is happily now well on the way to convalescence after his automobile accident, was heard with grace and beauty in short episodes that fell to the solo violin and in extremely fine passages where the string trio and quartet served as pleasing contrast to the full orchestra.

In the exquisite old time Symphony of Haydn, Mr. Holst conducted with a light hand and with only few directions. His adagio is more rapid and his allegretto more slow than that to which we are accustomed. In his own compositions, however, he was much more alert, more exacting in his beat and more vivacious in his manner. The orchestra gave its very best efforts and undivided attention and assisted his artistic efforts to the fullest, which is a quality of the highest type of musicianship and of personality.

This brief hearing of Holst shows him to be an able conductor of the classics, an original thinker in orchestration, a highly individual and personal composer of significant music in characteristic, but not entirely exclusive idiom, and one capable and vital in his appreciation of Bach in his lighter vein.

Mr. Holst was received with the warmest cordiality by the capacity house. He was recalled after each offering and more than once called upon the orchestra to share the acknowledgement of his success.

The program:

Haydn—
Symphony in E flat major (B. & H. No. 3)
I. Adagio; Allegro con spirito
II. Andante
III. Menuetto; Trio
IV. Allegro con spirito
Holst...St. Paul's Suite, for String Orchestra
Holst....................Somerset Rhapsody
Holst—
Ballet from the opera, "The Perfect Fool."
I. Invocation
II. Dance of the Spirits of Earth
III. Dance of the Spirits of Water
IV. Dance of the Spirits of Fire
Holst..Prelude and Scherzo, "Hammersmith"
(First performance in America)
Bach......................Fugue a la Gigue
(Arranged for Orchestra by Holst)

DR. W. LOUIS CHAPMAN.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HAMILTON, O.
NEWS

JAN 20 1932

GERSHWIN WRITES SECOND RHAPSODY

To Be Played by Boston Symphony Orchestra on January 29

NEW YORK, Jan. 20—(AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore.

"The Second Rhapsody," it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on January 29 and 30, and will be heard in Carnegie Hall in New York on February 5, almost eight years to the day from the time his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian Hall.

The new work, which like the 1924 cpus, will employ some syncopation, some blue embellishments and some jazz, started out as in-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD

JAN 20 1932

American-Made 50-Minute Symphony Gets Critics' O. K.

NEW YORK, Jan. 20 (AP)—A 50-minute symphony, American-made by a composer born 39 years ago in Newport, R. I., won favorable comment today from critics.

The composition, "Symphony in D Minor, No. 2," was completed five years ago by Allan Lincoln Langley, but had never been performed until the National Orchestral association presented it at Carnegie hall yesterday.

Heretofore known as a composer of waltzes of orchestral caliber, some of which have been played at Lewisohn stadium concerts here, Langley pleased critics with his "symphony," despite comment of some that its unusual "Brucknerian" length seemed to militate against a sustained pitch throughout.

The symphony is suggestive in style of Brahms and Bruckner, critics said. It is, however, romantic and orthodox in construction, and not in the "modern" manner. Themes are well defined and the symphony is fashioned with an unashamed eye to melody.

Langley, who studied at the New England Conservatory of Music, formerly played with the Boston and National Symphony orchestras and with the New York Philharmonic.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

JAN 20 1932

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Third in Concert Series

Gustav Holst, Distinguished English Composer, Is Guest Conductor And Is Received With Warmest Cordiality by Capacity House.—An Able Conductor of Classics, Critic Declares.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening gave the third of its concert series in the Albee Theatre. The concert was directed by Gustav Holst, distinguished English composer.

Only occasionally is the Boston Symphony Orchestra presided over by a guest conductor during Dr. Koussevitzsky's mid-season siesta, whereas the New York Philharmonic Orchestra has three or four guests during the season. It is not to be expected that any visiting conductor will make any particular impression upon his men in a brief season. The claims of personality and the many features that combine to make genius require time to make themselves felt, and it is imposible to throw off the habits of many months in a few days.

It is probably no easier for the conuctor than it is for the men. He, too, accustomed to another team; he, too, ust become adjusted to other tonal ualities, and notwithstanding the cordality of his reception by the band, he ust feel strange and somewhat ill at ase.

Holst comes to a magnificent instruent; he handles it ably; he accomlishes highly artistic results. Haydn, ach and Holst receive their meed of performance and praise. Consciously and

These are unusual, his gifts are varied and of a high order, his thematic material is often rich and highly original and his harmony is tinctured by a modernism that is so much his own that it may be said to be his idiom.

There is nothing commonplace about Holst's orchestration. This, too, has personality and originality and if it is reminiscent of anyone it recalls Edward Elgar. He is appreciative of the keyed glockenspiel with its suggestion of musical glasses, the xylophone now coming into its own in orchestral music, of the matchless baritone of the bass clarinet and the resonant reinforcement of the double bassoon. In these facilities he has the advantage over the older composers who were limited as to orchestral possibilities. Frequently one notes trumpet figures which are suggestive of jazz, but we must remember these are not the only episodes in music that are debased by unworthy exposition and that because jazz has borrowed of the best in music there is no reason for belittling the value of the musical timbre or for failing to distinguish between the splendid and the cheap. In his orchestration Holst brings to us much that is apparently in the jazz idiom, but it clothes fine thematic material and is well worthy of sympathetic attention.

The St. Paul's Suite is not an ecclesiastical work as its name might imply, but was composed for the girl's orchestra of St. Paul's School. It is strongly Celtic in character with a rhythmic jig, a brilliant presto and impressive intermezzo and for finale another reel with the accent on the off beat. Our salute to the girl's orchestra which can play this vivacious piece of unusual music.

The last movement of this suite is strongly reminiscent of the "Irish Washerwoman" of our youth, and very good thematic material it is, too. This contrapuntal study would become wearisome were it not for the remarkable fugal "working out" of the orchestra, which gave a notable exhibition of impeccable bowing and unity of rhythm which pleased the eye as well as the ear.

The "Somerset Rhapsody" is more elegiac than rhapsodic. It is very fully scored. Mr. Ritter presided over four kettle drums instead of two. Mr. Speyer was particularly eloquent in a long lamentoso upon the English horn with the Celtic sentiment again much in evidence. Despite the many evidences of remarkable orchestral resources there are in this and in the "Hammersmith" Prelude and Scherzo some very long paths of tonal aridity which might have blossomed into greater beauty had the composer abandoned his avowed purpose of studied atonality and watered the desert with the life-giving springs of melody and harmony of the less advanced type.

It seemed quite appropriate that the part of the Wizard in "The Perfect Fool" should be taken by Bedetti, that truly great 'cellist who was heard in several solo parts during Holst's compositions. It was he who gave life, beauty and vigor to the charming arrangement of the "Fugue a la Gigue" by Bach as well as distinction to the parlando recitatives in the "Invocation" in the Ballet.

Mr. Theodorowicz, acting as concertmaster for Mr. Burgin, who is happily now well on the way to convalescence after his automobile accident, was heard with grace and beauty in short episodes that fell to the solo violin and in extremely fine passages where the string trio and quartet served as pleasing contrast to the full orchestra.

In the exquisite old time Symphony of Haydn, Mr. Holst conducted with a light hand and with only few directions. His adagio is more rapid and his allegretto more slow than that to which we are accustomed. In his own compositions, however, he was much more alert, more exacting in his beat and more vivacious in his manner. The orchestra gave its very best efforts and undivided attention and assisted his artistic efforts to the fullest which is a quality of the highest type of musicianship and of personality.

This brief hearing of Holst shows him to be an able conductor of the classics an original thinker in orchestration, a highly individual and personal composer of significant music in characteristic, but not entirely exclusive idiom, and one capable and vital in his appreciation of Bach in his lighter vein.

Mr. Holst was received with the warmest cordiality by the capacity house. He was recalled after each offering and more than once called upon the orchestra to share the acknowledgement of his success.

The program:

Haydn—
Symphony in E flat major (B. & H. No. 3)
I. Adagio; Allegro con spirito
II. Andante
III. Menuetto; Trio
IV. Allegro con spirito
Holst...St. Paul's Suite, for String Orchestra
Holst....................Somerset Rhapsody
Holst—
Ballet from the opera, "The Perfect Fool."
I. Invocation
II. Dance of the Spirits of Earth
III. Dance of the Spirits of Water
IV. Dance of the Spirits of Fire
Holst..Prelude and Scherzo, "Hammersmith"
(First performance in America)
Bach......................Fugue a la Gigue
(Arranged for Orchestra by Holst)

DR. W. LOUIS CHAPMAN.

THIS CLIPPING FROM UTICA, N. Y.
OBSERVER DISPATCH

JAN 20 1932

New Gershwin Rhapsody Is Encore to His Blue Hit of Eight Years Ago

New York—(AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore.

"The Second Rhapsody," it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Jan. 29 and 30, and will be heard in Carnegie Hall in New York on Feb. 5, almost eight years to the day from the time his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian Hall.

The new work which, like the 1924 opus, will employ some syncopation, some blue embellishments and some jazz, started as incidental music to a motion picture, but broadened into its present form as Gershwin developed his theme. The preliminary title was "Rhapsody of Rivets," but this was outgrown as the work progressed.

The composer began the composition last year in Hollywood while under contract to supply music for a talkie. As this required only a few songs, Gershwin decided also to do a serious piece of work, and put seven weeks into it.

"In the picture a composer comes to the United States," said Mr. Garshwin, as he returned from the piano in his modernistic pent house apartment overlooking the broad sweep of the Hudson, "and I decided to write some music which would express the composer's emotional reaction to New York. The music was to run as an underlying theme through a certain part of the picture.

"The sound of riveting on New York skyscrapers provided the theme. The movie producer was to use as much of the material as he wished, and he took about four minutes of it. The entire rhapsody now runs about 15 minutes.

"After I had finished the 'rivets' theme I got into a broad, flowing movement which strikes me as almost religious in effect. The work developed beyond the first conception and so the title was changed.

"A composer shouldn't try to make a title mean too much. Take the 'Rhapsody in Blue' for instance. Everybody has read a meaning into it except me."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

112

JAN 20 1932

IN TERMS OF MUSIC, Comment in Season

Gustav Holst, Noted English Composer, Conducting Boston Symphony Orchestra, Warmly Greeted in Praiseworthy Concert at Albee Theatre.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening gave the third of its concert series in the Albee Theatre. The concert was directed by Gustav Holst, distinguished English composer.

Only occasionally is the Boston Symphony Orchestra presided over by a guest conductor during Dr. Koussevitzsky's mid-season siesta, whereas the New York Philharmonic Orchestra has three or four guests during the season. It is not to be expected that any visiting conductor will make any particular impression upon his men in a brief season. The claims of personality and the many features that combine to make genius require time to make themselves felt, and it is imposible to throw off the habits of many months in a few days.

It is probably no easier for the conductor than it is for the men. He, too, is accustomed to another team; he, too, must become adjusted to other tonal qualities, and notwithstanding the cordiality of his reception by the band, he must feel strange and somewhat ill at ease.

Holst comes to a magnificent instrument; he handles it ably; he accomplishes highly artistic results. Haydn, Bach and Holst receive their meed of performance and praise. Consciously and unconsciously we compare their merits and graces and to most persons the concert is over. But there is much more to be said, there are many features to contemplate. There are divers values to be appreciated and, after all is done and said, we realize that the music we have heard is very interesting; that our visitor is carrying on the torch of musical learning worthily and that his compositions are of a very high order of esthetic and musical thought.

The time for the unreserved worship of the compositions of the old masters has gone. The fact that Mozart, Bach or Beethoven wrote this or that does not make them good unless they contain true and intrinsic merit. The life of every composer contains some works that are better than others and we are pleased to admire the best of these.

Comes now a composer from across the seas whose musical and literary preparation has been most thorough, thus assuring a capable medium for the presentation of his talents. These are unusual, his gifts are varied and of a high order, his thematic material is often rich and highly original and his harmony is tinctured by a modernism that is so much his own that it may be said to be his idiom.

There is nothing commonplace about Holst's orchestration. This, too, has personality and originality and if it is reminiscent of anyone it recalls Edward Elgar. He is appreciative of the keyed glockenspiel with its suggestion of musical glasses, the xylophone now coming into its own in orchestral music, of the matchless baritone of the bass clarinet and the resonant reinforcement of the double bassoon. In these facilities he has the advantage over the older composers who were limited as to orchestral possibilities. Frequently one notes trumpet figures which are suggestive of jazz, but we must remember these are not the only episodes in music that are debased by unworthy exposition and that because jazz has borrowed of the best in music there is no reason for belittling the value of the musical timbre or for failing to distinguish between the splendid and the cheap. In his orchestration Holst brings to us much that is apparently in the jazz idiom, but it clothes fine thematic material and is well worthy of sympathetic attention.

The St. Paul's Suite is not an ecclesiastical work as its name might imply, but was composed for the girl's orchestra of St. Paul's School. It is strongly Celtic in character with a rhythmic jig, a brilliant presto and impressive intermezzo and for finale another reel with the accent on the off beat. Our salute to the girl's orchestra which can play this vivacious piece of unusual music.

The last movement of this suite is strongly reminiscent of the "Irish Washerwoman" of our youth, and very good thematic material it is, too. This contrapuntal study would become wearisome were it not for the remarkable fugal "working out" of the orchestra, which gave a notable exhibition of impeccable bowing and unity of rhythm which pleased the eye as well as the ear.

The "Somerset Rhapsody" is more elegiac than rhapsodic. It is very fully scored. Mr. Ritter presided over four kettle drums instead of two. Mr. Speyer was particularly eloquent in a long lamentoso upon the English horn with the Celtic sentiment again much in evidence. Despite the many evidences of remarkable orchestral resources there are in this and in the "Hammersmith" Prelude and Scherzo some very long paths of tonal aridity which might have blossomed into greater beauty had the composer abandoned his avowed purpose of studied atonality and watered the desert with the life-giving springs of melody and harmony of the less advanced type.

It seemed quite appropriate that the part of the Wizard in "The Perfect Fool" should be taken by Bedetti, that truly great 'cellist who was heard in several solo parts during Holst's compositions. It was he who gave life, beauty and vigor to the charming arrangement of the "Fugue a la Gigue" by Bach as well as distinction to the parlando recitatives in the "Invocation" in the Ballet.

Mr. Theodorowicz, acting as concertmaster for Mr. Burgin, who is happily now well on the way to convalescence after his automobile accident, was heard with grace and beauty in short episodes that fell to the solo violin and in extremely fine passages where the string trio and quartet served as pleasing contrast to the full orchestra.

In the exquisite old time Symphony of Haydn, Mr. Holst conducted with a light hand and with only few directions. His adagio is more rapid and his allegretto more slow than that to which we are accustomed. In his own compositions, however, he was much more alert, more exacting in his beat and more vivacious in his manner. The orchestra gave its very best efforts and undivided attention and assisted his artistic efforts to the fullest, which is a quality of the highest type of musicianship and of personality.

This brief hearing of Holst shows him to be an able conductor of the classics, an original thinker in orchestration, a highly individual and personal composer of significant music in characteristic, but not entirely exclusive idiom, and one capable and vital in his appreciation of Bach in his lighter vein.

Mr. Holst was received with the warmest cordiality by the capacity house. He was recalled after each offering and more than once called upon the orchestra to share the acknowledgement of his success.

The program:

Haydn—
  Symphony in E flat major (B. & H. No. 3)
    I. Adagio; Allegro con spirito
    II. Andante
    III. Menuetto; Trio
    IV. Allegro con spirito
Holst...St. Paul's Suite, for String Orchestra
Holst....................Somerset Rhapsody
Holst—
  Ballet from the opera, "The Perfect Fool."
    I. Invocation
    II. Dance of the Spirits of Earth
    III. Dance of the Spirits of Water
    IV. Dance of the Spirits of Fire
Holst..Prelude and Scherzo, "Hammersmith"
  (First performance in America)
Bach....................Fugue a la Gigue
  (Arranged for Orchestra by Holst)

DR. W. LOUIS CHAPMAN.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HAMILTON, O.
NEWS

JAN 20 1932

GERSHWIN WRITES SECOND RHAPSODY

To Be Played by Boston Symphony Orchestra on January 29

NEW YORK, Jan. 20—(AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore.

"The Second Rhapsody," it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on January 29 and 30, and will be heard in Carnegie Hall in New York on February 5, almost eight years to the day from the time his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian Hall.

The new work, which like the 1924 cpus, will employ some syncopation, some blue embellishments and some jazz, started out as incidental music to a motion picture, but broadened into its present form as Gershwin developed his theme. The preliminary title was "Rhapsody of Rivets," but this was outgrown as the work progressed.

THIS CLIPPING FRO
UTICA, N. Y.
OBSERVER DISP

JAN 2 0 19

Socks Mahara

MAHARAJAH OR OT- YOU CAN'T GET AWAY WITH THAT STUFF!
HELP!- CALL THE GUARD!

sody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian Hall.

The new work which, like the 1924 opus, will employ some syncopation, some blue embellishments and some jazz, started as incidental music to a motion picture, but broadened into its present form as Gershwin developed his theme. The preliminary title was "Rhapsody of Rivets," but this was outgrown as the work progressed.

The composer began the composition last year in Hollywood while under contract to supply music for a talkie. As this required only a few songs, Gershwin decided also to do a serious piece of work, and put seven weeks into it.

"In the picture a composer comes to the United States," said Mr. Garshwin, as he returned from the piano in his modernistic pent house apartment overlooking the broad sweep of the Hudson, "and I decided to write some music which would express the composer's emotional reaction to New York. The music was to run as an underlying theme through a certain part of the picture.

"The sound of riveting on New York skyscrapers provided the theme. The movie producer was to use as much of the material as he wished, and he took about four minutes of it. The entire rhapsody now runs about 15 minutes.

[illegible] Minute [illegible] Critics' O. K.

NEW YORK, Jan. 20 (AP)—A 50-minute symphony, American-made by a composer born 39 years ago in Newport, R. I., won favorable comment today from critics.

The composition, "Symphony in D Minor, No. 2," was completed five years ago by Allan Lincoln Langley, but had never been performed until the National Orchestral association presented it at Carnegie hall yesterday.

Heretofore known as a composer of waltzes of orchestral caliber, some of which have been played at Lewisohn stadium concerts here, Langley pleased critics with his "symphony," despite comment of some that its unusual "Brucknerian" length seemed to militate against a sustained pitch throughout.

The symphony is suggestive in style of Brahms and Bruckner, critics said. It is, however, romantic and orthodox in construction, and not in the "modern" manner. Themes are well defined and the symphony is fashioned with an unashamed eye to melody.

Langley, who studied at the New England Conservatory of Music, formerly played with the Boston and National Symphony orchestras and with the New York Philharmonic.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

JAN 20 1932

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Third in Concert Series

Gustav Holst, Distinguished English Composer, Is Guest Conductor And Is Received With Warmest Cordiality by Capacity House.—An Able Conductor of Classics, Critic Declares.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening gave the third of its concert series in the Albee Theatre. The concert was directed by Gustav Holst, distinguished English composer.

Only occasionally is the Boston Symphony Orchestra presided over by a guest conductor during Dr. Koussevitzsky's mid-season siesta, whereas the New York Philharmonic Orchestra has three or four guests during the season. It is not to be expected that any visiting conductor will make any particular impression upon his men in a brief season. The claims of personality and the many features that combine to make genius require time to make themselves felt, and it is imposible to throw off the habits of many months in a few days.

It is probably no easier for the conductor than it is for the men. He, too, is accustomed to another team; he, too, must become adjusted to other tonal qualities, and notwithstanding the cordiality of his reception by the band, he must feel strange and somewhat ill at ease.

Holst comes to a magnificent instrument; he handles it ably; he accomplishes highly artistic results. Haydn, Bach and Holst receive their meed of performance and praise. Consciously and unconsciously we compare their merits and graces and to most persons the concert is over. But there is much more to be said, there are many features to contemplate. There are divers values to be appreciated and, after all is done and said, we realize that the music we have heard is very interesting; that our visitor is carrying on the torch of musical learning worthily and that his compositions are of a very high order of esthetic and musical thought.

The time for the unreserved worship of the compositions of the old masters has gone. The fact that Mozart, Bach or Beethoven wrote this or that does not make them good unless they contain true and intrinsic merit. The life of every composer contains some works that are better than others and we are pleased to admire the best of these.

Comes now a composer from across the seas whose musical and literary preparation has been most thorough, thus assuring a capable medium for the presentation of his talents. These are unusual, his gifts are varied and of a high order, his thematic material is often rich and highly original and his harmony is tinctured by a modernism that is so much his own that it may be said to be his idiom.

There is nothing commonplace about Holst's orchestration. This, too, has personality and originality and if it is reminiscent of anyone it recalls Edward Elgar. He is appreciative of the keyed glockenspiel with its suggestion of musical glasses, the xylophone now coming into its own in orchestral music, of the matchless baritone of the bass clarinet and the resonant reinforcement of the double bassoon. In these facilities he has the advantage over the older composers who were limited as to orchestral possibilities. Frequently one notes trumpet figures which are suggestive of jazz, but we must remember these are not the only episodes in music that are debased by unworthy exposition and that because jazz has borrowed of the best in music there is no reason for belittling the value of the musical timbre or for failing to distinguish between the splendid and the cheap. In his orchestration Holst brings to us much that is apparently in the jazz idiom, but it clothes fine thematic material and is well worthy of sympathetic attention.

The St. Paul's Suite is not an ecclesiastical work as its name might imply, but was composed for the girl's orchestra of St. Paul's School. It is strongly Celtic in character with a rhythmic jig, a brilliant presto and impressive intermezzo and for finale another reel with the accent on the off beat. Our salute to the girl's orchestra which can play this vivacious piece of unusual music.

The last movement of this suite is strongly reminiscent of the "Irish Washerwoman" of our youth, and very good thematic material it is, too. This contrapuntal study would become wearisome were it not for the remarkable fugal "working out" of the orchestra, which gave a notable exhibition of impeccable bowing and unity of rhythm which pleased the eye as well as the ear.

The "Somerset Rhapsody" is more elegiac than rhapsodic. It is very fully scored. Mr. Ritter presided over four kettle drums instead of two. Mr. Speyer was particularly eloquent in a long lamentoso upon the English horn with the Celtic sentiment again much in evidence. Despite the many evidences of remarkable orchestral resources there are in this and in the "Hammersmith" Prelude and Scherzo some very long paths of tonal aridity which might have blossomed into greater beauty had the composer abandoned his avowed purpose of studied atonality and watered the desert with the life-giving springs of melody and harmony of the less advanced type.

It seemed quite appropriate that the part of the Wizard in "The Perfect Fool" should be taken by Bedetti, that truly great 'cellist who was heard in several solo parts during Holst's compositions. It was he who gave life, beauty and vigor to the charming arrangement of the "Fugue a la Gigue" by Bach as well as distinction to the parlando recitatives in the "Invocation" in the Ballet.

Mr. Theodorowicz, acting as concertmaster for Mr. Burgin, who is happily now well on the way to convalescence after his automobile accident, was heard with grace and beauty in short episodes that fell to the solo violin and in extremely fine passages where the string trio and quartet served as pleasing contrast to the full orchestra.

In the exquisite old time Symphony of Haydn, Mr. Holst conducted with a light hand and with only few directions. His adagio is more rapid and his allegretto more slow than that to which we are accustomed. In his own compositions, however, he was much more alert, more exacting in his beat and more vivacious in his manner. The orchestra gave its very best efforts and undivided attention and assisted his artistic efforts to the fullest which is a quality of the highest type of musicianship and of personality.

This brief hearing of Holst shows him to be an able conductor of the classics, an original thinker in orchestration, a highly individual and personal composer of significant music in characteristic, but not entirely exclusive idiom, and one capable and vital in his appreciation of Bach in his lighter vein.

Mr. Holst was received with the warmest cordiality by the capacity house. He was recalled after each offering and more than once called upon the orchestra to share the acknowledgement of his success.

The program:

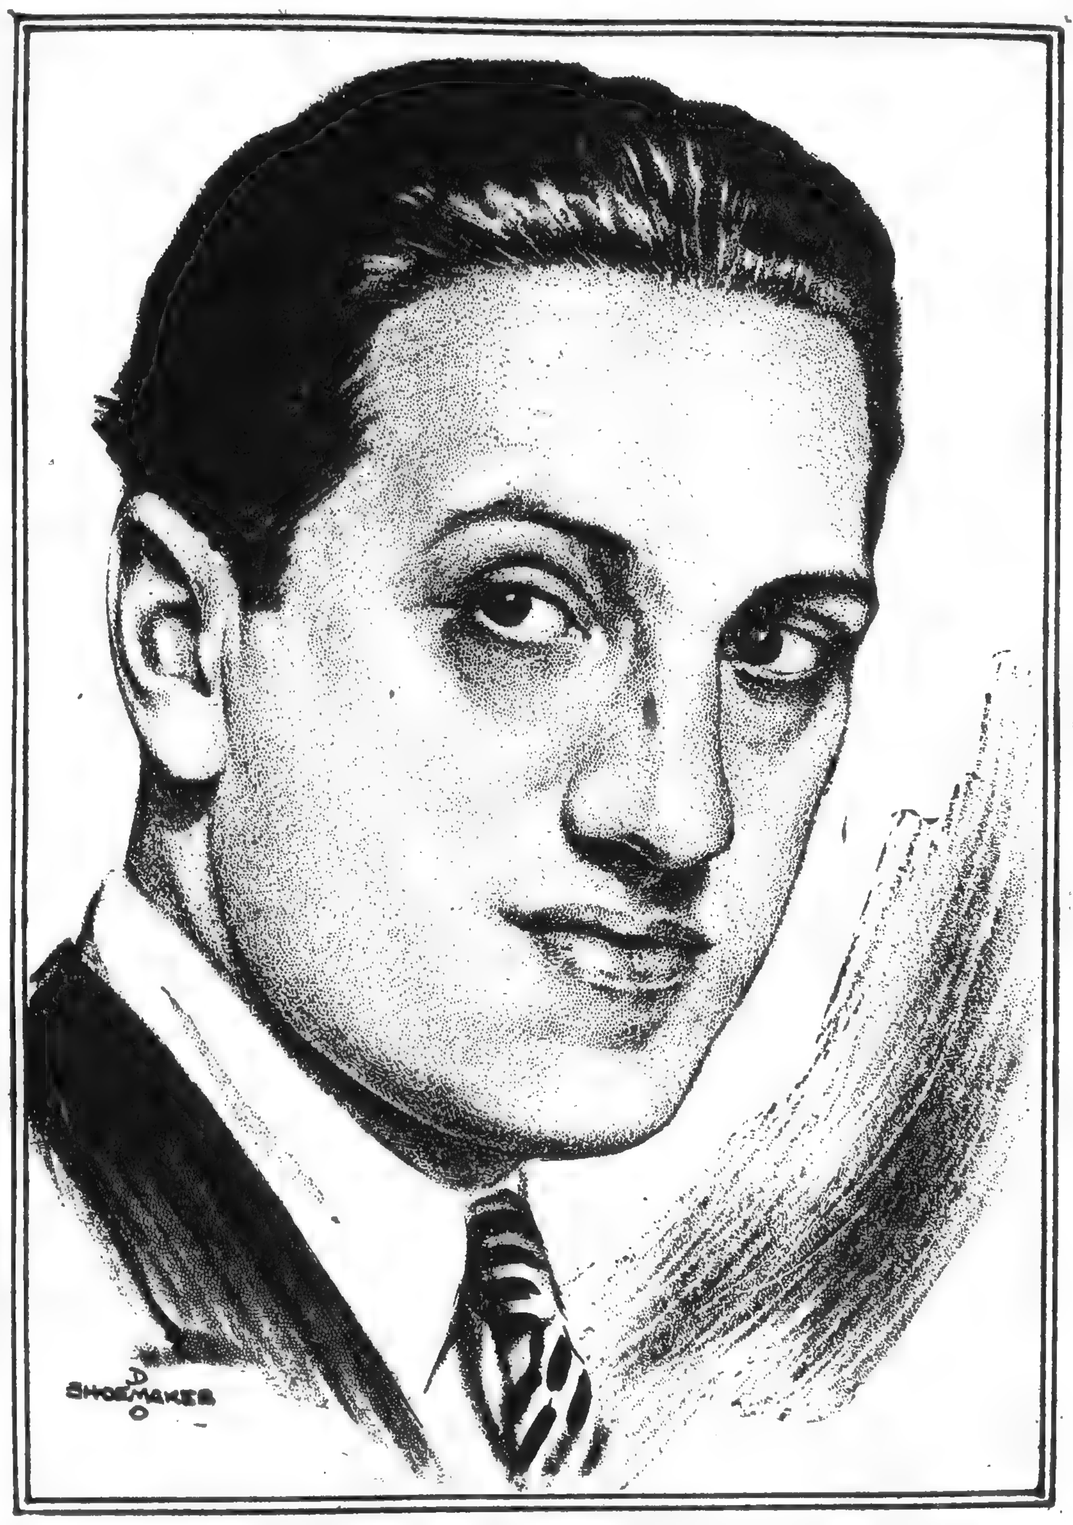
Haydn—
  Symphony in E flat major (B. & H. No. 3)
    I. Adagio; Allegro con spirito
    II. Andante
    III. Menuetto; Trio
    IV. Allegro con spirito
Holst...St. Paul's Suite, for String Orchestra
Holst....................Somerset Rhapsody
Holst—
  Ballet from the opera, "The Perfect Fool."
    I. Invocation
    II. Dance of the Spirits of Earth
    III. Dance of the Spirits of Water
    IV. Dance of the Spirits of Fire
Holst..Prelude and Scherzo, "Hammersmith"
  (First performance in America)
Bach....................Fugue a la Gigue
  (Arranged for Orchestra by Holst)

DR. W. LOUIS CHAPMAN.

Jan 31

THE NEW YORK TIMES, S

NEWS AND CON



George Gershwin, Whose New "Rhapsody" Will Be Played in New York by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CAMDEN, N. J.
POST
JAN 27 1932

RIVETS FOR INSPIRATION

George Gershwin, than whom there is no Gershwiner when it comes to jazz tunes, has written a new rhapsody which is to be played this week by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The inspiration, it seems, was the sound of riveting on a New York skyscraper. Hence, the initial theme of the composition is a "rivet theme." Which makes one wonder as to just what constitutes inspiration—and just what constitutes music.

A flat wheel on a trolley car! A klaxon! The rattlings of a wheezy bus!

All these things are noises, just as the noise of riveting. But why drag them into the tone art?

George Antheil, Jersey's own composer, who postures in Paris most of the time, used the same idea in his "Mechanical Ballet." There was a tone poem written about "Flivver Ten Million" and a ballet "Skyscrapers."

But most of us go to the concert hall for relief from the noises of the street. If symphony orchestras are to be turned into gangs of riveters it would be cheaper to just hire plain riveters. While most of us, alas, would sneak out—to some cafe where a Strauss a feeling of

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
JAN 24 1932

The first performance of George Gershwin's Rhapsody No. 2 for orchestra, with the composer at the piano, will be given Friday afternoon, Jan. 29, in Symphony Hall, Boston, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting. The work [redacted] be played here on Feb. 6, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives a concert at Carnegie Hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE LANSING, MICH.
STATE JOURNAL
JAN 23 1932

Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Give Gershwin 'Second Rhapsody' World Premier; Is Serious Work

By CHARLES HONCE
Associated Press

NEW YORK, Jan. 23

GEORGE GERSHWIN, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore.

"The Second Rhapsody," it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra on January 29 and 30, and will be heard in Carnegie hall in New York on February 5, almost eight years to the day from the time his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian hall.

The new work, which like the 1924 opus will employ some syncopation, some blue embellishments and some jazz, started out as incidental music to a motion picture, but broadened into its present form as Gershwin developed his theme. The preliminary title was "Rhapsody in Rivets," but this was outgrown as the work progressed.

The composer began the composition last year in Hollywood while under contract to supply music for a talkie. As this required only a few songs Gershwin decided also to do a serious piece of work, and put seven weeks into it.

"In the picture a composer comes to the United States," said Mr. Gershwin, as he turned from the piano in his modernistic pent house apartment overlooking the broaod sweep of the Hudson, "and I decided to write some music which would express the composer's emotional reaction to New York. The music was to run as an underlying theme through a certain part of the picture.

"The sound of riveting on New York skyscrapers provided the theme. The movie producer was to use as much of the material as he wished, and he took about four minutes of it. The entire rhapsody now runs about 15 minutes.

"After I had finished the 'Rivets' theme I got into a broad, flowing movement which strikes me as almost religious in effect. The work developed beyond the first conception and so the title was changed.

"A composer shouldn't try to make a title mean too much. Take the 'Rhapsody in Blue' for instance. Everybody has read a meaning into it except me."

Gershwin wrote only the piano score in Hollywood. The orchestration was developed after his return to New York.

"The new rhapsody is not a continuation of my first," the composer said. "It is broader and deeper. It has but four movements, whereas the "Rhapsody in Blue" was a pot pouri of a number of themes, written hurriedly for a set event.

"And it will not be as popular."

The new work will be played by the regulation orchestra, including pianos. There will be no saxophones. The riveting effects will be taken by the trombones and allied instruments.

Gershwin, who never touched a piano until he was 12 years old, and who set himself to a serious study of musical technique and orchestration after he already had won success in Tin Pan alley, was born in Brooklyn September 26, 1898 in a non-musical family. At 16 he was a piano pounder in Remick's at $15 a week and his first active contact with the theater was playing the piano at rehearsals of "Miss 1917."

In 1919, the song "Swanee," sung by Al Jolson in "Sinbad," lifted Gershwin into fame and fortune overnight. A succession of musical comedy successes followed, down to the current hit "Of Thee I Sing."

The now historic concert by Paul Whiteman and his band on February 12, 1924, introduced Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue," undoubtedly his best known and best liked composition. Later came " The Concerto in F," the "Jazz Preludes," and "An American in Paris."

Gershwin constantly is working. studying, pressing toward a higher musical goal.

"Yes, I would like to write a grand opera," he said, "but the difficulty is in getting a good libretto. Even in musical comedy the libretto is the main thing. Good music cannot carry a poor libretto."

As a relaxation Gershwin has turned to painting. He took it up just the other day, and his first oil, a portrait, was turned out in three days. Previously he had done some pen and ink work.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE OSHKOSH, WIS.
DAILY NORTHWESTERN
JAN 20 1932

Encore Written by Composer of Famous "Rhapsody in Blue"

New York—(AP)—George Gershwin whose "Rhapsody in Blue"

York skyscrapers provided the theme. The movie producer was to

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y.
STAR ENTERPRISE
JAN 19 1932

Riveters Inspire Another George Gershwin Rhapsody

NEW YORK.—(AP)—George

Tel. Chelsea 3-8800

of work, and put seven weeks into it.

THIS CLIPPING FROM EVERETT, WASH.
HERALD

"The Second Rhapsody" by George Gershwin to Be Heard on January 29

NEW YORK, Jan. 19.—(AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody a talkie. As this required only a few songs Gershwin decided also to

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE ELMIRA, N. Y.
STAR-GAZETTE
JAN 19 1932

N. Y. Soon to Hear Gershwin's Encore to 'Rhapsody in Blue'

New York — (AP) — George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the piece of work, and put seven weeks into it.

"In the picture a composer to the United States," said

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE ITHACA, N. Y.
JOURNAL-NEWS
JAN 19 1932

Gershwin's Newest Rhapsody Employs Riveting as Theme

New York—(AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody In the piano in his modernistic pent apartment overlooking the sweep of the Hudson, "and I

THIS CLIPPING FROM OSHKOSH, WIS.
NORTHWESTERN
JAN 20 1932

Encore Written by Composer of Famous "Rhapsody in Blue"

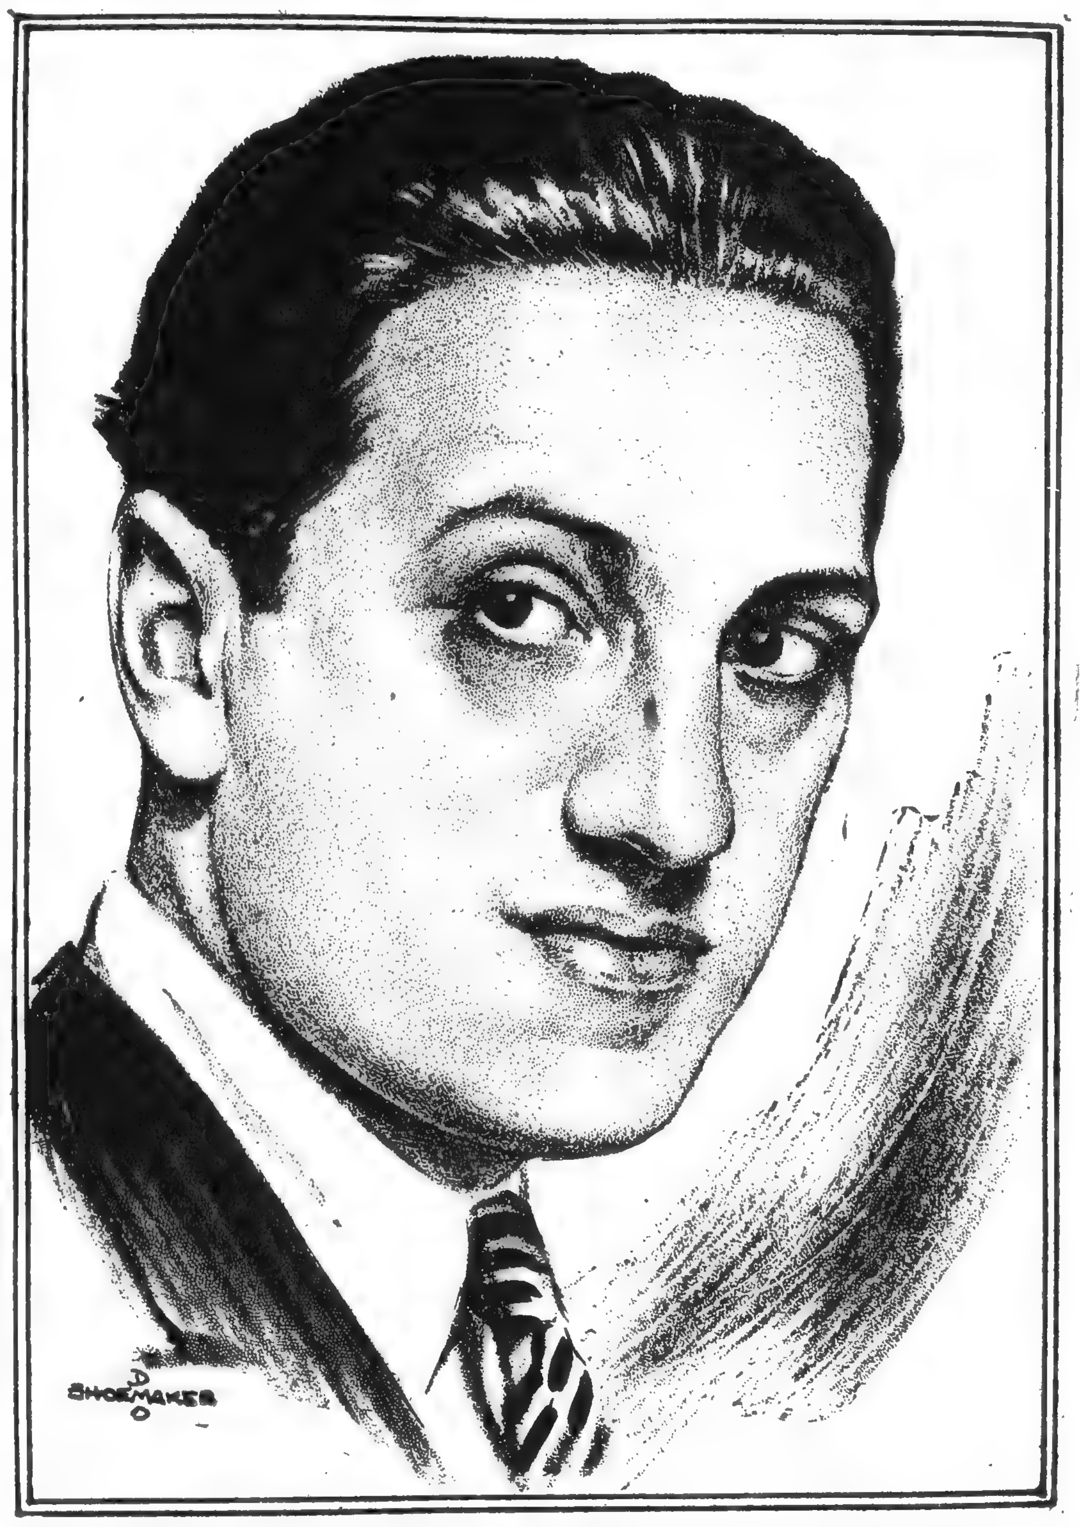
New York—(AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the devel-

York skyscrapers provided the theme. The movie producer was to

Jan 31

THE NEW YORK TIMES, S

NEWS AND CON



George Gershwin, Whose New "Rhapsody" Will Be Played in New York by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CAMDEN, N. J.
POST
JAN 27 1932

RIVETS FOR INSPIRATION

George Gershwin, than whom there is no Gershwiner when it comes to jazz tunes, has written a new rhapsody which is to be played this week by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The inspiration, it seems, was the sound of riveting on a New York skyscraper. Hence, the initial theme of the composition is a "rivet theme." Which makes one wonder as to just what constitutes inspiration—and just what constitutes music.

A flat wheel on a trolley car! A klaxon! The rattlings of a wheezy bus!

All these things are noises, just as the noise of riveting. But why drag them into the tone art?

George Antheil, Jersey's own composer, who postures in Paris most of the time, used the same idea in his "Mechanical Ballet." There was a tone poem written about "Flivver Ten Million" and a ballet "Skyscrapers."

But most of us go to the concert hall for relief from the noises of the street. If symphony orchestras are to be turned into gangs of riveters it would be cheaper to just hire plain riveters. While most of us, alas, would sneak out—to some cafe where a Strauss waltz might be heard without a feeling of shame for not being highbrow!

Gershwin's [illegible] chestra, with the composer at the piano, will be given Friday afternoon, Jan. 29, in Symphony Hall, Boston, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting. The work will probably be played here on Feb. 6, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives a concert at Carnegie Hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE LANSING, MICH.
STATE JOURNAL
JAN 2 3 1932

Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Give Gershwin 'Second Rhapsody' World Premier; Is Serious Work

By CHARLES HONCE
Associated Press

NEW YORK, Jan. 23

GEORGE GERSHWIN, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore.

"The Second Rhapsody," it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra on January 29 and 30, and will be heard in Carnegie hall in New York on February 5, almost eight years to the day from the time his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian hall.

The new work, which like the 1924 opus will employ some syncopation, some blue embellishments and some jazz, started out as incidental music to a motion picture, but broadened into its present form as Gershwin developed his theme. The preliminary title was "Rhapsody in Rivets," but this was outgrown as the work progressed.

The composer began the composition last year in Hollywood while under contract to supply music for a talkie. As this required only a few songs Gershwin decided also to do a serious piece of work, and put seven weeks into it.

"In the picture a composer comes to the United States," said Mr. Gershwin, as he turned from the piano in his modernistic pent house apartment overlooking the broaod sweep of the Hudson, "and I decided to write some music which would express the composer's emotional reaction to New York. The music was to run as an underlying theme through a certain part of the picture.

"The sound of riveting on New York skyscrapers provided the theme. The movie producer was to use as much of the material as he wished, and he took about four minutes of it. The entire rhapsody now runs about 15 minutes.

"After I had finished the 'Rivets' theme I got into a broad, flowing movement which strikes me as almost religious in effect. The work developed beyond the first conception and so the title was changed.

"A composer shouldn't try to make a title mean too much. Take the 'Rhapsody in Blue' for instance. Everybody has read a meaning into it except me."

Gershwin wrote only the piano score in Hollywood. The orchestration was developed after his return to New York.

"The new rhapsody is not a continuation of my first," the composer said. "It is broader and deeper. It has but four movements, whereas the "Rhapsody in Blue" was a pot pouri of a number of themes, written hurriedly for a set event.

"And it will not be as popular."

The new work will be played by the regulation orchestra, including pianos. There will be no saxophones. The riveting effects will be taken by the trombones and allied instruments.

Gershwin, who never touched a piano until he was 12 years old, and who set himself to a serious study of musical technique and orchestration after he already had won success in Tin Pan alley, was born in Brooklyn September 26, 1898 in a non-musical family. At 16 he was a piano pounder in Remick's at $15 a week and his first active contact with the theater was playing the piano at rehearsals of "Miss 1917."

In 1919, the song "Swanee," sung by Al Jolson in "Sinbad," lifted Gershwin into fame and fortune overnight. A succession of musical comedy successes followed, down to the current hit "Of Thee I Sing."

The now historic concert by Paul Whiteman and his band on February 12, 1924, introduced Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue," undoubtedly his best known and best liked composition. Later came " The Concerto in F," the "Jazz" Preludes," and "An American in Paris."

Gershwin constantly is working. studying, pressing toward a higher musical goal.

"Yes, I would like to write a grand opera," he said, "but the difficulty is in getting a good libretto. Even in musical comedy the libretto is the main thing. Good music cannot carry a poor libretto."

As a relaxation Gershwin has turned to painting. He took it up just the other day, and his first oil, a portrait, was turned out in three days. Previously he had done some pen and ink work.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE OSHKOSH, WIS.
DAILY NORTHWESTERN
JAN 20 1932

Encore Written by Composer of Famous "Rhapsody in Blue"

New York—(AP)—George Gershwin whose "Rhapsody in Blue" York skyscrapers provided the theme. The movie producer was to

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y.
STAR ENTERPRISE
JAN 1 9 1932

Riveters Inspire Another George Gershwin Rhapsody

NEW YORK.—(AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in of work, and put seven weeks into it.

"The Second Rhapsody" by George Gershwin to Be Heard on January 29

NEW YORK, Jan. 19.—(AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody a talkie. As this required only a few songs Gershwin decided also to

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE ELMIRA, N. Y.
STAR-GAZETTE
JAN 1 9 1932

N. Y. Soon to Hear Gershwin's Encore to 'Rhapsody in Blue'

New York—(AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the piece of work, and put seven weeks into it.

"In the picture a composer to the United States," said

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE ITHACA, N. Y.
JOURNAL-NEWS
JAN 1 9 1932

Gershwin's Newest Rhapsody Employs Riveting as Theme

New York—(AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody In Blue" the piano in his modernistic pent house apartment overlooking the broad sweep of the Hudson, "and I

Encore Written by Composer of Famous "Rhapsody in Blue"

New York—(AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the devel- York skyscrapers provided the theme. The movie producer was to

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROWNSVILLE, TEX.
HERALD

114

JAN 2 0 1932

Riveting Suggested 'The 2nd Rhapsody'

NEW YORK, Jan. 19. (AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian Hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN ANTONIO, TEX.
NEWS

JAN 1 9 1932

1932

STACCATO PURR OF RIVETING MACHINES FURNISHES THEME FOR NEW GERSHWIN RHAPSODY

By CHARLES HONCE

NEW YORK, Jan. 19 (AP).—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the de

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM AUSTIN, TEX.
STATESMAN

JAN 2 0 1932

RHAPSODY IN BLUE COMPOSER INSPIRED TO WRITE AN ENCORE BY RIVETING ON SKYSCRAPER

NEW YORK, Jan. 19.—(AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BATTLE CREEK, MICH.
ENQUIRER NEWS

JAN 20 1932

George Gershwin Writes Enco To His Epochal Rhapsody in Bl

New York, Jan. 20.—(AP)—George Gershwin, whose Rhapsody in Blue was to run as an underlying through a certain part of the

FORT WORTH, TEXAS
STAR-TELEGRAM

JAN 2 0 1932

ANOTHER GERSHWIN RHAPSODY

*** *** *** ***

RIVETS FURNISHED THEME

*** *** *** ***

IT'S TO HAVE SYMPHONIC DEBUT

By Associated Press.

NEW YORK, Jan. 20.—George Gershwin, whose Rhapsody in Blue marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BEAUMONT, TEX.
JOURNAL

JAN 1 9 1932

GEORGE GERSHWIN'S NEW ENCOR

* * * * * * * * * * * * *

TO 'RHAPSODY IN BLUE' WILL B

* * * * * * * * * * * * *

PLAYED BY SYMPHONY JANUARY

NEW YORK, Jan. 19.—(AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a his theme. The preliminary tit was "Rhapsody in Rivets," bu this was outgrown as the

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PORT HURON, MICH.
TIMES HERALD

JAN 2 0 1932

Rivets Of New York Inspire Gershwin 'Second Rhapsody'

(By The Associated Press)

New York, Jan. 20 — George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the tinuation of my first," the composer said. "It is broader and deeper. It has but four movements whereas the 'Rhapsody in

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE YAKIMA, WASH.
DAILY REPUBLIC

JAN 1 9 1932

GERSHWIN PRODUCES ENCORE

Second Rhapsody to Be Played by Boston Symphony Orchestra

New York, Jan. 19—(AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE AKRON, O.
BEACON JOURNAL

JAN 1 9 1932

GERSHWIN'S NEW RHAPSODY READY

Develops Theme Of Latest Musical Score From Film Number

PRESENTATION PLANNED

By CHARLES HONCE
Associated Press Staff Writer

NEW YORK, Jan. 19. — George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the of modern American

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
AMSTERDAM, N. Y.
EVE. RECORDER

JAN 2 0 1932

GERSHWIN WRITES "SECOND RHAPSODY"

Creator of "Rhapsody in Blue" to Play Composition in Boston Recital.

NEW YORK, Jan. 20.—(AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody " marked a high point in

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE SANT AMONICA, CAL.
OUTLOOK

JAN 1 9 1932

Gershwin Writes Second Rhapsody

'Encore' to Famous Work of 8 Years Ago to Be Presented Soon

NEW YORK, Jan. 19 (AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue"

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE ELLENSBURG, WASH.
RECORD

JAN 2 0 1932

Rivets Inspire Geo. Gershwin To Another Rhapsody

By Charles Honce

NEW YORK, Jan. 20. — (AP) — George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM STOCKTON, CAL.
RECORD

JAN 2 3 1932

Gershwin's "Second Rhapsody" to Be Presented in East

By CHARLES HONCE

NEW YORK, Jan. 23.—Associated Press)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM LONGVIEW, TEXAS
NEWS

JAN 2 4 1932

GERSHWIN WILL OFFER SECOND RHAPSODY SOON

Will Make Appearance in Carnegie Hall Eight Years After First Hit

NEW YORK, Jan. 23. (AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the develo

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEWS-SEARCHLIGH'
BREMERTON, WASH.

JAN 2 0 1932

RIVETS IN NEW YORK INSPIRE A COMPOSITION

NEW YORK, Jan. 20.—(AP)—George Gershwin, whose "rhap-

THIS CLIPPING FROM CALGARY, ALBERTA
HERALD

JAN 23 1932

George Gershwin Writes Sequel to Rhapsody in Blue

NEW YORK, Jan. 23. — George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in

PRESS CLIPPINGS
THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW BERN, N. C.
NEW BERNIAN

JAN 2 1 1932

ANOTHER "RHAPSODY"

NEW YORK, Jan. 19—(By Associated Press)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROWNSVILLE, TEX.
HERALD

JAN 20 [illegible]

Riveting Suggested 'The 2nd Rhapsody'

NEW YORK, Jan. 19. (AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian Hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN ANTONIO, TEX.
NEWS

JAN 19 1932
1932

19, 1932.

STACCATO PURR OF RIVETING MACHINES FURNISHES THEME FOR NEW GERSHWIN RHAPSODY

By CHARLES HONCE

NEW YORK, Jan. 19 (AP).—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the de

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM AUSTIN, TEX.
STATESMAN

JAN 20 1932

RHAPSODY IN BLUE COMPOSER INSPIRED TO WRITE AN ENCORE BY RIVETING ON SKYSCRAPER

NEW YORK, Jan. 19.—(AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BATTLE CREEK, MICH.
ENQUIRER NEWS

JAN 20 1932

George Gershwin Writes Enco To His Epochal Rhapsody in Bl

New York, Jan. 20.—(AP)—George Gershwin, whose Rhapsody in Blue was to run as an underlying theme through a certain part of the

---

FORT WORTH, TEXAS
STAR-TELEGRAM

JAN 20 1932

ANOTHER GERSHWIN RHAPSODY

*** *** *** ***

RIVETS FURNISHED THEME

*** *** *** ***

IT'S TO HAVE SYMPHONIC DEBUT

By Associated Press.

NEW YORK, Jan. 20.—George Gershwin, whose Rhapsody in Blue marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BEAUMONT, TEX.
JOURNAL

JAN 19 1932

GEORGE GERSHWIN'S NEW ENCORE TO 'RHAPSODY IN BLUE' WILL BE PLAYED BY SYMPHONY JANUARY 29

NEW YORK, Jan. 19.—(AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a his theme. The preliminary title was "Rhapsody in Rivets," but this was outgrown as the

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PORT HURON, MICH.
TIMES HERALD

JAN 20 1932

Rivets Of New York Inspire Gershwin 'Second Rhapsody'

(By The Associated Press)

New York, Jan. 20 — George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the tinuation of my first," the composer said. "It is broader and deeper. It has but four movements whereas the 'Rhapsody in

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE YAKIMA, WASH.
DAILY REPUBLIC

JAN 19 1932

GERSHWIN PRODUCES ENCORE

Second Rhapsody to Be Played by Boston Symphony Orchestra

New York, Jan. 19—(AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE AKRON, O.
BEACON JOURNAL

JAN 19 1932

GERSHWIN'S NEW RHAPSODY READY

Develops Theme Of Latest Musical Score From Film Number

PRESENTATION PLANNED

By CHARLES HONCE
Associated Press Staff Writer

NEW YORK, Jan. 19. — George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the of modern American

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
AMSTERDAM, N. Y.
EVE. RECORDER

JAN 20 1932

SHWIN WRITES "SECOND RHAPSODY" reator of "Rhapsody in Blue" to Play Composition in Boston Recital.

NEW YORK, Jan. 20. — (AP) — George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody " marked a high point in

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE SANT AMONICA, CAL.
OUTLOOK

JAN 19 1932

Gershwin Writes Second Rhapsody

'Encore' to Famous Work of 8 Years Ago to Be Presented Soon

NEW YORK, Jan. 19 (AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue"

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE SBURG, WASH.
RECORD

N 20 1932

s Inspire eo. Gershwin To Another Rhapsody

By Charles Honce

NEW YORK, Jan. 20. — (AP) — George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM STOCKTON, CAL.
RECORD

JAN 23 1932

Gershwin's "Second Rhapsody" to Be Presented in East

By CHARLES HONCE

NEW YORK, Jan. 23.—Associated Press)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM LONGVIEW, TEXAS
NEWS

JAN 24 1932

GERSHWIN WILL OFFER SECOND RHAPSODY SOON

Will Make Appearance in Carnegie Hall Eight Years After First Hit

NEW YORK, Jan. 23. (AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEWS-SEARCHLIGH'
BREMERTON, WASH.

JAN 20 1932

RIVETS IN NEW YORK INSPIRE A COMPOSITION

NEW YORK, Jan. 20.—(AP)—George Gershwin, whose "rhap-

THIS CLIPPING FROM CALGARY, ALBERTA
HERALD

JAN 23 1932

George Gershwin Writes Sequel to Rhapsody in Blue

NEW YORK, Jan. 23. — George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in

PRESS CLIPPINGS
THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW BERN, N. C.
NEW BERNIAN

JAN 21 1932

ANOTHER "RHAPSODY"

NEW YORK, Jan. 19—(By Associated Press)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAGINAW, MICH.
NEWS

JAN 22 1932

GERSHWIN WRITES SECOND RHAPSODY

Newest Composition to Be Played in Boston January 29 and 30.

IS ALMOST RELIGIOUS

(By Associated Press.)

NEW YORK, Jan. 22.—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
HERALD
MT. VERNON, WASH.

JAN 20 1932

RIVETS INSPIRE COMPOSING OF NEW RHAPSODY

NEW YORK, Jan. 19. —(AP)— George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE RENO, NEV.
EVE. GAZETTE

JAN 19 1932

GERSHWIN WRITES ENCORE TO HIS RHAPSODY IN BLUE

By CHARLES HONCE

NEW YORK, Jan. 19.—(AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the develop-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM PHILADELPHIA, PA.
RECORD

JAN 21 1932

GERSHWIN

By CHARLES HONCE

NEW YORK, Jan. 23 (AP).—

THIS CLIPPING FROM LONG BEACH, CALIF.
PRESS TELEGRAM

JAN 19 1932

played rapid, sure pinochle.

New Rhapsody by Gershwin to Be Heard Soon

NEW YORK, Jan. 19.—(AP)— George Geshwin, whose "Rhap-

THIS CLIPPING FROM SPOKANE, WASH.
CHRONICLE

JAN 19 193

GERSHWIN WRITES SECOND RHAPSODY

NEW YORK, Jan. 19. (AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue"

THIS CLIPPING FROM RENO, NEV.
GAZETTE

JAN 19 1932

GERSHWIN WRITES ENCORE TO HIS RHAPSODY IN BLUE

By CHARLES HONCE

NEW YORK, Jan. 19.—(AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the develop-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SAULT ST. MARIE, MICH.
NEWS

JAN 21 1932

GERSHWIN PENS NEW RHAPSODY

His First Marked High Point in American Music.

NEW YORK, Jan. 21 AP—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in th

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM WICHITA FALLS, TEX.
TIMES

JAN 19 1932

ENCORE TO RHAPSODY BY GEORGE GERSHWIN

NEW YORK, Jan. 19. (AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in

THIS CLIPPING FROM FITCHBURG, MASS.
SENTINEL

JAN 20 1932

American Composer Wins Praise

NEW YORK, Jan. 20 (AP) — A 50-minute symphony, American-made

THIS CLIPPING FROM YAKIMA, WASH.
REPUBLIC

JAN 19 1932

GERSHWIN PRODUCES ENCORE

Second Rhapsody to Be Played by Boston Symphony Orchestra

New York, Jan. 19—(AP)—George

THIS CLIPPING FROM WALLA WALLA, WASH.
BULLETIN

JAN 19 1932

'SECOND RHAPSODY' HAS RIVET THEME

George Gershwin Composes Encore With New York Impressions

NEW YORK, Jan. 19 (AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM GREEN BAY, WIS.
PRESS-GAZETTE

JAN 21 1932

GERSHWIN COMPOSES HIS SECOND U. S. RHAPSODY

NEW YORK—(AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in

PRESS CLIPPINGS

9

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE WATERTOWN, N. Y.
TIMES

JAN 19 1932

RIVETS INSPIRE A NEW RHAPSODY

GEORGE GERSHWIN DEVELOPS ANOTHER THEME

SYNCOPATION, BLUES AND JAZZ

Composer Started Out to Write Music For Talkie But Developed It Into Broader Work.

By CHARLES HONCE

New York, Jan. 19. (AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rapsody in

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW BRITAIN, C
HERALD

JAN 19 1932

k at ild on Al not eft ail

GERSHWIN WRITES SECOND RHAPSODY

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Play New Work Soon

New York, Jan. 19 (AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the American

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM MONTGOMERY, ALA.
JOURNAL

JAN 20 1932

BLUES ENCORE FOR RHAPSODY

Gershwin Composes Companion Piece to Celebrated Song of America

By CHARLES HONCE

NEW YORK, Jan. 20.—(AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM MONTREAL, CAN.
GAZETTE

HAS WRITTEN ENCORE

Gershwin's "Second Rhapsody" to be Played Soon

New York, January 19.—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in

THIS CLIPPING FROM WINONA, MINN.
Republican-Herald

JAN 20 1932

GERSHWIN FINISHES 'SECOND RHAPSODY'

Piece Was Started as Background for Movie.

New York—(AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue

MANDAN, N. D.
PIONEER

JAN 20 1932

GERSCHWIN AUTHOR OF NEW BLUES PHAPSODY

By CHARLES HONCE

New York, Jan. 20 (AP)— George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE JOURNAL & COURIE
LAFAYETTE, IND.

JAN 20 1932

Gershwin Writes Second Rhapsody

NEW YORK, Jan. 19.—(AP)— George

THIS CLIPPING FROM RALEIGH, N. C.
TIMES

JAN 20 1932

GERSHWIN WRITES SECOND RHAPSODY

NEW YORK, Jan. 20.—(AP)—George Gershwin whose "Phapsody in Blue"

THIS CLIPPING FROM GALVESTON, TEX.
TRIBUNE

JAN 19

Gershwin Writes Second Rhapsody

BY CHARLES HONCE.

New York, Jan. 19.—(AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHATTANOOGA, TENN.
NEWS

JAN 19 1932

Gershwin Produces "Second Rhapsody"

New York, Jan. 19.—(A. P.)— George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern American music, has written an encore.

"The Second Rhapsody," it is called, and it will be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra on January ~~29~~ and 30, and will be heard in Carnegie hall in New York on February 5, almost eight years to the day from the time his first rhapsody created musical history under Paul Whiteman's baton at Aeolian hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LUDINGTON, MICH.
DAILY NEWS

115 JAN 19 1932

Second Rhapsody Is Written by Gershwin

NEW YORK, Jan. 19.—(AP)— George Gershwin, whose "Rhap-

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN ANGELO, TEXAS
STANDARD

JAN 20 1932

JAN 2

Gershwin Writes Enchore To His "Rhapsody in Blue"

NEW YORK, Jan. 20. (AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM MOUNT VERNON, WASH.
HERALD

JAN 20 1932

RIVETS INSPIRE COMPOSING OF NEW RHAPSODY

NEW YORK, Jan. 19.—(AP)— George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
GRAND FORKS, N. D.
HERALD

JAN 20 1932

SECOND RHAPSODY TO BE ENCORE FOR 1ST GERSHWIN WORK

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Play New Selection Soon.

New York, Jan. 20.—(AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody In " marked a high point in the American

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

JAN 27 1932

GERSHWIN TO PLAY IN RELIEF PROGRAM

BOSTON, Jan. 26, (AP).—George Gershwin, whose "Second Rhapsody" will be presented for the first time in concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra this week, will play the piano parts of his new score at a special performance to be given Saturday noon for the Boston unemployment relief fund.

The presentation of Gershwin's latest symphonic contribution was scheduled originally for Friday afternoon and Saturday noon at Symphony hall, and in Carnegie hall in New York on Feb. 5. The additional performance, for charity, Saturday noon will be under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and is expected to yield $7500 to Boston's $3,000,000 unemployment relief campaign.

THIS CLIPPING FROM COLORADO SPRINGS, COLO.
TELEGRAPH

116

JAN 1 9 1932

NEW GERSHWIN RHAPSODY WILL BE HEARD SOON

Encore to Famous Work to Be Played First Time in Boston on January 29; Outgrowth of Movie

By CHARLES HONCE

NEW YORK, Jan. 19 (AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody

THIS CLIPPING FROM PONTIAC, MICH.
PRESS

JAN 25 1932

Gershwin Finishes 'Second Rhapsody'

Encore to Rhapsody in Blue To Be Heard First January 29

BY CHARLES HONCE
(By the Associated Press)

NEW YORK, Jan. 25.—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAPH

JAN 2 2 1932

Gershwin Hits Highest Note

Boston Symphony to Play Second Rhapsody in Carnegie Feb. 25.

George Gershwin cracks right square into the big time on January 29 and 30, when Serge Kousse-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM MANCHESTER, N. H.
LEADER-EVE. UNION
JAN 2 8 1932

BOSTON—George Gershwin, composer whose "Second Rhapsody" will be presented for the first time in concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, will play piano parts of his new score at unemployment performance.

Tel. Chelsea 8300

THIS CLIPPING FROM BRISTOL, CONN.
PRESS

JAN 2 8 1932

Boston—George Gershwin, composer whose "Second Rhapsody" will be presented for the first time in concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra will play piano parts of his new score at unemployment performance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK MIRROR

JAN 2 9 1932

Gershwin Second Rhapsody.

George Gershwin will be soloist in his own Second Rhapsody to be played here for the first time by the Boston Symphony, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, on Friday evening, February 5, and Saturday afternoon, February 6, at Carnegie Hall. This work, which was performed in Boston last week, is the third work of Mr. Gershwin for piano and orchestra, the others being the Rhapsody in Blue and the Concerto in F.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

JAN 2 9 1932

George Gershwin will appear in a benefit performance of his new Second Rhapsody with the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Saturday at noon in Symphony Hall, Boston. The entire receipts will go to Boston's unemployment relief campaign.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ATTLEBORO, MASS.
SUN

JAN 2 7 1932

Boston—George Gershwin, composer whose "Second Rhapsody" will be presented for the first time in concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra will play piano parts of his new score at unemployment performance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
FALL RIVER, MASS.
HERALD-NEWS

JAN 26 1932

thick layer of hardening paster.

Gershwin Rhapsody To Be Played By Symphony

Music of George Gershwin will be heard for the first time at a Boston

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

JAN 2 7 1932

Boston—George Gershwin, composer, whose "Second Rhapsody" will be presented for the first time in concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra will play piano parts of his new score at unemployment performance.

Lowell, Mass.—William P. McCarthy, assistant city clerk of Lowell for 45 years, dies.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BENNINGTON, VT.
BANNER

JAN 2 7 1932

Boston—George Gershwin, composer whose "Second Rhapsody" will be presented for the first time in concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, will pla

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM BANGOR, ME.
COMMERCIAL

JAN 2 7 1932

Boston—George Gershwin, composer, whose "Second Rhapsody" will be presented for the first time in concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, will play piano parts of his new score at unemployment performance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
KEENE, N. H.
SENTINEL

JAN 2 7 1932

Boston—George Gershwin, composer, whose "Second Rhapsody" will be presented for the first time in concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra will play piano parts of his new score at unemployment performance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ST. ALBANS, VT.
MESSENGER

JAN 2 7 1932

Boston—George Gershwin, composer whose "Second Rhapsody" will be presented for the first time in concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will play piano parts of his new score at unemployment performance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LYNN, MASS.
EVE. ITEM

JAN 2 7 1932

BOSTON—George Gershwin, composer whose "second rhapsody" will be presented for the first time in concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, will play piano parts of his new score at unemployment performance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HAVERHILL, MASS.
GAZETTE

JAN 2 7 1932

BOSTON—George Gershwin, composer, whose "second rhapsody" will be presented for the first time in con-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM WORCESTER, MASS.
POST

27 1932

BOSTON — George Gershwin, composer whose "Second Rhapsody" will be presented for the first time in concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will play piano parts of his new score at unemployment performance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CONCORD, N. H.
MONITOR PATRIOT

JAN 2 7 1932

BOSTON—George Gershwin, composer whose "Second Rhapsody" will be presented for the first time in concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play piano parts of his new score at unemployment performance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DANBURY, CONN.
NEWS

JAN 2 7 1932

New York — An invalid for the last seven years, Dennis Keating, sixty-nine years old, was burned to death yesterday afternoon when his home at 330 Bement avenue, West New Brighton, S. I., was partly destroyed by fire.

Boston—George Gershwin, composer whose "Second Rhapsody" will be presented for the first time in concerts by the Boston symphony orchestra will play piano parts of his new score at unemployment performance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TORRINGTON, CONN.
REGISTER

JAN 2 7 1932

Boston — George Gershwin, composer whose "second Rhapsody" will be presented for the first time in concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play parts of his new score at unemployment performance.

N 3 0 1932

SONG OF RIVETER IN NEW SYMPHONY

Staccato Note of Pneumatic Tool Featured in George Gershwin's 2d Rhapsody Which Has Premiere in Boston

By Associated Press to The Patriot

Boston, Jan. 29.—The song of the Riveter was heard in Symphony Hall today and a dis-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM BRATTLEBORO, VT.
REFORMER

JAN 2 7 1932

BOSTON—George Gershwin, composer, whose Second Rhapsody will be presented for the

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM STAMFORD, CONN.
ADVOCATE

JAN 2 7 1932

Boston — George Gershwin, composer whose "second rhapsody" will be presented for the first time in concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play piano parts of his new score at unemployment performance.

Boston—Mayor Curley sees no

THIS CLIPPING FROM BARRE, VT.
TIMES

JAN 2 7 1932

Boston.—George Gershwin, composer whose "Second Rhapsody" will be presented for the first time in concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, will play piano parts of his new scope at unemployment performance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SO. MANCHESTER, CONN.
HERALD

JAN 2 7 1932

Boston—George Gershwin, composer whose "Second Rhapsody" will be presented for the first time in concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play piano parts of his new score at unemployment performance.

Boston—Mayor Curley

THIS CLIPPING FROM NORWICH, CONN.
RECORD

JAN 2 7 1932

BOSTON — George Gershwin, composer whose "second rhapsody" will be presented for the first time in concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra will play piano parts of his new score at unemployment performance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MANCHESTER, N. H.
LEADER-EVE. UNION

JAN 2 7 1932

BOSTON—George Gershwin, composer whose "Second Rhapsody" will be presented for the first time in concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, will play piano parts of his new score at unemployment performance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

JAN 3 0 1932

MACHINE 'MUSIC' THRILLS BOSTON

Symphony Hall's Distinguished Audience Enthralled by "The Song of the Riveter," New Type of Modern Composition by George Gershwin, Creator of "Rhapsody in Blue."

By PAUL COCHRANE.

BOSTON, Jan. 29, (AP)—The Song of the Riveter was heard in Sym-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ST. PAUL, MINN.
DISPATCH

JAN 3 0 1932

GERSHWIN'S 2D RHAPSODY GREETED BY BOSTONIANS

Boston, Jan. 30.—(AP)—The song of the riveter was heard in Symphony

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

JAN 3 0 1932

RIVETER'S SONG DELIGHTS HUB IN RHAPSODY

George Gershwin's New Composition Acclaimed at Premiere in Symphony Hall

Boston, Jan. 30.—(AP)—The song of the riveter was heard in Symphony

THIS CLIPPING FROM COLORADO SPRINGS, COLO.
TELEGRAPH

116

JAN 19 1932

NEW GERSHWIN RHAPSODY WILL BE HEARD SOON

Encore to Famous Work to Be Played First Time in Boston on January 29; Outgrowth of Movie

By CHARLES HONCE

NEW YORK, Jan. 19 (AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody

THIS CLIPPING FROM PONTIAC, MICH.
PRESS

JAN 25 1932

Gershwin Finishes 'Second Rhapsody'

Encore to Rhapsody in Blue To Be Heard First January 29

BY CHARLES HONCE
(By the Associated Press)

NEW YORK, Jan. 25.—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAPH

JAN 22 1932

Gershwin Hits Highest Note

Boston Symphony to Play Second Rhapsody in Carnegie Feb. 25.

George Gershwin cracks right square into the big time on January 29 and 30, when Serge Kousse-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM MANCHESTER, N. H.
LEADER-EVE. UNION
JAN 28 1932

BOSTON—George Gershwin, composer whose "Second Rhapsody" will be presented for the first time in concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, will play piano parts of his new score at unemployment performance.

Tel. Chelsea 8500

THIS CLIPPING FROM BRISTOL, CONN.
PRESS

JAN 28 1932

Boston—George Gershwin, composer whose "Second Rhapsody" will be presented for the first time in concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra will play piano parts of his new score at unemployment performance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK MIRROR

JAN 29 1932

Gershwin Second Rhapsody.

George Gershwin will be soloist in his own Second Rhapsody to be played here for the first time by the Boston Symphony, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, on Friday evening, February 5, and Saturday afternoon, February 6, at Carnegie Hall. This work, which was performed in Boston last week, is the third work of Mr. Gershwin for piano and orchestra, the others being the Rhapsody in Blue and the Concerto in F.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

JAN 29 1932

George Gershwin will appear in a benefit performance of his new Second Rhapsody with the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Saturday at noon in Symphony Hall, Boston. The entire receipts will go to Boston's unemployment relief campaign.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ATTLEBORO, MASS.
SUN

JAN 27 1932

Boston—George Gershwin, composer whose "Second Rhapsody" will be presented for the first time in concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra will play piano parts of his new score at unemployment performance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
FALL RIVER, MASS.
HERALD-NEWS

JAN 26 1932

thick layer of hardening paster.

Gershwin Rhapsody To Be Played By Symphony

Music of George Gershwin will be heard for the first time at a Boston

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

JAN 27 1932

Boston—George Gershwin, composer, whose "Second Rhapsody" will be presented for the first time in concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra will play piano parts of his new score at unemployment performance.

Lowell, Mass.—William P. McCarthy, assistant city clerk of Lowell for 45 years, dies.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BENNINGTON, VT.
BANNER

JAN 27 1932

Boston—George Gershwin, compose whose "Second Rhapsody" will be present ed for the first time in concerts by th Boston Symphony orchestra, will pla

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM BANGOR, ME.
COMMERCIAL

JAN 27 1932

Boston—George [illegible]

will be [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
KEENE, N. H.
SENTINEL

JAN 27 1932

Boston—George Gershwin, composer, whose "Second Rhapsody" will be presented for the first time in concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra will play piano parts of his new score at unemployment performance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ST. ALBANS, VT.
MESSENGER

JAN 27 1932

Boston—George Gershwin, composer whose "Second Rhapsody" will be presented for the first time in concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will play piano parts of his new score at unemployment performance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LYNN, MASS.
EVE. ITEM

JAN 27 1932

BOSTON—George Gershwin, composer whose "second rhapsody" will be presented for the first time in concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, will play piano parts of his new score at unemployment performance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HAVERHILL, MASS.
GAZETTE

JAN 27 1932

BOSTON—George Gershwin, composer, whose "second rhapsody" will be presented for the first time in con-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM WORCESTER, MASS.
POST

27 1932

BOSTON — George Gershwin, composer whose "Second Rhapsody" will be presented for the first time in concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will play piano parts of his new score at unemployment performance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CONCORD, N. H.
MONITOR PATRIOT

JAN 27 1932

BOSTON—George Gershwin, composer whose "Second Rhapsody" will be presented for the first time in concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play piano parts of his new score at unemployment performance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DANBURY, CONN.
NEWS

JAN 27 1932

New York — An invalid for the last seven years, Dennis Keating, sixty-nine years old, was burned to death yesterday afternoon when his home at 330 Bement avenue, West New Brighton, S. I., was partly destroyed by fire.

Boston—George Gershwin, composer whose "Second Rhapsody" will be presented for the first time in concerts by the Boston symphony orchestra will play piano parts of his new score at unemployment performance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TORRINGTON, CONN.
REGISTER

JAN 27 1932

Boston — George Gershwin, composer whose "second Rhapsody" will be presented for the first time in concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play parts of his new score at unemployment performance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARRISBURG, PA.
PATRIOT

N 30 1932

SONG OF RIVETER IN NEW SYMPHONY

Staccato Note of Pneumatic Tool Featured in George Gershwin's 2d Rhapsody Which Has Premiere in Boston

By Associated Press to The Patriot

Boston, Jan. 29.—The song of the Riveter was heard in Symphony Hall today and a dis-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM BRATTLEBORO, VT.
REFORMER

JAN 27 1932

BOSTON—George Gershwin, composer, whose Second Rhapsody will be presented for the first time in concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, will play piano parts of his new score at unemployment performance.

JAN

Boston — George Gershwin, composer whose "second rhapsody" will be presented for the first time in concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play piano parts of his new score at unemployment performance.

Boston—Mayor Curley sees no

THIS CLIPPING FROM BARRE, VT.
TIMES

JAN 27 1932

Boston.—George Gershwin, composer whose "Second Rhapsody" will be presented for the first time in concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, will play piano parts of his new scope at unemployment performance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SO. MANCHESTER, CONN.
HERALD

JAN 27 1932

Boston—George Gershwin, composer whose "Second Rhapsody" will be presented for the first time in concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play piano parts of his new score at unemployment performance.

Boston—Mayor Curley

THIS CLIPPING FROM NORWICH, CONN.
RECORD

JAN 27 1932

BOSTON — George Gershwin, composer whose "second rhapsody" will be presented for the first time in concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra will play piano parts of his new score at unemployment performance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MANCHESTER, N. H.
LEADER-EVE. UNION

JAN 27 1932

BOSTON—George Gershwin, composer whose "Second Rhapsody" will be presented for the first time in concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, will play piano parts of his new score at unemployment performance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

JAN 30 1932

MACHINE 'MUSIC' THRILLS BOSTON

Symphony Hall's Distinguished Audience Enthralled by "The Song of the Riveter," New Type of Modern Composition by George Gershwin, Creator of "Rhapsody in Blue."

By PAUL COCHRANE.

BOSTON, Jan. 29, (AP)—The Song of the Riveter was heard in Sym-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ST. PAUL, MINN.
DISPATCH

JAN 30 1932

GERSHWIN'S 2D RHAPSODY GREETED BY BOSTONIANS

Boston, Jan. 30.—(AP)—The song of the riveter was heard in Symphony

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
JAN 30 1932

RIVETER'S SONG DELIGHTS HUB IN RHAPSODY

George Gershwin's New Composition Acclaimed at Premiere in Symphony Hall

Boston, Jan. 30.—(AP)—The song of the riveter was heard in Symphony

THIS CLIPPING FROM BANGOR, ME.
NEWS

JAN 30 1932

Gershwin's New Rhapsody Heard For First Time

Played By Boston Symphony Orchestra Before Several Thousand People.

BOSTON, Jan. 29—(AP)—The Song of the Riveter was heard in

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS

JAN 30 1932

Rhapsody.

George Gershwin's second rhapsody, inspired by a riveting machine

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM TORONTO, CAN.
MAIL & EMPIRE

JAN 30 1932

GERSHWIN'S RHAPSODY HAS RIVETER'S THEME

Boston Symphony Plays Work With Composer at Piano.

Boston, Jan. 29.—(AP)—The song

THIS CLIPPING FROM MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
TRIBUNE

JAN 30 1932

Orchestra Adds Fly Swatter to Instrument List

Boston Symphony Uses Summer Weapon in Playing Second Rhapsody by Gershwin.

Boston, Jan. 29.—(UP)—George Gershwin's second rhapsody, for

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

JAN 30 1932

SONG OF RIVETS TAKES BOSTONIANS BY STORM

Boston, Jan. 29.—(AP)—The song of the riveter was heard in Symphony Hall

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
TELEGRAM

JAN 30 1932

GERSHWIN'S SONG OF RIVETER WINS APPLAUSE IN HUB

Life on Streets of New York Depicted in Second Rhapsody.

BOSTON, Jan. 29.—(By Associated Press) The song of the riveter was

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER-EXPRESS

JAN 30 1932

GERSHWIN APPLAUDED

Distinguished audience hears his second Rhapsody

Boston, Jan. 29 (AP)—The song of the Riveter was heard in Symphony

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM KNOXVILLE, TENN.
JOURNAL

JAN 30 1932

FLY SWATTER

Becomes Orchestra Instrument As Boston Symphony Honors Gershwin

(By UNITED PRESS)

BOSTON, Jan. 29.—George

THIS CLIPPING FROM YOUNGSTOWN, OHIO
VINDICATOR

JAN 30 1932

Gershwin's Second Rhapsody Scores Hit

Boston, Jan.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
DESERET NEWS

JAN 30 1932

George Gershwin Writes Encore To 'Rhapsody in Blue'

Noted American Composer Completes "The Second Rhapsody."

BY CHARLES HONCE.

NEW YORK.—(AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody in Blue" marked a high point in the development of modern Ameri-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BANGOR, ME.
NEWS

JAN 30 1932

Gershwin's New Rhapsody Heard For First Time

Played By Boston Symphony Orchestra Before Several Thousand People.

BOSTON, Jan. 29—(AP)—The Song of the Riveter was heard in Symphony Hall today and a distin-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

JAN 30 1932

MACHINE 'MUSIC' THRILLS BOSTON

Symphony Hall's Distinguished Audience Enthralled by "The Song of the Riveter," New Type of Modern Composition by George Gershwin, Creator of "Rhapsody in Blue."

By PAUL COCHRANE.

BOSTON, Jan. 29, (AP)—The Song of the Riveter was heard in Sym-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE READING, PA.
TIMES

JAN 30 1932

USE FLY SWATTER IN GERSHWIN RHAPSODY

BOSTON, Jan. 29 (AP)—The Song of the Riveter was heard in Symphony Hall, today, and a distinguished

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS

JAN 30 1932

Gershwin Rhapsody Features Riveters

BOSTON, Jan. 29—(A.P.)—The song of the Riveter was heard in Symphony Hall today

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE

FEB 2 1932

Boston Symphony to Play Gershwin Rhapsody

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. AMERICAN

JAN 30 1932

THRONGS IN BOSTON APPLAUD GERSHWIN AND NEW RHAPSODY

By PAUL V. COCHRANE.

BOSTON, Jan. 29 (AP).

The song of the riveter was heard in Symphony Hall today and a distinguished audience

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
Transcript Telegram

FEB 1 1932

☼ ☼

The song of the riveter was heard in Symphony Hall at Boston Saturday and a distinguished audience

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

JAN 30 1932

GERSHWIN WINS TRIUMPH.

Second Rhapsody Delights Boston Symphony Audience at Premiere.

BOSTON, Jan. 29 (AP).—The song of the riveter was heard in Symphony Hall today and a distinguished audience applauded in general de-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald-Tribune

JAN 30 1932

Gershwin's 2d Rhapsody, Song of Rivets, Is Heard

Boston Applauds Composer Himself at the Piano

BOSTON, Jan. 29 (AP).—The song of the riveter was heard in Symphony Hall today and a distinguished audience of several thousand applauded, for it was the premiere of George

---

THIS CLIPPING
ATLANTA GA.
CONSTITUTION

JAN 30 1932

GEORGE GERSHWIN'S SECOND SYMPHONY HEARD IN BOSTON

BOSTON, Jan. 30.—(UP)—George Gershwin's Second Rhapsody, for

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JAN 30 1932

* * *

The first performance of George Gershwin's "Second Rhapsody," written for orchestra and piano, was given in Boston last evening, with the composer at the piano, by the Boston Symphony orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky. The work will be given in New York soon by the Boston players.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS

JAN 30 1932

GERSHWIN SCORES HIT WITH SECOND RHAPSODY

BOSTON, Jan. 30.—(U.P.)—George Gershwin's second rhapsody, for which he found inspiration in the machine-gun tattoo of Manhattan

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW YORK NEWS

JAN 26 1932

George Gershwin is now in Boston. Saturday eve the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play his latest composition, "The Second Rhapsody." He will conduct.

A week later New Yorkers will be able to hear this piece, for it will be played at Carnegie Hall.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW ORLEANS, LA.
TRIBUNE

JAN 30 1932

Gershwin's 'Rivet' Rhapsody Played For First Time By Boston Symphony

BOSTON, Jan. 29—(UP)—George Gershwin's second rhapsody

Lewis Carroll anniversary. In con-

THIS CLIPPING FROM WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

JAN 30 1932

Gershwin's 'Song of Riveter' Pleases Symphony Patrons

BOSTON, Jan. 29 (AP)—The Song of the Riveter" was heard in Symphony hall today and a distinguished audience of several thousand applauded in general delight for it was the premiere of George

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

AN 30 1932

Gershwin's Song of Rivets Takes High-Hat Bostonians by Storm

None Less Than Eminent Koussevitzky Wields Baton at Premiere of Jazz Composer's Latest Rhapsody, Written for Movie Then Expanded.

Boston, Jan. 29.—(AP)—The song of the riveter was heard in Symphony Hall

Eventually other themes were consid-

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
EXAMINER

JAN 30 1932

Rivets and Fly Swatters Blended; Gershwin Again!

BOSTON, Jan. 29. (AP)—The song of the riveter was heard in Writttn originally to be used in connection with a motion

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

JAN 30 1932

GERSHWIN'S RHAPSODY 'SONG OF THE RIVETER' ENCHANTS BOSTONIANS

Boston, Jan. 29—(AP)—The Song of the Riveter was heard in Symphony Hall today and a distinguish-namic fingers went into action and the orchestra took it up.

Eventually other themes were considered: nearly every form of

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JAN 28 1932

"Tin Pan Alley" Boy Scores Again

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BURLINGTON, VT.
FREE PRESS

JAN 30 1932

Damrosch, Famous Conductor, 70 Today; Gershwin's 'Rhapsody of Rivets' Has Premiere

BY PAUL COCHRANE

BOSTON, Jan. 29. (AP)—The Song of the Riveter was heard in Symphony Hall today and a

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM GREAT FALLS, MONT.
LEADER

JAN 30 1932

Gershwin's Second Rhapsody Is Played by Boston Orchestra; It Introduces Fly-Swatter to Fame

By MARTIN KANE
United Press Staff Correspondent

BOSTON, Jan. 30.—(U.P.)—George Gershwin's Second meaningless notes on the piano and developed into a scherzo written in terms of jazz.

The final division

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAPH

JAN 31 1932

GERSHWIN'S Rivets Quite Well Received

BOSTON, Jan. 30.—George Gershwin's "second rhapsody," which he says was inspired by Manhattan riveters, was played at its premiere by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

Mr. Gershwin appeared with the orchestra as soloist, playing the dominating piano part. His ordinary business suit was in contrast to the formal attire of the conductor and orchestra. He walked to the piano with a broad grin.

The performance marked the first appearance of a fly-swatter as a symphony instrument. But the usual conservative symphony audience, for the most part, applauded vigorously.

The rhapsody's first division began with a few rhythmic but melodically meaningless notes on the piano and developed into a scherzo in jazz terms.

The final division of the rhapsody was in keeping with the atmosphere of a symphony orchestra. The subordinated "rivet theme" was heard in firmly repeated notes, and the final strains were typically Gershwin, reminiscent of his rhapsody in blue.

In the lobby during the intermission Dr. Koussevitzky seemed well pleased.

Deems Taylor's suite, "Through the Looking Glass," in commemoration of the current Lewis Carroll anniversary, preceded the rhapsody.

Here's what the critics said of the Gershwin piece:

Boston Herald: "The music has decided individuality, which, it is to be hoped, Mr. Gershwin will preserve, and not be frightened into the smug respectability approved by professors of music."

Boston Globe: "This rhapsody, despite the frequent and regrettable failure . . . of Dr. Koussevitzky and the players to catch its rhythmic swing, impressed one deeply. It sounded genuine."

Boston Post: "Most of the new rhapsody calls out for a musical comedy setting. At a symphony concert it is as out of place as a one-piece bathing suit."

THIS CLIPPING FROM WORCESTER, MASS.
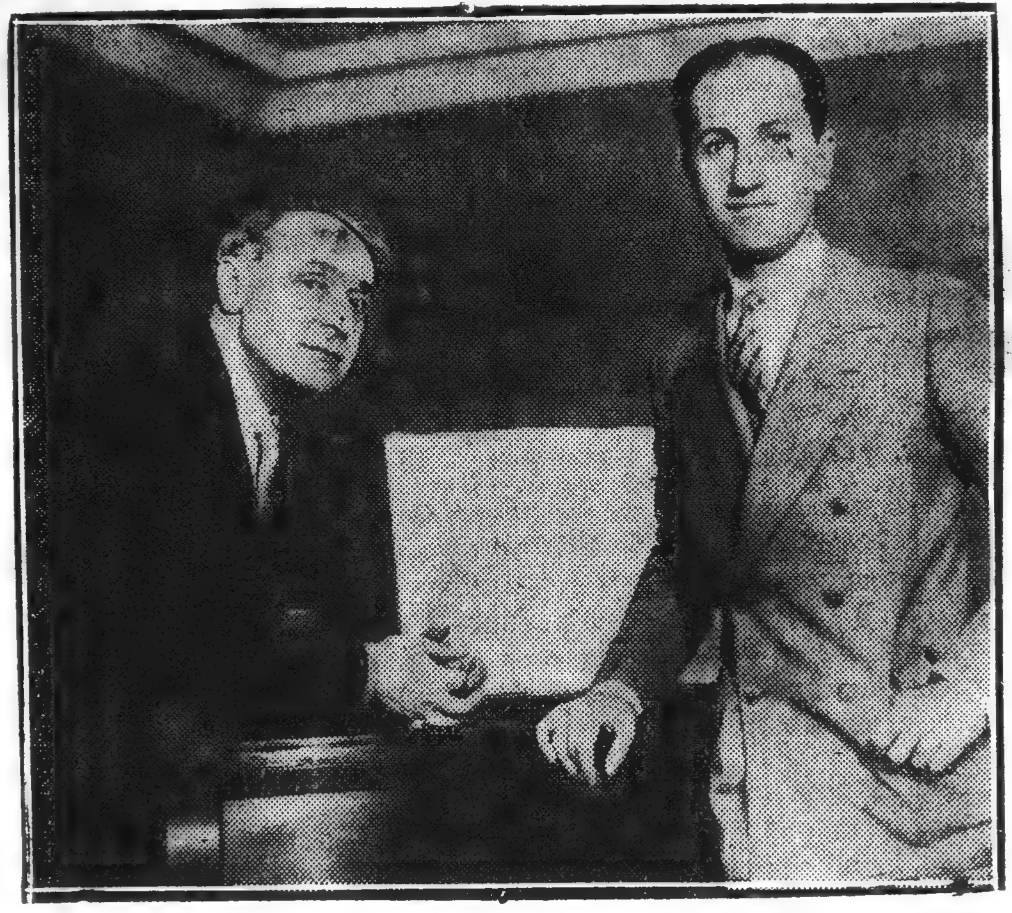
GAZETTE

JAN 28 1932

Rehearse Gershwin Work



(Associated Press Photo)

Serge Koussevitzky, internationally known conductor of Boston Symphony orchestra (left), and George Gershwin, product of New York's Tin Pan Alley, standing beside piano at final rehearsal of Gershwin's "Second Rhapsody," which is to be performed for the first time tomorrow in Boston. Koussevitzky called the work "masterful." Gershwin, author of the "Rhapsody in Blue," was pounding the piano for $15 a week only 18 years ago. His new piece has for its theme the song of rivets on New York skyscrapers.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKYLN, N. Y.
EAGLE

JAN 31 1932

With the Orchestras

A Sequel to the Rhapsody in Blue Is Offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra—Philharmonic and Other Programs

Visiting New York for the third time this season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussewitsky will play at Carnegie Hall on Friday evening and Saturday afternoon of this week. A novelty of major interest will be presented at both concerts—George Gershwin's Second Rhapsody, for piano and orchestra, the composer performing the solo part. The Second Rhapsody, announced as a companion piece to the Rhapsody in Blue, was written during Mr. Gershwin's recent sojourn in Hollywood. Originally intended for inclusion in the film "Delicious," the composer later withdrew it from the score of the picture in order to make a concert-piece of it. Under Mr. Koussewitsky's direction, it was played in Boston last week, for the first time anywhere.

The complete program for the Friday evening concert of the Boston Symphony (which replaces the concert usually given on Thursday) includes Prokofiew's Classical Symphony, Hindemith's Konzertmusik for strings and brass, the Gershwin Rhapsody and Scriabin's Poem of Ectasy. The Hindemith work will be heard for the first time in New York. It was composed for the Boston Orchestra on the occasion of its 50th anniversary.

At the Saturday matinee, in addition to the Gershwin Rhapsody, Mr. Koussewitsky will conduct performances of a Corelli Suite, Tcherepin's Eight Miniatures "after a Russian illustrated alphabet," and Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symhony.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

FEB 1 1932

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY AND GERSHWIN

Returning to his labors in Symphony Hall, Boston, after a midseason respite, writes L. A. S. in the C. S. Monitor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky received, on Jan. 29, a warm greeting. He then directed the fourteenth program of the Boston Symphony season, as follows: Taylor Suite, "Through the Looking Glass;" Gershwin, Rhapsody No. 2 for piano and orchestra; Scriabin, "Poem of Ecstasy."

Mr. George Gershwin's new rhapsody was performed on this occasion for the first time. In an interview last fall, Dr. Koussevitzky was quoted as saying that "the experimental stage is definitely past and we know who among the new composers have something of interest to offer." And again: "I hold no brief for those 'modernists' whose work I cannot find serious enough to bring to a first hearing. I must feel the reason for the existence of a work before I can begin its study."

It seems to follow, then, that Mr. Gershwin is one of the new composers who have something of interest to offer, and that Dr. Koussevitzky has felt the reason for the existence of this rhapsody. Let us not presume to question the conductor's judgment on the first point; we can only regret that the performance of the rhapsody did not make the reason for its existence so clear to us as it must be to him.

You will gain a sufficient notion of the work when you learn that it was originally to be entitled "Manhattan Rhapsody," or "Rhapsody in Rivets." The main musical idea, which was inspired by the riveting machines of New York, was used in a motion picture score, and while he was yet in Hollywood Mr. Gershwin was moved to incorporate it in a symphonic piece. This theme is merely a rhythmic figure of a type easily imagined. The other material of the piece is taken from the rag bag of musical comedy. The composer has learned more about the orchestra since writing his "Rhapsody in Blue" and the Piano Concerto, but this is hardly enough to lift him from the theater to the concert hall. Nor is a great symphony orchestra the ideal communicator of his music, which belongs essentially to the dance hall bands.

The other American composer represented fared better. Mr. Deems Taylor's early Suite seems likely to remain his principal contribution to musical literature, just as the story which inspired it remains the monument of its author, Lewis Carroll, in honor of whose centenary the suite was played.

It is true that Mr. Taylor has written other music, notably two operas which have been produced at the Metropolitan; but we believe that this suite is more truly representative of his talent. It is music which is happily wedded to its text, and which after 13 years still seems witty and charming.

Dr. Koussevitzky, alone among conductors, we are assured by Mr. Leonid Sabaneev in his "Modern Russian Composers," is qualified to officiate as high priest of Scriabin's tonal mysteries. We have never been able to soar with some of the commentators into the rarefied atmosphere where Scriabin dwells, but we were able to admire Dr. Koussevitzky's magnificent conception of this score, and the superb texture of sound that issued from the orchestra he guided through it.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEWS
Arlington, Mas

JAN 12 1932

Free Symphony Listed Today In Boston

Arlington music lovers will be on hand this afternoon when for the first time in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the doors of Symphony Hall will be thrown open to the general public for a concert conducted by Dr. Sert. Koussevitzky, in memory of the late president of the board of trustees, Judge Frederick P. Cabot.

Only the scores for which Judge Cabot had an especial fondness will be played and every musician will in music press his regard for Judge Cabot, who during the past 30 years had kept close personal touch with every individual in the orchestra. It was Judge Cabot who organized the first pension fund of the orchestra at the request of Mayor Higginson, and he was the first trustee and president of the Pension Institution since 1919.

Dr. Koussevitzky returned from a mid-year vacation to conduct the Symphony Orchestra and the Bach Cantata Club in the special concert. The general public will be admitted to hear the musical tribute the members of Symphony play, with the doors opening at 2 o'clock, although the concert will not begin until 4 o'clock. No cards are required.

The programme arranged by Dr. Koussevitzky will include choruses from Mozart's Requiem Mass, in which the Bach Cantata Club will assist. The concluding number will be Tchaikovsky's Symphony Pathetique, a score for which Judge Cabot had often expressed especial fondness.

William H. Brennan, manager of the orchestra, stated last night that it was the first time the precedent had been broken and the general public admitted free to a Symphony concert. One previous concert in memory of Thomas A. Edison was restricted to holders of cards.

In a statement yesterday officials of Symphony said:

"Judge Frederick P. Cabot had been president of the board of trustees since the Boston Symphony orchestra's incorporation in 1918. In the spring of that year, Henry L. Higginson decided to relinquish to corporate control the orchestra, which had been his creation and his personal charge since 1881. He asked his friend to take this responsibility as the head of a board of trustees.

"Alike in the times of difficulty and the ensuing seasons of fresh renown which have characterized the last 13 years, Judge Cabot made the orchestra his special interest and concern. Despite the many demands upon his time, he always kept in personal touch with the individual members of the orchestra, taking over both orchestral and private matters with a friendly regard.

"These close relationships were further extended by Judge Cabot's interest in the orchestra's pension fund. Few except the musicians themselves realize that Judge Cabot's active participation in the orchestra's welfare covered a period of about 30 years. In 1903, Major Higginson first called upon Mr. Cabot for assistance in the affairs of the orchestra, when he asked him to organize what was to be the first pension fund for an American orchestra. The by-laws drawn by Mr. Cabot at that time are still in effect. He was an original trustee of the Pension Institution, and since 1919 had been its president.

'For these many reasons, tomorrow's concert will become the expression of true personal loss—not only for the conductor, but for every musician upon the stage."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
Brooklyn Standard Union

JAN 26 1932

High Notes of the MUSIC WORLD

By JOSEPH A. MILLER

TO CELEBRATE CARROLL CENTENARY

VARIOUS symphony orchestras in the United States will join Columbia University in celebrating the centenary of Lewis Carroll's birth, it is announced by Prof. J. Enrique Zanetti, chairman of the Lewis Carroll Centenary Committee.

The centenary was to have been observed tomorrow, Carroll's one hundredth birthday, but owing to the coming of Mrs. Reginald Hargreaves, the former Alice Liddell, the original Alice of "Alice in Wonderland," the official ceremonies have been postponed to May 4 to spare Mrs. Hargreaves, who will be 80 years old on that date, the hardships of an ocean crossing in January.

The orchestra leaders who were approached by the Lewis Carroll Centenary Committee and who were not prevented by absence or impossibility of altering their programs, agreed to play at their regular concerts during the current week compositions based on Carroll's immortal books, Prof. Zanetti said.

Two orchestras suites have been written based on the "Alice" books, both of them by American composers. Edgar Stillman-Kelley wrote the suite "Alice in Wonderland," which was first performed by members of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra under the composer's baton at the Norfolk County festival on June 9, 1919, and Deems Taylor wrote the "Through the Looking-Glass" suite, Opus 12, which was first performed in Brooklyn by the New York Symphony on March 10, 1923, under the direction of Walter Damrosch.

The Boston, Chicago and Cincinnati symphony orchestras, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Dr. Frederick A. Stock and Dr. Eugene Goossens, will play the Deems Taylor suite at their regular concerts on January 28 and 29.

The Detroit Symphony will play the Stillman-Kelley suite under the direction of Victor Kolar, associate director, who is conducting in the absence of the Ossip Gabrilowitsch. The Manhattan Symphony, which could not alter its program in time, will play the Deems Taylor suite under Mr. Taylor himself early in February.

Although the musical program does not synchronize with the official centenary as originally planned, it serves as a musical prelude to open the Carroll centenary year. This will be followed by the exhibition of Carrolliana at Columbia University, to which Carroll collectors from all over the United States are contributing their rarest items, and which will be opened to the public on April 1. The official ceremonies on May 4 will close the centenary celebration.

THIS CLIPPING FROM RICHMOND, VA.
NEWS-LEADER

JAN 23 1932

Dr. Serge Koussebitsky to Lead 110 Musicians at Auditorium Concert.

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky and his 110 musicians, comprising the great Boston Symphony orchestra, will pay their annual visit to Richmond the night of February 1, one week from next Monday, when they will appear in concert at the city auditorium under the management of T. Michaux Moody. This is the date originally set for this popular attraction, which is one of the concerts in the artists' series necessarily transferred from the Mosque.

Tickets are now on sale at Walter D. Moses and Company where subscribers must exchange their Mosque seats for auditorium seats. Mr. Moody is making every effort to give each patron a location corresponding as nearly as possible with that previously held.

The program to be given by the distinguished Dr. Koussevitsky has not yet been received, so there is no indication which symphony is to be heard, but in addition to the classics, the conductor of the Boston orchestra may be counted on to introduce at least one novelty. It is more than possible that this may be "Raphsody No. 2," a new composition by the widely known American composer, George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody Blue" is known from coast to coast. The newer offering will be played by the orchestra in its concerts taking place the closing nights of this month, and also will be heard a few days after the Richmond visit, according to press reports. So it is not al all unlikely that local concert-goers will be afforded a similar opportunity of listening to this latest work of the young New Yorker.

Whenever the Boston Symphony orchestra goes on tour it is directed by its own eminent conductor, who, in the five seasons that he has headed the great organization, founded fifty-two years ago by the late Colonel Higginson, is declared by critics to have brought the orchestra to its highest standard of artistic merit, until now it is unsurpassed.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ERIE, PA.
DISPATCH-HERALD

JAN 24 1932

The Boston Symphony orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky has been chosen by Jan Sibelius to give the world-premiere of his recently completed Eighth Symphony. The performance will be given during the present season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH

JAN 24 1932

Boston Symphony Orchestra Makes 4th Annual Visit Here

With the appearance of the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, set for February 1 at the City Auditorium, Richmond music lovers last week responded favorably to the reopening of the sale of tickets for the third of the "artists' series" which is promoted by T. Michaux Moody.

Mr. Moody reports an uncommonly large demand for tickets, and expects a capacity crowd to greet the celebrated musicians in their fourth consecutive visit to the City. Last season the Boston Symphony celebrated its fiftieth anniversary and its personnel of 113 pieces is said to remain unchanged.

Under Dr. Koussevitzky the orchestra has reach a state of perfection heretofore unknown, and has been acclaimed by record crowds at performances in various cities in the North and East.

The complete program for the concert February 1 was announced yesterday by Mr. Moody as follows:

1—Prokofieff's classical symphony.

2—Tcherepnin's eight miniatures from an illustrated Russian alphabet—Arab Boy, Egypt, Baba Jaga, Stars, Mama, General, the Forest, The Tsarina.

3—Ravell's Daphnis and Chloe, second suite.

4—Sibelius' second symphony.

Following the appearance of the Boston symphony, Mme. Conchita Supervia, coloratura mezzo-soprano, will be the attraction at the City Auditorium February 23.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PASADENA, CAL.
STAR-NEWS

JAN 23 1932

Koussevitzky and His Epoch Seen in Lourie Biography

SERGEI KOUSSEVITZKY AND HIS EPOCH. A Biographical Chronicle. By Arthur Lourie. Translated from the Russian by S. W. Pring. New York: Alfred A. Knopf.

THE AUTHOR of this authoritative account of the life of the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is an old friend who has followed the career of Mr. Youssevitzky ever since he played a double bass in an obscure Russian orchestra some thirty years ago.

It is, of course, too early to expect anything like a full-length biography of the subject, and Mr. Lourie has not attempted it. He has, however, drawn an intimate picture of the man and considered him in relation to his epoch. It is a summing up of his achievements at the close of his first quarter century as a conductor, both here and in Europe.

With much detail, Mr. Lourie chronicles the progress of Koussevitzky from his boyhood in an obscure village in Russia to his world fame, which his father, a teacher of the violin, could not have thought possible when he opposed his son's becoming a musician. When very young the boy learned to play several instruments, and a neighbor gave him piano lessons and introduced him to the world of classical music.

At the age of 14 he made his way to Moscow, was admitted to the Philharmonic Conservatory, chose to study the double bass, and in four years was playing in the Imperial Theater orchestra. Six years later he was acclaimed as ranking with Bottesini and Dragonetti. In 1898 he made his first appearance in Berlin, and in 1908 made his debut as a conductor in the same city. He had decided to devote himself to conducting, and through hard work has reached the top of his profession.

The story of his progress is told sympathetically by Mr. Lourie, who also comments much on Russian music and discusses composers and other conductors. The visit of Debussy to Russia is said to have had an important influence on Koussevitzky, and there is an interesting chapter which deals with his friendship with Scriabin.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald-Tribune

JAN 24 1932

Boston Symphony Offers Gershwin's 2d Rhapsody

Composer as Soloist in New York Performances Feb. 5-6

George Gershwin's recently competed second rhapsody for orchestra, with piano, will be first played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening and will also be given by this orchestra in its Carnegie Hall concerts of Friday evening and Saturday afternoon, February 5 and 6. In these performances Serge Koussevitzky will conduct and the composer will appear as soloist.

This is the composer's third week for piano and orchestra. The first was the Rhapsody in Blue, introduced by Paul Whitman in February, 1924, and later rescored for symphony orchestra. The second was the Concerto in F, introduced by the New York Symphony in December, 1925.

Gustav Holst, who will be connected with the music department of Harvard University for the rest of the college year, conducted the Boston Symphony last week, giving his own "St. Paul's Suite," ballet from "The Perfect Fool" and "The Planets." Dr. Koussevitzky resumes the direction of the orchestra this week.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. SUN

JAN 30 1932

George Gershwin will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, playing the piano part in his new Second Rhapsody at each of the two concerts to be given by the orchestra in Carnegie Hall next week. These will be the first New York performances. The evening concert will take place on Friday, February 5, at 8:45 instead of on the usual Thursday evening. The matinee will be given on Saturday, February 6, at 2:30.

At the Friday evening concert Serge Koussevitzky will present the following program of which the Hindemith number is a New York premiere as well as the Gershwin opus:

Konzertmusik for String and Brass Instruments	Hindemith
Classical Symphony	Prokofieff
Poem of Ecstacy	Scriabine
Rhapsody No. 2 for orchestra with piano	Gershwin

At the matinee Koussevitzky will present, in addition to the Gershwin Rhapsody, Corelli's suite, consiting of Sarabande, Gigue and Badinerie, Tcherepnin's Eight Miniatures, "After a Russian Illustrated Alphabet," and Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, No. 6.

The Miniatures are by Nicolai Tcherepnin, the older composer, who gave this little suite its first performance when he appeared as guest with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston recently.

THIS CLIPPING FROM RICHMOND, VA.
NEWS-LEADER

JAN 30 1932

BRAHMS NUMBER TO OPEN CONCERT

Boston Symphony Will Make Annual Appearance on Next Monday Night.

When the Boston symphony orchestra gives it annual concert in Richmond next Monday night at 8:30 o'clock, appearing at the city auditorium with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, the opening number on the program will be Brahms' famous fourth symphony in E minor, instead of the Sibelius No. 2 in D major, at the end of the list, as originally announced. The organization has 110 musicians. The box office is at Walter D. Moses and Company, where there is a steady demand for seats, according to T. Michaux Moody, who is bringing the orchestra here.

This symphony is regarded by critics as a product of Brahms' ripest genius, and was composed in 1884-85. Although E minor is looked on as a somber key for a symphony, and this one is subdued and autumnal in mood, yet it is an imposing and massive structure with a grandeur of its own which sets it apart from all other symphonies. The final movement is in the form of a passacaglia, consisting of an eight-bar theme, repeated again and again with varying orchestration and ornamentation. In this splendid finale, the trombones, introduced for the first time in the symphony, intone the mighty chords as a sort of glorified chorale.

There will be two symphonies played, for Serge Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony" is to be heard in Richmond for the first time.

The complete program is as follows:

Brahms' Symphony No. 4 in E minor; N. Tcherepnin, Eight Miniatures (after a Russian illustrated alphabet), Arab-boy, Egpyt, Baba-jaga, Stars, Mama, General the Forest, the Tsarina; Ravel, Daphnis and Chloe, second suite; Prokofieff, Classical Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE Times
Dunnington

JAN 30 1932

CRITICS DIVIDED ON MERITS OF GERSHWIN'S NEW SECOND RHAPSODY

BOSTON, Jan. 30.—(UP)—Though one critic held that it was as out of place at a symphony concert as a one-piece bathing suit others today acclaimed George Gershwin's Second Rhapsody, played for the first time in public yesterday by the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Inspired by the sights and sounds of New York in general, and by the incessant tattoo of Manhattan riveters in particular, the new work was put forward by some critics as a fitting successor to the young composer's famous "Rhapsody in Blue."

The music was in keeping with the brisk stride, breezy swing of the shoulders and broad grin of its composer as he walked to the piano in the center of the stage directly beneath the baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor.

120

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS
JAN 3 0 1932

Boston Orchestra to Play Brahms' Fourth Symphony

Koussevitzky Brings Noted Group Here for Concert at 4:30 Tuesday

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will make its only concert appearance of the current season in Washington at Constitution Hall next Tuesday afternoon, Feb. 2, at 4:30 p. m., when it appears as the fourth attraction of Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Philharmonic series of afternoon concerts.

Since joining the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1924, Koussevitzky has not only restored the prestige of this world famous orchestra but he has established himself as one of the three outstanding conductors in the 50-year history of the Boston Symphony. In the seven seasons he has already served with the orchestra—the present season is his eighth—the importance and distinction of his concerts has been reflected in a greatly augmented public response both in Boston and elsewhere while the broadened repertoire of the orchestra under this conductor, its festivals and special choral concerts have resulted in a splendid renaissance of the Boston Symphony tradition.

Good Program

Dr. Koussevitzky has selected a superb program. Brahms' Fourth Symphony in E Minor will be the symphonic offering of the afternoon and will open the program. This is the last symphony Brahms ever wrote and one of the greatest. Dr. Koussevitzky can be depended upon for a reading that will gratify the most critical demands of the Brahms enthusiast.

A suite by Corelli, the great 17th Century violinist who laid the foundations for the technical development of the solo violin and whose compositions for that instrument were distinguished; a marked novelty in Nicholas Tcherepnin's eight miniatures "After a Russian Illustrated Alphabet," and excerpts from the second suite of Ravel's exquisite music for the "Daphnis et Chloe" ballet will also be played.

The order of the program will be:

Brahms. . . . .Symphony in E minor, No. 4
I Allegro non troppo
II Andante moderato
III Allegro giacoso
IV Allegro energico e passionato
INTERMISSION
Corelli . . . . Suite
Sarabando—Gigus—Badinerio
N. Tcherepnin. . .Eight Miniatures, "After a Russian Illustrated Alphabet"
I Arab-boy V "Mama"
II Egypt VI General
III Baba-jaga VII The Forest
IV Stars VIII The Tsarina
Ravel. . . . ."Daphnis et Chloe," Ballet: Orchestra Excerpts (Second Suite).

THIS CLIPPING FROM RICHMOND, VA.
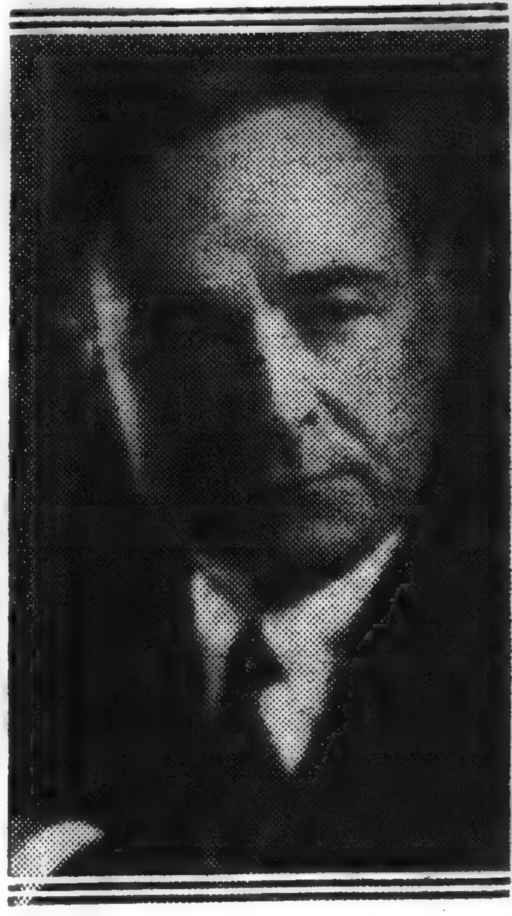
TIMES DISPATCH
JAN 3 1 1932

Here Tuesday



Serge Koussevitzky brings his justly renowned Boston Symphony Orchestra to Washington Tuesday afternoon for its only local concert of the season, in Constitution Hall at 4:30. The Russian leader is one of the greatest conductors in this country and his orchestra one of the finest.

---

hony hat the man mouse-trap in world beating reason to benments which The Mosque suffer great-

Boston Symght would be the beautiful it would still tter where it acoustics of enhance the it would still these compari-certain refu-e are no des musical ac-Boston Sym-would go to yed, or under scious of the d come as a sive desert of hly aware of chmond peoarpened per-its expression.

sque this searonged houses people. Attited this fact.
our blessings us we appre-

rse, needs no introduction to Richmond music lovers and praise of its recitals seems superfluous here, but a slight discussion of what goes into the production may not be amiss. The Boston Globe has frequently stated, solemnly and devotedly, that the orchestra is a presentation of life on its noblest plane. With this we agree, but let us quote a bit from the Globe, because its presentment has the clarity of a close-up:

> A great orchestra is a power station and the power it generates is closely akin to if not actually religion itself. But if such an instrument is to be kept up to concert pitch someone must lead virtually a dedicated life, and that someone is the conductor of the orchestra. He is the leading actor who must play several parts a week. Not for him the life of dining out and social lionization. For him, on the contrary, a life little short of ascetic in the true sense of asceticism; that it, of an athlete in training. He must average four concerts a week, each lasting about one hour and three-quarters. This means four rehearsals beginning at 10 A. M. and running till 1 P. M. When a chorus is performing with the orchestra there must be extra rehearsals. But his work has begun long before the orchestra score reaches the rehearsal stage—hours of solitary study over what shall be played and how he shall play it.
>
> In such a life as this there must be careful and abstemious eating, sleep at as early and regular hours as can be obtained, and some out-of-door exercise. This is no imaginary portrait. it is a faint sketch of the pace maintained by > r until April, > of his actual > e table's is of > tains a man > reer, too, that > ms which are > ative? He is sustained by a force which few are qualified to comprehend until they have themselves experienced the discipline of long effort directed to a higher than personal aim.

The program arranged for the Boston Symphony on Monday night is one that brings into bold relief its superb capacities The concert will be something more than cultural treat; it will approach an artisti feast.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald-Tribune
JAN 3 1 1932

Bruckner Society Awards

The Bruckner Society of America awarded its first Mahler medal to be given to a conductor in his effort to create a better understanding and appreciation of Gustav Mahler's music to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who introduced the composer's music this season both to Boston and to New York.

A similar medal has been presented to Artur Bodanzky, who, as conductor of the Society of Friends of Music, introduced "Das Lied von der Erde" to New York.

THIS CLIPPING FROM RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
JAN 3 1 1932

Noted Boston Symphony To Appear Here Monday

Richmond Ready to Greet Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and Orchestra at City Auditorium Tomorrow Night in Another of "Artists' Series"

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will be presented at the City Auditorium tomorrow night at 8 o'clock by T. Michaux Moody as one of the outstanding attractions on the season's "artists' series." The appearance of the Boston Symphony has been an important annual musical event in Richmond for a number of years. As in previous seasons there has been a distinctly heavy advance demand for reservations, it was stated.

A program of four interesting compositions will be given with Dr. Koussevitzky conducting.

Serge Prokofieff's classical symphony will be an important number. In this score the modern Russian composer temporarily forgets the dissonances of the twentieth century to carve a miniature score with the charm and sparkle of Mazart's time. Although it is plain that Prokofieff is speaking in the current century, the Mozartean allusions are unmistakable. This tiny symphony lasts but a few minutes.

A novelty which has had its first American performances by the Boston orchestra this season is Nikolai Tcherepnin's little suite of miniatures after a Russian illustrated alphabet. Tcherepnin, the father of Alexander Tcherepnin who is likewise a composer, made his first visit to this country this season and played this little suite when he conducted this orchestra in Boston. It is a notable example of tone pictures in miniature, drawn with a light masterly hand and utilizing the rich color palette which the Russians command. The eight movements consist of: "Arab-boy," overwhelming effect as in the tumultuous dance which closes this suite. When Ravel made his only visit to America in 1928, he was guest of honor at the concert by this orchestra in Carnegie Hall, N. Y. Koussevitzky conducted several of the eminent Frenchman's works, including this one. The composer, who sat in a box, was given an ovation by the New York public at the conclusion of the "Daphnis and Chloe" suite.

The classical composer upon this program, will be Brahms when his fourth symphony in E minor will be played. This symphony was a product of Brahms' ripest genius, having been composed in 1884-85. E minor is looked upon as a sombre key for a symphony, and indeed this one is subdued and autumnal in mood. It remains, however, an imposing and massive structure with a grandeur of its own which sets it apart from all other symphonies. The final movement is in the form of a passacaglia, consisting of an eight-bar theme, repeated again and again with varying orchestration and ornamentation. In this splendid finale, the trombones, introduced for the first time in the symphony, intone and mighty chords a sort of glorified chorale.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE, MD.
AMERICAN
JAN 3 1 1932

Koussevitzky to Direct Program Including Opus For Orchestra's Jubilee

By CARROLL DULANEY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, ~~conductor,~~ makes its only appearance of the season in Baltimore at the Lyric next Wednesday under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

DIRECTS

Serge Koussevitzky will direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert at the Lyric, Wednesday, February 3.

Mr. Koussevitzky is living up to his reputation as a program maker. The symphonic high light of the program is the Tschaikowsky Sixth (Pathetique) Symphony The remainder of the program follows:

Suite . . . . .Corelli
Sarabande—Gigue—Badinerie
Konzertmusik for string and brass instruments
Hindsmith
"Daphnis et Chloe," Ballet: Orchestral Excerpts. . . . . . .Ravel
(Second Suite)

The program novelty is the Concerto which Paul Hindsmith wrote especially for the golden jubilee of the Boston Orchestra. It had its first public performance by the orchestra last spring.

In the seven years that Mr. Koussevitzky has been director of the Boston Orchestra, he has established himself as one of the greatest conductors the famous orchestra has ever served. Not so long ago the organization used to play four or five concerts a season in Baltimore. Now, unfortunately, this has been reduced to one. But we are grateful for that one.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST
JAN 3 1 1932

Y AY

stra, ctor, ance gton sday lock.
rachar-s at tzky his gton mionic will ppo, oso,

This ever
Dr. upon the hms be ten

the relli, olinthe vio-
that hed, estra s of ony, oser erge orm-

Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct the orchestra in its fifteenth program Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Feb. 12 and 13, playing Bruckner's symphony No. 8 in C minor, Debussy's Rhapsody for orchestra and English horn, with Louis Speyer as the soloist, and the "Classical" symphony, by Prokofieff.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
JAN 3 1 1932

The Ambassador of France and Mme. Claudel will entertain at luncheon in the embassy Tuesday, when they will be hosts to about 30 French musicians who are members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give a concert Tuesday afternoon.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST
JAN 3 0 1932

New Gershwin Rhapsody

To Be Played Next Week by Boston Symphony Orchestra First Time in New York—Other Programs

GEORGE GERSHWIN'S Rhapsody No. 2 for piano and orchestra, with the composer as soloist, will be given for the first time in this city Friday evening in Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, and repeated Saturday afternoon. The other numbers Friday will be Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony, Hindemith's "Konzertmusik" for strings and brass, and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy." The other numbers Saturday will be Corelli's Suite, Tcherepnin's "Eight Miniatures" and Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique" Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST
JAN 3 1 1932

The French Ambassador and Mme. Claudel will return to Washington tomorrow from New York, where they have passed the week-end. On Tuesday the Ambassador and Mme. Claudel will entertain at luncheon for the French musicians who will play in the concert of the Boston Symphony that afternoon.

120

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS
JAN 30 1932

Bost to P Four

Kousse
Grou

THE B
Dr. tor, will pearance Washing
next Tu
4:30 p. fourth Greene's ternoon
Since phony O ky has tige of but he one of ductors
Boston sons he orchestr eighth—tion of ed in a sponse while the orc its festi certs h renaissa tradition.

NDS of CLEAVER ST

—desks wouldn't go any better here than they did in Denver. more culture nor anything— steer. I hung around for a w and then I got a chance to hook with these lousy hams, and I too I didn't have to—see? I wa stoney. I ain't yet. I got a piec change put away in the bank, b am going to keep it there—see got a use for it. So I'm stic with this gang, and maybe I'm lu at that, until things open up. S as they do, I got an idea for a s act. That's what I'm saving dough for. . ."

* * *

MARY FRANCES' feet were burning lumps of torture. backdrop was to be made of stripes of gold cloth and black vet, and the partner (feminine) was to feed Earl in front of it to be dressed in stripes of gold black. Finding the partner for act was going to be most diffi Sometimes he feared that it was ing to be impossible. He sta awake at night, often, worr about it. He knew what he wan he would have nothing else. wanted an awn-jew-nay type— much Mary Frances' own type; cisely her type, come to think o who wouldn't hog the act if she a chance. Look at Dolly and D Diamonds. Dicky had the goo he had everything. What did D have? Nothing. Nothing bu

Good Program

Dr. Koussevitzky has selected a superb program. Brahms' Fourth Symphony in E Minor will be the symphonic offering of the afternoon and will open the program. This is the last symphony Brahms ever wrote and one of the greatest. Dr. Koussevitzky can be depended upon for a reading that will gratify the most critical demands of the Brahms enthusiast.

A suite by Corelli, the great 17th Century violinist who laid the foundations for the technical development of the solo violin and whose compositions for that instrument were distinguished; a marked novelty in Nicholas Tcherepnin's eight miniatures "After a Russian Illustrated Alphabet," and excerpts from the second suite of Ravel's exquisite music for the "Daphnis et Chloe" ballet will also be played.

The order of the program will be:

Brahms. . . .Symphony in E minor, No. 4
I Allegro non troppo
II Andante moderato
III Allegro giacoso
IV Allegro energico e passionato
INTERMISSION
Corelli .... Suite
Sarabando—Gigus—Badinerio
N. Tcherepnin. . .Eight Miniatures, "After a Russian Illustrated Alphabet"
I Arab-boy V "Ma..a"
II Egypt VI General
III Baba-jaga VII The Forest
IV Stars VIII The Tsarina
Ravel. . . ."Daphnis et Chloe," Ballet: Orchestra Excerpts (Second Suite).

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST
JAN 30 1932

N niversity Club, the American Ass n's City Club, the League of W and the Y. W. C. A.
To Be
the program of the institute
f representatives for each club.
in arranging the preliminary

GEORGE GERSHWIN'S Rhapsody No. 2 for piano and orchestra, with the composer as soloist, will be given for the first time in this city Friday evening in Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, and repeated Saturday afternoon. The other numbers Friday will be Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony, Hindemith's "Konzertmusik" for strings and brass, and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy." The other numbers Saturday will be Corelli's Suite, Tcherepnin's "Eight Miniatures" and Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique" Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST
JAN 31 1932

The French Ambassador and Mme. Claudel will return to Washington tomorrow from New York, where they have passed the week-end. On Tuesday the Ambassador and Mme. Claudel will entertain at luncheon for the French musicians who will play in the concert of the Boston Symphony that afternoon.

THIS CLIPPING FROM RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
JAN 31 1932

The Boston Symphony

IN the quiet consciousness that the man who built the world's best mouse-trap in sylvan solitude soon found the world beating a path to his retreat, there is reason to believe that the series of entertainments which have been shifted, in part, from The Mosque to the City Auditorium, will not suffer greatly in point of attendance.

It is probably true that the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Monday night would be heard to better advantage in the beautiful settings of The Mosque, but it would still be a perfection of art, no matter where it played. It is possible that the acoustics of Carnegie Hall might further enhance the playing by the symphony, but it would still be THE symphony. We suggest these comparisons of environment because of certain refutation by those who know there are no degrees in perfection and, so far as musical accomplishment is concerned, the Boston Symphony is perfection. Richmond would go to hear it, no matter where it played, or under what circumstances and be conscious of the fact that the performance would come as a benediction in our rather extensive desert of artistic isolation.

THE TIMES-DISPATCH is thoroughly aware of the cultural appreciation of Richmond people. This consciousness is sharpened perceptibly on each occasion of its expression. The entertainments at The Mosque this season have been received by thronged houses of perceptive, actually grateful people. Attitude, expression, applause, shouted this fact. Unlike Boston, we do not take our blessings for granted; what art gives to us we appreciate for its rarity.

The Boston Symphony, of course, needs no introduction to Richmond music lovers and praise of its recitals seems superfluous here, but a slight discussion of what goes into the production may not be amiss. The Boston Globe has frequently stated, solemnly and devotedly, that the orchestra is a presentation of life on its noblest plane. With this we agree, but let us quote a bit from the Globe, because its presentment has the clarity of a close-up:

> A great orchestra is a power station and the power it generates is closely akin to if not actually religion itself. But if such an instrument is to be kept up to concert pitch someone must lead virtually a dedicated life, and that someone is the conductor of the orchestra. He is the leading actor who must play several parts a week. Not for him the life of dining out and social lionization. For him, on the contrary, a life little short of ascetic in the true sense of asceticism; that it, of an athlete in training. He must average four concerts a week, each lasting about one hour and three-quarters. This means four rehearsals beginning at 10 A. M. and running till 1 P. M. When a chorus is performing with the orchestra there must be extra rehearsals. But his work has begun long before the orchestra score reaches the rehearsal stage—hours of solitary study over what shall be played and how he shall play it.
>
> In such a life as this there must be careful and abstemious eating, sleep at as early and regular hours as can be obtained, and some out-of-door exercise. This is no imaginary portrait. it is a faint sketch of the pace maintained by DR. KOUSSEVITZKY from October until April, but as pallid a suggestion of his actual performance as a railway time table's is of an express train. What sustains a man in a career so arduous, a career, too, that is often beclouded by criticisms which are more scholarly than imaginative? He is sustained by a force which few are qualified to comprehend until they have themselves experienced the discipline of long effort directed to a higher than personal aim.

The program arranged for the Boston Symphony on Monday night is one tha brings into bold relief its superb capacities The concert will be something more than cultural treat; it will approach an artisti feast.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald-Tribune
JAN 31 1932

Bruckner Society Awards

The Bruckner Society of America awarded its first Mahler medal to be given to a conductor in his effort to create a better understanding and appreciation of Gustav Mahler's music to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who introduced the co[illegible] music this season both to Boston and to New York.

A similar medal has been presented to Artur Bodanzky, who, as conductor of the Society of Friends of Music, introduced "Das Lied von der Erde" to New York.

THIS CLIPPING FROM RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
JAN 31 1932

Noted Boston Symphony To Appear Here Monday

Richmond Ready to Greet Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and Orchestra at City Auditorium Tomorrow Night in Another of "Artists' Series"

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will be presented at the City Auditorium tomorrow night at 8 o'clock by T. Michaux Moody as one of the outstanding attractions on the season's "artists' series." The appearance of the Boston Symphony has been an important annual musical event in Richmond for a number of years. As in previous seasons there has been a distinctly heavy advance demand for reservations, it was stated.

A program of four interesting compositions will be given with Dr. Koussevitzky conducting.

Serge Prokofieff's classical symphony will be an important number. In this score the modern Russian composer temporarily forgets the dissonances of the twentieth century to carve a miniature score with the charm and sparkle of Mazart's time. Although it is plain that Prokofieff is speaking in the current century, the Mozartean allusions are unmistakable. This tiny symphony lasts but a few minutes.

A novelty which has had its first American performances by the Boston orchestra this season is Nikolai Tcherepnin's little suite of miniatures after a Russian illustrated alphabet. Tcherepnin, the father of Alexander Tcherepnin who is likewise a composer, made his first visit to this country this season and played this little suite when he conducted this orchestra in Boston. It is a notable example of tone pictures in miniature, drawn with a light masterly hand and utilizing the rich color palette which the Russians command. The eight movements consist of: "Arab-boy," overwhelming effect as in the tumultuous dance which closes this suite. When Ravel made his only visit to America in 1928, he was guest of honor at the concert by this orchestra in Carnegie Hall, N. Y. Koussevitzky conducted several of the eminent Frenchman's works, including this one. The composer, who sat in a box, was given an ovation by the New York public at the conclusion of the "Daphnis and Chloe" suite.

The classical composer upon this program will be Brahms when his fourth symphony in E minor will be played. This symphony was a product of Brahms' ripest genius, having been composed in 1884-85. E minor is looked upon as a sombre key for a symphony, and indeed this one is subdued and autumnal in mood. It remains, however, an imposing and massive structure with a grandeur of its own which sets it apart from all other symphonies. The final movement is in the form of a passacaglia, consisting of an eight-bar theme, repeated again and again with varying orchestration and ornamentation. In this splendid finale, the trombones, introduced for the first time in the symphony, intone and mighty chords a sort of glorified chorale.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE, MD.
AMERICAN
JAN 31 1932

MUSINGS

K

vi in m

Serge Koussevitzky will direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert at the Lyric, Wednesday, February 3.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST
JAN 31 1932

KOUSSEVITZKY HERE TUESDAY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conductor, will make its only concert appearance of the current season in Washington at Constitution Hall next Tuesday afternoon, February 2, at 4:30 o'clock, when it appears as the fourth attraction of Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Philharmonic series of afternoon concerts at that auditorium. Dr. Koussevitzky has selected a superb program for his orchestra's only 1931-32 Washington concert.

Brahms' Fourth Symphony, E minor, Opus 98, will be the symphonic offering of the afternoon and will open the program, Allegro non troppo, Andante moderato, Allegro giacoso, Allegro energico e passionato. This is the last symphony Brahms ever wrote and one of the greatest. Dr. Koussevitzky can be depended upon for a reading that will gratify the most critical demands of the Brahms enthusiast. The symphony will be followed by an intermission of ten minutes.

Right after the intermission the orchestra will play a suite by Corelli, the great seventeenth century violinist, who laid the foundations for the technical development of the solo violin, and whose compositions for that instrument were more distinguished, it appears, than his virtuosity.

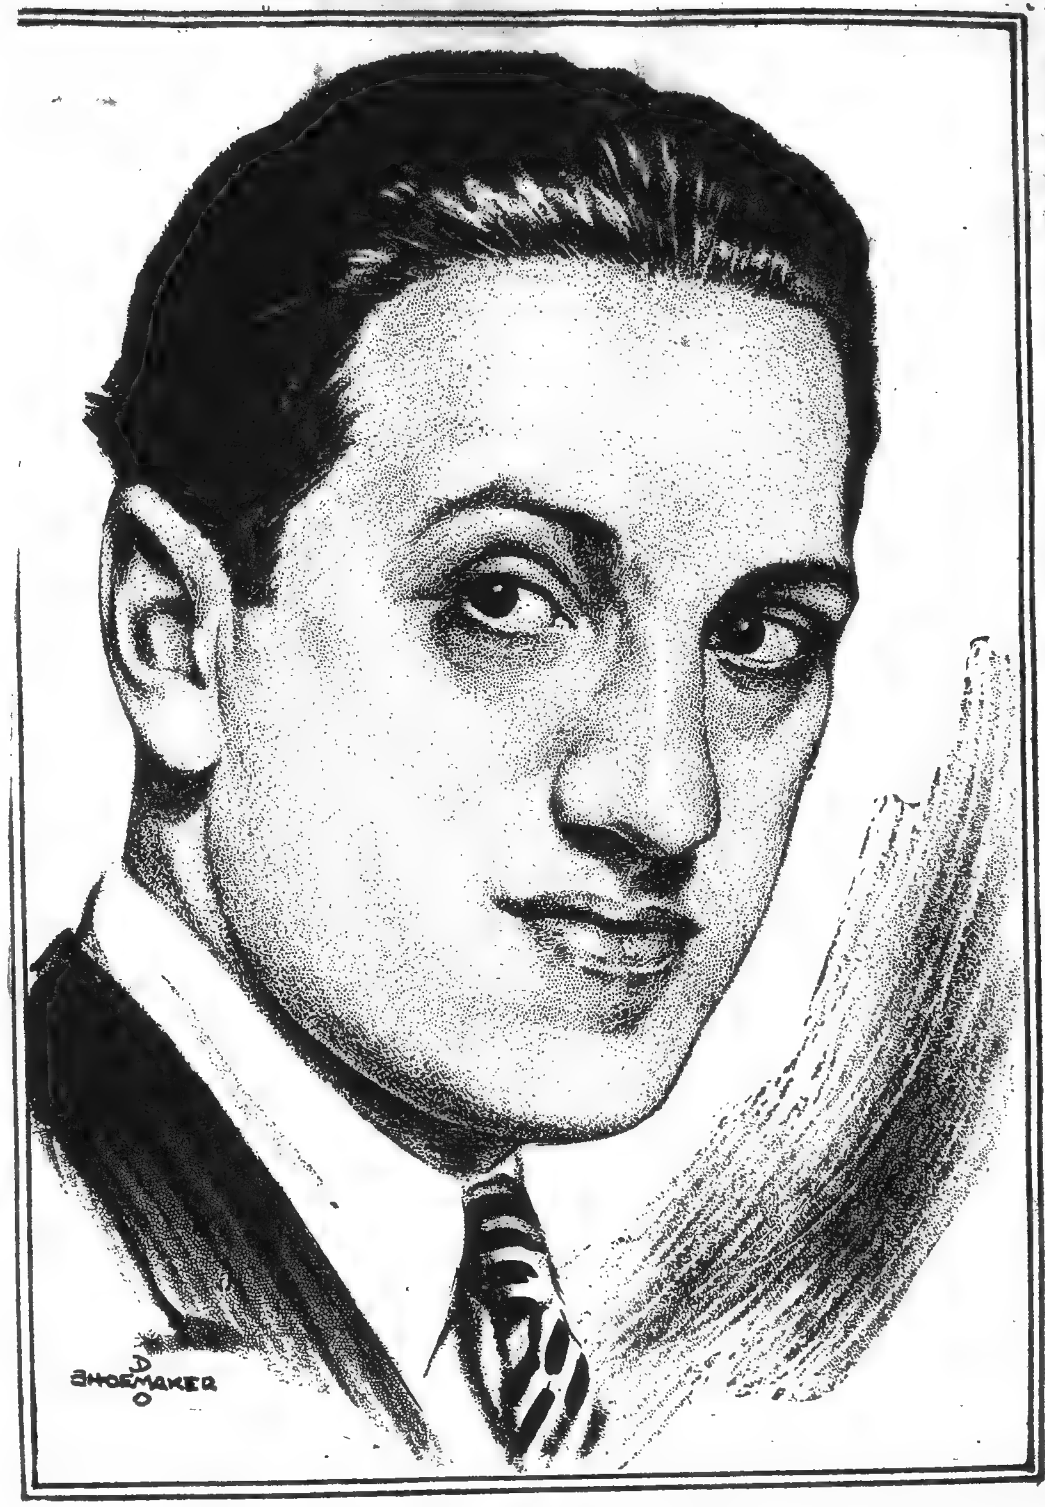
The Boston Symphony Orchestra has received word from Sibelius of the completion of his new symphony, the Eighth. The Finnish composer is forwarding the score to Serge Koussevitzky for its first performance this Spring.

Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct the orchestra in its fifteenth program Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Feb. 12 and 13, playing Bruckner's symphony No. 8 in C minor, Debussy's Rhapsody for orchestra and English horn, with Louis Speyer as the soloist, and the "Classical" symphony, by Prokofieff.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
JAN 31 1932

The Ambassador of France and Mme. Claudel will entertain at luncheon in the embassy Tuesday, when they will be hosts to about 30 French musicians who are members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give a concert Tuesday afternoon.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
JAN 3 1 1932



George Gershwin, Whose New "Rhapsody" Will Be Played in New York by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
FEB 1 1932

ART BLAZES NEW PATHS.

Art, which is as old as the world itself, remains young because it is constantly learning, for the true artist realizes that it can never reach real perfection. Consequently it strives and struggles; it tries out new ideas and welcomes pioneers. The true master of the arts will not turn the cold shoulder to an idea simply because it is new.

These observations bear relation to two concerts which were given in Boston on Friday night and Saturday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Saturday offering was of particular interest because it was held for the benefit of the city's unemployment movement, but from the standpoint of musical history it holds a special place because a featured number was George Gershwin's Second Rhapsody, with Mr. Gershwin playing the piano part as soloist.

We have known of Gershwin and his works during the past years, and the American public has followed his progress into the more serious fields of music with sympathetic attention. Probably some of us have not yet learned to like his "Rhapsody in Blue," but it may be our fault. His later compositions may be more understandable in the ears and minds of those who have long listened to the works of an older school. It is likely enough that we have to learn to understand Gershwin now as in the days of Wagner his public had to learn to understand the master who is now universally accepted as in the foremost rank of the great. At any rate there is a special and a sympathetic interest in Gershwin's appearance with the great Boston organization, which represents the very highest in the realm of orchestral music.

One does not need to look far back to remember when such a combination, Mr. Gershwin and the Boston Symphony, would have been virtually impossible. But that was before the days of Serge Koussevitzky, he who yields to none in his fealty to the established masters but who is not wedded to the ideals of a former day. He gives us Beethoven and Mozart as one who loves them; Wagner, Brahms, Tchaikovsky and their contemporaries are played with all the sympathy of interpretation and consummate art that a great conductor and orchestra can give their splendid works. It is this same bold pathfinder who plays the Ravel "Bolero," or Honneger's bewildering composition descriptive of a great locomotive crossing mountain passes, and today he raises his standard beside that of Gershwin, once of Tinpan Alley. He is a realist, and being a realist he moves onward with the times. And yet Koussevitzky and Gershwin on the same programme appear a bit strange. It is just a little difficult to get accustomed to the idea.

THIS CLIPPING FROM RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
JAN 3 1 1932

Richmond Times-Dispatch: Sunday, January 31, 1932

AMUSEMENTS

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
CITY AUDITORIUM
MONDAY
←

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
CONDUCTOR

ERIC LINDEN, ROCHELLE HUDSON AND BERYL MERCER IN "ARE THESE OUR CHILDREN?"
← -BYRD

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD
FEB 1 - 1932

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS TOMORROW

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will make its only concert appearance this season in Washington at Constitution Hall tomorrow afternoon at 4:30 as the fourth attraction of Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Philharmonic series of afternoon concerts.

Brahm's Fourth Symphony, E minor, Opus 98, will be the symphonic offering of the program and will be the opening selection. This is the last symphony written by Brahms and one of his greatest. Dr. Koussevitzky may be depended upon for a reading that will gratify the most critical demands of Brahms' enthusiasts.

The Orchestra will also play a suite by Corelli, great violinist of the Seventeenth century who laid the foundations for the technical development of the solo violin; and a novelty, Nicholas Tcherepnin's eight miniatures "After a Russian Illustrated Alphabet." The program will close with orchestral excerpts from the second suite of Ravel's exquisite music for the "Daphnis et Chloe" ballet.

Seats for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra may be obtained at Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Concert Bureau, 1300 G St. N W., and at Constitution Hall tomorrow afternoon after 3 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE LEWISTON, ME.
SUN
FEB 1 1932

1222 certo for oboe and music in Rochestra.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY AND GERSHWIN

Returning to his labors in Symphony Hall, Boston, after a mid-season respite, writes L. A. S. in the C. S. Monitor, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky received, on Jan. 29, a warm greeting. He then directed the fourteenth program of the Boston Symphony season, as follows: Taylor Suite, "Through the Looking Glass;" Gershwin, Rhapsody No. 2 for piano and orchestra; Scriabin, "Poem of Ecstasy."

Mr. George Gershwin's new rhapsody was performed on this occasion for the first time. In an interview last fall, Dr. Koussevitzky was quoted as saying that "the experimental stage is definitely past and we know who among the new composers have something of interest to offer." And again: "I hold no brief for those 'modernists' whose work I cannot find serious enough to bring to a first hearing. I must feel the reason for the existence of a work before I can begin its study."

It seems to follow, then, that Mr. Gershwin is one of the new composers who have something of interest to offer, and that Dr. Koussevitzky has felt the reason for the existence of this rhapsody. Let us not presume to question the conductor's judgment on the first point; we can only regret that the performance of the rhapsody did not make the reason for its existence so clear to us as it must be to him.

You will gain a sufficient notion of the work when you learn that it was originally to be entitled "Manhattan Rhapsody," or "Rhapsody in Rivets." The main musical idea, which was inspired by the riveting machines of New York, was used in a motion picture score, and while he was yet in Hollywood Mr. Gershwin was moved to incorporate it in a symphonic piece. This theme is merely a rhythmic figure of a type easily imagined. The other material of the piece is taken from the rag bag of musical comedy. The composer has learned more about the orchestra since writing his "Rhapsody in Blue" and the Piano Concerto, but this is hardly enough to lift him from the theater to the concert hall. Nor is a great symphony orchestra the ideal communicator of his music, which belongs essentially to the dance hall bands.

The other American composer represented fared better. Mr. Deems Taylor's early Suite seems likely to remain his principal contribution to musical literature, just as the story which inspired it remains the monument of its author, Lewis Carroll, in honor of whose centenary the suite was played.

It is true that Mr. Taylor has written other music, notably two operas which have been produced at the Metropolitan; but we believe that this suite is more truly representative of his talent. It is music which is happily wedded to its text, and which after 13 years still seems witty and charming.

Dr. Koussevitzky, alone among conductors, we are assured by Mr. Leonid Sabaneev in his "Modern Russian Composers," is qualified to officiate as high priest of Scriabin's tonal mysteries. We have never been able to soar with some of the commentators into the rarefied atmosphere where Scriabin dwells, but we were able to admire Dr. Koussevitzky's magnificent conception of this score, and the superb texture of sound that issued from the orchestra he guided through it

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
FEB 1 - 1932

With tickets selling at $1 and with George Gershwin as an "added attraction," the Boston Symphony orchestra found a hearty response to its special concert given for the benefit of the Boston unemployment relief fund. It is to be regretted that Boston's leading newspapers are in disagreement as to the interpretation of this event. The Herald argues that there is a larger public for the symphony concerts than is able to obtain admission to Symphony hall. If the capacity of the hall were twice what it is, the public, in the Herald's opinion, woulc eagerly fill the seats. To which the theatrical department of the Trans cript retorts, citing an "ill-informec 'contemporary" and declaring it opinion to be "solemn nonsense, that at the supplementary series o concerts now given on Tuesda afternoons there have been a cor siderable number of moderate-price seats available throughout the sea son. The Herald may have to ui derwrite a series of Sunday afte noon concerts, similar to those give by the Philharmonic orchestra New York, to determine whether or the Transcript is correct measuring the potential demand fi good music in Boston and vicinity

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
JAN 31 1932

The Boston Symphony Orches has received word from Sibelius the completion of his new symphor the Eighth. The Finnish composer is forwarding the score to Serge Koussevitzky for its first performance this Spring.

Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct the orchestra in its fifteenth program Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Feb. 12 and 13, playing Bruckner's symphony No. 8 in C minor, Debussy's Rhapsody for orchestra and English horn, with Louis Speyer as the soloist, and the "Classical" symphony, by Prokofieff.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES
FEB 3 - 1932

KOUSSEVITZKY CHARMS WITH SYMPHONY

With a program designed to bring out the best in orchestral music, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday at Constitution Hall delighted an audience headed by Mrs. Herbert Hoover.

Masterly Rendition

Two presentations were outstanding. One, the best, was Ravel's "Daphne et Chloe." With the love story of Daphne and Chloe woven through the theme, the work opened with the hushed sound of the wind instruments; slowly it developed, swelling to a mighty climax which left one breathless, with nerves a-tingle to a master's interpretation of a masterly work.

The second outstanding work was a group of eight miniatures "After a Russian Illustrated Alphebet," by Tcherepnin. These little gems ran the gamut of musical moods.

Brahms Highlight

The Brahms symphony was the piece de resistance of the program.

At this point it is well to repeat a criticism voiced here some time ago anent the lighting of Constitution Hall. The harsh, glaring light over the audience lent the one jarring note to an otherwise perfect program—it inevitably drew one back from the fairyland of music to the glaring world of reality. These lights can be, and should be softened.—C. B. S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
FEB 2 1932

The Ambassador of France and Mme. Claudel entertained at luncheon today about 30 French musicians who are members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give a concert this afternoon.

Richmond Feb 2

Music

By George Harris

Boston Symphony Attracts Crowd.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, outstanding for many years as sometimes the greatest and always one of the greatest of the orchestras of this country, gave us its annual concert last night. T. Michaux Moody knows that it is particularly popular with Richmond and wisely included it in this season's course, and it came at the psychological moment to draw a large audience to the City Auditorium.

Serge Koussevitzky was again the conductor, and stood before us with his usual directness of approach, lack of mannerisms and with his sensitiveness to every particle of musical beauty that his orchestra is capable of giving. Besides Mr. Koussevitzky's sincere interpretations and unfaltering control, he always chooses programs of great interest, both educational and emotional. Last night the ~~great fourth~~ symphony of Brahms, which opened the program, perhaps seemed to some listeners ponderously on the educational side, but those that got the thrill that is in it got a great thrill—the kind of reaction that brings stunned enjoyment rather than torrential applause. This symphony is not as often played as the other three by Brahms, and it is probable that it has never been played in Richmond before. Whether or not, it is an event to be remembered, and one that will doubtless grow in retrospect. The sonority of the orchestra, which is what Brahms always demands rather than startling instrumentation, was all there in this mighty organization, and Mr. Koussevitzky made this sonority rise and fall in great pulsating waves.

I cannot quite make out why anybody should write in this age, except as an exercise, the sort of imitation of the style of a past period such as we heard in the classical symphony by Prokofieff. Only in a few special places did it seem to have real spontaneity and anything approaching an original conception, unless a certain childishness of harmonic relationships has an intangible charm. Except in the last movement, which was rich with an interweaving of rapid melodies, I felt that a real classical symphony would have been more enjoyable. I could not help comparing it with the Mozart Symphony that we heard last year, not to the advantage of the modern work.

With the Tcherepnin "Miniatures" we were taken into a really modern field, where strange combinations of instruments, that made one almost laugh at their absurdity, fitted with the child mood that the music was meant to represent. The absurdities were mixed with passages of tenderness and simple beauty, and particularly in "Mama" one was convinced of sincere feeling. Tcherepnin is not the only Russian who has interpreted the emotions and imagination of a child, for Moussorgsky has written some most extraordinary children's songs, but those are only songs, while in the Tcherepnin pieces the canvas is broadened, and we are given a more telling picture. In comparison with the Ravel composition which followed, it was interesting to hear modern effects of orchestration used in a frankly grotesque way.

The second "Daphnis and Chloe" ballet by Ravel closed the program with a whirl of excitement. But we were a long time getting to the excitement, and the poetical part that came first probably seemed long drawn out to some listeners, unless it put them into a lathergic brown study, where the passage of time was forgotten. But the end was pagan and hilarious, a real casting off of all barriers and a complete abandonment to an almost drunken joy. In spite of the emotional whirl one got at the end, one could almost begrudge the time taken away from music that might have been a trifle more noble, a thought that is suggested by the memory of certain programs given here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the past. And this feeling would be quite different if we had more than one such concert in the season. But at certain moments during the evening I sat back with a feeling that it did not matter what the orchestra played, the mere sound of it was so beautiful.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES
FEB 2 - 1932

* * *

The French Ambassador and Mme. Claudel entertained at luncheon today at the embassy, for a large group of French musicians who are here to play this afternoon with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Constitution Hall.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM RICHMOND, VA.
NEWS-LEADER
FEB 2 - 1932

ORCHESTRA LULLS SENSE OF TUMULT

Boston Symphony Brings to Richmond Audience Beauty at Disturbed Time.

By HELEN de MOTTE.

The concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra last night came with a grateful sense of beauty in a world that seems increasingly filled with tumult. We fared forth to the old city auditorium to hear what has now become, we hope, an annual concert by this great orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky. It was not until the first movement of Brahms' Fourth Symphony had been played that we were able entirely to dispel the "wars and rumors of war" and the four bleak walls of the old market. Surely nothing, one felt, could be hopeless while there was such beauty as Brahms brought into the world with this symphony.

The satisfying poise, self-control and sanity of Brahms is always like a tonic. It was rather a stroke of genius to have combined this symphony with the modern Russian and French numbers which followed, instead of the Sibelius one first announced.

It was given the most delectable reading by Mr. Koussevitsky, all the tenderness, the grace and beauty of the melodic scheme being drawn forth with utmost warmth and grace, while the sonorities of the rich orchestration were built into a tonal texture of the utmost richness and depth. The last movement, harking back to an early form, the Passacaglia, was particularly fine from the standpoint of sonority and structural interest.

The "Classical Symphony," by Prokofieff, was an interesting modern composition in the Mozartean scrutable "Egypt," the charming "Stars," the tender berceuse, "Mama," the humorous, pompous "General," the descriptive "Forest" music, and the gracious, stately "Czarina," all like pictures on a wall colorful delineations of their titles.

Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe," has sometimes been called a "choleographic symphony," since it was written on order for the Diaghilev ballet in Paris. Distinctly a pantheistic theme, it is picturesquely characterized by the music and unique orchestration. Sensitive and imaginative, Ravel's music is always filled with poetic introspection. In the closing portion there are many striking polyharmonic effects. It was played with tremendous effectiveness last night.

An audience that did not completely fill the auditorium gave enthusiastic evidence of approval and satisfaction.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES
FEB 2 - 1932

Chief Executive Host at White House

The President and Mrs. Hoover will be hosts at dinner this evening, when the Speaker and Mrs. John N. Garner will be the guests of honor. A large company has been invited to meet them, which will include a number of house guests who will arrive at the White House this afternoon.

Mrs. Hoover will entertain a party of friends in her box at the concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Constitution Hall this afternoon.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. World-Telegram
FEB 2 - 1932

DIATONICS.

Florent Schmitt is to visit this country next fall to play his new piano concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. M. Schmitt is gracefully referred to in his native France as the "wild boar of the Ardennes."

THIS CLIPPING FROM SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE
FEB 2 1932

* * *

NEW SIBELIUS BIOGRAPHY

A new Sibelius biography has just been issued by the Oxford University Press. It is by Cecil Gray, who believes that after the present period of musical experiment and sensationalism has passed, Sibelius will emerge as "not only the greatest of his generation but one of the major figures in the entire history of music." Mr. Gray takes pains to correct an impression that Sibelius is not a full-blooded Finn, but predominantly Swedish.

The Eighth Symphony of Sibelius will be played for the first time anywhere this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Bos[illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
FEB 2 1932

PRESIDENT and Mrs. Hoover will be hosts at dinner this evening, entertaining in compliment to the new Speaker of the House of Representatives and Mrs. John N. Garner. Several guests from out of town will be entertained at the White House during their stay.

Mrs. Hoover with a group of guests will occupy a box at the concert this afternoon of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, when Serge Koussevitsky will conduct.

WARREN HEAD OF SYMPHONY

Succeeds Judge Cabot as President of Trustees

Post — Feb. 2

Bentley W. Warren, noted Boston lawyer and music lover, was elected president of the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at a meeting of the board, held yesterday. He succeeds the late Judge Frederick P. Cabot, who held the office until his death, recently.

The trustees also announced that, under the will of Sally C. Cochran, the sum of $25,000 has been given to the orchestra's endowment fund, swelling the fund to a total of $434,559.55.

Mr. Warren is 68, a native of Boston, graduate of Williams College, of which he is now senior trustee, and one of the original trustees of the orchestra when it was incorporated. Since 1927 he has been vice-president of the corporation. During the World war he was legal advisor to the United States Fuel Administrator, and his most recent activity in the law has been to represent five New England States in the controversy over the New England railroads.

Herald Feb 2

BENTLEY W. WARREN SYMPHONY BOARD HEAD

Vice-President of Trustees to Succeed Late Judge Cabot

Bentley W. Warren, prominent atorney, who has been vice-president of he board of trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra since 1927, yester ay was elected president of the board o succeed the late Judge Frederick P. Cabot, who had been president since he board was formed in 1918.

It was announced yesterday also that he endowment fund of the orchestra has been increased to $434,559.55 by a $25,000 bequest of Sally C. Cochran.

Mr. Warren, who was born in Boston April 20, 1864, was one of the original trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and succeeded to the vice-presidency on the death of Galen Stone in 1927. He was graduated from Williams College in 1885 and was admitted to the bar in 1888. He is senior trustee of Williams, having served on its board the last 29 years.

1272

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

FEB 1 1932

certo for oboe and music in Rochestra.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY AND GERSHWIN

Returning to his labors in Symphony Hall, Boston, after a mid-season respite, writes L. A. S. in the C. S. Monitor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky received, on Jan. 29, a warm greeting. He then directed the fourteenth program of the Boston Symphony season, as follows: Taylor Suite, "Through the Looking Glass;" Gershwin, Rhapsody No. 2 for piano and orchestra; Scriabin, "Poem of Ecstasy."

Mr. George Gershwin's new rhapsody was performed on this occasion for the first time. In an interview last fall, Dr. Koussevitzky was quoted as saying that "the experimental stage is definitely past and we know who among the new composers have something of interest to offer." And again: "I hold no brief for those 'modernists' whose work I cannot find serious enough to bring to a first hearing. I must feel the reason for the existence of a work before I can begin its study."

It seems to follow, then, that Mr. Gershwin is one of the new composers who have something of interest to offer, and that Dr. Koussevitzky has felt the reason for the existence of this rhapsody. Let us not presume to question the conductor's judgment on the first point; we can only regret that the performance of the rhapsody did not make the reason for its existence so clear to us as it must be to him.

You will gain a sufficient notion of the work when you learn that it was originally to be entitled "Manhattan Rhapsody," or "Rhapsody in Rivets." The main musical idea, which was inspired by the riveting machines of New York, was used in a motion picture score, and while he was yet in Hollywood Mr. Gershwin was moved to incorporate it in a symphonic piece. This theme is merely a rhythmic figure of a type easily imagined. The other material of the piece is taken from the rag bag of musical comedy. The composer has learned more about the orchestra since writing his "Rhapsody in Blue" and the Piano Concerto, but this is hardly enough to lift him from the theater to the concert hall. Nor is a great symphony orchestra the ideal communicator of his music, which belongs essentially to the dance hall bands.

The other American composer represented fared better. Mr. Deems Taylor's early Suite seems likely to remain his principal contribution to musical literature, just as the story which inspired it remains the monument of its author, Lewis Carroll, in honor of whose centenary the suite was played.

It is true that Mr. Taylor has written other music, notably two operas which have been produced at the Metropolitan; but we believe that this suite is more truly representative of his talent. It is music which is happily wedded to its text, and which after 13 years still seems witty and charming.

Dr. Koussevitzky, alone among conductors, we are assured by Mr. Leonid Sabaneev in his "Modern Russian Composers," is qualified to officiate as high priest of Scriabin's tonal mysteries. We have never been able to soar with some of the commentators into the rarefied atmosphere where Scriabin dwells, but we were able to admire Dr. Koussevitzky's magnificent conception of this score, and the superb texture of sound that issued from the orchestra he guided through it.

Richmond Feb 2

Music

By George Harris

Boston Symphony Attracts Crowd.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, outstanding for many years as sometimes the greatest and always one of the greatest of the orchestras of this country, gave us its annual concert last night. T. Michaux Moody knows that it is particularly popular with Richmond and wisely included it in this season's course, and it came at the psychological moment to draw a large audience to the City Auditorium.

Serge Koussevitzky was again the conductor, and stood before us with his usual directness of approach, lack of mannerisms and with his sensitiveness to every particle of musical beauty that his orchestra is capable of giving. Besides Mr. Koussevitzky's sincere interpretations and unfaltering control, he always chooses programs of great interest, both educational and emotional. Last night the ~~great fourth~~ symphony of Brahms, which opened the program, perhaps seemed to some listeners ponderously on the educational side, but those that got the thrill that is in it got a great thrill—the kind of reaction that brings stunned enjoyment rather than torrential applause. This symphony is not as often played as the other three by Brahms, and it is probable that it has never been played in Richmond before. Whether or not, it is an event to be remembered, and one that will doubtless grow in retrospect. The sonority of the orchestra, which is what Brahms always demands rather than startling instrumentation, was all there in this mighty organization, and Mr. Koussevitzky made this sonority rise and fall in great pulsating waves.

I cannot quite make out why anybody should write in this age, except as an exercise, the sort of imitation of the style of a past period such as we heard in the classical symphony by Prokofieff. Only in a few special places did it seem to have real spontaneity and anything approaching an original conception, unless a certain childishness of harmonic relationships has an intangible charm. Except in the last movement, which was rich with an interweaving of rapid melothe latter with 10 points, were hig for Battery Park.

The line-ups:

Weatherford (28).

	G.	F.	T.
Vaile, f.	1	3
Whitley, f.	3	1
Bryant, c.	1	0
Randlett, g.	0	1
Wilkinson, g.	6	1

instruments, that made one almost laugh at their absurdity, fitted with the child mood that the music was meant to represent. The absurdities were mixed with passages of tenderness and simple beauty, and particularly in "Mama" one was convinced of sincere feeling. Tcherepnin is not the only Russian who has interpreted the emotions and imagination of a child, for Moussorgsky has written some most extraordinary children's songs, but those are only songs, while in the Tcherepnin pieces the canvas is broadened, and we are given a more telling picture. In comparison with the Ravel composition which followed, it was interesting to hear modern effects of orchestration used in a frankly grotesque way.

The second "Daphnis and Chloe" ballet by Ravel closed the program with a whirl of excitement. But we were a long time getting to the excitement, and the poetical part that came first probably seemed long drawn out to some listeners, unless it put them into a lathergic brown study, where the passage of time was forgotten. But the end was pagan and hilarious, a real casting off of all barriers and a complete abandonment to an almost drunken joy. In spite of the emotional whirl one got at the end, one could almost begrudge the time taken away from music that might have been a trifle more noble, a thought that is suggested by the memory of certain programs given here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the past. And this feeling would be quite different if we had

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM RICHMOND, VA.
NEWS-LEADER

FEB 2 - 1932

ORCHESTRA LULLS SENSE OF TUMULT

Boston Symphony Brings to Richmond Audience Beauty at Disturbed Time.

By HELEN de MOTTE.

The concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra last night came with a grateful sense of beauty in a world that seems increasingly filled with tumult. We fared forth to the old city auditorium to hear what has now become, we hope, an annual concert by this great orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky. It was not until the first movement of Brahms' Fourth Symphony had been played that we were able entirely to dispel the "wars and rumors of war" and the four bleak walls of the old market. Surely nothing, one felt, could be hopeless while there was such beauty as Brahms brought into the world with this symphony.

The satisfying poise, self-control and sanity of Brahms is always like a tonic. It was rather a stroke of genius to have combined this symphony with the modern Russian and French numbers which followed, instead of the Sibelius one first announced.

It was given the most delectable reading by Mr. Koussevitsky, all the tenderness, the grace and beauty of the melodic scheme being drawn forth with utmost warmth and grace, while the sonorities of the rich orchestration were built into a tonal texture of the utmost richness and depth. The last movement, harking back to an early form, the Passacaglia, was particularly fine from the standpoint of sonority and structural interest.

The "Classical Symphony," by Prokofieff, was an interesting modern composition in the Mozartean style. The third movement was particularly charming.

"Miniatures" Interesting.

Tcherepnin's "Eight Miniatures After a Russian Illustrated Alphabet" were interesting bits of modern impressionism—almost, one might say, program music, since they were frankly descriptive, with the inscrutable "Egypt," the charming "Stars," the tender berceuse, "Mama," the humorous, pompous "General," the descriptive "Forest" music, and the gracious, stately "Czarina," all like pictures on a wall colorful delineations of their titles.

Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe," has sometimes been called a "choleographic symphony," since it was written on order for the Diaghilev ballet in Paris. Distinctly a pantheistic theme, it is picturesquely characterized by the music and unique orchestration. Sensitive and imaginative, Ravel's music is always filled with poetic introspection. In the closing portion there are many striking polyharmonic effects. It was played with tremendous effectiveness last night.

An audience that did not completely fill the auditorium gave enthusiastic evidence of approval and satisfaction.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. World-Telegram

FEB 2 - 1932

DIATONICS.

Florent Schmitt is to visit this country next fall to play his new piano concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. M. Schmitt is gracefully referred to in his native France as the "wild boar of the Ardennes."

THIS CLIPPING FROM SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE

FEB 2 1932

* * *

NEW SIBELIUS BIOGRAPHY

A new Sibelius biography has just been issued by the Oxford University Press. It is by Cecil Gray, who believes that after the present period of musical experiment and sensationalism has passed, Sibelius will emerge as "not only the greatest of his generation but one of the major figures in the entire history of music." Mr. Gray takes pains to correct an impression that Sibelius is not a full-blooded Finn, but predominantly Swedish.

The Eighth Symphony of Sibelius will be played for the first time anywhere this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Bos

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

FEB 2 1932

PRESIDENT and Mrs. Hoover will be hosts at dinner this evening, entertaining in compliment to the new Speaker of the House of Representatives and Mrs. John N. Garner. Several guests from out of town will be entertained at the White House during their stay.

Mrs. Hoover with a group of guests will occupy a box at the concert this afternoon of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, when Serge Koussevitsky will conduct.

WARREN HEAD OF SYMPHONY

Succeeds Judge Cabot as President of Trustees

Post — Feb 2

Bentley W. Warren, noted Boston lawyer and music lover, was elected president of the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at a meeting of the board, held yesterday. He succeeds the late Judge Frederick P. Cabot, who held the office until his death, recently.

The trustees also announced that, under the will of Sally C. Cochran, the sum of $25,000 has been given to the orchestra's endowment fund, swelling the fund to a total of $434,559.55.

Mr. Warren is 68, a native of Boston, graduate of Williams College, of which he is now senior trustee, and one of the original trustees of the orchestra when it was incorporated. Since 1927 he has been vice-president of the corporation. During the World war he was legal advisor to the United States Fuel Administrator, and his most recent activity in the law has been to represent five New England States in the controversy over the New England railroads.

Herald Feb 2

BENTLEY W. WARREN SYMPHONY BOARD HEAD

Vice-President of Trustees to Succeed Late Judge Cabot

Bentley W. Warren, prominent attorney, who has been vice-president of the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra since 1927, yesterday was elected president of the board to succeed the late Judge Frederick P. Cabot, who had been president since the board was formed in 1918.

It was announced yesterday also that the endowment fund of the orchestra has been increased to $434,559.55 by a $25,000 bequest of Sally C. Cochran.

Mr. Warren, who was born in Boston April 20, 1864, was one of the original trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and succeeded to the vice-presidency on the death of Galen Stone in 1927. He was graduated from Williams College in 1885 and was admitted to the bar in 1888. He is senior trustee of Williams, having served on its board the last 29 years.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

FEB 1 - 1932

With tickets selling at $1 and with George Gershwin as an "added attraction," the Boston Symphony orchestra found a hearty response to its special concert given for the benefit of the Boston unemployment relief fund. It is to be regretted that Boston's leading newspapers are in disagreement as to the interpretation of this event. The Herald argues that there is a larger public for the symphony concerts than is able to obtain admission to Symphony hall. If the capacity of the hall were twice what it is, the public, in the Herald's opinion, would eagerly fill the seats. To which the theatrical department of the Transcript retorts, citing an "ill-informed 'contemporary'" and declaring it opinion to be "solemn nonsense," that at the supplementary series of concerts now given on Tuesday afternoons there have been a considerable number of moderate-priced seats available throughout the season. The Herald may have to underwrite a series of Sunday afternoon concerts, similar to those given by the Philharmonic orchestra New York, to determine whether or the Transcript is correct measuring the potential demand for good music in Boston and vicinity.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES

FEB 3 - 1932

KOUSSEVITZKY CHARMS WITH SYMPHONY

With a program designed to bring out the best in orchestral music, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday at Constitution Hall delighted an audience headed by Mrs. Herbert Hoover.

Masterly Rendition

Two presentations were outstanding. One, the best, was Ravel's "Daphne et Chloe." With the love story of Daphne and Chloe woven through the theme, the work opened with the hushed sound of the wind instruments; slowly it developed, swelling to a mighty climax which left one breathless, with nerves a-tingle to a master's interpretation of a masterly work.

The second outstanding work was a group of eight miniatures "After a Russian Illustrated Alphebet," by Tcherepnin. These little gems ran the gamut of musical moods.

Brahms Highlight

The Brahms symphony was the piece de resistance of the program.

At this point it is well to repeat a criticism voiced here some time ago anent the lighting of Constitution Hall. The harsh, glaring light over the audience lent the one jarring note to an otherwise perfect program—it inevitably drew one back from the fairyland of music to the glaring of reality. These lights and should be softened.—

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

JAN 3 1 1932

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has received word from Sibelius of the completion of his new symphony, the Eighth. The Finnish composer is forwarding the score to Serge Koussevitzky for its first performance this Spring.

Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct the orchestra in its fifteenth program Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Feb. 12 and 13, playing Bruckner's symphony No. 8 in C minor, Debussy's Rhapsody for orchestra and English horn, with Louis Speyer as the soloist, and the "Classical" symphony, by Prokofieff.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

FEB 2 1932

The Ambassador of France and Mme. Claudel entertained at luncheon today about 30 French musicians who are members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give a concert this afternoon.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES

FEB 2 - 1932

* * *

The French Ambassador and Mme. Claudel entertained at luncheon today at the embassy, for a large group of French musicians who are here to play this afternoon with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Constitution Hall.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES

FEB 2 - 1932

Chief Executive Host at White House

The President and Mrs. Hoover will be hosts at dinner this evening, when the Speaker and Mrs. John N. Garner will be the guests of honor. A large company has been invited to meet them, which will include a number of house guests who will arrive at the White House this afternoon.

Mrs. Hoover will entertain a party of friends in her box at the concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Constitution Hall this afternoon.

* * *

Transcript Feb 2

At a meeting yesterday, the Trustees of the Symphony Orchestra chose Mr. Bentley W. Warren to be President of the Board in succession to the late Frederick P. Cabot. Mr. Warren became a trustee when the Board was organized in 1918. He has been Vice-president since 1927. . . . The Trustees also announced the addition of $25,000 to the Endowment Fund—a legacy from the estate of Sally C. Cochran. The Fund now stands at $439,559.55.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. World-Telegram

FEB 2 - 1932

HEADS ORCHESTRA.

BOSTON, Feb. 2.—Bentley W. Warren, Boston lawyer, has been elected president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, succeeding the late Judge Frederick P. Cabot.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM

FEB 2 1932

ATTY. BENTLEY WARREN HEADS SYMPHONY BOARD

Bentley W. Warren, prominen attorney, who has been vice-president of the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1927, yesterday was elected president of the board to succeed the late Judge Frederick P. Cabot, who had been president since the board was formed in 1918.

Mr. Warren, who was born in Boston, April 20, 1864, was one of the original trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and succeeded to the vice-presidency on the death of Galen Stone in 1927. He was graduated from Williams College in 1885 and was admitted to the bar in 1888. He is senior trustee of Williams, having served on its board the last 29 years. Atty. Warren has been senior counsel for the Holyoke Water Power Co. in a number of its important law cases in recent years.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

FEB 2 - 1932

Warren Heads Symphony.

BOSTON, Feb. 2 (United Press)—Bentley W. Warren, Boston lawyer, has been elected president of the Boston Symphony orchestra, succeeding the late Judge Frederick P. Cabot.

Glasgow, Scotland, police are warring on shoplifters.

An old-fashioned circus is attracting crowds in London.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SO. MANCHESTER, CONN.
HERALD

FEB 2 - 1932

HEADS TRUSTEES

Boston, Feb. 2.—(AP)—Bentley W. Warren, prominent attorney has been elected president of the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it was announced today.

Warren, who succeeds Judge Frederick P. Cabot who died last month, is one of the original trustees of the orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TORRINGTON, CONN.
REGISTER

FEB 2 - 1932

Heads Orchestra Trustees

Boston, Feb. 2 (AP).—Bentley W. Warren, prominent attorney, has been elected president of the board of trustees of the Boston symphony orchestra, it was announced today.

Warren, who succeeds Judge Frederick P. Cabot, who died last month, is one of the original trustees of the orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE QUINCY, MASS.
NEWS

(6)

FEB 2 1932

one-car, third-class garage.

NEW SYMPHONY HEAD

Boston (UP)—Bentley W. Warren, Boston Lawyer, has been elected president of the Boston Symphony orchestra, succeeding the late Judge Frederick P. Cabot.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ANSONIA, CONN.
SENTINEL

FEB 2 - 1932

PRESIDENT OF BOSTON SYMPHONY BOARD

Boston, Feb. 2.—(AP)—Bentley W. Warren, prominent attorney, has been elected president of the board of trustees of the Boston symphony orchestra, it was announced today.

Warren, who succeeds Judge Frederick P. Cabot, who died last month, is one of the original trustees of the orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald-Tribune

FEB 2 - 1932

The Conning Tower

THOUGHT FOR THE WEEK

If I could seize my wayward traitor heart—
Sentenced to death by order of its peers—
And toss it over life's Tarpeian rock,
I might go back to Rome again—dear Rome—
Live out my life an honored senator
And legislate on aqueducts and wars.

Nor need I worry lest my heart should lie
Unburied and accurst: it knows a friend
Who gladly would climb down that painful slope
And give the poor crushed thing its burial
So that the gods could let it sleep in peace.

And I too should know peace—no longer lie
Wakeful till dawn the while it pled with me
For wild empiric laws no state dare pass.
Aware its death was legal and most just,
I might sleep through the night, knowing my heart
Would never haunt me with its strange demands.

KATHERINE BURTON

Excellent as are the notes that appear on the programs of concerts such as those given by the Philadelphia and Boston Orchestras, it seems to us that the compilers, by stealing an idea from Liberty, could do a greater service to those who attend concerts. Liberty, as is now well known, tells its readers what the reading-time of each article or story is. Of course, that time varies necessarily, for some of us read more slowly than others. But if a musical composition be played at approximately the tempo that the composer has indicated, the length of time that it takes to play will not vary much; and even if one conductor plays, for example, the Fifth Symphony three minutes faster than another, the note-compiler knows, or can find out, how long it takes his orchestra to play each piece.

If you read, for instance, under Serenade No. 2, in A major, Op. 16 . . . Johannes Brahms, that the playing time is 21 minutes, you know that when about ten minutes along you hear a passage that sounds like an ending, it is nothing of the kind. You know it is a false armistice. You have been living in a fool's paradise. Also the scheme would add excitement to what might otherwise be a bald and unconvincing evening. You would get to wondering, possibly even to betting, whether the good old orchestra would get in on time. You would know whether, if the notator were able to say, the orchestra played it according to the composer's notion of tempo. You would know, if you read that the last piece took 82 minutes to play, whether you would rather stay or go home.

If the note-compilers won't do that, we appeal to the press departments of all musical organizations, of violinists, and pianists. Let them, when they send the announcements to the papers, append the figures; let them say that the playing of this or that by this or that soloist will take 43 minutes. . . . How long is it going to take George Gershwin to play his Rhapsody No. 2 next Friday evening?

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald-Tribune

FEB 3 - 1932

WASHINGTON

Mrs. Hoover attended the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert yesterday.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

FEB 3 - 1932

Heads Symphony Board.

Boston, Feb. 2.—(AP.)—Bentley W. Warren, prominent attorney, has been elected president of the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it was announced today. Warren, who succeeds Judge Frederick P. Cabot, who died last month, is one of the original trustees of the orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BENNINGTON, VT.
BANNER

FEB 3 - 1932

Boston (AP)—Bentley W. Warren, prominent attorney, has been elected president of the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra, it was announced yesterday. Warren, who succeeds Judge Frederick P. Cabot, who died last month, is one of the original trustees of the orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

FEB 3 - 1932

Brahms' Symphony Features Boston Concert.

THE Boston Orchestra came out of the East yesterday afternoon and played, alas, the only concert that it will play here this season. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, whose last year's Bee[illegible]festival in the same hall ([illegible]) is still remembered with the utmost affection, undertook at yesterday's concert a Corelli suite, "Eight Miniatures," by Nikolai Tcherepnin; Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" ballet from the second suite, and the all-magnificent Brahms fourth symphony in E minor.

Serge Koussevitzky.

The audience, which was very large and exceedingly enthusiastic, rewarded Dr. Koussevitzky's readings with thunderous applause, which reached its highest peak after the Brahms symphony, and after the Ravel ballet music. The Brahms was, of course, the great undertaking of the afternoon, and since the mightiest of the classics have lain much neglected on the shelves this season by out-of-town orchestras, it was a rare treat to be indulged with not only some of this great composer's best music but with some of Koussevitzky's most pungent musical interpretations. Even those who still rebel against composer Brahms must have been stirred by yesterday's performance. The orchestra, which plays always with authority and as though to remind us that it has often been called the ringleader of the orchestral world, supplied yesterday the utmost in veneration to this favorite symphonic work.

While the Brahms was unquestionably the high point of the afternoon, those present perhaps wondering when they will have a chance to hear such a work again, the orchestral horizon being full to the brim of cacophonous Russian moderns (shades of next week's Philadelphia concert), the program as a whole well rounded and splendidly executed. The "badinerie" of the Corelli suite began the program cheerfully, the eight miniatures from "After a Russian Illustrated Alphabet" seemed more often than not colorful and melodious—especially the sweeping full-blooded tone of "The Tsarina" and the gentle miniature called "Mama"—and the Ravel "Daphnis et Chloe" was played by the orchestra with real genius—the final climaxes and the "sweet conglomeration of noises" being really superb.

It might be hinted here, too, that while Koussevitzky presents his share of the more modern moderns, he invariably offers those which have a more easily recognizable form and substance, and which do not require herculean effort to listen to. For this reason his yesterday's program, with its final version of one of the most loved symphonies, was a supremely eloquent expression on the part of one of the most tried and true and famed symphony conductors.

E. DE S. MELCHER.

THIS CLIPPING FROM RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH

123

FEB 3 1932

Unnecessary Erosion

WHEN a Virginia court ruled that Acca Temple was not legally obligated to keep open the Mosque for T. MICHAUX MOODY'S series of entertainment, THE TIMES-DISPATCH said:

> Repeatedly in the future, occasions will arise when the City will find ample use for the Mosque auditorium; there will be times when there will be a crying need for it. These will bob up, like truth, to insist upon its preservation. The City must be receptive to its own needs.

The first of these occasions which "will bob up, like truth," was the cancellation by MR. MOODY of the performance of a group of Spanish dancers because Richmond no longer possessed a suitable theatre for their appearance. Supporters of the entertainment program obviously believed that something had been denied them unreasonably; their comments and their regrets constituted the first erosive influence which will grow to the point where it will bring about the reopening of the Mosque. But the lack of opportunity to see LA ARGENTINA was at most something impersonal and not at all the intimate influence of witnessing a performance under conditions less favorable than those which obtain at Acca's fine auditorium.

The second of these occasions which threaten to become as ubiquitous as Banquo's ghost came Monday night, when Richmond's music lovers thronged the old City Auditorium to hear DR. KOUSSEVITZKY'S Boston Symphony play an exalting program. We have no quarrel with the old auditorium; associated with it are memories dear to many people; it has played a part in the entertaining of another generation, but it is a patent fact that theatre construction has passed on and left it quite unfitted for the finer purposes of a civic auditorium.

Monday night, our sympathies were quite divided between the audience that filled the main floor of the auditorium almost to the point where it was seated in the lap of the orchestra and the slightly embarrassed musicians from Boston, who obviously were a bit surprised at the intimacy of the seating arrangements. The audience possibly was just as acutely sensitive of the fact that Boston's Symphony was accustomed to something a little better as were the musicians. Passing over the mutual embarrassment, the fact remains that the setting was not in keeping with the artistic treat Richmond experienced. There are those who may have commented under their breath that it was unfortunate that the visitors happened to be from the city that is as much a rival of Richmond culturally as it is in the traditions associated with American colonization and independence.

As the gifted leader raised his baton, the musicians settled to the perfection of art which obscures surroundings and the audience to the appreciation which has a similar result. The entertainment was sufficient to justify the thronging to attend it, even if it were held in Byrd Park on a winter night. It was a manifestation that our people are cordially, even thoroughly, appreciative of the best of entertainment. We mention this, not to trumpet the fact that they will jam the City Auditorium to hear the symphony, but as assurance that any series of entertainment suitable to the Mosque will be certain of large attendance.

The major significance of the performance, however, and it was on the lips of half the persons assembling in the auditorium, was the perfectly plain fact that Richmond needs to get the Mosque reopened for such entertainments. This is the second instance in a month bringing this conclusion home to Richmonders. It will come home to them every time they attend an entertainment that is better fitted to the Mosque than the surroundings in which it is held; it will irritate them each time they learn that certain entertainments or conventions have declined to come to Richmond because they could not obtain the Acca auditorium.

THE TIMES-DISPATCH takes the occasion simply to remind our people that recurrent occasions emphasizing the importance of the Mosque to our City will eventuate in its reopening. It would be advantageous to Richmond if our City administration could appreciate this certainty without further delay, inasmuch as the end seems certain. It would be helpful if the civic agencies would set about, with the conviction of necessity, to do what is necessary to provide our community with a suitable auditorium. The situation is so obvious that there seems no reason for temporizing.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

124

FEB 3 - 1932

BOSTON SYMPHONY PRESENTS DYNAMIC CONCERT IN CAPITAL

By MADELINE ENSIGN

If you have ever been the least uncertain as to the real meaning of the word "dynamic" you should make it a point to witness Dr. Serge Koussevitzky at the helm of ~~the~~ Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Yesterday a plentiful audience headed by Mrs. Herbert Hoover and her party and including among its sincerely interested listeners, Hans Kindler, conductor of the National Symphony Orchestra, assembled in Constitution Hall to enjoy another inspiring afternoon with the energetic Russian maestro and his talented musicians.

The program, which did not run according to the printed sheet, but which was more satisfactorily begun by the Corelli suite, was one of Koussevitzky's better arrangements. It ran the gamut of orchestral endeavors. It furnished a complete opportunity for this reputable symphonic unit to exhibit its claim to renown.

* * *

Two works in particular impressed the audience by virtue of their infrequent appearances on programs. The first was Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" ballet; the second Tcherepnin's "Eight Miniatures," after a Russian illustrated ballet.

On this occasion we listened to an unfamiliar Ravel. We found not another of his bizarre gems but a great and stirring opus of enthralling brilliance. A tone poem depicting "Daybreak," "Pantomime" and a "General Dance" with the great love story of Daphnis and Chloe acting as the main theme.

The work is almost disconcerting in its mysterious romantic vision and its strangely liberal form. Opening as it does with a hushed murmur of wind instruments and developing slowly, rhythmically, forcefully to a magnificent climax in a tumultous harmony of wild, somewhat pantheistic abandonment, it leaves the hearer shaken but exhilarated. It is Ravel, greater, more ingenious than all of his entertaining and humorous works could ever make him.

* * *

Tcherepnin's miniatures were jewels of color and loveliness. From the eight we would select "Egypt" with its restful, Oriental theme that was in itself a chant of repose and quietude. This, in strict opposition with the fast moving, overwhelming and turbulent "Baba-jaga," made it easier to pierce the composer's concept of an evil witch flying through the air in a mortar.

Daintiness and fragility of tone stamped the "Maman" while the glorious splendor of music that soulfully poured from "Le Foret" was but a share removed in grandeur from the pompous and military "La Tsarine." Such a contrast of mood and challenge to the sensitivity of conductor and musician is seldom passed so magnanimously.

Brahm's ponderous Fourth Symphony E Minor, consumed the second half of the program which did not conclude until later than most afternoon concerts. Koussevitsky is perfectly capable of reading this composer. His fiery personality drew from the score every vestige of expression that Brahms has made so important in his works. The composer would have been well pleased.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

FEB 3 - 1932

WASHINGTON.

Mrs. Herbert Hoover entertained at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, conducted by Serge Koussevitsky, Mrs. Charles Francis Adams, wife of the Secretary of the Navy; Mrs. Leonidas C. Dyer, wife of Representative Dyer of Missouri, and her house guests, Mrs. Goodrich, wife of former Governor Goodrich of Indiana, and Mrs. Lewis L. Strauss of New York.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WATSONVILLE, CALIF.
REGISTER

FEB 3 _ 19

Second Rhapsody By Gershwin Pleases Premiere Audience

(By ASSOCIATED PRESS)

BOSTON, Feb. 2. — The song of the riveter was heard in Symphony Hall yesterday and a distinguished audience of several thousand applauded in general delight, for it was the premiere of George Gershwin's second rhapsody.

Gershwin, himself was at the piano.

The hand that wielded the baton over an ensemble of musical instruments which included a fly swatter was that of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of Boston's Symphony Orchestra.

Written originally to be used in connection with a motion picture, the composition as it was played was a greatly expanded work. The staccato note of the riveter tinkled loudly from the treble cleft of the keyboard as Gershwin's dynamic fingers went into action and the orchestra took it up.

The performance was almost eight years to the day from the time Gershwin's first rhapsody, the now celebrated "Rhapsody in Blue," created musical history under the baton of Paul Whiteman.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

FEB 3 _ 1932

BOSTON SYMPHONY FEATURES BRAHMS

Warm Reception Is Given Dr. Koussevitzky at Constitution Hall.

A beautiful Brahms symphony, his noted one in E minor, was the piece de resistance of the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Constitution Hall yesterday afternoon.

The orchestra was conducted by the eminent musician, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, and it proved to be one of the most delightful presentations of the musical season. The concert was given under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

Frieda Hempel, Viennese operatic star, who was the soloist at the concert of the National Symphony Orchestra on Sunday, occupied a stage box and was very enthusiastic in her applause.

Dr. Koussevitzky was in fine form and gave an inspired reading of the Brahms symphony, each of its four movements vying in beauty and melodic tone pictures with the other.

The audience was won also by the Ravel number. The ballet from "Daphnis and Chloe," with its tremendous finale. An illustrated alphabet by N. Tcherepnin, typically Russian music, also pleased the audience, while Corelli's dainty suite with three enchanting movements completed the comprehensive concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

FEB 3 1932

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has received word from Jan Sibelius, the eminent Finnish composer, that he has completed his new symphony, the eighth in the list. He is sending the score to Mr. Koussevitzky, who contemplates its first performance in America, this spring.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

FEB 3 - 1932

* * *

The Ambassador of France and Mme Claudel entertained at luncheon yesterday for the 30 French musicians who are playing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN

FEB 4 1932

Boston Symphony Presents Annual Concert At Lyric

Serge Koussevitzky Conducts Program That Includes Works By Tschaikowsky And Ravel

The swiftness of a year's passing was illustrated last night when Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra presented their annual concert at the Lyric. The orchestra is the only one which has preserved its traditional physical aspect, and there is a real sentiment in its return which more than any of the others has been the arbiter elegantiarum of Baltimore symphonic taste.

No matter what other directors do to cajole public approbation, Mr. Koussevitzky is never behind the procession, and for the sake of the magnificent Ravel he offered as well as for its own, even the Tschaikowsky Pathetique is forgiven.

Murmers of dissatisfaction over the symphony before the concert seemed somehow to evaporate before the Russian director's telling restoration of its barbaric morbidness and bigness. With him, it became not the recital of a personal melancholia, but the imperishable record of the sadness that was always Russia.

One may complain of a lack of homogeneity in the various choirs, but this became a virtue in the emphasis Mr. Koussevitzky laid upon them from time to time. A lack of emphasis on the third beat of the basso ostinato of the second movement gave noticeable accretion in savage monotony of those bars. Changes in accent of the Allegro Vivace greatly enhanced its characteristic dance feeling. From the first heavy measures to the final sorrowful bars, the symphony was emphatically Russian.

A Corelli Suite—Sarabande-Gigue and Badinerie, wholly precise, delightfully artificial, yet graceful and lucid—saw the concert under way, with Vincent d'Indy's Symphonic Variations, Istar, to keep it company. It was the first of M. d'Indy on local programs for a considerable interval.

During the interval something has happened and Istar sounded more like a pleasing fusion of well-chosen sound, too reminiscent of Wagner, than a symphonic poem on the description of the moon goddess' descent into oblivion, a colorful bit of verse. To confirm the notion of the pallor of the d'Indy opus, the Ravel excerpts which followed it seemed electric by contrast.

Respect for M. Ravel's genius and for the Boston orchestra's mettle in presenting the Daphne and Chloe ballet music took a sharp upturn. If the French composer has appeared in remarkable guises before he surpassed himself in this ballet. His tricks of orchestration are inexhaustible. The most alluring of phrases, never heard before, rose out of the superlatively constructed score.

It is wonderfully lazy music, which spreads itself out luxuriously, or is unchained revelry, in which the drums crash and there is a burst of sound opposite in the strings of such power as though the sound had penetrated the floor and come up of its own weight. The basses roar and the answer comes from the winds.

Nothing is comparable with Ravel's description of dawn in the first of the excerpts, and when at times one fancies a repetition from another of Ravel's works, it is gone immediately in the manifold, exotic creations of this nimblest of minds. Mr. Koussevitzky and his men paid a worthy compliment to the ballet music in a vivid and inspiring performance of it.

H. S. T.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. JOURNAL

FEB 4 - 1932

Program Change

A change in the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall tomorrow evening substitutes for Paul Hindemith's "Concert Music," d'Indy's "Instar" variations.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE, MD.
NEWS

FEB 4 - 1932

Boston Symphony Enchants Music Lovers at Lyric

Such human achievements as the concert presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric last evening lie beyond any criticism on the grounds of beauty or perfection of execution.

If any unsatisfied minority was to be found among the large and enthusiastic audience, most certainly they could have been discovered only in the ranks of the ultramoderns, who may have not shared the general rejoicing that Vincent d'Indy's "Istar" was substituted on the program for the promised Hindemith composition.

AHEAD OF THEIR TIME

These symphonic variations, first brought out some thirty-five years ago, although representative in matter, are in actual manner far ahead of their time in the ingenuity and boldness of their harmonies, and the vivacious originality of their structure.

A highly imaginative composition, with a decided element of fantasy, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky gave the work a reading of the greatest finesse.

The quiet distinction of this great conductor, the refinement and discrimination of his taste, the quality of his emotional and intellectual apprehension was never more apparent than last evening, and he gave a superlative interpretation of the Tschaikowsky Sixth Symphony, which was the major composition presented.

SCULPTURAL MAJESTY

Confronted by this monumental work it is difficult to suggest more than a few angles of its sculptural majesty, the fading echo of the theme that closes the first movement—the amazing crescendo, set forth by the drums and basses—the magnificent marcato, shining with the wild color of frenzied banners in battle—the dramatic finale.

Dr. Koussevitsky practically ignored his score for the symphony, although he kept a book on the conductor's stand throughout the program, which opened with a suite arranged by Pinelli from a series published by Corelli in 1700, a delightful composition for strings alone, beginning with a somber stately "Sarabande," and turning from a graceful Gigue, to the most capricious and frolicsome "Badinerie."

SPINS MUSICAL WEB

The brasses and woodwinds were much in evidence as well, for the Ravel ballet excerpts, taken from his "Daphnis and Chloe."

Here the French composer has spun a web of shimmering gossamer, where the merry loves of shepherd and shepherdess are darkened by the purpler passions of Pan, and set against a background of trickling waters, scampering flocks, rustling reeds and whispering breezes developing finally into repeated sweeping crescendo bursts of dancing figures.

An evening not soon to be forgotten.

H. A. F. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

FEB 4 - 1932

D'Indy's "Istar" Variations have been substituted for Hindemith's "Konzertmusik" on the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct tomorrow evening at Carnegie Hall.

En Voyage Trans. Feb. 4

This week the Symphony Orchestra is making the longest journey of the winter. It played in Richmond last Monday; in Washington last Tuesday; in Baltimore last Wednesday; in Brooklyn yesterday. Today and tomorrow it will be heard through a third pair of concerts in New York. To the Southern cities it dispensed Brahms's Fourth Symphony, Chaikovsky's "Pathetic Symphony," Prokofiev's "Classical Symphony"; the show-pieces from Ravel's ballet, "Daphnis and Chloë"; d'Indy's "Istar"; Corelli's Suite for Strings; Cherepnin's "Miniatures." At both concerts in New York it will set forth Mr. Gershwin's new Rhapsody with the composer as pianist. Along with it this evening go Prokofiev's "Classical Symphony," d'Indy's "Istar" and Skriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy." Tomorrow afternoon, the Suite from Corelli, the "Miniatures" from Cherepnin, Chaikovsky's "Pathetic Symphony" have place.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION

FEB 5 - 1932

VARIATIONS

By WILLARD M. CLARK

Musical Boston seethed with interest last week when it was announced by Dr. Serge Koussevitsky that the Boston Symphony Orchestra would give the first performance of George Gershwin's "Second Rhapsody." So great was the interest that a noonday concert was given Saturday to swell the unemployment fund.

Symphony Hall was crowded for this performance. There were rounds of applause when Dr. Koussevitsky and the dapper Gershwin came onto the platform, and then the audience settled down for a critical estimate of the new work.

Comparison with the "Rhapsody in Blue" was inevitable. There was no mistaking the significance of the dashing, reckless, opening movement. All the sounds that reach the ear of the immigrant landing in New York were to be heard. It was crude, almost vulgar music, but national. There were pages of decided individuality, at the moment one of Gershwin's most precious possessions, but on the whole the new composition lacks the allure and the sweeping thematic material of the "Rhapsody in Blue."

The work seems to be the result of painstaking composition, writing which shows Gershwin as a finer musician and more skilful orchestrater. It is this thorough preparation which robs the new work of the irresistible spontaneity of the first rhapsody.

It is said that Gershwin fears sentimentality and that the broad and beautiful second melody of the "Rhapsody in Blue" came close to being eliminated from the score. There is no such movement in the new work. There are passages of undeniable beauty wherein the violins are used with skill, but the charm and rhythmic sweep of the first rhapsody is missing.

The piano is used as a part of the orchestra rather than as a solo instrument. Mr. Gershwin played with skill and Mr. Koussevitsky conducted as painstaking a performance as could be given of this carefully prepared work. There was much cordial applause after the performance with the composer coming back for several bows, but the response was less enthusiastic than that which even today greets the "Rhapsody in Blue."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Enquirer

FEB 5 1932

First Offering Here of New Gershwin Work

George Gershwin's Second Rhapsody will be played for the first time in New York by the Boston Symphony Orchestra tonight at 8:45 o'clock in Carnegie Hall, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting. Mr. Gershwin will be the piano soloist.

Mr. Gershwin's first work of this kind, the "Rhapsody in Blue," was performed eight years ago for the first time under Paul Whiteman's direction. Other compositions he has written for orchestra are "An American in Paris" and the Concerto in F. The new work began as incidental music to a motion picture but broadened in scope as the composer developed his ideas. The preliminary title was "Rhapsody of Rovets," but this was outgrown. The theme of the rivets occupies only the first part of the work. The piano score was written in Hollywood last year. It is scored for full symphony orchestra. It does not call for saxophones.

CONTINUED ON PAGE THREE

D'Indy's "Istar" Variations have been substituted for Hindemith's 'Konzertmusik" on the Boston Symphony's program tonight.

1205

THIS CLIPPING FROM BRROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 5 - 1932

Boston Symphony Plays At Academy of Music

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard last evening at the Academy of Music under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences.

Patrons and patronesses were composed of the citizens' committee. Adrian Van Sinderen, chairman. Vice chairmen are:

Frank L. Babbott
Mrs. Edward C. Blum
Judge Frederick E. Crane
Mrs. H. E. Dreier
Mrs. William H. Good
H. F. Gunnison
Henry A. Ingraham
Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt
Mrs. B. Herbert Smith
R. Huntington Woodman

The committee follows:

Dr. Joseph Dana Allen
Juan A. Almirall
Dr. Frank L. Babbott, jr.
Dr. Nathan T. Beers
Dr. W. B. Brinsmade
Mrs. Glentworth R. Butler
Rev. S. Parkes Cadman, D. D.
William M. Calder
Mrs. Otis Swan Carroll
J. Norman Carpenter
Mrs. I. Sherwood Coffin
Mrs. Frederick L. Cranford
Justice James C. Cropsey
Justice Norman S. Dike
Rev. Samuel M. Dorrance
Mrs. Guy DuVal
S. Raymond Estey
Mrs. Lewis W. Francis
Theodore L. Frothingham
William Peter Hamilton
Walter Hammitt
George Hewlett
Miss Amelia B. Hollenback
Dr. Alexander C. Howe
William T. Hunter
Darwin R. James
Dr. William A. Jewett
James H. Jourdan
Charles D. Lay
Mrs. Robert B. Lea
Mrs. John Eadie Leech
Miss Hilda Loines
Mrs. Charles J. McDermott
Judge George V. McLaughlin
Mrs. William W. Marshall
W. S. Morton Mead
Frank C. Munson
Charles F. Murphy
Mrs. George Notman
Neilson Olcott
Mrs. Frank H. Parsons
James H. Post
Charles E. Potts
Mrs. George H. Prentiss
Mrs. Benjamin Prince
Mrs. Clinton L. Rossiter, jr.
H. Stavely Sammond
Mrs. Henry Spelman
Porter Steele
Mrs. Herman Stutzer
Miss Marion J. Terry
William Armour Thayer
Carl H. Tollefsen
Mrs. Walter Truslow
Mrs. James P. Warbasse
Mrs. Edwin Carrington Ward
Mrs. Walter F. Wells
Mrs. J. B. Whitney
Eugene A. Wid
Dr. Ralph C. Williams
Surrogate Gearge A. Wingate
Cornelius D. Wood
Mrs. W. H. Ziegler

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

FEB 5 - 1932

Boston Symphony Concert Attracts Large Audience

The third Brooklyn concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, last evening, attracted a large audience to the Academy of Music.

A citizens' committee, under whose auspices the concert series is being given, was headed by: Adrian Van Sinderen chairman Frank L. Babbott, Mrs. Edward C. Blumfi Frederick E. Crane, Walter H. Critten, H. Edward Dreier, Mrs. William H. Good, Herbert F. Gunnison, Henry A. Ingraham, Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mrs. B. Herbert Smith and R. Huntington Woodman vice-chairmen.

Others on the committee are: Dr. Joseph Danna Allen Joan A. Almirall, Frank L. Babbott, Jr, Dr. Nathan A. Beers, Dr. W. N. Brinsmade, Mrs. Glentworth R. Butler, Rev. S. Parkes Cadman, William R. Calder, Mrs. Otis Swan Carroll, J. Norman Carpenter, J. Sherwood Coffin, Mrs. Frederick L. Cranford, James C. Cropsey, Norman S. Dike, Rev. S. M. Dorrance, Mrs. Guy Du Val S. Raymond Estey, Mrs. Lewis W. Francis, Theodore L. Frothingham, William Peter Hamilton, leWalter Hammitt, George Hewlett, Miss Amelia Hallenback, Dr. Alexander Howe William T. Hunter, Darwin R. James, Dr. William Jewette, James H. Jordan, Charles D. Lay, R B. Lea, Mrs. John Eadie Leach, Miss Hilda Loines, Mrs. Charles J. McDermott, George V. McLaughlin, Mrs. William W. Marshall. W. S. Morton Mead, Frank C. Munson, Charles F. Murphy, George Notman, Neilson Olcott, Mrs. Frank H. Parsons, James H. Post, Charles E.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CALGARY, ALBERTA
HERALD

FEB 5 1932

CELLIST KNOWS 300 WORKS
BOSTON (U.P.)—Jean Bedetti, first cellist of the Boston Symphony orchestra, knows 300 complete works by memory.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
Brooklyn Standard Union

FEB 5 - 1932

High Notes of the MUSIC WORLD

By JOSEPH A. MILLER

ALL-RUSSIAN PROGRAM AT THE ACADEMY

DR. SERGE KOU~~SSEVITZKY~~, always welcome in Brooklyn, with the Boston Symphony orchestra gave a delighted audience an all-Russian program at the Academy of Music last night. He began with some novelties that might be considered contributions to the "new" music toward which he is so partial, but for the last part of the program he reverted to the good old reliable "Pathetique" symphony of Tshaikovsky, and everybody was quite happy.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has its ardent disciples here in Brooklyn, who insist that there is really no other orchestra in existence worthy of consideration. Indeed, they often advertise the Boston concerts at the Academy as only symphonic concerts in Brooklyn, blandly ignoring the fact that the New York Philharmonic-Symphony orchestra also plays music in the same music hall. To them the concerts of the Boston Symphony are all the music Brooklyn ever hears. It is a curious aberration and tenaciously clung to by a definite section of our community.

We will not enter into debate with those enthusiasts, except timidly to suggest that there is other good music and that Dr. Koussevitsky's ensemble is not the only orchestra worth listening to, that Mr. Toscanini and Mr. Walter can also conduct passably well, and that such an attitude tends to make them and Brooklyn ridiculous and places difficulties in the way of those who are trying to convince a new generation that there are untold beauties in symphonic music well played.

And after all this is said, it cannot be denied that the Boston organization is a beautiful orchestra. Hang us and boil us in oil if you will we cannot see that it ranks with the Philharmonic-Symphony in any way, but still it is a great orchestra and a delight to listen to.

* * *

Dr. Koussevitzky goes in for softness, a certain fragile beauty rather than the robustness for which our own New York orchestra is famous. It is very lovely to listen to, but we must confess that a whole concert of fragility is too much. One likes whipped cream—but a meal should have good rich roast beef as well.

The program opened with the "Classical" Symphony by the young contemporary Prokofieff, a charming and delightful toy symphony that had moments of rare beauty. Especially charming was the third movement, the Gavotte. Despite its fragility, the piece swept the audience and evoked the wildest enthusiasm.

There followed the prelude to the opera "Khovantchina" by Moussorgsky, an opera in which the conflict between Old and New Russia (of several centuries ago) is supposed to be pictured, and the prelude of which is supposed to illustrate the coming of dawn over the Red Square in Moscow. The number was too "descriptive" and too attenuated for our taste, but candor compels us to report that we are here filing a minority report.

* * *

Nikolai Nikolaievitch Tcherepnin, a contemporary but not associated with the "new" music, was represented by "Eight Miniatures (After a Russian Illustrated Alphabet)," some of which were pretty enough, but all of which seemed to us beneath the notice of a first-rate orchestra.

Then came the "Pathetique!" This famous Sixth Symphony of Tchaikovsky is supposed to be outmoded, hackneyed, dull, but we daro to flaunt in the face of all the modernists the fact that to us it is one of the most beautiful and moving pieces of symphonic music in existence. It was played with not sufficient robustness, but it was glorious and it sent the audience out into the rain quite happy.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS

FEB 5 - 1932

Boston Symphony.—A program of novelties will be played Friday night at Carnegie Hall, New York, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Serge Kussevitzky. For the first time in New York George Gershwin's jazzy Rhapsody No. 2 will be performed. Hindemith's modernistic Konzertmusik for strings and brass, composed for the orchestra, will be played. Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstacy" and Prokoviev's classical symphony, Op. 25, are other numbers.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BRROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 5 - 1932

little solidity to Mr. Koussevitsky's list of compositions. The "modern" was placed foremost, inasmuch as the "classical" symphony of Prokofieff opened the evening's concert. The conductor read it as though he were deeply cognisant of that "exultant joy" which characterizes most of it. Although Mr. Felix Borowski has found the spirit of Mozart predominating in this modern dress presentation of old forms, your reviewer would urge the distinguished Chicagoan and his followers to peer somewhat more deeply and then look back once more upon the one who is regarded as the founder of the symphony as such. For to me, the Prokofieff sinfonietta smacks more of Haydn than of Mozart.

The Prokofieff was followed by the prelude to "Khovanstchina," the Moussorgsky opus which was destined at one time to have a Metropolitan Opera presentation, but which was shelved in favor of "The Fair at Sorochintzy." This vorspiel depicts the coming of dawn over the Kremlin and although it lacks the substance of the description of morn in the vicinity of Valhalla, it is not unrelated to that

ent. Mr. Koussevitsky gave it a dignified and colorful reading.

Eight miniatures of Teherephin followed this prelude and these bits of orchestral froth, pointedly descriptive and denoting the composer's command of orchestration, were given in delightful vein by the conductor and his associates. And then came the symphony which despite uncertain attacks in the first movement and some slight discrepancies in pitch on the part of the wood choir, was given a stately and inherently Slavonic consideration by Mr. Koussevitsky. It was a farewell of dignity, of poignancy and of beauty that Tschaikovsky made to the world and it was read in keeping with this significance by last night's orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKYLN, N. Y.
EAGLE

FEB 5 - 1932

Music of the Day

By EDWARD CUSHING

THE neo-classic nonsense practiced and preached by composers of the post-war decade had at least the effect of producing, in Prokofiew's Classical Symphony, a highly successful jeu d'esprit. Prokofiew may have professed an attempt to recapture, in this work, "the spirit of Mozart," to "put down that which, were he living today, Mozart would have put into his scores," but essentially, one feels, the symphony is a takeoff on the affectations and preciosities of its author's contemporaries. It is music written tongue in cheek, a pointed and captivating musical satire.

Last evening Mr. ~~Koussewitsky~~ placed it first on the ~~all~~-Russian program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's third Brooklyn concert. His Academy of Music audience had heard it before, but their attitude was obviously not that of the girl who had a book. The Classical Symphony tolerates repetition; we shall have heard it many times before we discover that its wit has worn thin, its charm gone stale on us.

From Prokofiew and the Classical Symphony Mr. Koussewitsky turned to Moussorgsky and the prelude to "Khowantscnina" (this also has had numerous performances at Boston Symphony concerts). The novelty of the evening was a set of Eight Miniatures, "after a Russian illustrated alphabet," by Nicholas Tcherepnin. In general form and in the character of its episodes, this suite resembles Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," though both qualitatively and quantitatively it is the lesser work. Tcherepnin's ideas have little distinction, but he knows a thing or two about instrumentation and at his best achieves the sort of piquancy to which audiences inevitably respond.

The concert concluded with Tschaikowsky's Pathetic Symphony. Mr. Koussewitsky's reading of this work is familiar to his admirers both in Brooklyn and Manhattan. The conductor adopts the point of view that exaggeration is the soul of eloquence. Those who agree with him doubtless find his "Pathetic" entirely to their taste.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. SUN

FEB 6 - 1932

n Rhapsody Heard

Orchestra Presents Work hythm of the Riveters.

J. HENDERSON.

chestra marched into Carnegie Hall freight. It was nothing less than famous composer of the "Rhapsody than our very own George Gershwin, creator of the music of "Girl Crazy," "Of Thee I Sing," "Delicious" and other contributions of stage and screen to the gayety of Broadway.

When the first rhapsody was produced in 1924 by Paul Whiteman at the memorable jazz concert in Aeolian Hall, Mr. Gershwin played the piano part. When his second rhapsody was delivered ceremoniously by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky to the intelligentsia of Boston at a symphony concert assembled not long ago he played the solo part and there was some shaking of learned heads, rumors of earthquake in Harvard Yard and other signs and portents. But there was likewise much approval, expressed by the customary show of hands, and later by dissertations in the public prints.

This second rhapsody expanded itself from a germinal thought which was born in the composer's mind when he was writing the music for "Delicious." The action of that drama takes place among ex-Gov. Smith's "Sidewalks of New York" and Mr. Gershwin believed there ought to be a riveting theme, "the eternal tattoo of the skyscraper riveters." So out in the midst of hustling Hollywood, where the perennial psychoses bloom under the beneficent rays of the studio lights, Mr. Gershwin developed what he at first called a "Rhapsody in Rivets." He finished it last May and fulfilled his intention of returning from California with a Western tan, a pocket full of money and a serious composition.

It is not too serious. It is American, New York and specifically zz, of course, but school with some There is no banjo by hatted trumpet use of the nasal ne—originator of the true jazz slur—speaks the correct language at times and there is the incessant rhythm, two in a bar, without which jazz does not exist. This is the rhythm of the riveter riveting rivets the live-long day. It sounds just that way. The thematic material suggests the first rhapsody over and over and the harmonies are characteristic of the Gershwin studio.

The composition is chiefly for orchestra. The piano part is no more than an important obbligato. The orchestration is generally too thick, which is a result of the attempt to fit the jazz style to a symphonic orchestra. The unctuous harmonies of the body of saxophones, trumpets and trombones in a jazz band are sui generis. Keeping the brass choir of a symphonic orchestra incessantly busy trying to supply the place of such harmonies must produce a heavy mass of tone when the rest of the orchestra is striving to balance the brass.

But these are perhaps secondary matters. The rhapsody is spirited, it is full of youth and recklessness, it is, indeed, young America of the untrammeled manners and the cocktail energy. But it is likely that most music lovers will believe that the first rhapsody expressed America and its musical inclinations even better than this one. Mr. Gershwin possesses a unique talent and his endeavors to put jazz in the artistic category are interesting and commendable. He was heartily applauded last evening after he and the great orchestra had performed his work with extraordinary brilliancy.

The concert began with Prokofieff's "Classical" symphony, which is an enjoyable piece of music, spontaneous in material, ingenious in construction and delightful in its adaptation of the manners of the eighteenth century to the moods of the twentieth. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted the symphony with a most delicate hand. The second number was Vincent D'Indy's "Istar" variations, splendidly played in memory of the composer who died recently. This admirable composition can perhaps never be popular because of its profound seriousness, its peculiar construction, and the mystic legend to which it is attached. People who would undoubtedly rather see some one dance the dance of the seven veils than hear D'Indy's poetic song of the disrobing of Istar by the warders of the seven gates. The last number on the evening's list was Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy."

Concerts of the Week.

SUNDAY.

Conchita Supervia, soprano, Town Tall, 3 P. M.
Philharmonic - Symphony Orchestra, Carnegie Hall, 3 P. M.
League of Composers, French Institute, 20 East Sixtieth street, 3:15 P. M.
Lotte Lehmann, soprano, Town Hall, 8:30 P. M.
Florence Stern, soprano, Barbizon-Plaza, 8:30 P. M.
Metropolitan Opera House Concert, 8:30 P. M.
Samuel Levine, violin, Roerich Hall, 8:30 P. M.
Grofe Musicians' Benefit, Manhattan Theater, 8:30 P. M.
Manhattan Symphony Orchestra, Waldorf-Astoria, 9 P. M.

MONDAY.

St. Olaf Lutheran Choir, Mecca Hall, 8:15 P. M.
Ignace Paderewski, piano, Madison Square Garden, 8:30 P. M.

TUESDAY.

National Orchestral Association, Carnegie Hall, 3 P. M.
Egon Petri, piano, Town Hall, 8:30 P. M.
Marjorie Peugnet, mezzo contralto, Barbizon-Plaza Concert Hall, 8:45 P. M.
Greek Byzantine Vocal Quintet, Barbizon-Plaza Salon, 8:30 P. M.

WEDNESDAY.

Compinsky Trio, Carnegie Hall, 8:30 P. M.
Alton Jones, piano, Town Hall, 8:30 P. M.
Ellenor Cook, diseuse, Barbizon-Plaza, 8:30 P. M.

THURSDAY.

Muriel Kerr, piano, Town Hall, 8:30 P. M.
Philharmonic - Symphony Orchestra, Carnegie Hall, 8:45 P. M.

FRIDAY.

Lund Opera Company ("Rip Van Winkle"), Town Hall, 11 A. M.
Philharmonic - Symphony Orchestra, Carnegie Hall, 2:30 P. M.
Florence Austral, soprano, Carnegie Hall, 8:30 P. M.
Julian De Gray, piano, Town Hall, 8:30 P. M.

SATURDAY.

Intimate Concerts for Young People, Barbizon-Plaza, 11 A. M.
Stanley Hummel, piano, Town Hall, 3 P. M.
Reba Patton, soprano, Town Hall, 8:30 P. M.
Philharmonic-Symphony Students' Concert, Carnegie Hall, 8:45 P. M.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BRROKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 5 - 1932

Boston Symphony Plays At Academy of Music

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard last evening at the Academy of Music under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences.

Patrons and patronesses were composed of the citizens' committee, Adrian Van Sinderen, chairman. Vice chairmen are:

Frank L. Babbott
Mrs. Edward C. Blum
Judge Frederick E. Crane
Mrs. H. E. Dreier
Mrs. William H. Good
H. F. Gunnison
Henry A. Ingraham
Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt
Mrs. B. Herbert Smith
R. Huntington Woodman

The committee follows:

Dr. Joseph Dana Allen
Juan A. Almirall
Dr. Frank L. Babbott, jr.
Dr. Nathan T. Beers
Dr. W. B. Brinsmade
Mrs. Glentworth R. Butler
Rev. S. Parkes Cadman, D. D.
William M. Calder
Mrs. Otis Swan Carroll
J. Norman Carpenter
Mrs. I. Sherwood Coffin
Mrs. Frederick L. Cranford
Justice James C. Cropsey
Justice Norman S. Dike
Rev. Samuel M. Dorrance
Mrs. Guy DuVal
S. Raymond Estey
Mrs. Lewis W. Francis
Theodore L. Frothingham
William Peter Hamilton
Walter Hammitt
George Hewlett
Miss Amelia B. Hollenback
Dr. Alexander C. Howe
William T. Hunter
Darwin R. James
Dr. William A. Jewett
James H. Jourdan
Charles D. Lay
Mrs. Robert B. Lea
Mrs. John Eadie Leech
Miss Hilda Loines
Mrs. Charles J. McDermott
Judge George V. McLaughlin
Mrs. William W. Marshall
W. S. Morton Mead
Frank C. Munson
Charles F. Murphy
Mrs. George Notman
Neilson Olcott
Mrs. Frank H. Parsons
James H. Post
Charles E. Potts
Mrs. George H. Prentiss
Mrs. Benjamin Prince
Mrs. Clinton L. Rossiter, jr.
H. Stavely Sammond
Mrs. Henry Spelman
Porter Steele
Mrs. Herman Stutzer
Miss Marion J. Terry
William Armour Thayer
Carl H. Tollefsen
Mrs. Walter Truslow
Mrs. James P. Warbasse
Mrs. Edwin Carrington Ward
Mrs. Walter F. Wells
Mrs. J. B. Whitney
Eugene A. Wid
Dr. Ralph C. Williams
Surrogate Gearge A. Wingate
Cornelius D. Wood
Mrs. W. H. Ziegler

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

FEB 5 - 1932

Boston Symphony Concert Attracts Large Audience

The third Brooklyn concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, last evening, attracted a large audience to the Academy of Music.

A citizens' committee, under whose auspices the concert series is being given, was headed by: Adrian Van Sinderen chairman Frank L. Babbott, Mrs. Edward C. Blumfi Frederick E. Crane, Walter H. Critten, H. Edward Dreier, Mrs. William H. Good, Herbert F. Gunnison, Henry A. Ingraham, Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mrs. B. Herbert Smith and R. Huntington Woodman vice-chairmen.

Others on the committee are: Dr. Joseph Danna Allen Joan A. Almirall, Frank L. Babbott, Jr., Dr. Nathan A. Beers, Dr. W. N. Brinsmade, Mrs. Glentworth R. Butler, Rev. S. Parkes Cadman, William R. Calder, Mrs. Otis Swan Carroll, J. Norman Carpenter, J Sherwood Coffin. Mrs. Frederick L. Cranford, James C. Cropsey, Norman S. Dike, Rev. S. M. Dorrance, Mrs. Cuy Du Val S. Raymond Estey, Mrs. Lewis W. Francis, Theodore L. Frothingham, William Peter Hamilton, leWalter Hammitt, George Hewlett, Miss Amelia Hallenback, Dr. Alexander Howe William T. Hunter, Darwin R. James, Dr. William Jewette, James H. Jordan, Charles D. Lay, R B. Lea, Mrs. John Eadie Leach, Miss Hilda Loines, Mrs. Charles J. McDermott, George V. McLaughlin, Mrs. William W. Marshall. W. S. Morton Mead, Frank C. Munson, Charles F. Murphy, George Notman, Neilson Olcott, Mrs. Frank H. Parsons, James H. Post, Charles E.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CALGARY, ALBERTA
HERALD

FEB 5 1932

CELLIST KNOWS 300 WORKS

BOSTON (U.P.)—Jean Bedetti, first cellist of the Boston Symphony orchestra, knows 300 complete works by memory.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
Brooklyn Standard Union

FEB 5 - 1932

RVING

A
DR
ULTON TREET

delig of M might which he re of Ts

The has it Brookly really ence w deed, they often advertise the ton concerts at the Academy as only symphonic concerts in Brooklyn, blandly ignoring the fact that the New York Philharmonic-Symphony orchestra also plays music in the same music hall. To them the concerts of the Boston Symphony are all the music Brooklyn ever hears. It is a curious aberration and tenaciously clung to by a definite section of our community.

We will not enter into debate with those enthusiasts, except timidly to suggest that there is other good music and that Dr. Koussevitsky's ensemble is not the only orchestra worth listening to, that Mr. Toscanini and Mr. Walter can also conduct passably well, and that such an attitude tends to make them and Brooklyn ridiculous and places difficulties in the way of those who are trying to convince a new generation that there are untold beauties in symphonic music well played.

And after all this is said, it cannot be denied that the Boston organization is a beautiful orchestra. Hang us and boil us in oil if you will we cannot see that it ranks with the Philharmonic-Symphony in any way, but still it is a great orchestra and a delight to listen to.

* * *

Dr. Koussevitzky goes in for softness, a certain fragile beauty rather than the robustness for which our own New York orchestra is famous. It is very lovely to listen to, but we must confess that a whole concert of fragility is too much. One likes whipped cream—but a meal should have good rich roast beef as well.

The program opened with the "Classical" Symphony by the young contemporary Prokofieff, a charming and delightful toy symphony that had moments of rare beauty. Especially charming was the third movement, the Gavotte. Despite its fragility, the piece swept the audience and evoked the wildest enthusiasm.

There followed the prelude to the opera "Khovantchina" by Moussorgsky, an opera in which the conflict between Old and New Russia (of several centuries ago) is supposed to be pictured, and the prelude of which is supposed to illustrate the coming of dawn over the Red Square in Moscow. The number was too "descriptive" and too attenuated for our taste, but candor compels us to report that we are here filing a minority report.

* * *

Nikolai Nikolaievitch Tcherepnin, a contemporary but not associated with the "new" music, was represented by "Eight Miniatures (After a Russian Illustrated Alphabet)," some of which were pretty enough, but all of which seemed to us beneath the notice of a first-rate orchestra.

Then came the "Pathetique!" This famous Sixth Symphony of Tchaikovsky is supposed to be outmoded, hackneyed, dull, but we dare to flaunt in the face of all the modernists the fact that to us it is one of the most beautiful and moving pieces of symphonic music in

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS

FEB 5 - 1932

Boston Symphony.—A program of novelties will be played Friday night at Carnegie Hall, New York, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Serge Kussevitzky. For the first time in New York George Gershwin's jazzy Rhapsody No. 2 will be performed. Hindemith's modernistic Konzertmusik for strings and brass, composed for the orchestra, will be played. Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstacy" and Prokoviev's classical symphony, Op. 25, are other numbers.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BRROKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 5 - 1932

MUSIC

By HAROLD A. STRICKLAND

Slavonic Music

In offering the third of his series of five Brooklyn concerts at the Academy of Music last night, Serge Koussevitsky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra did not tax the musical intellect of his local subscribers too greatly. Presenting an all-Russian program, the conductor ranged from Moussorgsky, the elder Tcherepnin and Tschaikovsky to Prokofieff, so that "modernism" and as the sources of its derivation were all encompassed by his schedule.

However, except for the "Pathetique" of Peter Ilich, there was little solidity to Mr. Koussevitsky's list of compositions. The "modern" was placed foremost, inasmuch as the "classical" symphony of Prokofieff opened the evening's concert. The conductor read it as though he were deeply cognisant of that "exultant joy" which characterizes most of it. Although Mr. Felix Borowski has found the spirit of Mozart predominating in this modern dress presentation of old forms, your reviewer would urge the distinguished Chicagoan and his followers to peer somewhat more deeply and then look back once more upon the one who is regarded as the founder of the symphony as such. For to me, the Prokofieff sinfonietta smacks more of Haydn than of Mozart.

The Prokofieff was followed by the prelude to "Khovanstchina," the Moussorgsky opus which was destined at one time to have a Metropolitan Opera presentation, but which was shelved in favor of "The Fair at Sorochintzy." This vorspiel depicts the coming of dawn over the Kremlin and although it lacks the substance of the description of morn in the vicinity of Valhalla, it is not unrelated to that

ent. Mr. Koussevitsky gave it a dignified and colorful reading.

Eight miniatures of Teherephin followed this prelude and these bits of orchestral froth, pointedly descriptive and denoting the composer's command of orchestration, were given in delightful vein by the conductor and his associates. And then came the symphony which despite uncertain attacks in the first movement and some slight discrepancies in pitch on the part of the wood choir, was given a stately and inherently Slavonic consideration by Mr. Koussevitsky. It was a farewell of dignity, of poignancy and of beauty that Tschaikovsky made to the world and it was read in keeping with this significance by last night's orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKYLN, N. Y.
EAGLE

FEB 5 - 1932

at Fordham.
M land U. at Newar

OLD F. PARROTT

THE neo-classic nonsense practiced and preached by composers of the post-war decade had at least the effect of producing, in Prokofiew's Classical Symphony, a highly successful jeu d'esprit. Prokofiew may have professed an attempt to recapture, in this work, "the spirit of Mozart," to "put down that which, were he living today, Mozart would have put into his scores," but essentially, one feels, the symphony is a takeoff on the affectations and preciosities of its author's contemporaries. It is music written tongue in cheek, a pointed and captivating musical satire.

Last evening Mr. Koussewitsky placed it first on the all-Russian program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's third Brooklyn concert. His Academy of Music audience had heard it before, but their attitude was obviously not that of the girl who had a book. The Classical Symphony tolerates repetition; we shall have heard it many times before we discover that its wit has worn thin, its charm gone stale on us.

From Prokofiew and the Classical Symphony Mr. Koussewitsky turned to Moussorgsky and the prelude to "Khowantscnina" (this also has had numerous performances at Boston Symphony concerts). The novelty of the evening was a set of Eight Miniatures, "after a Russian illustrated alphabet," by Nicholas Tcherepnin. In general form and in the character of its episodes, this suite resembles Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," though both qualitatively and quantitatively it is the lesser work. Tcherepnin's ideas have little distinction, but he knows a thing or two about instrumentation and at his best achieves the sort of piquancy to which audiences inevitably respond.

The concert concluded with Tschaikowsky's Pathetic Symphony. Mr. Koussewitsky's reading of this work is familiar to his admirers both in Brooklyn and Manhattan. The conductor adopts the point of view that exaggeration is the soul of eloquence. Those who agree with him doubtless find his "Pathetic" entirely to their taste.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. SUN

FEB 6 - 1932

n Rhapsody Heard

Orchestra Presents Work
hythm of the Riveters.

J. HENDERSON.

rchestra marched into Carnegie Hall freight. It was nothing less than famous composer of the "Rhapsody than our very own George Gershwin, creator of the music of "Girl Crazy," "Of Thee I Sing," "Delicious" and other contributions of stage and screen to the gayety of Broadway.

When the first rhapsody was produced in 1924 by Paul Whiteman at the memorable jazz concert in Aeolian Hall, Mr. Gershwin played the piano part. When his second rhapsody was delivered ceremoniously by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky to the intelligentsia of Boston at a symphony concert assembled not long ago he played the solo part and there was some shaking of learned heads, rumors of earthquake in Harvard Yard and other signs and portents. But there was likewise much approval, expressed by the customary show of hands, and later by dissertations in the public prints.

This second rhapsody expanded itself from a germinal thought which was born in the composer's mind when he was writing the music for "Delicious." The action of that drama takes place among ex-Gov. Smith's "Sidewalks of New York" and Mr. Gershwin believed there ought to be a riveting theme, "the eternal tattoo of the skyscraper riveters." So out in the midst of hustling Hollywood, where the perennial psychoses bloom under the beneficent rays of the studio lights, Mr. Gershwin developed what he at first called a "Rhapsody in Rivets." He finished it last May and fulfilled his intention of returning from California with a Western tan, a pocket full of money and a serious composition.

It is not too serious. It is American, New York and specifically Broadway. It is jazz, of course, but jazz out of high school with some educational polish. There is no banjo strumming, no derby hatted trumpet and no inordinate use of the nasal mute. The trombone—originator of the true jazz slur—speaks the correct language at times and there is the incessant rhythm, two in a bar, without which jazz does not exist. This is the rhythm of the riveter riveting rivets the live-long day. It sounds just that way. The thematic material suggests the first rhapsody over and over and the harmonies are characteristic of the Gershwin studio.

The composition is chiefly for orchestra. The piano part is no more than an important obbligato. The orchestration is generally too thick, which is a result of the attempt to fit the jazz style to a symphonic orchestra. The unctuous harmonies of the body of saxophones, trumpets and trombones in a jazz band are sui generis. Keeping the brass choir of a symphonic orchestra incessantly busy trying to supply the place of such harmonies must produce a heavy mass of tone when the rest of the orchestra is striving to balance the brass.

But these are perhaps secondary matters. The rhapsody is spirited, it is full of youth and recklessness, it is, indeed, young America of the untrammeled manners and the cocktail energy. But it is likely that most music lovers will believe that the first rhapsody expressed America and its musical inclinations even better than this one. Mr. Gershwin possesses a unique talent and his endeavors to put jazz in the artistic category are interesting and commendable. He was heartily applauded last evening after he and the great orchestra had performed his work with extraordinary brilliancy.

The concert began with Prokofieff's "Classical" symphony, which is an enjoyable piece of music, spontaneous in material, ingenious in construction and delightful in its adaptation of the manners of the eighteenth century to the moods of the twentieth. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted the symphony with a most delicate hand. The second number was Vincent D'Indy's "Istar" variations, splendidly played in memory of the composer who died recently. This admirable composition can perhaps never be popular because of its profound seriousness, its peculiar construction, and the mystic legend to which it is attached. People who would undoubtedly rather see some one dance the dance of the seven veils than hear D'Indy's poetic song of the disrobing of Istar by the warders of the seven gates. The last number on the evening's list was Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy."

Concerts of the Week.

SUNDAY.

Conchita Supervia, soprano, Town Tall, 3 P. M.
Philharmonic - Symphony Orchestra, Carnegie Hall, 3 P. M.
League of Composers, French Institute, 20 East Sixtieth street, 3:15 P. M.
Lotte Lehmann, soprano, Town Hall, 8:30 P. M.
Florence Stern, soprano, Barbizon-Plaza, 8:30 P. M.
Metropolitan Opera House Concert, 8:30 P. M.
Samuel Levine, violin, Roerich Hall, 8:30 P. M.
Grofe Musicians' Benefit, Manhattan Theater, 8:30 P. M.
Manhattan Symphony Orchestra, Waldorf-Astoria, 9 P. M.

MONDAY.

St. Olaf Lutheran Choir, Mecca Hall, 8:15 P. M.
Ignace Paderewski, piano, Madison Square Garden, 8:30 P. M.

TUESDAY.

National Orchestral Association, Carnegie Hall, 3 P. M.
Egon Petri, piano, Town Hall, 8:30 P. M.
Marjorie Peugnet, mezzo contralto, Barbizon-Plaza Concert Hall, 8:45 P. M.
Greek Byzantine Vocal Quintet, Barbizon-Plaza Salon, 8:30 P. M.

WEDNESDAY.

Compinsky Trio, Carnegie Hall, 8:30 P. M.
Alton Jones, piano, Town Hall, 8:30 P. M.
Ellenor Cook, diseuse, Barbizon-Plaza, 8:30 P. M.

THURSDAY.

Muriel Kerr, piano, Town Hall, 8:30 P. M.
Philharmonic - Symphony Orchestra, Carnegie Hall, 8:45 P. M.

FRIDAY.

Lund Opera Company ("Rip Van Winkle"), Town Hall, 11 A. M.
Philharmonic - Symphony Orchestra, Carnegie Hall, 2:30 P. M.
Florence Austral, soprano, Carnegie Hall, 8:30 P. M.
Julian De Gray, piano, Town Hall, 8:30 P. M.

SATURDAY.

Intimate Concerts for Young People, Barbizon-Plaza, 11 A. M.
Stanley Hummel, piano, Town Hall, 3 P. M.
Reba Patton, soprano, Town Hall, 8:30 P. M.
Philharmonic-Symphony Students' Concert, Carnegie Hall, 8:45 P. M.

1205

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BRROKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 5 - 1932

Boston Symphony Plays At Academy of Music

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard last evening at the Academy of Music under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences.

Patrons and patronesses were composed of the citizens' committee. Adrian Van Sinderen, chairman. Vice chairmen are:

Frank L. Babbott
Mrs. Edward C. Blum
Judge Frederick E. Crane
Mrs. H. E. Dreier
Mrs. William H. Good
H. F. Gunnison
Henry A. Ingraham
Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt
Mrs. B. Herbert Smith
R. Huntington Woodman

The committee follows:

Dr. Joseph Dana Allen
Juan A. Almirall
Dr. Frank L. Babbott, jr.
Dr. Nathan T. Beers
Dr. W. B. Brinsmade
Mrs. Glentworth R. Butler
Rev. S. Parkes Cadman, D. D.
William M. Calder
Mrs. Otis Swan Carroll
J. Norman Carpenter
Mrs. I. Sherwood Coffin
Mrs. Frederick L. Cranford
Justice James C. Cropsey
Justice Norman S. Dike
Rev. Samuel M. Dorrance
Mrs. Guy DuVal
S. Raymond Estey
Mrs. Lewis W. Francis
Theodore L. Frothingham
William Peter Hamilton
Walter Hammitt
George Hewlett
Miss Amelia B. Hollenback
Dr. Alexander C. Howe
William T. Hunter
Darwin R. James
Dr. William A. Jewett
James H. Jourdan
Charles D. Lay
Mrs. Robert B. Lea
Mrs. John Eadie Leech
Miss Hilda Loines
Mrs. Charles J. McDermott
Judge George V. McLaughlin
Mrs. William W. Marshall
W. S. Morton Mead
Frank C. Munson
Charles F. Murphy
Mrs. George Notman
Neilson Olcott
Mrs. Frank H. Parsons
James H. Post
Charles E. Potts
Mrs. George H. Prentiss
Mrs. Benjamin Prince
Mrs. Clinton L. Rossiter, jr.
H. Stavely Sammond
Mrs. Henry Spelman
Porter Steele
Mrs. Herman Stutzer
Miss Marion J. Terry
William Armour Thayer
Carl H. Tollefsen
Mrs. Walter Truslow
Mrs. James P. Warbasse
Mrs. Edwin Carrington Ward
Mrs. Walter F. Wells
Mrs. J. B. Whitney
Eugene A. Wid
Dr. Ralph C. Williams
Surrogate Gearge A. Wingate
Cornelius D. Wood
Mrs. W. H. Ziegler

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

FEB 5 - 1932

Boston Symphony Concert Attracts Large Audience

The third Brooklyn concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, last evening, attracted a large audience to the Academy of Music.

A citizens' committee, under whose auspices the concert series is being given, was headed by: Adrian Van Sinderen chairman Frank L. Babbott, Mrs. Edward C. Blumfi Frederick E. Crane, Walter H. Critten, H. Edward Dreier, Mrs. William H. Good, Herbert F. Gunnison, Henry A. Ingraham, Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mrs. B. Herbert Smith and R. Huntington Woodman vice-chairmen.

Others on the committee are: Dr. Joseph Danna Allen Joan A. Almirall, Frank L. Babbott, Jr, Dr. Nathan A. Beers, Dr. W. N. Brinsmade, Mrs. Glentworth R. Butler,. Rev. S. Parkes Cadman, William R. Calder, Mrs. Otis Swan Carroll, J. Norman Carpenter, J. Sherwood Coffin, Mrs. Frederick L. Cranford, James C. Cropsey, Norman S. Dike, Rev. S. M. Dorrance, Mrs. Guy Du Val S. Raymond Estey, Mrs. Lewis W. Francis, Theodore L. Frothingham, William Peter Hamilton, leWalter Hammitt, George Hewlett, Miss Amelia Hallenback, Dr. Alexander Howe William T. Hunter, Darwin R. James, Dr. William Jewette, James H. Jordan, Charles D. Lay, R B. Lea, Mrs. John Eadie Leach, Miss Hilda Loines, Mrs. Charles J. McDermott, George V. McLaughlin, Mrs. William W. Marshall. W. S. Morton Mead, Frank C. Munson, Charles F. Murphy, George Notman, Neilson Olcott, Mrs. Frank H. Parsons, James H. Post, Charles E.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CALGARY, ALBERTA
HERALD

FEB 5 1932

CELLIST KNOWS 300 WORKS

BOSTON (U.P.)—Jean Bedetti, first cellist of the Boston Symphony orchestra, knows 300 complete works by memory.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
Brooklyn Standard Union

FEB 5 - 1932

RVING

DRULTON TREET

delig of M migh which he re of Ts

The has it Brookly really ence w
deed, they often advertise the Boston concerts at the Academy as only symphonic concerts in Brooklyn, blandly ignoring the fact that the New York Philharmonic-Symphony orchestra also plays music in the same music hall. To them the concerts of the Boston Symphony are all the music Brooklyn ever hears. It is a curious aberration and tenaciously clung to by a definite section of our community.

We will not enter into debate with those enthusiasts, except timidly to suggest that there is other good music and that Dr. Koussevitzky's ensemble is not the only orchestra worth listening to, that Mr. Toscanini and Mr. Walter can also conduct passably well, and that such an attitude tends to make them and Brooklyn ridiculous and places difficulties in the way of those who are trying to convince a new generation that there are untold beauties in symphonic music well played.

And after all this is said, it cannot be denied that the Boston organization is a beautiful orchestra. Hang us and boil us in oil if you will we cannot see that it ranks with the Philharmonic-Symphony in any way, but still it is a great orchestra and a delight to listen to.

* * *

Dr. Koussevitzky goes in for softness, a certain fragile beauty rather than the robustness for which our own New York orchestra is famous. It is very lovely to listen to, but we must confess that a whole concert of fragility is too much. One likes whipped cream—but a meal should have good rich roast beef as well.

The program opened with the "Classical" Symphony by the young contemporary Prokofieff, a charming and delightful toy symphony that had moments of rare beauty. Especially charming was the third movement, the Gavotte. Despite its fragility, the piece swept the audience and evoked the wildest enthusiasm.

There followed the prelude to the opera "Khovantchina" by Moussorgsky, an opera in which the conflict between Old and New Russia (of several centuries ago) is supposed to be pictured, and the prelude of which is supposed to illustrate the coming of dawn over the Red Square in Moscow. The number was too "descriptive" and too attenuated for our taste, but candor compels us to report that we are here filing a minority report.

* * *

Nikolai Nikolaievitch Tcherepnin, a contemporary but not associated with the "new" music, was represented by "Eight Miniatures (After a Russian Illustrated Alphabet)," some of which were pretty enough, but all of which seemed to us beneath the notice of a first-rate orchestra.

Then came the "Pathetique!" This famous Sixth Symphony of Tchaikovsky is supposed to be outmoded, hackneyed, dull, but we daro to flaunt in the face of all the modernists the fact that to us it is one of the most beautiful and moving pieces of symphonic music in

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS

FEB 5 - 1932

Boston Symphony.—A program of novelties will be played Friday night at Carnegie Hall, New York, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Serge Kussevitzky. For the first time in New York George Gershwin's jazzy Rhapsody No. 2 will be performed. Hindemith's modernistic Konzertmusik for strings and brass, composed for the orchestra, will be played. Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstacy" and Prokoviev's classical symphony, Op. 25, are other numbers.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BRROKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 5 - 1932

dren attending the public s on one side of the street and parochial school on the other s Inconvenience also would be caus to the Roman Catholic Church the street, Mr. Knott said.

"Mayor Walker has said he not like to have business chop up inside residential areas," Knott emphasized. "Our civic as ciations agree with him. Furth more, why put more business this neighborhood when many the existing stores are vacant. P sibly the change would result in increase in assessments. It is ab time we had an assessment va tion."

Alderman O'Connell Opposed

By

In of fi
Acad
Kous phony
music scribe
all-Ru range elder sky to Prokofieff, so that "modernism" and as the sources of its derivation were all encompassed by his schedule.

However, except for the "Pathetique" of Peter Ilich, there was little solidity to Mr. Koussevitsky's list of compositions. The "modern" was placed foremost, inasmuch as the "classical" symphony of Prokofieff opened the evening's concert. The conductor read it as though he were deeply cognisant of that "exultant joy" which characterizes most of it. Although Mr. Felix Borowski has found the spirit of Mozart predominating in this modern dress presentation of old forms, your reviewer would urge the distinguished Chicagoan and his followers to peer somewhat more deeply and then look back once more upon the one who is regarded as the founder of the symphony as such. For to me, the Prokofieff sinfonietta smacks more of Haydn than of Mozart.

The Prokofieff was followed by the prelude to "Khovanstchina," the Moussorgsky opus which was destined at one time to have a Metropolitan Opera presentation, but which was shelved in favor of "The Fair at Sorochintzy." This vorspiel depicts the coming of dawn over the Kremlin and although it lacks the substance of the description of morn in the vicinity of Valhalla, it is not unrelated to that

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKYLN, N. Y.
EAGLE

FEB 5 - 1932

M

land U. at Newar

OLD F. PARROTT

THE neo-classic nonsense practiced and preached by composers of the post-war decade had at least the effect of producing, in Prokofiew's Classical Symphony, a highly successful jeu d'esprit. Prokofiew may have professed an attempt to recapture, in this work, "the spirit of Mozart," to "put down that which, were he living today, Mozart would have put into his scores," but essentially, one feels, the symphony is a takeoff on the affectations and preciosities of its author's contemporaries. It is music written tongue in cheek, a pointed and captivating musical satire.

Last evening Mr. Koussewitsky placed it first on the all-Russian program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's third Brooklyn concert. His Academy of Music audience had heard it before, but their attitude was obviously not that of the girl who had a book. The Classical Symphony tolerates repetition; we shall have heard it many times before we discover that its wit has worn thin, its charm gone stale on us.

From Prokofiew and the Classical Symphony Mr. Koussewitsky turned to Moussorgsky and the prelude to "Khowantscnina" (this also has had numerous performances at Boston Symphony concerts). The novelty of the evening was a set of Eight Miniatures, "after a Russian illustrated alphabet," by Nicholas Tcherepnin. In general form and in the character of its episodes, this suite resembles Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," though both qualitatively and quantitatively it is the lesser work. Tcherepnin's ideas have little distinction, but he knows a thing or two about instrumentation and at his best achieves the sort of piquancy to which audiences inevitably respond.

The concert concluded with Tschaikowsky's Pathetic Symphony. Mr. Koussewitsky's reading of this work is familiar to his admirers both in Brooklyn and Manhattan. The conductor adopts the point of view that exaggeration is the soul of eloquence. Those who agree with him doubtless find his "Pathetic" entirely to their taste.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. SUN

FEB 6 - 1932

New Gershwin Rhapsody Heard

Boston Symphony Orchestra Presents Work Dealing With Rhythm of the Riveters.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra marched into Carnegie Hall last night bearing precious freight. It was nothing less than the second rhapsody of the famous composer of the "Rhapsody in Blue," who is none other than our very own George Gershwin, creator of the music of "Girl Crazy," "Of Thee I Sing," "Delicious" and other contributions of stage and screen to the gayety of Broadway.

When the first rhapsody was produced in 1924 by Paul Whiteman at the memorable jazz concert in Aeolian Hall, Mr. Gershwin played the piano part. When his second rhapsody was delivered ceremoniously by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky to the intelligentsia of Boston at a symphony concert assembled not long ago he played the solo part and there was some shaking of learned heads, rumors of earthquake in Harvard Yard and other signs and portents. But there was likewise much approval, expressed by the customary show of hands, and later by dissertations in the public prints.

This second rhapsody expanded itself from a germinal thought which was born in the composer's mind when he was writing the music for "Delicious." The action of that drama takes place among ex-Gov. Smith's "Sidewalks of New York" and Mr. Gershwin believed there ought to be a riveting theme, "the eternal tattoo of the skyscraper riveters." So out in the midst of hustling Hollywood, where the perennial psychoses bloom under the beneficent rays of the studio lights, Mr. Gershwin developed what he at first called a "Rhapsody in Rivets." He finished it last May and fulfilled his intention of returning from California with a Western tan, a pocket full of money and a serious composition.

It is not too serious. It is American, New York and specifically Broadway. It is jazz, of course, but jazz out of high school with some educational polish. There is no banjo strumming, no derby hatted trumpet and no inordinate use of the nasal mute. The trombone—originator of the true jazz slur—speaks the correct language at times and there is the incessant rhythm, two in a bar, without which jazz does not exist. This is the rhythm of the riveter riveting rivets the live-long day. It sounds just that way. The thematic material suggests the first rhapsody over and over and the harmonies are characteristic of the Gershwin studio.

The composition is chiefly for orchestra. The piano part is no more than an important obbligato. The orchestration is generally too thick, which is a result of the attempt to fit the jazz style to a symphonic orchestra. The unctuous harmonies of the body of saxophones, trumpets and trombones in a jazz band are sui generis. Keeping the brass choir of a symphonic orchestra incessantly busy trying to supply the place of such harmonies must produce a heavy mass of tone when the rest of the orchestra is striving to balance the brass.

But these are perhaps secondary matters. The rhapsody is spirited, it is full of youth and recklessness, it is, indeed, young America of the untrammeled manners and the cocktail energy. But it is likely that most music lovers will believe that the first rhapsody expressed America and its musical inclinations even better than this one. Mr. Gershwin possesses a unique talent and his endeavors to put jazz in the artistic category are interesting and commendable. He was heartily applauded last evening after he and the great orchestra had performed his work with extraordinary brilliancy.

The concert began with Prokofieff's "Classical" symphony, which is an enjoyable piece of music, spontaneous in material, ingenious in construction and delightful in its adaptation of the manners of the eighteenth century to the moods of the twentieth. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted the symphony with a most delicate hand. The second number was Vincent D'Indy's "Istar" variations, splendidly played in memory of the composer who died recently. This admirable composition can perhaps never be popular because of its profound seriousness, its peculiar construction, and the mystic legend to which it is attached. People who would undoubtedly rather see some one dance the dance of the seven veils than hear D'Indy's poetic song of the disrobing of Istar by the warders of the seven gates. The last number on the evening's list was Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy."

Concerts of the Week.

SUNDAY.

Conchita Supervia, soprano, Town Tall, 3 P. M.
Philharmonic - Symphony Orchestra, Carnegie Hall, 3 P. M.
League of Composers, French Institute, 20 East Sixtieth street, 3:15 P. M.
Lotte Lehmann, soprano, Town Hall, 8:30 P. M.
Florence Stern, soprano, Barbizon-Plaza, 8:30 P. M.
Metropolitan Opera House Concert, 8:30 P. M.
Samuel Levine, violin, Roerich Hall, 8:30 P. M.
Grofe Musicians' Benefit, Manhattan Theater, 8:30 P. M.
Manhattan Symphony Orchestra, Waldorf-Astoria, 9 P. M.

MONDAY.

St. Olaf Lutheran Choir, Mecca Hall, 8:15 P. M.
Ignace Paderewski, piano, Madison Square Garden, 8:30 P. M.

TUESDAY.

National Orchestral Association, Carnegie Hall, 3 P. M.
Egon Petri, piano, Town Hall, 8:30 P. M.
Marjorie Peugnet, mezzo contralto, Barbizon-Plaza Concert Hall, 8:45 P. M.
Greek Byzantine Vocal Quintet, Barbizon-Plaza Salon, 8:30 P. M.

WEDNESDAY.

Compinsky Trio, Carnegie Hall, 8:30 P. M.
Alton Jones, piano, Town Hall, 8:30 P. M.
Ellenor Cook, diseuse, Barbizon-Plaza, 8:30 P. M.

THURSDAY.

Muriel Kerr, piano, Town Hall, 8:30 P. M.
Philharmonic - Symphony Orchestra, Carnegie Hall, 8:45 P. M.

FRIDAY.

Lund Opera Company ("Rip Van Winkle"), Town Hall, 11 A. M.
Philharmonic - Symphony Orchestra, Carnegie Hall, 2:30 P. M.
Florence Austral, soprano, Carnegie Hall, 8:30 P. M.
Julian De Gray, piano, Town Hall, 8:30 P. M.

SATURDAY.

Intimate Concerts for Young People, Barbizon-Plaza, 11 A. M.
Stanley Hummel, piano, Town Hall, 3 P. M.
Reba Patton, soprano, Town Hall, 8:30 P. M.
Philharmonic-Symphony Students' Concert, Carnegie Hall, 8:45 P. M.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK TIMES

126 FEB 6 - 1932

MUSIC IN REVIEW

George Gershwin Plays His Second Rhapsody for First Time Here With Koussevitzky and Boston Orchestra.

By OLIN DOWNES.

The program offered by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall was refreshing for its catholicity and interest. Mr. Koussevitzky is one of the very few conductors today who appear to realize that music was not made exclusively in Germany, Italy or France, either; who examines scores of all kinds and schools with curiosity and a singular appreciation, whatever their contents may be; who can be relied upon to supplement the routine sort of program which, in the main, New York City still receives.

The novelty of last night's concert was George Gershwin's Second Rhapsody, scored for piano and large modern orchestra, with the composer as solo pianist. The originality of the Gershwin "Rhapsody in Blue," first heard in this city Feb. 12, 1924, was the cause of Mr. Gershwin's later adventures in the symphonic field, with his "Concerto in F," (1925) for piano and orchestra, and "An American in Paris" (1928), a score which will probably remain the best constructed and most effective of Mr. Gershwin's present "period"—this though certain of the ideas of the "Rhapsody in Blue" are more original.

The score performed last night is the expansion of a five-minute sequence inserted into the picture "Delicious," a screen comedy drama, based on a story by Guy Bolton, with lyrics by Ira Gershwin and music by George, produced in 1931. The rhapsody was written in California in the Spring of the same year and later somewhat revised. Some of the comedy scenes showed the streets of New York, and for the five-minute orchestral sequence Gershwin conceived a "rivet theme" to echo the tattoo of the skyscrapers. The second rhapsody had originally the title of "Rhapsody in Rivets."

This rhapsody has more orchestration and more development than the "Rhapsody in Blue." Its main motive is reasonably suggestive of rivets and racket in streets of this metropolis; also, if you like, of the liveliness and bonhomie of inhabitants. There is a second theme, built into a contrasting section. Thus jazz dance rhythm and sentimental song are opposed and juxtaposed in this score. The conception is wholly orchestral. The piano is not so prominent as in the "Rhapsody in Blue"; it is, in fact, merely one of the instruments of the ensemble.

But with all its immaturities, the "Rhapsody in Blue" is more individual and originative than the piece heard last night. In fact, the "Second Rhapsody" is imitative in many ways of the "Rhapsody in Blue." One of the figures of the first part, and certain harmonic cadences, and the song theme of the middle part, have all quite direct derivations from the earlier work. Furthermore, the "Second Rhapsody" is too long for its material.

The work was superbly performed. Mr. Koussevitzky, who conducts it for the second time this afternoon, led the orchestra as earnestly as if he had been introducing a new symphony by a Roussel or a Miascovsky, and patiently labored to obtain from the players the last ounce of their energy. It was a virtuoso performance. Mr. Gershwin played a modest piano part simply but with the composer's authority. There was royal welcome for the composer, the performers, the music. Nevertheless, we have had better things from Mr. Gershwin, and we expect better in time to come.

Mr. Koussevitsky also figured on this occasion as the one conductor who has seen fit to honor in New York the memory of a great French composer, the late Vincent d'Indy, with a performance of one of his representative works. The second item of the program was the "Istar" Variations. There has been no such searching, and imaginative performance of these Variations here for many years. Neither Mr. Mengelberg nor Mr. Toscanini did as well by them. In the technical sense the performance was a marvel of clarity and finesse, and on the interpretive side Mr. Koussevitzky read the music with realization of its poetical and sensuous quality.

Apparently few conductors grasp this element in d'Indy's score. We have never heard, in any city, the introduction laden with so much mystery and languor. D'Indy had the reputation of a "cerebral" composer. In these Variations are pages of extreme sensuousness and a passion that can be white-hot. It seems perhaps invidious, in view of the rare beauty of the reading last night and of the tribute Mr. Koussevitzky paid the composer so earnestly and so well, to make any conditional remarks about his performance. Nevertheless, there is one. We believe that these unique Variations could have been given a bolder line and sweep and ampler climax.

Nevertheless, the performance was one to remember. Throughout the evening the glorious orchestra responded with the utmost bravura and sensitiveness to every wish of the leader, and Mr. Koussevitzky was on particularly favorable ground. He played not only d'Indy and Gershwin for the middle of his program, but Prokofieff of the "Classic Symphony" for a beginning and Scriabine of the "Poëme de l'Extase" for an end.

It was a consummately brilliant performance. The repetition, after some seasons of New York concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra of Prokofieff's symphony was welcome and illuminating. The title "classic" can be variously construed and a comparison of the symphony with the style of Mozart is inaccurate and to the symphony's disadvantage. Prokofieff has gone back to Mozart to the vein of early Italian composers. The brevity of the movements the ingenious but continent orchestration, the simple and melodious writing, and the wit that sparkles through the score make a veritable jeux d'esprit, achieved in the happiest manner.

We have not liked this symphony so well at previous hearings. Last night it appeared, not as an officious and unblushing imitation of music of an earlier period but as the work of a composer who deeply appreciated the spirit as well as the letter of older music, which inspired him to fresh utterance of his own, in the same vein.

A refreshing program and a brilliant concert, which caused the audience to admire anew the conductor and the band, and to applaud all participants with an enthusiasm deserved by their achievements.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

N. Y. Herald-Tribune

FEB 6 - 1932

MUSIC

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

Mr. George Gershwin Plays His New Rhapsody With the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Third evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; soloist, George ~~Gershwin~~, pianist at Carnegie Hall.

PROGRAM

1. Prokofieff..."Classical" Symphony, Op. 25
2. d'Indy....Symphonic Variations, "Istar," Op. 42.
3. Gershwin....Rhapsody No. 2, for Orchestra with piano.
   George Gershwin, Pianist
   (First time in New York)

Intermission

4. Scriabin......"Poem of Ecstasy," Op. 54

George Gershwin

Photo by Nicholas Haz

Who appeared as soloist at last night's Boston Symphony concert

THE generous Mr. Koussevitzky, who possesses the "bountiful eye" of Scripture, offered his public a rare treat at last night's concert of his model orchestra in Carnegie Hall. It is seldom that a Boston Symphony audience is privileged to hear as soloist so eminent a personage as Mr. George Gershwin; yet Mr. Gershwin not only played the piano at last evening's exercises, but he co-operated with Mr. Koussevitzky in exhibiting, for the first time west of Boston, his newly completed Second Rhapsody "for orchestra with piano" (as the program carefully described the work).

It need hardly be said that the momentousness of the double event was recognized. Only Mr. Paderewski, perhaps, could have drawn a gathering comparable in numbers if not in kind with that which stood patiently at the rear of the hall last evening while Mr. Koussevitzky cruelly delayed the appearance of George I by playing a couple of superfluous introductory numbers by Prokofieff and Vincent d'Indy.

* * *

It is almost eight years since Mr. Gershwin, at Paul Whiteman's epochal concert of February 12, 1924, lifted the ancient and sagging face of music through the renovating aid of his "Rhapsody in Blue." Euterpe, thereby restored and gladdened, accepted with appreciation Mr. Gershwin's subsequent offerings to his enlivened Muse—the Piano Concerto and "An American in Paris." But a Second Rhapsody, nevertheless, was inevitable; and now at last we have it.

* * *

Dr. Isaac Goldberg, Mr. Gershwin's accomplished Boswell, has set forth the genesis of the new composition. The work originated, Dr. Goldberg tells us, "in the aphrodisiac atmosphere of Beverly Hills, Calif., redolent of oranges and Greta Garbo." It appears that Mr. Gershwin, finding himself in Hollywood a year or so ago, busy with a contribution to the movie "Delicious," evolved his Rhapsody from what Dr. Goldberg describes as "an orchestral sequence inserted into the picture. The picture, in part, is laid in many thoroughfares of New York," and Mr. Gershwin's music "represented the emotions of the heroine as she wandered through Gotham in quest of the hero."

To accentuate the rhythms of pursuit, explains our excellent and indispensable authority, Mr. Gershwin hit upon a so-called "rivet theme"—a theme consisting mostly of repeated notes, decisively accented. "If Beethoven," as Dr. Goldberg aptly observes, "may be inspired by metronomes, and Chopin by raindrops, why not Gershwin by the eternal tattoo of the New York riveters in their Babel-ascent to the skies?" Why not, indeed?

The motion picture required only a few moments of tonal riveting. But Mr. Gershwin, mindful of the expectations of Euterpe and the eagerly waiting ears of the symphonic public, responded to an inspiration. He had, as he told an interviewer, seven weeks in California. He was bored by the parties and the night life of Hollywood. "Here was my chance to do some serious work." Bacchus and Aphrodite might press the juice from Hollywood's golden fruit as beguilingly as they chose: Mr. Gershwin, absorbed and untemptable, would dedicate those seven weeks to serving the divinest of the Muses.

From the sequence used in the picture, he developed a concert piece for orchestra and piano which was at first entitled "Rhapsody in Rivets," At the last moment, the piece was renamed, with admirable austerity, "Second Rhapsody," so that the light-minded would not seek in it too definite a program.

* * *

The rivets, extracted from the title, remain in the score. The opening tattoo, heard on the piano at the beginning of the piece, is virtually its basic theme. Of course, the music is not all rivets. Mr. Gershwin was mindful of the need for contrast. In a world that knows too well the sound of the pneumatic drill, the lyric impulse still occasionally breaks its bounds. So Mr. Gershwin, quite properly, pays his respects to song. "I wanted merely," he told an interviewer, "to write a broad, flowing melody, the same as Bach, Brahms or Wagner would have done."

Needless to say, he gives us, also, music employing those idioms with which, long since, he caught the ear of the world. Jazzarella, undiminished in gusto and vitality, dances here and languishes, and has her way with us. The happy few, as Stendhal called them, will recognize and value the skill of her evolutions and the subtlety of her guile. Those who must remain outside the gates, lonely in the outer court, will know, from the nature of the distant cheers, that music's most enlivened daughter is, as usual, bringing down the house.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

N. Y. AMERICAN

FEB 6 - 1932

GEORGE GERSHWIN RHAPSODY GIVEN BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

By GRENA BENNETT.

The feature of the program presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night was the first New York performance of George Gershwin's Second Rhapsody. The composer played the piano part.

Mr. Gershwin's signature has graced much music of the theatre and several works that have been considered appropriate to symphonic programs. His most notable composition in the last named class is the Rhapsody in Blue which had its public baptism at a concert by the Whiteman Orchestra, and from that beginning went around the world.

That first Rhapsody of Gershwin's is so imprinted on his musical mind that he cannot refrain from reference to it in later compositions. Which means that it is the parent of Rhapsody No. 2 whose resemblance in ever so many phrases is undeniable.

This second work originally bore the title, "Rhapsody in Rivets." The rivets are there, sure enough. One heard them from the keyboard, the horns and the drums many times. And when the steam or compressed air gave out, one recognized a few phrases from "Swanee River" rivetted into the Rhapsody. They might have flowed in, but however they were wedged in, they were present.

However, even though the new Gershwin composition paid a graceful tribute to its Rhapsodical predecessor, it proved to be an interesting and richly orchestrated work with a thankful part for the pianist. Its performance was earnest and effective.

Serge Koussevitzky conducted with his familiar care, conscientiousness and intelligence. His reading of Prokofieff's Classical Symphony revealed that delightful work in all its delicate harmony, grace and crisp rhythms.

In memory of Vincent D'Indy, the French composer who died recently, Mr. Koussevitzky made a last minute change in the program so as to include D'Indy's Istar Variations. It was played with beauty, feeling and glowing tone color.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM

N. Y. JOURNAL

FEB 6 - 1932

GEORGE GERSHWIN'S 'RIVET RHAPSODY' HAS PREMIERE

By IRVING WEIL.

George Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue" has a successor which, we suppose, might be called a rhapsody in red since it sings the song of the riveter's glowing tattoo. It was, indeed, originally titled "Rhapsody in Rivets" but now simply names itself "Rhapsody No. 2." As such it was introduced to its first New York audience at Carnegie Hall last night by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra. Mr. Gershwin was the pianist in the solo part of his own work.

This "Rivet Rhapsody" (we doubt if Mr. Gershwin will ever hear it called anything else) is in many ways more musically ambitious and coherent than the "Blue" one he wrote some eight or nine years ago, and its piano part fits into it more closely and is therefore less spectacular. Perhaps for that reason the new rhapsody made something less of a stirring effect than the old one, although last night's audience applauded it heartily enough, as it did Mr. Gershwin himself.

NOT REALISM.

The rhapsody is not primarily an attempt at musical realism. Mr. Gershwin nowhere tries to have his orchestra, with or without the help of the piano, reproduce anything like the clattering din of a riveting crew at work. He does not make use of the metallic polytonal harmony invented by Igor Stravinsky (but not for realistic purposes) and adapted, for example, by the young Russian, Alexander Mossoloff for his "Steel Mill" or by Arthur Honegger for his "Pacific-231."

The American composer sticks to the older romantic tradition of implied suggestion. He has devised a "riveting" theme in rapid staccato but holding a syncopated accentuation and it is as well suited to the piano as it is to the orchestra. It is rather mild compared to one's horrific sense of what the real thing is like, but, granting the composer his premise, it does its work well as musical suggestion.

Nor is the staccato song of the riveter by any means the whole of the piece. In fact, it once also had the alternative title of "Manhattan Rhapsody" and it seeks to give an impression of the feeling and spirit of city life—of New York City life. There is plenty of characteristic jazz rhythm through it and finally it spreads out into a broadly flowing sentimental section of the "blues" type, only no saxophones trail it through the orchestra.

GERSHWIN AS PIANIST.

Mr. Gershwin's instrumentation fulfills his purposes fairly well but not exactly brilliantly. The piano, when it joins the orchestra, is sometimes ineffective and occasionally quite unheard. When it plays alone, however, it has something to say that bears directly upon the development of the composer's idea. Mr. Gershwin, as a pianist, did some remarkably expert playing. The work was spiritedly presented by Mr. Koussevitzky and his men.

The rest of the evening was taken up with Serge Prokofieff's somewhat too bright imitation Mozart, called the "Classic" symphony; d'Indy's dehydrated "Istar" variations and the Scriabin "Poem of Ecstasy" in which Mr. Koussevitzky worked his orchestra up to a high temperature climax.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. World-Telegram

FEB 6 - 1932

Gershwin Hailed for New Music

Boston Musicians Play His Rhapsody Here.

A great audience in Carnegie Hall last night applauded heartily a new rhapsody by George Gershwin, admirably performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky, with the composer as collaborating pianist.

This composition, which was finished last spring and given a trial hearing in a studio of the National Broadcasting Co. June 26, was originally entitled "Rhapsody in Rivets," the "eternal tattoo" of the skyscraper riveters furnishing its rhythmic motive. The composer then decided to avoid so strong a suggestion of a program by calling the work merely "Second Rhapsody."

Sentiment Under Tattoo.

However, the rhythm of the riveters is there, more musical, less nerve-rasping, than in the steel original. Indeed, the tattoo sounds pleasant enough in the conventional way. Along with it one hears an obbligato of more or less sentimental tune, which eventually resembles a sort of denatured "Suwanee River."

It is eight years this month since Mr. Gershwin's now famous "Rhapsody in Blue" was brought out at Paul Whiteman's concert in Aeolian Hall. The new rhapsody, like the old, has its suggestion of Liszt, but it shows a considerable technical advance over that somewhat naive, if charming, composition. As regards initial inspiration, however, the older work is superior.

In Memory of Vincent d'Indy.

The concert opened with a delightful performance of Prokofieff's charming little "Classical" symphony. After it Mr. Koussevitzky led the "Istar" variations in memory of their composer, the late Vincent d'Indy—a decidedly more effective performance than the variations have received here under the guidance of either Mr. Mengelberg or Mr. Toscanini.

The concluding section of the program was devoted to that specialty of the Russian batonist, Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy."

P. S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKYLN, N. Y.
EAGLE

FEB 6 - 1932

Music of the Day

By EDWARD CUSHING

George Gershwin's Second Rhapsody Has Its Premiere at a Boston Symphony Concert in Carnegie Hall

IN TURNING thumbs down on George Gershwin's second rhapsody (performed for the first time in New York, the composer assisting, at last night's Boston Symphony Concert) your correspondent has the uncomfortable feeling that he is betraying an old friend, frankly, though the second rhapsody will not do—nor, we are afraid, will anything else that Mr. Gershwin may produce under the influence of a desire, but lacking the necessary ideas and implements, to write a "serious composition" (something, apparently, scored for full orchestra and lasting more than five minutes).

The reason is fairly simple: Mr. Gershwin's undeniable talent finds its natural expression in the idiom and the unpretentious forms of so-called popular music. Our failure to realize this years ago was due to the fact that our ambitions for Mr. Gershwin, like Mr. Gershwin's for himself, blinded us to the obvious. What, after all, was salient in the Rhapsody in Blue? Precisely that which was salient in Mr. Gershwin's previous musical comedies; a gift for melodic epigram, a mastery of the metrics of jazz. If we had stopped to think about it, we should have realized that Mr. Gershwin was to the 1920's and New York what Johann Strauss was to the 1870's and Vienna, no more and no less. Why, the fact that he could write better jazz tunes than any of his contemporaries should have led us on to the belief (probably, at that, only a hope) that he could write better symphonies we cannot say. But for a time the belief—or hope—ran high, and Mr. Gershwin himself evidently came to share it.

The Concerto in F was the immediate result of Mr. Gershwin's new ambition. But as time went on, this ambition died down; it ceased to be novel and stimulating, and Mr. Gershwin devoted himself to less and less frequently and less and less effectually to its realization. The second rhapsody is, purely and simply, manufactured music. Mr. Gershwin composed it, as he wrote to a friend, "mainly because I wanted to write a serious composition." He went to Hollywood to work on the picture, "Delicious," and since "nearly everybody comes back from California with a western tan and a pocketful of moving picture money," Mr. Gershwin decided to come back with these and a serious composition besides. It was not a good idea.

Mr. Gershwin's music for revues and musical comedies and moving pictures continues to be distinguished above the average. Why should his "serious" compositions have deteriorated? Mainly, we think, because the expression of his natural talent is prevented by self-consciousness, and self-consciousness is implicit in his attitude toward "serious" compositions. Our advice to Mr. Gershwin is to abandon the attitude which is all that remains of what was once an ambition. Since he can turn out first-rate musical comedies, let him continue to do so. If, occasionally, an idea occurs to him as suitable for development in a symphonic piece, let him compose one—but without any mistaken notion that what he writes for Carnegie Hall must necessarily be any more serious than what he writes for Broadway and Hollywood. One of these days, under such circumstances, he might turn out a worthy successor to the Rhapsody in Blue and the Concerto in F.

The reader should have gathered that the second rhapsody is not a masterpiece. It is distinguished neither in its substance nor its style. It was heard last evening with little enthusiasm. The solo piano part was played by Mr. Gershwin, and Mr. Koussewitsky conducted. And that, you might say, was that. The balance of the evening's program was made up of Porkofiew's classical symphony, D'Indy's "Istar" variations and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST

FEB 6 - 1932

Other Music

By OSCAR THOMPSON

GEORGE GERSHWIN reappeared in the role of a composer of symphonic music at last night's concert of the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall when Serge Koussevitzky conducted the first public performance in New York of a Rhapsody No. 2, originally styled "Rhapsody in Rivets." "I wrote it," says the composer in a letter quoted in the program notes, "mainly because I wanted to write a serious composition and found the opportunity in California to do it."

The opportunity to be "serious" grew out of a movie commission in Hollywood a year ago. A short "sequence" for the film "Delicious" was expanded into the work played last night, and thus was born a successor and companion piece for the "Rhapsody in Blue," the jazz Piano Concerto and "An American in Paris." Mr. Gershwin, having given the piano duties comparable to those of various modern concertos, collaborated with the orchestra as keyboard soloist, and was recalled to the platform many times by an audience prodigal of applause.

This was a Gershwin evening, though it could not be said the competition was keen. Of Mr. Koussevitzky's other numbers D'Indy's "Istar" Variations and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy" were quite as "serious" as the new Rhapsody, but the time has passed when either is likely to create any considerable stir. There was also the little "Classical" Symphony of Prokofieff, which contrives to be entertaining in spite of its label and its imitation Mozart.

The Gershwin work justified its discarded title. The sonorities were often those of a boiler factory. Frequently recollective of his other works, it showed over them an advance in confidence, particularly with respect to the scoring, which was anything but timid or tentative. Its tunes sounded worked over and much of the time the music seemed to be preparing to go somewhere it never went. No doubt those who liked it best were those who still believe the way to salvation for American music lies through the idiom of jazz, and those who liked it least were the ones long since convinced that, aside from the dance hall and the dance show, jazz simply doesn't belong. The work was lustily played.

THIS CLIPPING FROM Brooklyn Standard Union

6 - 1932

MUSIC

By JOSEPH A. MILLER

GERSHWIN WITH THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY is nothing if not versatile. A devotee of the best there is in the musical classics, he is always hospitable to the new things in music, be they French, Russian, German or American. Last night at Carnegie Hall his Boston Symphony Orchestra was host to Mr. George Gershwin, who played the piano part of his own Rhapsody Number 2 for orchestra and piano.

This is the piece that created a furore when Dr. Koussevitzky played it in Symphony Hall a week or so ago, and about which the Boston critics were divided. Some of them said it was the beginning of a new era in music, or ecstatic words to that general effect, while at least one critic wrote that the Gershwin composition was as out of place in Symphony Hall as a one-piece bathing suit.

Without giving too much of our limited space to the occasion we have this to report: that there was a vast audience vastly interested, that Gershwin is a swell player, and that we cannot see Mr. Gershwin and never could, and cannot now. Even the much-talked of and vastly overrated (in our humble opinion) "Rhapsody in Blue" is no challenge to the world of music, and this new rhapsody sounds to us like a deliberately fabricated hodge-podge, like a man whose metier is jazz trying to go straight—and not succeeding. However, it is fair to explain that this is a minority report—a very small minority.

In addition to Gershwin Mr. Koussevitzky presented the Prokofieff "Classical Symphony," heard in Brooklyn the previous evening, Vincent d'Indy's Symphonic Variations "Istar," which is very beautiful, and the magnificent "Poem of Ecstasy" by Scriabin. It was a notable concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. AMERICAN

FEB 7 - 1932

* * *

George Gershwin was the soloist for the second time with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, repeating his Rhapsody No. 2 at yesterday afternoon's concert in Carnegie Hall. Serge Koussevitzky conducted a collection of interesting pieces. The program began with Corelli's suite in three charming movements, performed with the grace and skill that eloquently disclosed its melodious message.

OTHER FEATURES.

It was followed by Tscherepine's eight miniatures, "After a Russian Illustrated Alphabet," bearing such picturesque titles as "Arab-boy," "Egypt," "Babajaga," Stars," "Mama," "General," "The Forest" and "The Tsarina."

Tschaikovsky's "Pathetic" symphony brought the concert and the Bostonians' third visit to an end.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald-Tribune

FEB 7 - 1932

8 Miniatures By Tcherepnin Given at Concert

First Performance of Work Here Offered by Boston Symphony Orchestra

Gershwin Again Heard

Pathetic Symphony Has Its Initial Hearing of Season

By Francis D. Perkins

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third afternoon concert of the season in Carnegie Hall yesterday, when Serge Koussevitzky began his program with the suite for strings arranged by Ettore Pinelli from the violin sonatas of Arcangelo Corelli's Opus 5. Nikolai Tcherepnin's Eight Miniatures (After a Russian Illustrated Alphabet) were played for the first time here, and George Gershwin reappeared as the assisting pianist in his second rhapsody, which Dr. Koussevitzky had introduced to New York last Friday evening. The post-intermission period was devoted to Tchaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony.

The Corelli-Pinelli suite, which this orchestra had played for its evening Carnegie Hall subscribers last month, was a delightful overture for yesterday's matinee, and, especially in the ingratiating, subtly shaded performance of the Gigue and the light-paced, weightless execution of the Badinerie, represented both the playing of this noted orchestra and the conductorial talents of its distinguished leader at their best.

First Played Last November

Tcherepnin's Eight Miniatures were played for the first time anywhere in public in a home concert of the Boston Symphony on November 27, 1931, under the direction of the composer, who visited New York in November, 1930, when his edition of Moussorgsky's "Fair at Sorochintzy," was produced at the Metropolitan. As a novelty, the work proved an agreeable divertissement, while not an important contribution to the orchestral repertoire; conservative, usually light, with a touch or two of humor, and tunes that sometimes gave hints of Russian folksong. The work was, perhaps, a little long for sustained interest, the responsibility for this impression lying in the second Miniature, "Egypt"; the last selection, "The Tsarina," recalled the close of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition." The orchestra and Mr. Gershwin then rhapsodized, and there was much applause for the composer-soloist.

Time was when we would have had several opportunities to hear the Pathetic Symphony before a music season had run its course as far as February, but this was its first performance here of the season of 1931-'32, and the first in the regular fall and winter series of one of the long-established orchestras since Bernardino Molinari and the Philharmonic gave it in January, 1930. It is, no doubt, just as well for the work itself and the concert-going public that the Pathetic Symphony has received a comparative respite from its overworked vogue of not so long ago, but it remains a symphony well able to hold its own with the passage of time.

Changes in Tempo Marked

In its main outlines, Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of Tchaikovsky's swan song did not differ radically from other readings known here; the first movement exceeded by a minute the time required for it by Willem Mengelberg; Dr. Koussevitzky's march was swifter than Mr. Mengelberg's by the same extent. There were, however, certain individual features in yesterday's highly effective performance; a holding back of the pace in the first measures of the allegro in the first movement, as if for contrast with the swift onset and impassioned outburst of the next few pages, an impression of languor in the passage marked "moderato mosso" during the andante section of the same movement; an unusually swift pace for the march, and certain other enhanced dynamic contrasts and momentary changes of tempo. The audience again bestowed vigorous plaudits on Dr. Koussevitzky and his able musicians.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

FEB 7 - 1932

The Ambassador of France and Mme. Claudel entertained at luncheon Tuesday about 30 French musicians who are members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gave a concert that afternoon.

---

ffort to justify the jazz monopoly of the r. But it was the eminent critic, Ernest Newman, we believe, who observed long since that when music becomes as good as Mr. Gershwin's best, it no longer deserves to be soiled with that barbaric label.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAPH

FEB 7 - 1932

Akin to First Composition

Work Is Sympathetically Read by Koussevitzky With Composer at Piano

by Walter D. Shackleton

Of prime importance on Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday evening at Carnegie Hall—at least, of prime importance to Broadway and environs which is believed by the inhabitants and wayfarers thereon to be New York—was George Gershwin's so-called second rhapsody.

So-called in that it was first a rhapsody in rivets as part of an interpretive theme for the movie, "Delicious." That was a little more than a year ago. After it appeared in the movie, Gershwin expanded it for orchestra.

For What Reason?

Just why it was presented to Dr. Koussevitzky to present is rather vague. The conductor himself merely says that it was turned over to him and he saw merit in it and, therefore, decided to add it to one of his programs. Anyhow, Boston heard it before New York. It may have been the old play theory of "putting it on the road for a tryout," although the Philharmonic got his "an American in Paris."

That it could not have been in better hands was obvious from the moment Dr. Koussevitzky raised his baton as Gershwin sat down at the piano. Incidentally, Mr. Gershwin for his New York presentation was in faultless dress, even to a gardenia in his buttonhole. Boston reported, possibly with a little eyebrow lifting, that he appeared in a sack suit. No ashes were mentioned.

Akin to "Rhapsody in Blue"

The piece is very much akin to his "Rhapsody in Blue." It is definitely a symphonic piece, despite opinions to the contrary. It has a certain thinness, as far as intricate orchestration and mere pride of technicianship is concerned. But it is highly interpretive of modern trend and music appeal. It is forward and progressive, highly enjoyable and has substance of its time, the present taste.

It may have been originally labeled "A Rhapsody in Rivets," yet the only identification with the rivets was in one particular part where a rat-a-tat-tat of a rivet hammer was heard. Other than that it rightly could be called "A Manhattan Symphony." It was more interpretive of noise and confusion of a great city and emphasized, caricatured the nerve-wracking cacophony of sound of a metropolis.

Orchestra Has Burden

The burden was carried by the orchestra, with Mr. Gershwin's piano part merely a phrasing. His piano phrases were echoed and expanded and his mild "noises" beaten back on him in ascending crescendo and multiple distortion in fine interpretation of the effect such city din has upon the system.

The piece is highly entertaining and possesses much merit, but a greater promise of later work of the man who is rapidly taking his place, in fact, to the stage world, has taken his place with the immortal Victor Herbert. As Victor Herbert interpreted the thought and taste of his generation in the terms of music, so is Gershwin doing it with the present time.

Should Do Opera

It now only remains for him to join Deems Taylor in the ranks of native opera writers. As Taylor has given us the conservative, to a large measure, "King's Henchmen" and "Peter Ibbetson," it is this opinion that Gershwin would give us an American Wozzeck. An American Wozzeck in that it would be radical, in the terms of his "Rhapsody in Blue" and his "Second Rhapsody," or, more properly, his "Rhapsody in Rivets," his Manhattan Symphony. It is to be hoped that he will do so.

Possibly his grand and proud father will help him. He who sits outside his door whenever he is composing and whenever he hears a prolonged silence from the piano as George wrestles with a recalcitrant muse, dashes in and whistles a few bars of anything or nothing and says: "Does that help you, Georgie?"

Doctor Sympathetic

Dr. Koussevitzky was keenly sympathetic in his interpretation of the Gershwin piece, as he is ever. Also the other selections on his program received the same intense yet gentle interpretation. He gave us Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony, opus 25; "D'Indy," symphonic variations; "Istar," opus 42, and Scriabin's delightful and satisfying "Poem of Ecstacy," opus 54.

There is one thing about the doctor: he always leaves his audience very much well satisfied with things, in a peaceful yet lively frame of mind. He knows the human as well as the music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK TIMES

128 FEB 7 - 1932

CONCERTS

Koussevitzky Experiments.

BY OLIN DOWNES.

At the second concert of the week in New York by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, its conductor, Mr. Koussevitzky, had arranged a program which consisted in the repetition of George Gershwin's "Second Rhapsody," played for the first time Friday evening; a suite by Corelli, Nikolai Tcherepnin's "Eight Miniatures" (after a Russian illustrated alphabet), and, for the final performance, Tchaikovsky's "Symphonie Pathétique."

Again Mr. Gershwin and his new work, discussed in THE TIMES of yesterday, were received with acclaim. The Corelli suite was well calculated to display the sterling qualities of the string choir, and the pieces by Laidoff, which are small and unpretentious, found favor. In conception they are not unremindful of Moussorgsky's "Pictures from an Exposition," but they have the folk-lore character, and in this are typical of the pupil of Rimsky-Korsakoff and the Russian school of which he was a leader.

It was good to hear again the great symphony of Tchaikovsky. The performance, it is needless to say, was technically of the finest, and there were pretty details of interpretation. But why is Mr. Koussevitzky so circumspect in his interpretation of this symphony? No doubt, with a conductor of such a dramatic temperament and restless mind, there is the temptation to find new readings of familiar works. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted some interesting interpretive experiments. Largely he held the music in leash, depriving it of its barbaric vigor, emotionalism and directness of address. Some would say that in doing this he distinguished Tchaikovsky beyond his merits, for there is certainly a wilder and coarser element in the "Symphonie Pathetique" than it was given yesterday.

But it is not easy to find justification for arbitrary changes of tempo distinctly at variance with the score as written. Nor were uncommon balances of the parts, and details sometimes minimized and sometimes enlarged, necessary to express Tchaikovsky. The fact that this symphony is so human, so moving and effective in performance is not a good argument for sophisticating it, especially if such treatment takes from the music some of its abandon and its hysterical power.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

N. Y. Herald-Tribune

FEB 7 1932

The citizens' committee for the Boston Symphony Orchestra which gave a concert on Thursday evening at the Academy of Music included: Mr. Adrian van Sinderen, chairman; Mr. Frank L. Babbott, Mrs. Edward C. Blum, Mr. Frederick E. Crane, Mr. Walter H. Crittenden, Mrs. H. E. Dreiser, Mrs. William H. Good, Mr. H. F. Gunnison, Mr. Henry A. Ingraham, Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mrs. B. Herbert Smith, Mr. R. Huntington Woodman, Dr. Joseph Dana Allen, Mr. Juan A. Almirall, Dr. Frank L. Babbott jr., Dr. Nathan T. Beers, Dr. W. B. Brinsmade, Mrs. Charles R. Buckley, Mrs. Glentworth Butler, the Rev. Dr. S. Parkes Cadman, Mr. William M. Calder, Mrs. Otis Swan Carroll, Mr. J. Norman Carpenter, Mrs. I. Sherwood Coffin, Mrs. Frederick L. Cranford, Judge James C. Cropsey, Mr. Norman S. Dike, the Rev. Samuel L. Dorrance, Mrs. Guy DuVal, Mr. S. Raymond Estey, Mrs. Lewis W. Francis, Mr. Theodore L. Frothingham, Mr. William Peter Hamilton, Mr. Walter Hammitt, Mr. George Hewlett, Miss Amelia Hollenback, Dr. Alexandria C. Howe, Mr. William T. Hunter, Mr. Darwin R. James, Dr. William A. Jewitt.

Also Mr. James H. Jourdan, Mr. Charles D. Lay, Mrs. Robert B. Lea, Mrs. John Eadie Leech, Miss Hilda Loines, Mrs. Charles J. McDermott, Mr. George V. McLaughlin, Mrs. William W. Marshall, Mr. W. S. Morton Mead; Mr. Frank C. Munson, Mr. Charles F. Murphy, Mrs. George Notman, Mr. Neilson Olcott, Mrs. Frank H. Parsons, Mr. James H. Post, Mr. Charles E. Potts, Mrs. George H. Prentiss, Mrs. Benjamin Prince, Mrs. Clinton L. Rossiter jr., Mr. H. Stavely Sammond, Mrs. Henry Spelman, Mr. Porter Steele, Mrs. Herman Stutzer, Miss Marion J. Terry, Mr. William Armour Thayer, Mr. Carl H. Tollefsen, Mrs. Walter Truslow, Mrs. James P. Warbasse, Mrs. Edwin Carrington Ward, Mrs. Walter F. Wells, Mrs. J. B. Whitney, Mr. Eugene A. Widmann, Dr. Ralph C. Williams, Surrogate George A. Wingate, Mr. Cornelius D. Wood and Mrs. W. H. Ziegler.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

TIME

FEB 8 1932

Second Rhapsody

Eight years ago Paul Whiteman asked George Gershwin, young Tin Pan-Alleyman, to write some music, not for dancing, but for serious people to listen to at a jazz concert. In a scant three weeks Gershwin turned out the terse, melancholic Rhapsody in Blue. Its success made him ambitious, started him writing for symphony orchestras (Concerto in F, An American in Paris).

Last winter in Hollywood George Gershwin had time on his hands. Fox Films had commissioned him to write the music for Delicious (Charles Farrell, Janet Gaynor) but that was soon done. Hollywood parties bored him. He started elaborating on a theme which he had suggested in the picture, a great city symbolized by relentless riveting. He thought first of calling the enlarged work "Rhapsody in Rivets" but it had become the Second Rhapsody by the time the Boston Symphony gave it its première last week, with Composer George Gershwin himself playing the piano.

Fox Films paid Gershwin well for the music which lasted only a few minutes in Delicious. He got $50,000 two years ago for letting Paul Whiteman use the Rhapsody in Blue in the Cinema King of Jazz.* But Gershwin's symphonic returns would never have permitted him to keep a big penthouse apartment, collect modern French paintings, smoke dollar cigars. The Boston Symphony paid him nothing for the privilege of playing his Second Rhapsody last week but it did its best to bring him glory.

Keystone

GEORGE GERSHWIN

From his symphonies, no dollar cigars.

Conductor Sergei Koussevitzky and his sedate band lavished almost too much care on the hard, staccato beginnings of the rhapsody, the smart, shifting jazz rhythms which followed. People were enthusiastic about the smooth, melodic middle theme which the Koussevitzky strings played superbly but Bostonians never really accept any new music without consulting one of two critical oracles, aged Philip Hale of the Boston Herald or H. T. ("Hell-to-Pay") Parker of the Transcript. Gnomelike Critic Parker thought "this Second Rhapsody seemed tempered and in degree de-natured by reflection and manipulation. It sounded over-often from the study-table and the piano-rack." Said Critic Hale: "The music has decided individuality, which, it is to be hoped, Mr. Gershwin will preserve, and not be frightened into the smug respectability approved by professors of music and easily shocked conservative hearers."

---

*A drop in the bucket compared with his returns upon the musicomedies Lady, Be Good, Oh Kay, Funny Face, Girl Crazy, Rosalie, Strike Up the Band and the current Of Thee I Sing (TIME, Jan. 4).

THIS CLIPPING FROM

N. Y. SUN

FEB 8 - 1932

Gershwin's 'Rhapsody Of Rivets' Played Again

The program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's matinee in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon contained one number which had been played at the previous evening's concert. This was George Gershwin's second rhapsody, the composer again playing the piano part. A second hearing of the composition clarified it to some degree, but made no changes in the general impression. The piano part seemed more prominent when heard again, the orchestration not quite so heavy, and the structural development of the rhapsody firmer and more logical. The vivacity and typical Broadway spirit of the work impressed themselves once more on the hearer. Mr. Gershwin has made another demonstration of the possibilities of jazz music as material for large art forms. The rhapsody was warmly applauded after an excellent performance.

The other numbers in the list were a string suite by Corelli, Tcherepnin's delightful "Eight Miniatures, After an Illustrated Russian Alphabet," and the "Pathetic" symphony of Tschaikowsky. The concert as a whole was an exhibition of the best qualities of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and of its distinguished conductor, Serge Koussevitzky.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

N. Y. EVE. POST

FEB 8 - 1932

IN REPEATING George Gershwin's latest serious composition, Rhapsody No. 2, with the composer as soloist, Serge Koussevitzky and his Bostonians gave their Saturday afternoon audience in Carnegie Hall opportunity to consider whether the riveting process is, after all, something that calls for music. This consideration was perhaps abetted by a performance of the Tchaikovsky "Pathetic" Symphony, with its emotional surges at an opposite pole from anything conceivably connected with the machine age. There were also some engaging "Miniatures," of a Russian nursery-tale character, by the elder Tcherepnin; and a Suite made up of movements extracted by Ettore Pinelli from some early eighteenth century music of the renowned violinist, Arcangelo Corelli. All this music was deftly played, though Mr. Koussevitzky rather curiously sacrificed much of the traditional emotional power of the "Pathetic" for the sake of dalliance with sundry secondary details of the symphony.

The Gershwin work was roundly applauded, the composer being recalled to the platform repeatedly, but it left with the reviewer an increased sense of commonplace material, laboriously worked over, and scoring as inexpert as it was noisy.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

RECORD

FEB 9 - 1932

Talkies and T

The motion picture has developed an unexpected byproduct. A musical composition of real importance came to being because of a sentimental little picture which is already forgotten. And because the gilded city happened to bore a very remarkable young man.

George Gershwin

George Gershwin went out to Hollywood to write music for "Delicious." He completed the score, found himself with time on his hands and nothing interesting to do about it, so he retired to Beverly Hills and finished his contracted seven weeks writing his "Second Rhapsody."

The work was given its first performance the other night in New York, with Gershwin at the piano, while Serge Koussevitzky, led the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. The applause is reported to have "brought the house down," and all Rhapsody in Blue fans were presented with another treasure.

"The Second Rhapsody" is the first musical work of importance to have been conceived in Hollywood, written there and inspired by a scenario. The theme, however, is based on New York and its noisy rivets. Let us hope that Gershwin will write his Third Rhapsody in the same way, but use, instead, Hollywood and its color as thematic material. That should make real American music.

"Delicious," as you must remember, was the Janet Gaynor and Charles Farrell recent starring picture

---

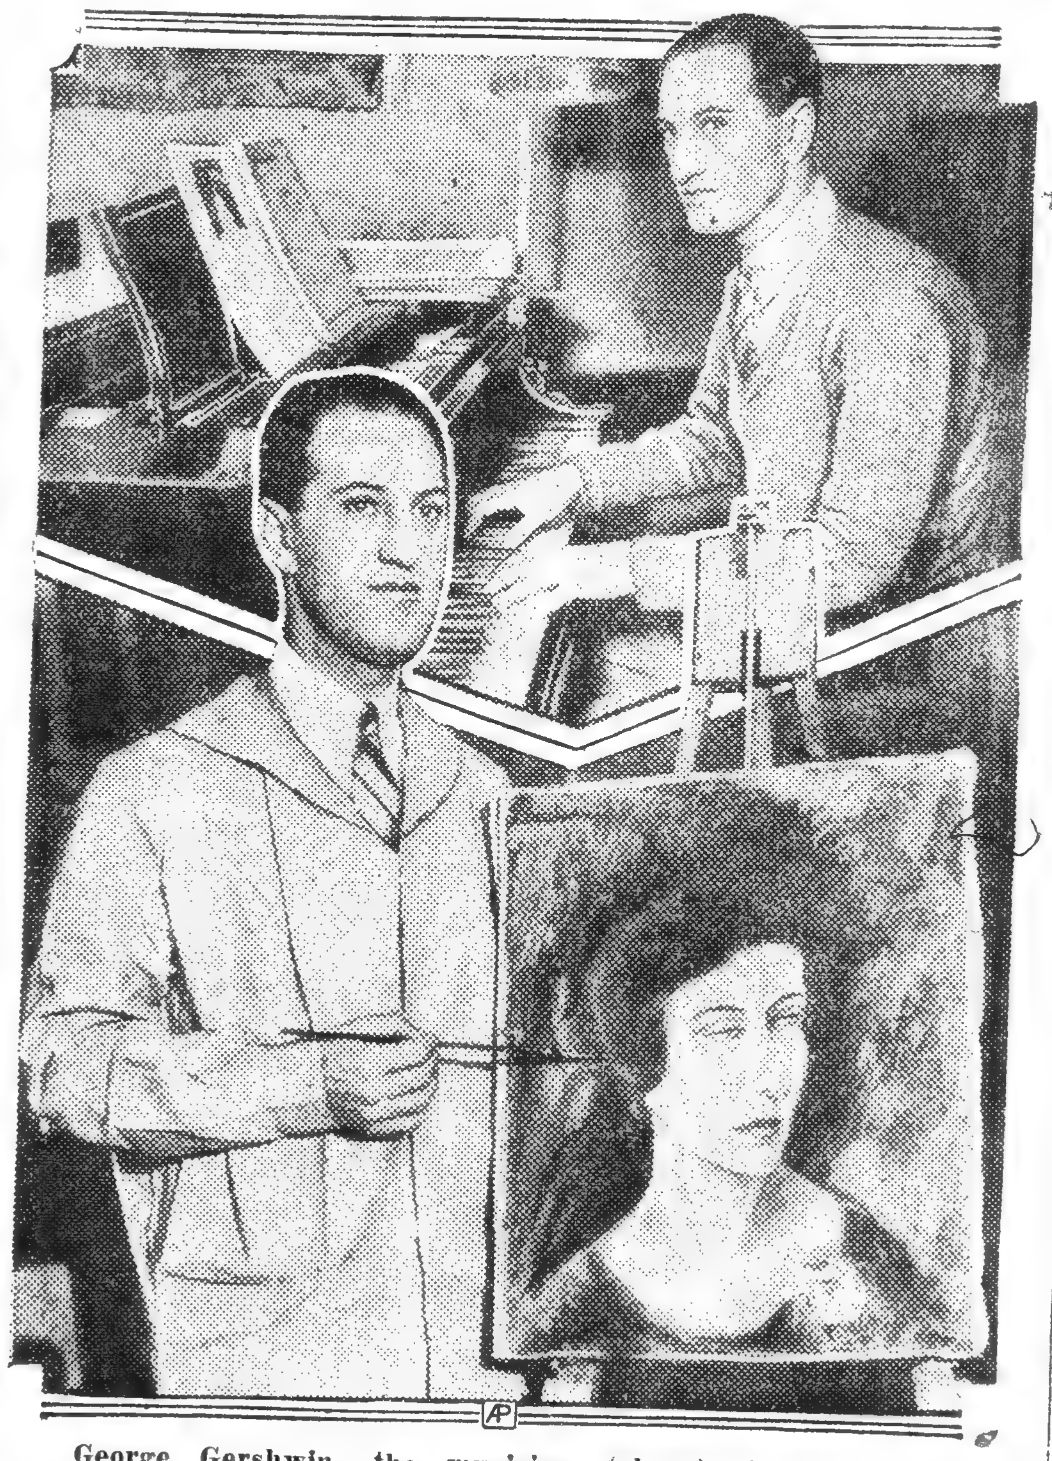
THIS CLIPPING FROM

PAWTUCKET, R. I.

TIMES

FEB 9 - 1932

Turning From Piano to Easel Brings Gershwin Relaxation



AP

George Gershwin, the musician (above), becomes George Gershwin, the painter (below), when the composer of "Rhapsody in Blue" and "Rhapsody No. 2" seeks relaxation. The latter composition has just been heard by eastern audiences. The painting with which Gershwin is shown is his first oil.

NEW YORK (AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody No. 2" has just been presented before Boston and New York audiences by the Boston Symphony orchestra, has turned to painting as a diversion.

His first oil, a portrait, was completed in three days during a period when he was preparing for the premier of his new composition. Previously he had done some work in black and white.

"If I had decided to follow painting instead of music," Gershwin said in his sub-bathed penthouse apartment overlooking Riverside drive and the Hudson river, "I would have attempted to express myself in art just as I have expressed myself in music."

Gershwin, who achieved immense popularity through his "Rhapsody in Blue" and a string of musical comedy successes, including the current "Of Thee I Sing," believes that a man talented in one line of aesthetic endeavor also has talents in the allied arts and that an artist in one medium can find escape in another.

The walls of his modernistic apartment are covered with paintings—also conceived in the modernistic manner. Even one of his three pianos is of modern design.

Gershwin's new rhapsody, which originally was intended as incidental music for a motion picture, but outgrew the first conception, contains a movement suggested by riveting on New York skyscrapers, and once was tentatively titled "Rhapsody in Rivets."

---

part fits into it more closely and is therefore less spectacular. Perhaps for that reason the new rhapsody made something less of a stirring effect than the old one, ting" theme in rapid stac- it holding a syncopated ac- tion and it is as well suited to the piano as it is to the orchestra. It is rather mild compared to one's horrific sense of what the real thing is like, but granting the sionally quite plays alone, ho thing to say that bears directly upon the development of the composer's idea. Mr. Gershwin, as a pianist, did some remarkably expert playing. The work was spir-

gle! Sensa

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK TIMES

FEB 7 -1932

CONCERTS

Koussevitzky Experiments.

BY OLIN DOWNES.

At the second concert of the week in New York by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, its conductor, Mr. Koussevitzky, had arranged a program which consisted in the repetition of George Gershwin's "Second Rhapsody," played for the first time Friday evening; a suite by Corelli, Nikolai Tcherepnin's "Eight Miniatures" (after a Russian illustrated alphabet), and, for the final performance, Tchaikovsky's "Symphonie Pathétique."

Again Mr. Gershwin and his new work, discussed in THE TIMES of yesterday, were received with acclaim. The Corelli suite was well calculated to display the sterling qualities of the string choir, and the pieces by Laidoff, which are small and unpretentious, found favor. In conception they are not unremindful of Moussorgsky's "Pictures from an Exposition," but they have the folk-lore character, and in this are typical of the pupil of Rimsky-Korsakoff and the Russian school of which he was a leader.

It was good to hear again the great symphony of Tchaikovsky. The performance, it is needless to say, was technically of the finest, and there were pretty details of interpretation. But why is Mr. Koussevitzky so circumspect in his interpretation of this symphony? No doubt, with a conductor of such a dramatic temperament and restless mind, there is the temptation to find new readings of familiar works. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted some interesting interpretive experiments. Largely he held the music in leash, depriving it of its barbaric vigor, emotionalism and directness of address. Some would say that in doing this he distinguished Tchaikovsky beyond his merits, for there is certainly a wilder and coarser element in the "Symphonie Pathetique" than it was given yesterday.

But it is not easy to find justification for arbitrary changes of tempo distinctly at variance with the score as written. Nor were uncommon balances of the parts, and details sometimes minimized and sometimes enlarged, necessary to express Tchaikovsky. The fact that this symphony is so human, so moving and effective in performance is not a good argument for sophisticating it, especially if such treatment takes from the music some of its abandon and its hysterical power.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

N. Y. Herald-Tribune

FEB 7 -1932

The citizens' committee for the Boston Symphony Orchestra which gave a concert on Thursday evening at the Academy of Music included: Mr. Adrian van Sinderen, chairman; Mr. Frank L. Babbott, Mrs. Edward C. Blum, Mr. Frederick E. Crane, Mr. Walter H. Crittenden, Mrs. H. E. Dreiser, Mrs. William H. Good, Mr. H. F. Gunnison, Mr. Henry A. Ingraham, Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mrs. B. Herbert Smith, Mr. R. Huntington Woodman, Dr. Joseph Dana Allen, Mr. Juan A. Almirall, Dr. Frank L. Babbott jr., Dr. Nathan T. Beers, Dr. W. B. Brinsmade, Mrs. Charles R. Buckley, Mrs. Glentworth Butler, the Rev. Dr. S. Parkes Cadman, Mr. William M. Calder, Mrs. Otis Swan Carroll, Mr. J. Norman Carpenter, Mrs. I. Sherwood Coffin, Mrs. Frederick L. Cranford, Judge James C. Cropsey, Mr. Norman S. Dike, the Rev. Samuel L. Dorrance, Mrs. Guy DuVal, Mr. S. Raymond Estey, Mrs. Lewis W. Francis, Mr. Theodore L. Frothingham, Mr. William Peter Hamilton, Mr. Walter Hammitt, Mr. George Hewlett, Miss Amelia Hollenback, Dr. Alexandria C. Howe, Mr. William T. Hunter, Mr. Darwin R. James, Dr. William A. Jewitt.

Also Mr. James H. Jourdan, Mr. Charles D. Lay, Mrs. Robert B. Lea, Mrs. John Eadie Leech, Miss Hilda Loines, Mrs. Charles J. McDermott, Mr. George V. McLaughlin, Mrs. William W. Marshall, Mr. W. S. Morton Mead; Mr. Frank C. Munson, Mr. Charles F. Murphy, Mrs. George Notman, Mr. Neilson Olcott, Mrs. Frank H. Parsons, Mr. James H. Post, Mr. Charles E. Potts, Mrs. George H. Prentiss, Mrs. Benjamin Prince, Mrs. Clinton L. Rossiter jr., Mr. H. Stavely Sammond, Mrs. Henry Spelman, Mr. Porter Steele, Mrs. Herman Stutzer, Miss Marion J. Terry, Mr. William Armour Thayer, Mr. Carl H. Tollefsen, Mrs. Walter Truslow, Mrs. James P. Warbasse, Mrs. Edwin Carrington Ward, Mrs. Walter F. Wells, Mrs. J. B. Whitney, Mr. Eugene A. Widmann, Dr. Ralph C. Williams, Surrogate George A. Wingate, Mr. Cornelius D. Wood and Mrs. W. H. Ziegler.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

TIME

FEB 8 1932

Second Rhapsody

Eight years ago Paul Whiteman asked George Gershwin, young Tin Pan-Alleyman, to write some music, not for dancing, but for serious people to listen to at a jazz concert. In a scant three weeks Gershwin turned out the terse, melancholic Rhapsody in Blue. Its success made him ambitious, started him writing for symphony orchestras (Concerto in F, An American in Paris).

Last winter in Hollywood George Gershwin had time on his hands. Fox Films had commissioned him to write the music for Delicious (Charles Farrell, Janet Gaynor) but that was soon done. Hollywood parties bored him. He started elaborating on a theme which he had suggested in the picture, a great city symbolized by relentless riveting. He thought first of calling the enlarged work "Rhapsody in Rivets" but it had become the Second Rhapsody by the time the Boston Symphony gave it its première last week, with Composer George Gershwin himself playing the piano.

Fox Films paid Gershwin well for the music which lasted only a few minutes in Delicious. He got $50,000 two years ago for letting Paul Whiteman use the Rhapsody in Blue in the Cinema King of Jazz.* But Gershwin's symphonic returns would never have permitted him to keep a big penthouse apartment, collect modern French paintings, smoke dollar cigars. The Boston Symphony paid him nothing for the ~~privilege of~~ playing his Second Rhapsody last week but it did its best to bring him glory.

Keystone

GEORGE GERSHWIN

From his symphonies, no dollar cigars.

Conductor Sergei Koussevitzky and his sedate band lavished almost too much care on the hard, staccato beginnings of the rhapsody, the smart, shifting jazz rhythms which followed. People were enthusiastic about the smooth, melodic middle theme which the Koussevitzky strings played superbly but Bostonians never really accept any new music without consulting one of two critical oracles, aged Philip Hale of the Boston Herald or H. T. ("Hell-to-Pay") Parker of the Transcript. Gnomelike Critic Parker thought "this Second Rhapsody seemed tempered and in degree de-natured by reflection and manipulation. It sounded over-often from the study-table and the piano-rack." Said Critic Hale: "The music has decided individuality, which, it is to be hoped, Mr. Gershwin will preserve, and not be frightened into the smug respectability approved by professors of music and easily shocked conservative hearers."

---

*A drop in the bucket compared with his returns upon the musicomedies Lady, Be Good, Oh Kay, Funny Face, Girl Crazy, Rosalie, Strike Up the Band and the current Of Thee I Sing (TIME, Jan. 4).

THIS CLIPPING FROM

N. Y. SUN

FEB 8 -1932

Gershwin's 'Rhapsody Of Rivets' Played Again

The program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's matinee in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon contained one number which had been played at the previous evening's concert. This was George Gershwin's second rhapsody, the composer again playing the piano part. A second hearing of the composition clarified it to some degree, but made no changes in the general impression. The piano part seemed more prominent when heard again, the orchestration not quite so heavy, and the structural development of the rhapsody firmer and more logical. The vivacity and typical Broadway spirit of the work impressed themselves once more on the hearer. Mr. Gershwin has made another demonstration of the possibilities of jazz music as material for large art forms. The rhapsody was warmly applauded after an excellent performance.

The other numbers in the list were a string suite by Corelli, Tcherepnin's delightful "Eight Miniatures, After an Illustrated Russian Alphabet," and the "Pathetic" symphony of Tschaikowsky. The concert as a whole was an exhibition of the best qualities of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and of its distinguished conductor, Serge ~~Koussevitzky~~.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

N. Y. EVE. POST

FEB 8 -1932

IN REPEATING George Gershwin's latest serious composition, Rhapsody No. 2, with the composer as soloist, Serge ~~Koussevitzky and his~~ Bostonians gave their Saturday afternoon audience in Carnegie Hall opportunity to consider whether the riveting process is, after all, something that calls for music. This consideration was perhaps abetted by a performance of the Tchaikovsky "Pathetic" Symphony, with its emotional surges at an opposite pole from anything conceivably connected with the machine age. There were also some engaging "Miniatures," of a Russian nursery-tale character, by the elder Tcherepnin; and a Suite made up of movements extracted by Ettore Pinelli from some early eighteenth century music of the renowned violinist, Arcangelo Corelli. All this music was deftly played, though Mr. Koussevitzky rather curiously sacrificed much of the traditional emotional power of the "Pathetic" for the sake of dalliance with sundry secondary details of the symphony.

The Gershwin work was roundly applauded, the composer being recalled to the platform repeatedly, but it left with the reviewer an increased sense of commonplace material, laboriously worked over, and scoring as inexpert as it was noisy.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

RECORD

FEB 9 -1932

Talkies and T

The motion picture has developed an unexpected byproduct. A musical composition of real importance came to being because of a sentimental little picture which is already forgotten. And because the gilded city happened to bore a very remarkable young man.

George Gershwin

George Gershwin went out to Hollywood to write music for "Delicious." He completed the score, found himself with time on his hands and nothing interesting to do about it, so he retired to Beverly Hills and finished his contracted seven weeks writing his "Second Rhapsody."

The work was given its first performance the other night in New York, with Gershwin at the piano, while Serge Koussevitzky led the Boston ~~Symphony Orchestra~~ in Carnegie Hall. The applause is reported to have "brought the house down," and all Rhapsody in Blue fans were presented with another treasure.

"The Second Rhapsody" is the first musical work of importance to have been conceived in Hollywood, written there and inspired by a scenario. The theme, however, is based on New York and its noisy rivets. Let us hope that Gershwin will write his Third Rhapsody in the same way, but use, instead, Hollywood and its color as thematic material. That should make real American music.

"Delicious," as you must remember, was the Janet Gaynor and Charles Farrell recent starring picture

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PAWTUCKET, R. I.

TIMES

FEB 9 -1932

Turning From Piano to Easel Brings Gershwin Relaxation

George Gershwin, the musician (above), becomes George Gershwin, the painter (below), when the composer of "Rhapsody in Blue" and "Rhapsody No. 2" seeks relaxation. The latter composition has just been heard by eastern audiences. The painting with which Gershwin is shown is his first oil.

NEW YORK (AP)—George Gershwin, whose "Rhapsody No. 2" has just been presented before Boston and New York audiences by the Boston Symphony orchestra, has turne[illegible]ing as a diversion.

His first oil, a portrait, was completed in three days during a period when he was preparing for the premier of his new composition. Previously he had done some work in black and white.

"If I had decided to follow painting instead of music," Gershwin said in his sun-bathed penthouse apartment overlooking Riverside drive and the Hudson river, "I would have attempted to express myself in art just as I have expressed myself in music."

Gershwin, who achieved immense popularity through his "Rhapsody in Blue" and a string of musical comedy successes, including the current "Of Thee I Sing," believes that a man talented in one line of aesthetic endeavor also has talents in the allied arts and that an artist in one medium can find escape in another.

The walls of his modernistic apartment are covered with paintings—also conceived in the modernistic manner. Even one of his three pianos is of modern design.

Gershwin's new rhapsody, which originally was intended as incidental music for a motion picture, but outgrew the first conception, contains a movement suggested by riveting on New York skyscrapers, and once was tentatively titled "Rhapsody in Rivets."

[illegible] therefore less spectacular. Perhaps for that reason the new rhapsody made something less of [illegible] effect than the old one,

[illegible] theme in rapid staccato holding a syncopated action and it is as well suited to the piano as it is to the orchestra. It is rather mild compared to one's horrific sense of what the real thing is like, but granting the pur

brill joins ine sionally quite plays alone, ho thing to say that bears directly upon the development of the composer's idea. Mr. Gershwin, as a pianist, did some remarkably expert playing. The work was spir

gle! Sensa

THIS CLIPPING FROM PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS

FEB 1 0 1932

The Show Shops

By JOHN M'NULTY

'Rhapsody In Rivets' Is Newest Gershwin Work; Miss Janis Tells of Trouble She Has Had with Frenchmen; Old-Timers Score At Last In Pictures.

GEORGE GERSHWIN is the man. no doubt, who first designed a respectable if modish musical frock to cover the unashamed chemise of the previously unaccepted Lady Jazz. He did that little thing when he wrote "Rhapsody in Blue" back in 1924.

Now he's introduced the lecherous lady into the hallowed precincts of "Bawston," by writing "Rhapsody No. 2," which was this week played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Koussevitsky, in New York.

McNulty

Gershwin first called his composition "Rhapsody in Rivets." But that sounded something like a movie title or a "Came-the-Dawn" affair, so it was changed to the more sedate "Rhapsody No. 2."

Isaac Goldberg, who writes Mr. Gershwin up for the papers, not to mention the shiny-papered magazines, says that Rhapsody No. 2 originated in the aphrodisiac atmosphere of Beverly Hills, Cal., redolent of oranges and Greta Garbo.

* * *

THEY JAMMED Carnegie Hall to hear the first New York performance of the new Gershwin opus. And they heard it start out with the rivets that represent the most blatant and perhaps significant activity of Manhattan.

Evidently a series of sharply accented notes forming a piano tattoo opens the rhapsody. It goes on from there, with the riveting theme popping up now and then with its monotonously effective repetition.

"The picture of the composition is in part laid in many thoroughfares of New York," to quote the good Dr. Goldberg once more, "and the music represents the emotions of the heroine as she wandered through Gotham in search of the hero."

And that, Old Pal-sy, is what we shall hear now for many and many a moon, whenever an accomplished jazz band wants to prove that it knows a rhapsody from a "scat" song. At least, that's what we heard wh[illegible] ...ut . . . and for one, two, three, four,

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM SPRINGFIELD, OHIO
NEWS

FEB 1 0 1932

GERSHWIN AGAIN

George Gershwin has been the trump card of the defenders of jazz since that night in 1924 when Paul Whiteman's band, one of the more melodious and pretentious jazz orchestras, gave his "Rhapsody in Blue" its first public rendition. Since then Mr. Gershwin has contributed a "Piano Concerto" and "An American Paris." But all past performances paled down when he appeared in New York the other evening as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, with his new "Rhapsody No. 2" as the piece de resistance.

Mr. Gershwin trails the jazz tag because he still writes light tunes for the musical shows and occasional orchestrations for the movies. It was one of the latter efforts, as a matter of fact, which gave rise ultimately to "Rhapsody No. 2." The heroine of an inane film was shown wandering through the metropolis in search of the hero. It was Mr. Gershwin's job to interpret her emotions in an orchestral sequence. Thus in the Hollywood atmosphere, "redolent of oranges and Greta Garbo," as Dr. Isaac Goldberg, the Gershwin biographer, puts it, the idea of the composition was born.

But its theme came from Gotham on the Atlantic coast—the rat-a-tat of the pneumatic riveters of the skyscraper builders. In the rhapsody this is simulated largely by repeated notes, decisively accented. Beethoven drew inspiration from the tick tock of the metronome. The raindrops sang to Chopin. Why shouldn't a Gershwin, questions Dr. Goldberg, adopt the cacophony of modern building construction? American industry has enlivened the muse before. Poets put it in verse, painters on canvas. Mr. Gershwin had precedent in that seemingly short-lived symphony in which one George Antheil combined the clangor of gongs, the shriek of whistles and the grinding of gears. Conductor Eugene Goosens of the Cincinnati Symphony orchestra, riding the engine cab at every chance, enjoys the rhythm of the locomotive wheels clicking on the rails.

At all events, here is Mr. Gershwin again in very distinguished company, the musical organization of the country's cultural capital parading his opus that somewhat smacks of jazz. The radio maestros are pretty apt to point with pride in the effort to justify the jazz monopoly of the air. But it was the eminent critic, Ernest Newman, we believe, who observed long since that when music gets as good as Mr. Gershwin's best, it no longer deserves to be soiled with that barbaric label.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

FEB 13 1932

The Observation Post

By Walter Brown, Dramatic Editor

String Music Tonight.

A suggestion is made that those who enjoy string music in handsome surroundings should remember the open-to-the-public concert in the Tapestry Hall of the Morgan Memorial this evening.

A string orchestra under the direction of Harold Berkley and the Memnon String Quartet will play, the concert being sponsored by the Hartford School of Music.

The program, already announced, includes the Avison E minor Concerto Grosso, the Bach Sarabande and Bourree, the Beethoven Quartet, Opus 18, No. 1, F major and Grieg's "Holberg Suite." The concert is scheduled to begin at 8:15.

Mr. Gershwin Taken Seriously.

A lot of followers of music in Hartford have heard with pleasure some of the works of George Gershwin, especially in the musical shows wherein his melodic talents have found good expression. And of course nearly everyone who has ever listened to the radio has heard the well-known "Rhapsody in Blue," over and over again. The obese Mr. Whiteman brought that opus to Hartford's consciousness when it was new and he was touring with an orchestra in straight orchestral concerts to show what could be done with a straight jazz program for concert purposes only. He showed. In Foot Guard Armory. And many music lovers have heard the "Rhapsody in Blue" much better played since then.

Mr. Gershwin has done other orchestral work since that time—work that has had place on programs of the leading orchestras. His Concerto in F for piano and orchestra was played in New York a year later than the Rhapsody (in 1925); he wrote "An American in Paris" that dates 1928; and now he has his "Second Rhapsody" for orchestra and piano and Mr. Koussevitzky has been playing it in Boston and New York with the composer assisting.

Now whether one likes Mr. Gershwin's compositions or not (and there are many who do not like them at all, just as there are many who think them superb examples of the music of the time) it is undeniable th professio
Koussevi artists
tion; an accorded
The s some in for a m bore the which n pression the fear the sky metropo second p ign rhyt timenta

Our Downes gives u included graphs,
of Mr.
and spe ance in "Bu ties more than In fa imita Rhap figur certa
the part rival Furt
Rha mate
"T form
the he h symp
Mias bored ers th
gy.
manc mode with
There the c the n had b win, time

Mr. G bune, w of the n
when h gives th them, b it is "s phony
so emi
George "only could have drawn a gathering comparable in numbers if not in kind with that which stood patiently at the rear of the hall (Carnegie) Friday evening while Mr. Koussevitzky cruelly delayed the appearance of George I by playing a couple of superfluous introductory numbers by Prokofieff and d'Indy."

Of the music itself Mr. Gilman writes:

> "The rivets, extracted from the title, remain in the score. The opening tattoo, heard on the piano at the beginning of the piece, is virtually its basic theme. Of course, the music is not all rivets. Mr. Gershwin was mindful of the need for contrast. In a world that knows too well the sound of the pneumatic drill, the lyric impulse still occasionally breaks its bounds. So Mr. Gershwin, quite properly, pays his respects to song. 'I want merely,' he told an interviewer, 'to write a broad flowing melody, the same as Bach, Brahms or Wagner would have done.'
>
> "Needless to say, he gives us, also, music employing those idioms with which, long since, he caught the ear of the world. Jazzarella, undiminished in gusto and vitality, dances here and languishes, and has her way with us. The happy few, as Stendhal called them, will recognize and value the skill of her evolutions and the subtlety of her guile. Those who must remain outside the gates, lonely in the outer court, will know, from the nature of the distant cheers, that music's most enlivened daughter is, as usual, bringing down the house."

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE MIAMI, FLA.
NEWS

4

FEB 1 3 1932

Gershwin Again

George Gershwin has been the trump card of the defenders of jazz since that

---

MUSICAL INSTRUCTION

LILA METCALF HOLMES
PIANO

GERTRUDE EDMANDS
TEACHER OF SINGING
6 VAN BUREN HALL
TRINITY COURT 175 DARTMOUTH STREET

ROYAL DADMUN BARITONE
IN BOSTON THURSDAYS AND FRIDAYS
STUDIO, 129 Newbury Street Telephone Circle 9291
For appointment write to above address or phone secretary—Beacon 1205

FELIX WINTERNITZ
ART OF VIOLIN PLAYING
Address, Residence
20 QUINCY STREET, CAMBRIDGE
Telephone, University 3530
Studio
270 HUNTINGTON AVENUE, BOSTON

GERTRUDE TINGLEY
SINGER AND TEACHER OF SINGING
STUDIOS, 83 NEWBURY STREET
Telephones { Kenmore 8258 / Aspinwall 7190

JANE RUSSELL COLPITT
PIANIST AND TEACHER
Has returned from study with Tobias Matthay in London and will resume teaching in October
BALDWIN PIANO
405 PIERCE BUILDING, COPLEY SQUARE
Telephone Bowdoin 1553-W

RUTH ELIZABETH AUSTEN, A.B., Mus.B.
VIOLINIST
VIOLIST
Tutor in Harmony and Solfeggio
Ensemble music furnished for all occasions
SOLOIST TEACHER
STUDIO, 102 GAINSBOROUGH STREET, BOSTON
Phone Commonwealth 4025

ISABEL FRENCH
TEACHER OF SINGING
Special attention given to interpretation
Telephone Commonwealth 2959 Studio: 6 Marlborough Street

Miss LESLIE KYLE
TEACHER OF SINGING
611 PIERCE BUILDING, BOSTON
DANA HALL SCHOOL OF MUSIC, WELLESLEY, MASS.
OXFORD SCHOOL, HARTFORD, CONN.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
Amer Hebrew
NY FEB 12 1932

129

Gershwin's New Rhapsody

Composer as Soloist at Boston Symphony Concert

By WALTER HART BLUMENTHAL

GERSHWIN added a notch to his fame with the rendition of his newest composition at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last Friday night at Carnegie Hall. Under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky, with the composer as collaborating pianist, the newly completed "Second Rhapsody" won the plaudits of a large audience. Although the composition was finished last Spring and given a trial audition in a studio of the National Broadcasting Company on June 26th, Gershwin made changes in the score subsequently. Originally entitled "Rhapsody in Rivets," it had a thematic treatment of the staccato tattoo of riveters working on the skeleton of a skyscraper. The composer, however, somewhat modified the rhythmic motif and was content to let his work be programmed merely as "Second Rhapsody."

There is less of the racking iteration of the rivet-theme in the final work than there was in the more metallic original. And there is an obbligato which has much of that melody Gershwin commands when he so desires. There is technical competence to this new work. With Mr. Gershwin at the piano, it need hardly be said that the audience was pleased. If it cannot be said that his art has advanced over his previous compositions, he has decisively shown that he has no intention of relinquishing his musical interpretation of America. It is almost eight years since Mr. Gershwin's now famous "Rhapsody in Blue" was brought out at Paul Whiteman's concert in Aeolian Hall. It was this composition which brought him to national notice.

Gershwin was born in Brooklyn in 1898. He was thirteen before he started to play the piano. At the age of sixteen he began work as a "song-plugger" for music publishing houses, frequently playing during the day in vaudeville acts, and until late in the night in cafes or cabarets. He took up the study of harmony under Rubin Goldmark, and in 1923 made his first appearance at Aeolian Hall in New York as accompanist for Eva Gauthier in a group of his own songs. The year following, his "Rhapsody in Blue" was played for the first time by this composer and Paul Whiteman's Orchestra. Walter Damrosch was instrumental in forwarding the young man's career.

The music of George Gershwin lifted the level of jazz to a distinct and by no means meritricious phase of American music. It seems that while in Hollywood about a year ago, contributing to the movie "Delicious," Gershwin began the earlier version of his "Rhapsody in Rivets," as it was then called. The opening tattoo heard on the piano at the outset of the composition constitutes the basic theme. His talent is evinced in the fact that he does not labor this motif of the pneumatic drill, but permits the lyric impulse to have interludes in his work.

It is given to few American composers so early in their careers to have such reclame as has been accorded Gershwin. Last year a biography of him appeared at the hands of Isaac Goldberg, the Boston writer, and in that volume is recounted the rise of this unusual figure in the contemporary musical world. His "Concerto in F" has been played by several of the foremost orchestras of the world, and it is said that he is now under contract with the Metropolitan for an American opera.

It is not generally known that he did a one-act 'negro opera' entitled "One Hundred and Thirty-fifth Street." This was written about 1923, and since then the composer has produced a number of lighter musical scores, the operetta "Song of the Flame," and the musical comedy "Tip-Toes."

The "Concerto" was the first work Gershwin scored for symphonic orchestra. Although it follows classical models in a somewhat distant way, Gershwin constantly injects his own highly personal musical idiom.

In his recent lighter work, he has had the collaboration of his lyric-writing brother, Ira, and the story of the recognition won by the pair constitutes an interesting record of consistent rise. The reception accorded by Boston to the "Second Rhapsody" was not less hearty at Carnegie Hall. It is now likely that it will be played abroad, where Gershwin is heralded as a typical American musical figure.

Strauss Work at Symphony

Amer Feb 13

Louis Speyer—English horn
Symphony
the curd by Dr.
with the originally and heard in these rprised in le for the ovely tone ut also as its own eceded by al" Sym-the Ravel brilliantly tra. The so Sprach ary tone-ss, a fittary on d genius, ssevitzky esentation ty of the

nes. But e listener s for the ond with
e. Ragged mon, and of musilanger of e less one playing of tably for on. included es of the y, includonductors nd stage-
t. M. S.

G FROM , CONN.
ANT

1 1932

USIC

s Why He ourant:—

a sentiment
f The Courhony music.
her hear one sevitzky or a es of le). It takes an to com-

LOVER.
932.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS

FEB 1 0 1932

The Show Shops

By JOHN M'NULTY

'Rhapsody In Rivets' Is Newest Gershwin Work; Miss Janis Tells of Trouble She Has Had with Frenchmen; Old-Timers Score At Last In Pictures.

GEORGE GERSHWIN is the man, no doubt, who first designed a respectable if modish musical frock to cover the unashamed chemise of the previously unaccepted Lady Jazz. He did that little thing when he wrote "Rhapsody in Blue" back in 1924.

Now he's introduced the lecherous lady into the hallowed precincts of "Bawston," by writing "Rhapsody No. 2," which was this week played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Koussevitsky, in New York.

McNulty

Gershwin first called his composition "Rhapsody in Rivets." But that sounded something like a movie title or a "Came-the-Dawn" affair, so it was changed to the more sedate "Rhapsody No. 2."

Isaac Goldberg, who writes Mr. Gershwin up for the papers, not to mention the shiny-papered magazines, says that Rhapsody No. 2 originated in the aphrodisiac atmosphere of Beverly Hills, Cal., redolent of oranges and Greta Garbo.

* * *

THEY JAMMED Carnegie Hall to hear the first New York performance of the new Gershwin opus. And they heard it start out with the rivets that represent the most blatant and perhaps significant activity of Manhattan.

Evidently a series of sharply accented notes forming a piano tattoo opens the rhapsody. It goes on from there, with the riveting theme popping up now and then with its monotonously effective repetition.

"The picture of the composition is in part laid in many thoroughfares of New York," to quote the good Dr. Goldberg once more, "and the music represents the emotions of the heroine as she wandered through Gotham in search of the hero."

And that, Old Pal-sy, is what we shall hear now for many and many a moon, whenever an accomplished jazz band wants to prove that it knows a rhapsody from a "scat" song. At least, that's what we heard when [illegible] it . . . and for one, two, three, four,

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

FEB 13 1932

The Observation Post

By Walter Brown, Dramatic Editor

String Music Tonight.

A suggestion is made that those who enjoy string music in handsome surroundings should remember the open-to-the-public concert in the Tapestry Hall of the Morgan Memorial this evening.

A string orchestra under the direction of Harold Berkley and the Memnon String Quartet will play, the concert being sponsored by the Hartford School of Music.

The program, already announced, includes the Avison E minor Concerto Grosso, the Bach Sarabande and Bourree, the Beethoven Quartet, Opus 18, No. 1, F major and Grieg's "Holberg Suite." The concert is scheduled to begin at 8:15.

Mr. Gershwin Taken Seriously.

A lot of followers of music in Hartford have heard with pleasure some of the works of George Gershwin, especially in the musical shows wherein his melodic talents have found good expression. And of course nearly everyone who has ever listened to the radio has heard the well-known "Rhapsody in Blue," over and over again. The obese Mr. Whiteman brought that opus to Hartford's consciousness when it was new and he was touring with an orchestra in straight orchestral concerts to show what could be done with a straight jazz program for concert purposes only. He showed. In Foot Guard Armory. And many music lovers have heard the "Rhapsody in Blue" much better played since then.

Mr. Gershwin has done other orchestral work since that time—work that has had place on programs of the leading orchestras. His Concerto in F for piano and orchestra was played in New York a year later than the Rhapsody (in 1925); he wrote "An American in Paris" that dates 1928; and now he has his "Second Rhapsody" for orchestra and piano and Mr. Koussevitzky has been playing it in Boston and New York with the composer assisting.

Now whether one likes Mr. Gershwin's compositions or not (and there could have drawn a gathering comparable in numbers if not in kind with that which stood patiently at the rear of the hall (Carnegie) Friday evening while Mr. Koussevitzky cruelly delayed the appearance of George I by playing a couple of superfluous introductory numbers by Prokofieff and d'Indy."

Of the music itself Mr. Gilman writes:

> "The rivets, extracted from the title, remain in the score. The opening tattoo, heard on the piano at the beginning of the piece, is virtually its basic theme. Of course, the music is not all rivets. Mr. Gershwin was mindful of the need for contrast. In a world that knows too well the sound of the pneumatic drill, the lyric impulse still occasionally breaks its bounds. So Mr. Gershwin, quite properly, pays his respects to song. 'I want merely,' he told an interviewer, 'to write a broad flowing melody, the same as Bach, Brahms or Wagner would have done.'
>
> "Needless to say, he gives us, also, music employing those idioms with which, long since, he caught the ear of the world. Jazzarella, undiminished in gusto and vitality, dances here and languishes, and has her way with us. The happy few, as Stendhal called them, will recognize and value the skill of her evolutions and the subtlety of her guile. Those who must remain outside the gates, lonely in the outer court, will know, from the nature of the distant cheers, that music's most enlivened daughter is, as usual, bringing down the house."

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE MIAMI, FLA.
NEWS

(4)

FEB 1 3 1932

THIS CLIPPING FROM
Amer Hebrew
N Y FEB 12 1932

129

Gershwin's New Rhapsody

Composer as Soloist at Boston Symphony Concert

By WALTER HART BLUMENTHAL

GERSHWIN added a notch to his fame with the rendition of his newest composition at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last Friday night at Carnegie Hall. Under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky, with the composer as collaborating pianist, the newly completed "Second Rhapsody" won the plaudits of a large audience. Although the composition was finished last Spring and given a trial audition in a studio of the National Broadcasting Company on June 26th, Gershwin made changes in the score subsequently. Originally entitled "Rhapsody in Rivets," it had a thematic treatment of the staccato tattoo of riveters working on the skeleton of a skyscraper. The composer, however, somewhat modified the rhythmic motif and was content to let his work be programmed merely as "Second Rhapsody."

There is less of the racking iteration of the rivet-theme in the final work than there was in the more metallic original. And there is an obbligato which has much of that melody Gershwin commands when he so desires. There is technical competence to this new work. With Mr. Gershwin at the piano, it need hardly be said that the audience was pleased. If it cannot be said that his art has advanced over his previous compositions, he has decisively shown that he has no intention of relinquishing his musical interpretation of America. It is almost eight years since Mr. Gershwin's now famous "Rhapsody in Blue" was brought out at Paul Whiteman's concert in Aeolian Hall. It was this composition which brought him to national notice.

Gershwin was born in Brooklyn in 1898. He was thirteen before he started to play the piano. At the age of sixteen he began work as a "song-plugger" for music publishing houses, frequently playing during the day in vaudeville acts, and until late in the night in cafes or cabarets. He took up the study of harmony under Rubin Goldmark, and in 1923 made his first appearance at Aeolian Hall in New York as accompanist for Eva Gauthier in a group of his own songs. The year following, his "Rhapsody in Blue" was played for the first time by this composer and Paul Whiteman's Orchestra. Walter Damrosch was instrumental in forwarding the young man's career.

The music of George Gershwin lifted the level of jazz to a distinct and by no means meritricious phase of American music. It seems that while in Hollywood about a year ago, contributing to the movie "Delicious," Gershwin began the earlier version of his "Rhapsody in Rivets," as it was then called. The opening tattoo heard on the piano at the outset of the composition constitutes the basic theme. His talent is evinced in the fact that he does not labor this motif of the pneumatic drill, but permits the lyric impulse to have interludes in his work.

It is given to few American composers so early in their careers to have such reclame as has been accorded Gershwin. Last year a biography of him appeared at the hands of Isaac Goldberg, the Boston writer, and in that volume is recounted the rise of this unusual figure in the contemporary musical world. His "Concerto in F" has been played by several of the foremost orchestras of the world, and it is said that he is now under contract with the Metropolitan for an American opera.

It is not generally known that he did a one-act 'negro opera' entitled "One Hundred and Thirty-fifth Street." This was written about 1923, and since then the composer has produced a number of lighter musical scores, the operetta "Song of the Flame," and the musical comedy "Tip-Toes."

The "Concerto" was the first work Gershwin scored for symphonic orchestra. Although it follows classical models in a somewhat distant way, Gershwin constantly injects his own highly personal musical idiom.

In his recent lighter work, he has had the collaboration of his lyric-writing brother, Ira, and the story of the recognition won by the pair constitutes an interesting record of consistent rise. The reception accorded by Boston to the "Second Rhapsody" was not less hearty at Carnegie Hall. It is now likely that it will be played abroad, where Gershwin is heralded as a typical American musical figure.

Strauss Work
...phony

13

English horn ston Symphony st in the curerts led by Dr. ying with the sody originally ione, and heard ovelty in these sic surprised in vehicle for the ter's lovely tone que, but also as for its own

as preceded by Classical" Sym-d by the Ravel nole, brilliantly orchestra. The s "Also Sprach raordinary tone-Strauss, a fit-mmentary on mad genius.
Koussevitzky presentation beauty of the st lines. But st one listener nxious for the respond with lliance. Ragged ncommon, and hread of musiin danger of ne the less one fine playing of k, notably for duction.
lience included ebrities of the mpany, includ-rs, conductors er and stagerhardt. M. S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SPRINGFIELD, OHIO
NEWS

FEB 1 0 1932

GERSHWIN AGAIN

George Gershwin has been the trump card of the defenders of jazz since that night in 1924 when Paul Whiteman's band, one of the more melodious and pretentious jazz orchestras, gave his "Rhapsody in Blue" its first public rendition. Since then Mr. Gershwin has contributed a "Piano Concerto" and "An American Paris." But all past performances paled down when he appeared in New York the other evening as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, with his new "Rhapsody No. 2" as the piece de resistance.

Mr. Gershwin trails the jazz tag because he still writes light tunes for the musical shows and occasional orchestrations for the movies. It was one of the latter efforts, as a matter of fact, which gave rise ultimately to "Rhapsody No. 2." The heroine of an inane film was shown wandering through the metropolis in search of the hero. It was Mr. Gershwin's job to interpret her emotions in an orchestral sequence. Thus in the Hollywood atmosphere, "redolent of oranges and Greta Garbo," as Dr. Isaac Goldberg, the Gershwin biographer, puts it, the idea of the composition was born.

But its theme came from Gotham on the Atlantic coast—the rat-a-tat of the pneumatic riveters of the skyscraper builders. In the rhapsody this is simulated largely by repeated notes, decisively accented. Beethoven drew inspiration from the tick tock of the metronome. The raindrops sang to Chopin. Why shouldn't a Gershwin, questions Dr. Goldberg, adopt the cacophony of modern building construction? American industry has enlivened the muse before. Poets put it in verse, painters on canvas. Mr. Gershwin had precedent in that seemingly short-lived symphony in which one George Antheil combined the clangor of gongs, the shriek of whistles and the grinding of gears. Conductor Eugene Goosens of the Cincinnati Symphony orchestra, riding the engine cab at every chance, enjoys the rhythm of the locomotive wheels clicking on the rails.

At all events, here is Mr. Gershwin again in very distinguished company, the musical organization of the country's cultural capital parading his opus that somewhat smacks of jazz. The radio maestros are pretty apt to point with pride in the effort to justify the jazz monopoly of the air. But it was the eminent critic, Ernest Newman, we believe, who observed long since that when music gets as good as Mr. Gershwin's best, it no longer deserves to be soiled with that barbaric label.

MUSICAL INSTRUCTION

MOULTON PIANOFORTE SCHOOL
Mr. Moulton's twenty-five years of training under some of the finest musical authorities here and abroad, together with his twenty-three years of successful teaching is your guarantee when studying at his school
83 NEWBURY STREET, BOSTON Telephone Needham 1550

SULLIVAN A. SARGENT
TEACHER OF SINGING
Member of the Faculty of New England Conservatory of Music
HUNTINGTON CHAMBERS, ROOM 616
Tuesdays and Fridays, Wednesdays and Saturday Mornings
Home address: 342 TAPPAN STREET, Brookline Telephone Aspinwall 0014

MADAME ISIDORA MARTINEZ
TEACHER OF SINGING
Prepares for Oratorio, Church, Opera and Concert
STUDIO, 1564 Commonwealth Ave. Tel. Asp. 0846

TRIANTE C. KEFALAS DRAMATIC TENOR
VOCAL INSTRUCTOR
A method that guarantees results STUDIO, 240 HUNTINGTON AVENUE
PHONE, KENMORE 2795

Miss HELEN GOODRICH
TEACHER OF SINGING
Tuesdays and Fridays at Lasell Seminary
66 FENWAY

CORINNE HARMON
PIANO TEACHER
48 CLEARWAY STREET
Kenmore 0456

Mrs. Charles Adams White
TEACHER OF SINGING
509 Pierce Building Copley Square
Telephone 5316 Haymarket

HARRIS S. SHAW
PIANO, ORGAN, COACHING
STUDIO
175 DARTMOUTH STREET, BOSTON
(Kenmore 8431)

Miss ROSE STEWART
TEACHER OF SINGING
245 Chestnut Hill Avenue, Brighton
Telephone Stadium 2326

LETTY LAUNDER TEACHER of the Violin
12 Lincoln Hall Trinity Court
175 DARTMOUTH STREET
Telephone Kenmore 6520

JOHN LANE
TEACHER OF SINGING
STEINERT HALL
162 BOYLSTON STREET .. .. BOSTON
Telephone Hubbard 6677

LUTHER O. EMERSON
BARITONE SOLOIST
TEACHER OF SINGING
30 HUNTINGTON AVENUE Room 406
Kenmore 9415

PAULINE HAMMOND CLARK
TEACHER OF SINGING COACH MANAGER
COPLEY CLUB SINGERS AND ENTERTAINERS
MABELLE TRASK, CONTRALTO SOLOIST
DOLORES RODRIGUEZ, PIANIST
LOIS H. SWETT, ACCOMPANIST
MME ELYSE SALIGNAC OF PARIS, FRENCH LANGUAGE
MME. LOUISE DUMAS, DANCER, TEACHER OF DANCING
543 BOYLSTON STREET TEL. KENMORE 5156

ELIZABETH SIEDOFF
PIANIST—INSTRUCTOR
"Has mastered the fundamentals of my teachings."—Matthay, London.
Concerts: Lecture—Piano Recitals
Studio: Hotel Canterbury, Boston.
14 Charlesgate W. Ken. 3700

---

since that when music becomes as good as Mr. Gershwin's best, it no longer deserves to be soiled with that barbaric label.

CLIPPING FROM FORD, CONN.
URANT

EB 1 1 1932

C MUSIC

xplains Why He rs It

The Courant:—

that a sentiment lers of The Cour-symphony music.
d rather hear one
Koussevitzky or a [illegible] es of r female). It takes musician to comndred.
MUSIC LOVER.
b. 10, 1932.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS

FEB 1 0 1932

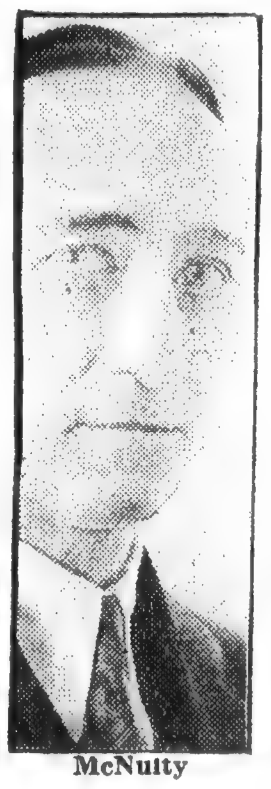
The Show Shops

By JOHN M'NULTY

'Rhapsody In Rivets' Is Newest Gershwin Work; Miss Janis Tells of Trouble She Has Had with Frenchmen; Old-Timers Score At Last In Pictures.

GEORGE GERSHWIN is the man, no doubt, who first designed a respectable if modish musical frock to cover the unashamed chemise of the previously unaccepted Lady Jazz. He did that little thing when he wrote "Rhapsody in Blue" back in 1924.

Now he's introduced the lecherous lady into the hallowed precincts of "Bawston," by writing "Rhapsody No. 2," which was this week played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Koussevitsky, in New York.



McNulty

Gershwin first called his composition "Rhapsody in Rivets." But that sounded something like a movie title or a "Came-the-Dawn" affair, so it was changed to the more sedate "Rhapsody No. 2."

Isaac Goldberg, who writes Mr. Gershwin up for the papers, not to mention the shiny-papered magazines, says that Rhapsody No. 2 originated in the aphrodisiac atmosphere of Beverly Hills, Cal., redolent of oranges and Greta Garbo.

* * *

THEY JAMMED Carnegie Hall to hear the first New York performance of the new Gershwin opus. And they heard it start out with the rivets that represent the most blatant and perhaps significant activity of Manhattan.

Evidently a series of sharply accented notes forming a piano tattoo opens the rhapsody. It goes on from there, with the riveting theme popping up now and then with its monotonously effective repetition.

"The picture of the composition is in part laid in many thoroughfares of New York," to quote the good Dr. Goldberg once more, "and the music represents the emotions of the heroine as she wandered through Gotham in search of the hero."

And that, Old Pal-sy, is what we shall hear now for many and many a moon, whenever an accomplished jazz band wants to prove that it knows a rhapsody from a "scat" song. At least, that's what we heard when "Rhapsody in Blue" S[illegible]ut . . . and for one, two, three, four,

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM SPRINGFIELD, OHIO
NEWS

FEB 1 0 1932

GERSHWIN AGAIN

George Gershwin has been the trump card of the defenders of jazz since that night in 1924 when Paul Whiteman's band, one of the more melodious and pretentious jazz orchestras, gave his "Rhapsody in Blue" its first public rendition. Since then Mr. Gershwin has contributed a "Piano Concerto" and "An American Paris." But all past performances paled down when he appeared in New York the other evening as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, with his new "Rhapsody No. 2" as the piece de resistance.

Mr. Gershwin trails the jazz tag because he still writes light tunes for the musical shows and occasional orchestrations for the movies. It was one of the latter efforts, as a matter of fact, which gave rise ultimately to "Rhapsody No. 2." The heroine of an inane film was shown wandering through the metropolis in search of the hero. It was Mr. Gershwin's job to interpret her emotions in an orchestral sequence. Thus in the Hollywood atmosphere, "redolent of oranges and Greta Garbo," as Dr. Isaac Goldberg, the Gershwin biographer, puts it, the idea of the composition was born.

But its theme came from Gotham on the Atlantic coast—the rat-a-tat of the pneumatic riveters of the skyscraper builders. In the rhapsody this is simulated largely by repeated notes, decisively accented. Beethoven drew inspiration from the tick tock of the metronome. The raindrops sang to Chopin. Why shouldn't a Gershwin, questions Dr. Goldberg, adopt the cacophony of modern building construction? American industry has enlivened the muse before. Poets put it in verse, painters on canvas. Mr. Gershwin had precedent in that seemingly short-lived symphony in which one George Antheil combined the clangor of gongs, the shriek of whistles and the grinding of gears. Conductor Eugene Goosens of the Cincinnati Symphony orchestra, riding the engine cab at every chance, enjoys the rhythm of the locomotive wheels clicking on the rails.

At all events, here is Mr. Gershwin again in very distinguished company, the musical organization of the country's cultural capital parading his opus that somewhat smacks of jazz. The radio maestros are pretty apt to point with pride in the effort to justify the jazz monopoly of the air. But it was the eminent critic, Ernest Newman, we believe, who observed long since that when music gets as good as Mr. Gershwin's best, it no longer deserves to be soiled with that barbaric label.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

FEB 13 1932

The Observation Post

By Walter Brown, Dramatic Editor

String Music Tonight.

A suggestion is made that those who enjoy string music in handsome surroundings should remember the open-to-the-public concert in the Tapestry Hall of the Morgan Memorial this evening.

A string orchestra under the direction of Harold Berkley and the Memnon String Quartet will play, the concert being sponsored by the Hartford School of Music.

The program, already announced, includes the Avison E minor Concerto Grosso, the Bach Sarabande and Bourree, the Beethoven Quartet, Opus 18, No. 1, F major and Grieg's "Holberg Suite." The concert is scheduled to begin at 8:15.

Mr. Gershwin Taken Seriously.

A lot of followers of music in Hartford have heard with pleasure some of the works of George Gershwin, especially in the musical shows wherein his melodic talents have found good expression. And of course nearly everyone who has ever listened to the radio has heard the well-known "Rhapsody in Blue," over and over again. The obese Mr. Whiteman brought that opus to Hartford's consciousness when it was new and he was touring with an orchestra in straight orchestral concerts to show what could be done with a straight jazz program for concert purposes only. He showed. In Foot Guard Armory. And many music lovers have heard the "Rhapsody in Blue" much better played since then.

Mr. Gershwin has done other orchestral work since that time—work that has had place on programs of the leading orchestras. His Concerto in F for piano and orchestra was played in New York a year later than the Rhapsody (in 1925); he wrote "An American in Paris" that dates 1928; and now he has his "Second Rhapsody" for orchestra and piano and Mr. Koussevitzky has been playing it in Boston and New York with the composer assisting.

Now whether one likes Mr. Gershwin's compositions or not (and there are many who do not like them at all, just as there are many who think them superb examples of the music of the time) it is undeniable that anything that gets the professional attention of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his assemblage of artists rates careful critical attention; and the new work has been accorded just that.

The score is an elongation of some incidental passages composed for a motion-picture and originally bore the title "Rhapsody in Rivets," which names gives a key to its impressionism. It suggests, in short, the fearsome chatter that builds up the skyscrapers, the noises of the metropolitan streets, and in its second part introduces the contrastign rhythms of dance-jazz and sentimental song.

Our opera-explaining friend, Mr. Downes of the New York Times, gives us the brief historical facts included in the preceding paragraphs, compares the newer work of Mr. Gershwin with the earlier, and speaks of its present performance in New York, as follows:

> "But with all its immaturities the Rhapsody in Blue is more individual and originative than the piece heard last night. In fact, the Second Rhapsody is imitative in many ways of the Rhapsody in Blue. One of the figures of the first part, and certain harmonic cadences, and the song theme of the middle part, have all quite direct derivations from the earlier work. Furthermore, the Second Rhapsody is too long for its material.
>
> "The work was superly performed. Mr. Koussevitzky led the orchestra as earnestly as if he had been introducing a new symphony by a Roussel or a Miascovsky, and patiently labored to obtain from the players the last ounce of their energy. It was a virtuoso performance. Mr. Gershwin played a modest piano part simply but with the composer's authority. There was royal welcome for the composer, the performers, the music. Neverthless, we have had bttr things from Mr. Gershwin, and we expect better in time to come."

Mr. Gilman, in the Herald Tribune, was not in a mood of worship of the modern for the modern's sake when he wrote his notice. But he gives the facts of the case as he sees them, basing on a statement that it is "seldom that a Boston Symphony audience is privileged to hear so eminent a personage as Mr. George Gershwin" the report that "only Mr. Paderewski, perhaps, could have drawn a gathering comparable in numbers if not in kind with that which stood patiently at the rear of the hall (Carnegie) Friday evening while Mr. Koussevitzky cruelly delayed the appearance of George I by playing a couple of superfluous introductory numbers by Prokofieff and d'Indy."

Of the music itself Mr. Gilman writes:

> "The rivets, extracted from the title, remain in the score. The opening tattoo, heard on the piano at the beginning of the piece, is virtually its basic theme. Of course, the music is not all rivets. Mr. Gershwin was mindful of the need for contrast. In a world that knows too well the sound of the pneumatic drill, the lyric impulse still occasionally breaks its bounds. So Mr. Gershwin, quite properly, pays his respects to song. 'I want merely,' he told an interviewer, 'to write a broad flowing melody, the same as Bach, Brahms or Wagner would have done.'
>
> "Needless to say, he gives us, also, music employing those idioms with which, long since, he caught the ear of the world. Jazzarella, undiminished in gusto and vitality, dances here and languishes, and has her way with us. The happy few, as Stendhal called them, will recognize and value the skill of her evolutions and the subtlety of her guile. Those who must remain outside the gates, lonely in the outer court, will know, from the nature of the distant cheers, that music's most enlivened daughter is, as usual, bringing down the house."

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE MIAMI, FLA.
NEWS

(4)

FEB 1 3 1932

Gershwin Again

George Gershwin has been the trump card of the defenders of jazz since that night in 1924 when Paul Whiteman's band, one of the more melodious and pretentious jazz orchestras, gave his "Rhapsody in Blue" its first public rendition. Since then Mr. Gershwin has contributed a "Piano Concerto" and "An American in Paris." But all past performances paled when he appeared in New York the other evening as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, with his new "Rhapsody No. 2" as the piece de resistance.

Mr. Gershwin trails the jazz tag because he still writes light tunes for the musical shows and occasional orchestrations for the movies. It was one of the latter efforts, as a matter of fact, which gave rise ultimately to "Rhapsody No. 2." The heroine of an inane film were shown wandering through the metropolis in search of the hero. It was Mr. Gershwin's job to interpret her emotions in an orchestral sequence. Thus in the Hollywood atmosphere, "redolent of oranges and Greta Garbo," as Dr. Isaac Goldberg, the Gershwin biographer, puts it, the idea of the composition was born.

But its theme came from Gotham on the Atlantic coast—the rat-a-tat of the pneumatic riveters of the skyscraper builders. In the rhapsody this is simulated largely by repeated notes, decisively accented. Beethoven drew inspiration from the tick-tock of the metronome. The raindrops sang to Chopin. Why shouldn't a Gershwin, questions Dr. Goldberg, adapt the cacophony of modern building construction? American industry has enlivened the muse before. Poets put it in verse, painters on canvas. Mr. Gershwin had precedent in that seemingly short-lived symphony in which one George Antheil combined the clangor of gongs, the shriek of whistles and the grinding of gears. Conductor Eugene Goosens of the Cincinnati Symphony orchestra, riding the engine cab at every chance, enjoys the rhythm of the locomotive wheels clicking on the rails.

At all events, here is Mr. Gershwin again in very distinguished company, the musical organization of the country's cultural capital parading his opus that somewhat smacks of jazz. The radio maestros are pretty apt to point with pride in the effort to justify the jazz monopoly of the air. But it was the eminent critic, Ernest Newman, we believe, who observed long since that when music becomes as good as Mr. Gershwin's best, it no longer deserves to be soiled with that barbaric label.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

7 FEB 12 1932

Gershwin's New Rhapsody

Composer as Soloist at Boston Symphony Concert

By WALTER HART BLUMENTHAL

GERSHWIN added a notch to his fame with the rendition of his newest composition at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last Friday night at Carnegie Hall. Under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky, with the composer as collaborating pianist, the newly completed "Second Rhapsody" won the plaudits of a large audience. Although the composition was finished last Spring and given a trial audition in a studio of the National Broadcasting Company on June 26th, Gershwin made changes in the score subsequently. Originally entitled "Rhapsody in Rivets," it had a thematic treatment of the staccato tattoo of riveters working on the skeleton of a skyscraper. The composer, however, somewhat modified the rhythmic motif and was content to let his work be programmed merely as "Second Rhapsody."

There is less of the racking iteration of the rivet-theme in the final work than there was in the more metallic original. And there is an obbligato which has much of that melody Gershwin commands when he so desires. There is technical competence to this new work. With Mr. Gershwin at the piano, it need hardly be said that the audience was pleased. If it cannot be said that his art has advanced over his previous compositions, he has decisively shown that he has no intention of relinquishing his musical interpretation of America. It is almost eight years since Mr. Gershwin's now famous "Rhapsody in Blue" was brought out at Paul Whiteman's concert in Aeolian Hall. It was this composition which brought him to national notice.

Gershwin was born in Brooklyn in 1898. He was thirteen before he started to play the piano. At the age of sixteen he began work as a "song-plugger" for music publishing houses, frequently playing during the day in vaudeville acts, and until late in the night in cafes or cabarets. He took up the study of harmony under Rubin Goldmark, and in 1923 made his first appearance at Aeolian Hall in New York as accompanist for Eva Gauthier in a group of his own songs. The year following, his "Rhapsody in Blue" was played for the first time by this composer and Paul Whiteman's Orchestra. Walter Damrosch was instrumental in forwarding the young man's career.

The music of George Gershwin lifted the level of jazz to a distinct and by no means meritricious phase of American music. It seems that while in Hollywood about a year ago, contributing to the movie "Delicious," Gershwin began the earlier version of his "Rhapsody in Rivets," as it was then called. The opening tattoo heard on the piano at the outset of the composition constitutes the basic theme. His talent is evinced in the fact that he does not labor this motif of the pneumatic drill, but permits the lyric impulse to have interludes in his work.

It is given to few American composers so early in their careers to have such reclame as has been accorded Gershwin. Last year a biography of him appeared at the hands of Isaac Goldberg, the Boston writer, and in that volume is recounted the rise of this unusual figure in the contemporary musical world. His "Concerto in F" has been played by several of the foremost orchestras of the world, and it is said that he is now under contract with the Metropolitan for an American opera.

It is not generally known that he did a one-act 'negro opera' entitled "One Hundred and Thirty-fifth Street." This was written about 1923, and since then the composer has produced a number of lighter musical scores, the operetta "Song of the Flame," and the musical comedy "Tip-Toes."

The "Concerto" was the first work Gershwin scored for symphonic orchestra. Although it follows classical models in a somewhat distant way, Gershwin constantly injects his own highly personal musical idiom.

In his recent lighter work, he has had the collaboration of his lyric-writing brother, Ira, and the story of the recognition won by the pair constitutes an interesting record of consistent rise. The reception accorded by Boston to the "Second Rhapsody" was not less hearty at Carnegie Hall. It is now likely that it will be played abroad, where Gershwin is heralded as a typical American musical figure.

Strauss Work at Symphony

Amer Feb 13

Louis Speyer, English horn player of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is soloist in the current pair of concerts led by Dr. Koussevitzky, playing with the orchestra a rhapsody originally written for saxophone, and heard yesterday as a novelty in these concerts. The music surprised in being not merely a vehicle for the display of Mr. Speyer's lovely tone and refined technique, but also as being worth-while for its own sake.

The rhapsody was preceded by the Prokofieff "Classical" Symphony and followed by the Ravel Rhapsodie Espagnole, brilliantly played by the orchestra. The principal item was "Also Sprach Zarathustra," extraordinary tone-poem of Richard Strauss, a fitting musical commentary on the work of the mad genius, Nietzsche. Dr. Koussevitzky had worked out a presentation bringing out the beauty of the work in its clearest lines. But it seemed to at least one listener that he was over-anxious for the orchestra did not respond with its accustomed brilliance. Ragged attacks were not uncommon, and at one point the thread of musical discourse was in danger of being broken. None the less one is grateful for the fine playing of most of the work, notably for the majestic introduction.

The matinee audience included many visiting celebrities of the Chicago Opera Company, including, among others, conductors Pollak and Cooper and stage-director Dr. Otto Erhardt. M. S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

FEB 1 1 1932

SYMPHONIC MUSIC

"Music Lover" Explains Why He Prefers It

To the Editor of The Courant:—

I am glad to see that a sentiment exists among readers of The Courant in favor of symphony music. Personally I would rather hear one performance by a Koussevitzky or a Toscanini than a whole series of songbirds (male or female). It takes a mighty good musician to compete against a hundred.

MUSIC LOVER.
Farmington, Feb. 10, 1932.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS

FEB 1 0 1932

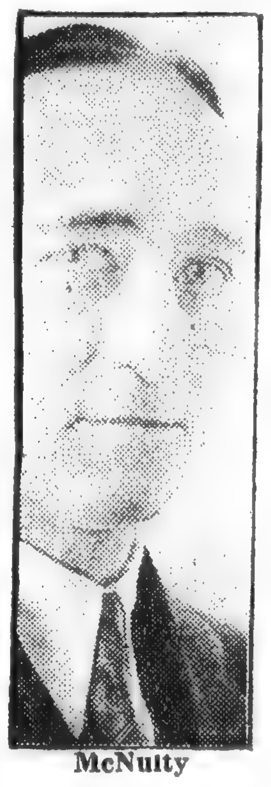
The Show Shops

By JOHN M'NULTY

'Rhapsody In Rivets' Is Newest Gershwin Work; Miss Janis Tells of Trouble She Has Had with Frenchmen; Old-Timers Score At Last In Pictures.

GEORGE GERSHWIN is the man, no doubt, who first designed a respectable if modish musical frock to cover the unashamed chemise of the previously unaccepted Lady Jazz. He did that little thing when he wrote "Rhapsody in Blue" back in 1924.

Now he's introduced the lecherous lady into the hallowed precincts of "Bawston," by writing "Rhapsody No. 2," which was this week played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Koussevitsky, in New York.



McNulty

Gershwin first called his composition "Rhapsody in Rivets." But that sounded something like a movie title or a "Came-the-Dawn" affair, so it was changed to the more sedate "Rhapsody No. 2."

Isaac Goldberg, who writes Mr. Gershwin up for the papers, not to mention the shiny-papered magazines, says that Rhapsody No. 2 originated in the aphrodisiac atmosphere of Beverly Hills, Cal., redolent of oranges and Greta Garbo.

* * *

THEY JAMMED Carnegie Hall to hear the first New York performance of the new Gershwin opus. And they heard it start out with the rivets that represent the most blatant and perhaps significant activity of Manhattan.

Evidently a series of sharply accented notes forming a piano tattoo opens the rhapsody. It goes on from there, with the riveting theme popping up now and then with its monotonously effective repetition.

"The picture of the composition is in part laid in many thoroughfares of New York," to quote the good Dr. Goldberg once more, "and the music represents the emotions of the heroine as she wandered through Gotham in search of the hero."

And that, Old Pal-sy, is what we shall hear now for many and many a moon, whenever an accomplished jazz band wants to prove that it knows a rhapsody from a "scat" song. At least, that's what we heard when "Rhapsody in Blue" first came out . . . and for one, two, three, four, five, six, seven, eight years afterward.

IN AGAIN

win has been the trump card of defenders of jazz since that night in 1924 when Paul Whiteman's band, one of the more melodious and pretentious jazz orchestras, gave his "Rhapsody in Blue" its first public rendition. Since then Mr. Gershwin has contributed a "Piano Concerto" and "An American Paris." But all past performances paled down when he appeared in New York the other evening as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, with his new "Rhapsody No. 2" as the piece de resistance.

Mr. Gershwin trails the jazz tag because he still writes light tunes for the musical shows and occasional orchestrations for the movies. It was one of the latter efforts, as a matter of fact, which gave rise ultimately to "Rhapsody No. 2." The heroine of an inane film was shown wandering through the metropolis in search of the hero. It was Mr. Gershwin's job to interpret her emotions in an orchestral sequence. Thus in the Hollywood atmosphere, "redolent of oranges and Greta Garbo," as Dr. Isaac Goldberg, the Gershwin biographer, puts it, the idea of the composition was born.

But its theme came from Gotham on the Atlantic coast—the rat-a-tat of the pneumatic riveters of the skyscraper builders. In the rhapsody this is simulated largely by repeated notes, decisively accented. Beethoven drew inspiration from the tick tock of the metronome. The raindrops sang to Chopin. Why shouldn't a Gershwin, questions Dr. Goldberg, adopt the cacophony of modern building construction? American industry has enlivened the muse before. Poets put it in verse, painters on canvas. Mr. Gershwin had precedent in that seemingly short-lived symphony in which one George Antheil combined the clangor of gongs, the shriek of whistles and the grinding of gears. Conductor Eugene Goosens of the Cincinnati Symphony orchestra, riding the engine cab at every chance, enjoys the rhythm of the locomotive wheels clicking on the rails.

At all events, here is Mr. Gershwin again in very distinguished company, the musical organization of the country's cultural capital parading his opus that somewhat smacks of jazz. The radio maestros are pretty apt to point with pride in the effort to justify the jazz monopoly of the air. But it was the eminent critic, Ernest Newman, we believe, who observed long since that when music gets as good as Mr. Gershwin's best, it no longer deserves to be soiled with that barbaric label.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

FEB 13 1932

The Observation Post

By Walter Brown, Dramatic Editor

String Music Tonight.

A suggestion is made that those who enjoy string music in handsome surroundings should remember the open-to-the-public concert in the Tapestry Hall of the Morgan Memorial this evening.

A string orchestra under the direction of Harold Berkley and the Memnon String Quartet will play, the concert being sponsored by the Hartford School of Music.

The program, already announced, includes the Avison E minor Concerto Grosso, the Bach Sarabande and Bourree, the Beethoven Quartet, Opus 18, No. 1, F major and Grieg's "Holberg Suite." The concert is scheduled to begin at 8:15.

Mr. Gershwin Taken Seriously.

A lot of followers of music in Hartford have heard with pleasure some of the works of George Gershwin, especially in the musical shows wherein his melodic talents have found good expression. And of course nearly everyone who has ever listened to the radio has heard the well-known "Rhapsody in Blue," over and over again. The obese Mr. Whiteman brought that opus to Hartford's consciousness when it was new and he was touring with an orchestra in straight orchestral concerts to show what could be done with a straight jazz program for concert purposes only. He showed. In Foot Guard Armory. And many music lovers have heard the "Rhapsody in Blue" much better played since then.

Mr. Gershwin has done other orchestral work since that time—work that has had place on programs of the leading orchestras. His Concerto in F for piano and orchestra was played in New York a year later than the Rhapsody (in 1925); he wrote "An American in Paris" that dates 1928; and now he has his "Second Rhapsody" for orchestra and piano and Mr. Koussevitzky has been playing it in Boston and New York with the composer assisting.

—

Now whether one likes Mr. Gershwin's compositions or not (and there are many who do not like them at all, just as there are many who think them superb examples of the music of the time) it is undeniable that anything that gets the professional attention of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his assemblage of artists rates careful critical attention; and the new work has been accorded just that.

The score is an elongation of some incidental passages composed for a motion-picture and originally bore the title "Rhapsody in Rivets," which names gives a key to its impressionism. It suggests, in short, the fearsome chatter that builds up the skyscrapers, the noises of the metropolitan streets, and in its second part introduces the contrastign rhythms of dance-jazz and sentimental song.

—

Our opera-explaining friend, Mr. Downes of the New York Times, gives us the brief historical facts included in the preceding paragraphs, compares the newer work of Mr. Gershwin with the earlier, and speaks of its present performance in New York, as follows:

> "But with all its immaturities the Rhapsody in Blue is more individual and originative than the piece heard last night. In fact, the Second Rhapsody is imitative in many ways of the Rhapsody in Blue. One of the figures of the first part, and certain harmonic cadences, and the song theme of the middle part, have all quite direct derivations from the earlier work. Furthermore, the Second Rhapsody is too long for its material.
>
> "The work was superly performed. Mr. Koussevitzky led the orchestra as earnestly as if he had been introducing a new symphony by a Roussel or a Miascoysky, and patiently labored to obtain from the players the last ounce of their energy. It was a virtuoso performance. Mr. Gershwin played a modest piano part simply but with the composer's authority. There was royal welcome for the composer, the performers, the music. Neverthless, we have had bttr things from Mr. Gershwin, and we expect better in time to come."

—

Mr. Gilman, in the Herald Tribune, was not in a mood of worship of the modern for the modern's sake when he wrote his notice. But he gives the facts of the case as he sees them, basing on a statement that it is "seldom that a Boston Symphony audience is privileged to hear so eminent a personage as Mr. George Gershwin" the report that "only Mr. Paderewski, perhaps, could have drawn a gathering comparable in numbers if not in kind with that which stood patiently at the rear of the hall (Carnegie) Friday evening while Mr. Koussevitzky cruelly delayed the appearance of George I by playing a couple of superfluous introductory numbers by Prokofieff and d'Indy."

Of the music itself Mr. Gilman writes:

> "The rivets, extracted from the title, remain in the score. The opening tattoo, heard on the piano at the beginning of the piece, is virtually its basic theme. Of course, the music is not all rivets. Mr. Gershwin was mindful of the need for contrast. In a world that knows too well the sound of the pneumatic drill, the lyric impulse still occasionally breaks its bounds. So Mr. Gershwin, quite properly, pays his respects to song. 'I want merely,' he told an interviewer, 'to write a broad flowing melody, the same as Bach, Brahms or Wagner would have done.'
>
> "Needless to say, he gives us, also, music employing those idioms with which, long since, he caught the ear of the world. Jazzarella, undiminished in gusto and vitality, dances here and languishes, and has her way with us. The happy few, as Stendhal called them, will recognize and value the skill of her evolutions and the subtlety of her guile. Those who must remain outside the gates, lonely in the outer court, will know, from the nature of the distant cheers, that music's most enlivened daughter is, as usual, bringing down the house."

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE MIAMI, FLA.
NEWS

(4)

FEB 1 3 1932

Gershwin Again

George Gershwin has been the trump card of the defenders of jazz since that night in 1924 when Paul Whiteman's band, one of the more melodious and pretentious jazz orchestras, gave his "Rhapsody in Blue" its first public rendition. Since then Mr. Gershwin has contributed a "Piano Concerto" and "An American in Paris." But all past performances paled when he appeared in New York the other evening as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, with his new "Rhapsody No. 2" as the piece de resistance.

Mr. Gershwin trails the jazz tag because he still writes light tunes for the musical shows and occasional orchestrations for the movies. It was one of the latter efforts, as a matter of fact, which gave rise ultimately to "Rhapsody No. 2." The heroine of an inane film were shown wandering through the metropolis in search of the hero. It was Mr. Gershwin's job to interpret her emotions in an orchestral sequence. Thus in the Hollywood atmosphere, "redolent of oranges and Greta Garbo," as Dr. Isaac Goldberg, the Gershwin biographer, puts it, the idea of the composition was born.

But its theme came from Gotham on the Atlantic coast—the rat-a-tat of the pneumatic riveters of the skyscraper builders. In the rhapsody this is simulated largely by repeated notes, decisively accented. Beethoven drew inspiration from the tick-tock of the metronome. The raindrops sang to Chopin. Why shouldn't a Gershwin, questions Dr. Goldberg, adapt the cacophony of modern building construction? American industry has enlivened the muse before. Poets put it in verse, painters on canvas. Mr. Gershwin had precedent in that seemingly short-lived symphony in which one George Antheil combined the clangor of gongs, the shriek of whistles and the grinding of gears. Conductor Eugene Goosens of the Cincinnati Symphony orchestra, riding the engine cab at every chance, enjoys the rhythm of the locomotive wheels clicking on the rails.

At all events, here is Mr. Gershwin again in very distinguished company, the musical organization of the country's cultural capital parading his opus that somewhat smacks of jazz. The radio maestros are pretty apt to point with pride in the effort to justify the jazz monopoly of the air. But it was the eminent critic, Ernest Newman, we believe, who observed long since that when music becomes as good as Mr. Gershwin's best, it no longer deserves to be soiled with that barbaric label.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

[illegible] 129

7 FEB 12 1932

Gershwin's New Rhapsody

Composer as Soloist at Boston Symphony Concert

By WALTER HART BLUMENTHAL

GERSHWIN added a notch to his fame with the rendition of his newest composition at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last Friday night at Carnegie Hall. Under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky, with the composer as collaborating pianist, the newly completed "Second Rhapsody" won the plaudits of a large audience. Although the composition was finished last Spring and given a trial audition in a studio of the National Broadcasting Company on June 26th, Gershwin made changes in the score subsequently. Originally entitled "Rhapsody in Rivets," it had a thematic treatment of the staccato tattoo of riveters working on the skeleton of a skyscraper. The composer, however, somewhat modified the rhythmic motif and was content to let his work be programmed merely as "Second Rhapsody."

There is less of the racking iteration of the rivet-theme in the final work than there was in the more metallic original. And there is an obbligato which has much of that melody Gershwin commands when he so desires. There is technical competence to this new work. With Mr. Gershwin at the piano, it need hardly be said that the audience was pleased. If it cannot be said that his art has advanced over his previous compositions, he has decisively shown that he has no intention of relinquishing his musical interpretation of America. It is almost eight years since Mr. Gershwin's now famous "Rhapsody in Blue" was brought out at Paul Whiteman's concert in Aeolian Hall. It was this composition which brought him to national notice.

Gershwin was born in Brooklyn in 1898. He was thirteen before he started to play the piano. At the age of sixteen he began work as a "song-plugger" for music publishing houses, frequently playing during the day in vaudeville acts, and until late in the night in cafes or cabarets. He took up the study of harmony under Rubin Goldmark, and in 1923 made his first appearance at Aeolian Hall in New York as accompanist for Eva Gauthier in a group of his own songs. The year following, his "Rhapsody in Blue" was played for the first time by this composer and Paul Whiteman's Orchestra. Walter Damrosch was instrumental in forwarding the young man's career.

The music of George Gershwin lifted the level of jazz to a distinct and by no means meritricious phase of American music. It seems that while in Hollywood about a year ago, contributing to the movie "Delicious," Gershwin began the earlier version of his "Rhapsody in Rivets," as it was then called. The opening tattoo heard on the piano at the outset of the composition constitutes the basic theme. His talent is evinced in the fact that he does not labor this motif of the pneumatic drill, but permits the lyric impulse to have interludes in his work.

It is given to few American composers so early in their careers to have such reclame as has been accorded Gershwin. Last year a biography of him appeared at the hands of Isaac Goldberg, the Boston writer, and in that volume is recounted the rise of this unusual figure in the contemporary musical world. His "Concerto in F" has been played by several of the foremost orchestras of the world, and it is said that he is now under contract with the Metropolitan for an American opera.

It is not generally known that he did a one-act 'negro opera' entitled "One Hundred and Thirty-fifth Street." This was written about 1923, and since then the composer has produced a number of lighter musical scores, the operetta "Song of the Flame," and the musical comedy "Tip-Toes."

The "Concerto" was the first work Gershwin scored for symphonic orchestra. Although it follows classical models in a somewhat distant way, Gershwin constantly injects his own highly personal musical idiom.

In his recent lighter work, he has had the collaboration of his lyric-writing brother, Ira, and the story of the recognition won by the pair constitutes an interesting record of consistent rise. The reception accorded by Boston to the "Second Rhapsody" was not less hearty at Carnegie Hall. It is now likely that it will be played abroad, where Gershwin is heralded as a typical American musical figure.

Strauss Work at Symphony

Amer Feb 13

Louis Speyer, English horn player of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is soloist in the current pair of concerts led by Dr. Koussevitzky, playing with the orchestra a rhapsody originally written for saxophone, and heard yesterday as a novelty in these concerts. The music surprised in being not merely a vehicle for the display of Mr. Speyer's lovely tone and refined technique, but also as being worth-while for its own sake.

The rhapsody was preceded by the Prokofieff "Classical" Symphony and followed by the Ravel Rhapsodie Espagnole, brilliantly played by the orchestra. The principal item was "Also Sprach Zarathustra," extraordinary tone-poem of Richard Strauss, a fitting musical commentary on the work of the mad genius, Nietzsche. Dr. Koussevitzky had worked out a presentation bringing out the beauty of the work in its clearest lines. But it seemed to at least one listener that he was over-anxious for the orchestra did not respond with its accustomed brilliance. Ragged attacks were not uncommon, and at one point the thread of musical discourse was in danger of being broken. None the less one is grateful for the fine playing of most of the work, notably for the majestic introduction.

The matinee audience included many visiting celebrities of the Chicago Opera Company, including, among others, conductors Pollak and Cooper and stage-director Dr. Otto Erhardt. M. S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

FEB 1 1 1932

SYMPHONIC MUSIC

"Music Lover" Explains Why He Prefers It

To the Editor of The Courant:—

I am glad to see that a sentiment exists among readers of The Courant in favor of symphony music. Personally I would rather hear one performance by a Koussevitzky or a Toscanini than a whole series of songbirds (male or female). It takes a mighty good musician to compete against a hundred.

MUSIC LOVER.

Farmington, Feb. 10, 1932.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN

130 FEB 14 1932

Composition From Pen Of Gershwin

Writer Considers Second Rhapsody And Wonders Why It Was Selected By Koussevitzky

By JOHN ALAN HAUGHTON

NEW YORK.

JUST why foreign orchestral conductors elect to play some of the American music which they do is a problem difficult of solution. It is true that America has never produced a symphony like the Schubert C Major or the Brahms First, but some rather good music has been written on these shores.

And yet, piffle such as trickles from the pen of George Gershwin is given place on a serious symphonic program of a serious musical body like the Boston Symphony! Mr. Koussevitzky gave two performances of Mr. Gershwin's so-called Second Rhapsody last week with the composer at the piano. Some people applauded it.

ATTEMPT AT HUMOR?

Rumor has it that the work was originally called Rivet Rhapsody, which may be the clever composer's idea of being furiously funny. There is a type of mind that confuses alliteration with humor. But, wander around as you please, like Alice in the garden of the Looking Glass House, and you find yourself coming in again at the door of why it was played at all. But, then, why was the Rhapsody in Blue ever played at all? To echo the tag line in a play popular some seasons ago: God knows!

Burno Walter put on a good concert, mostly Wagner, which began with Weber's Freischuetz Overture, a gesture, perhaps, over the shoulder, to the fact that Wagner owed much to Weber. With Harold Bauer as soloist, the Beethoven G. Major concerto was played. Of Wagner there was the Tannhaeuser Overture and Bacchanale, the Siegfried Idyll and the Tristan Prelude and Finale. Conservative, perhaps, but satisfactory stuff when all's said and done. Mr. Walter's Wagner is good, solid stuff, less scintillating than that of Toscanini, perhaps, but well thought-out and musicianly in its logic.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

FEB 14 1932

Copland's "Symphonic Ode," composed for the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be played by the orchestra for the first time on Friday afternoon at Symphony Hall in Boston, with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting. Yelly d'Aranyi, violinist, will be the soloist in Mozart's concerto in D major, on the same program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

FEB 14 1932

Serge Koussevitzky has been invited and has agreed to go to Vienna and be a member of the jury for the international contest of singers and violinists to be held in Vienna next Summer. Other members of this jury will be Sir Henry Hadow and Cesare Nordio.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ERIE, PA.
DISPATCH-HERALD

FEB 14 1932

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussvitzky, director, was the recipient of $20,000 last month, a bequest of the late Judge Frederick Pickering Cabot, who had been chairman of the board of trustees.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
CHRONICLE

FEB 14 1932

Boston Symphony Cabot Beneficiary

When Judge Frederick Pickering Cabot died last month, the Boston Symphony lost one of its best and most generous friends. His will included a bequest of $20,000 to the orchestra, of whose board of trustees he was chairman.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL COURIER

FEB 20 1932

Boston Symphony Coming To Woolsey

On Wednesday evening, March 2nd, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the conductorship of the world-famed Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will make its annual visit to New Haven with its entire personnel of 110 men, unchanged from last year. The concert, as has been the case for many years, will be looked forward to by music-lovers of this vicinity as a spectacular musical event, and a huge audience will hear the usual brilliant program that Dr. Koussevitzky may be counted upon to arrange. At the concerts both last year and the year before hundreds were unable to gain admission, so great was the demand for tickets, and with interest in the orchestra increasing every season the forthcoming concert will no doubt call for the largest crowd in the history of symphony concerts in New Haven.

A retrospect of the Boston Symphony orchestra's fifty years tells a clear story of its past and present eminence in the world of music.

In 1881, the late Major Henry L. Higginson realized the first dream and aspiration of his life by founding in Boston an orchestra of European standards—a phenomenon then unknown to America. The idea had come to him as a student in Vienna. It was an ambitious dream for an impecunious young man, but after many years, having made his fortune as a banker, he was able to give the Boston Symphony orchestra to the world. He engaged the finest musicians in Europe, and brought to this country a succession of the greatest conductors of their time. He set a new precedent by exacting of the musicians entire devotion of their talents to the orchestra. The conductor he gave entire artistic freedom. The wisdom of these policies soon showed as each conductor expended his genius to the cumulative improvement of an ensemble which soon had the world's attention.

George Henschel first established the orchestra in his three seasons of 1881-1884. Then came Wilhelm Gericke, Arthur Nikisch and Emil Paur, to conduct in that order, followed by a return of Gericke.

In 1900, Symphony hall, the orchestra's present home, was built. Dr. Karl Muck assumed the leadership of the orchestra in 1906, to be followed by Max Fiedler, Henri Rabaud, and Pierre Monteux.

Dr. Koussevitzky began his term in 1924. The great Russian leader has brought new beauties to the Boston Symphony concerts, a fresh importance and distinction reflected in the greatly enlarged public, the festivals and special choral concerts, the broadened repertory—new and old—of the regular concerts, and the qualities of performance which are as indefinable as the genius who directs them.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Woolsey Hall March 2

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

FEB 20 1932

Famous Pianist, Composer and Instructor

Harold Morris' recent acclamatory reception by music lovers and critics, upon the occasions of his three appearances as composer-soloist with the Boston Sympohny Orchestra, when his Concerto was played under the inspired direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, has greatly enlarged the hope of all who look forward expectantly to the future of American music. Mr. Morris comes from San Antonio, Texas, and is an alumnus of the university of his native State. During his formative years, neither the united dissuasions of parents, nor the "practical" advice of well meaning professors proved effectual to divorce his musical aspirations. During this time, in collaboration with a fellow student Mr. Morris wrote and presented an operetta "The Masqueraders." After receiving his B. A. degree Morris entered Cincinnati Conservatory as a scholarship student, remaining there for four years study. He came to New York in 1919 and made his concert debut as pianist in two Aeolin recitals. Mr. Morris has devoted much time to the preparation of chamber music, all of which has been skillfully presented and appreciated by his audiences. His first piano sonata was introduced by the late Oliver Denton in a New York recital. His sting quartet and trio were chosen by a committe of distinguished critics as representative American works to send a broad. Mr. Morris lives and works in New York. But when the summer days come he retires, with Mrs. Morris and Susanne, their little daughter, to the MacDowell Colony at Peterboro, N. H., where much of the composer's creative work of recent years has been written.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW YORKER

SARTORIAL NOTES: Members of the Philharmonic-Symphony wear full evening dress, but members of the Boston Symphony wear tails and black vests, except Mr. Koussevitzky, who wears a white vest. One of the drivers of Tiffany's delivery cars wears gray spats.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

FEB 26 1932

Dr. Koussevitzky's Program.

The program for the Boston Sympathy Orchestra's concert in Bushnell Hall on Tuesday evening, March 1, will come to a magnificent climax in the Beethoven "Eroica" Symphony—which work, my indefatigable musical friend Miss Frances Johnson tells me, has been played here by the Boston Orchestra on three previous occasions at least; on November 13, 1911 under Dr. Mav Fiedler; on November 27, 1922 in the conductorship of Pierre Monteux; and by Dr. Koussevitzky on February 6, 1927. The symphony, of course, will make up the second part of next Tuesday evening's concert.

The Prokofieff "Classical Symphony" will be used as the opening number of Tuesday's program with the "Lohengrin" Vorspiel to follow. And then will come the "Daphne and Chloe" Suite No. 2 of Ravel—which was played here by the Boston Orchestra on December 3, 1928.

I believe it will not be questioned that the "Lohengrin" Vorspiel has been played here before, but the Prokofieff work will be new to most of those in the big audience Tuesday evening. We had that composer's "Love of the Three Oranges" Suite here in the 1927 concert, with the "Eroica" Symphony—and at that time the Prokofieff music was very new in the orchestra's repertory, the first performance in the United States having been given in Boston November 12, 1926.

It is quite unnecessary to state that there will be an overflowing audience at the concert Tuesday evening; and perhaps, too, it is unnecessary to remind people to get to the hall before 8:15. For at any instant after that hour Dr Koussevitzky may be expected to begin playing!

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST

FEB 27 1932

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give their last pair of concerts but one in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. At the former will come the first performance here of the Symphonic Ode which Aaron Copland dedicated to the orchestra at its fiftieth anniversary last season. The concert will open with Bach's Suite No. 2 in B minor, for flute and strings, with Georges Laurent as soloist, and close with Brahms's Fourth Symphony.

At next Saturday's matinee, Koussevitzky will give the first New York performance of Paul Hindemith's "Konzertmusik" for brass instruments and strings. This score was likewise written for the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its fiftieth anniversary, and first performed in Boston last spring. The program will also include a concerto by Philip Emanuel Bach in D major which has been arranged for a more modern orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg, the son-in-law of Rimsky-Korsakoff. Ravel's "Rhapsodie Espagnole" will also be played and the program will close with the Second Symphony in D major of Sibelius.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL COURIER

FEB 26 1932

Boston Symphony To Play Ravel's Rhapsodie

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which comes to Woolsey Hall next Wednesday evening with its full quota of 110 musicians under the leadership of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will give an unusually popular program according to the announcement recently made.

The Sixth Symphony of Tchai kovsky, better known as the "Pathe tic", and Ravel's Rhapsodie Espag nole will vie with each other fc popular favor, for both are pa ticularly well liked by all classes (music-lovers.

The novelty portion of the pr gram will be Hindemith's "Ko zert-music", written especially fc the Boston Symphony's 50th an niversary last year, and being play ed for the first time outside of Boston here next week. The concert will commence with Philip Emanuel Bach's Concerto, a most acceptable orchestral number.

Providing as it does, one of the high lights of the local musical season, the famous orchestra and its great conductor will no doubt be even more than ever warmly received with such an appealing program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW YORKER

FEB 27 1932

Bandmaster

KOUSSEVITZKY, here this coming week with the Boston Symphony, has his clothes made with great care. When you flail your arms around before an audience you have to feel sure that your coat collar won't hike up and your sleeves look funny. Koussevitzky is probably the best-dressed of the eminent conductors, unless it's Stokowski. (Toscanini doesn't worry about such things.)

They say that Koussevitzky practices with a baton in front of a mirror. This story may have grown out of his antics as a boy in Russia, when he would arrange chairs in a room, bow to them, conduct them, berate them, with the score of some symphony open in front of him. He would sing different parts of the score as he conducted the surprised chairs.

When he was in his twenties he married the daughter of a wealthy Moscow merchant, who promised him anything he wanted as a wedding gift. Koussevitzky said he wanted a symphony orchestra, and although taken aback for a moment, his father-in-law kept his promise; he got together the foremost musicians of Moscow and Koussevitzky assembled his orchestra. The orchestra made him famous. For seven years he took it on tour, giving free concerts, sometimes in small towns along the Volga whose inhabitants had never heard an orchestra before. On these river trips the orchestra travelled by special steamer, another gift to the conductor from his wife's father.

Koussevitzky didn't just leap from chair-conducting to orchestra-leading. He had studied music in the Philharmonic school at Moscow and had played a bit on the double bass in orchestras. Now he is the only living virtuoso on the double bass. He hasn't given a public recital in two years, but every year on his birthday he gives a concert to his intimate friends in his Paris home.

He is always looking for new composers and has discovered or championed a dozen or more young Americans. In the season 1930-31 his orchestra played nine works for the first time anywhere (including two by Americans) and ten for the first time in Boston. He will listen to the first playing of something modern, perhaps by a group of chamber-music amateurs, and seem uninterested throughout. When it is finished he often takes the score and criticizes the interpretation of it in detail, as if he had known it for years.

One of his recreations is taking long morning walks with his Boston terrier, named Droll. This has gone on for seven years. Some say that on these walks he longs for Paris (the only place in which he owns a home). He was pretty firmly established there and making quite a stir when an offer of fifty thousand a year lured him to Boston. He has his own music-publishing house in the French capital with an advisory board of five prominent composers. He overrode the objections of all five of them when he published Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps."

INFORMATION OBSCURED

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN

130 FEB 1 4 1932

Composition From Pen Of Gershwin

Writer Considers Second Rhapsody And Wonders Why It Was Selected By Koussevitzky

By JOHN ALAN HAUGHTON

NEW YORK.

JUST why foreign orchestral conductors elect to play some of the American music which they do is a problem difficult of solution. It is true that America has never produced a symphony like the Schubert C Major or the Brahms First, but some rather good music has been written on these shores.

And yet, piffle such as trickles from the pen of George Gershwin is given place on a serious symphonic program of a serious musical body like the Boston [illegible]! Mr. Koussevitzky gave two performances of Mr. Gershwin's so-called Second Rhapsody last week with the composer at the piano. Some people applauded it.

ATTEMPT AT HUMOR?

Rumor has it that the work was originally called Rivet Rhapsody, which may be the clever composer's idea of being furiously funny. There is a type of mind that confuses alliteration with humor. But, wander around as you please, like Alice in the garden of the Looking Glass House, and you find yourself coming in again at the door of why it was played at all. But, then, why was the Rhapsody in Blue ever played at all? To echo the tag line in a play popular some seasons ago: God knows!

Burno Walter put on a good concert, mostly Wagner, which began with Weber's Freischuetz Overture, a gesture, perhaps, over the shoulder, to the fact that Wagner owed much to Weber. With Harold Bauer as soloist, the Beethoven G. Major concerto was played. Of Wagner there was the Tannhaeuser Overture and Bacchanale, the Siegfried Idyll and the Tristan Prelude and Finale. Conservative, perhaps, but satisfactory stuff when all's said and done. Mr. Walter's Wagner is good, solid stuff, less scintillating than that of Toscanini, perhaps, but well thought-out and musicianly in its logic.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

FEB 1 4 1932

Copland's "Symphonic Ode," composed for the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be played by the orchestra for the first time on Friday afternoon at Symphony Hall in Boston, with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting. Yelly d'Aranyi, [illegible], will be the soloist in Mozart's concerto in D major, on the same program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

FEB 1 4 1932

Serge Koussevitzky has been invited and has agreed to go to Vienna and be a member of the jury for the international contest of singers and violinists to be held in Vienna next Summer. Other members of this jury will be Sir Henry Hadow and Cesare Nordio.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ERIE, PA.
DISPATCH-HERALD

FEB 1 4 1932

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussvitzky, director, was the recipient of $20,000 last month, a bequest of the late Judge Frederick Pickering Cabot, who had been chairman of the board of trustees.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
CHRONICLE

FEB 1 4 1932

Boston Symphony Cabot Beneficiary

When Judge Frederick Pickering Cabot died last month, the Boston Symphony lost one of its best and most generous friends. His will included a bequest of $20,000 to the orchestra, of whose board of trustees he was chairman.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL COURIER

FEB 2 0 1932

Boston Symphony Coming To Woolsey

On Wednesday evening, March 2nd, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the conductorship of the world-famed Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will make its annual visit to New Haven with its entire personnel of 110 men, unchanged from last year. The concert, as has been the case for many years, will be looked forward to by music-lovers of this vicinity as a spectacular musical event, and a huge audience will hear the usual brilliant program that Dr. Koussevitzky may be counted upon to arrange. At the concerts both last year and the year before hundreds were unable to gain admission, so great was the demand for tickets, and with interest in the orchestra increasing every season the forthcoming concert will no doubt call for the largest crowd in the history of symphony concerts in New Haven.

A retrospect of the Boston Symphony orchestra's fifty years tells a clear story of its past and present eminence in the world of music.

In 1881, the late Major Henry L. Higginson realized the first dream and aspiration of his life by founding in Boston an orchestra of European standards—a phenomenon then unknown to America. The idea had come to him as a student in Vienna. It was an ambitious dream for an impecunious young man, but after many years, having made his fortune as a banker, he was able to give the Boston Symphony orchestra to the world. He engaged the finest musicians in Europe, and brought to this country a succession of the greatest conductors of their time. He set a new precedent by exacting of the musicians entire devotion of their talents to the orchestra. The conductor he gave entire artistic freedom. The wisdom of these policies soon showed as each conductor expended his genius to the cumulative improvement of an ensemble which soon had the world's attention.

George Henschel first established the orchestra in his three seasons of 1881-1884. Then came Wilhelm Gericke, Arthur Nikisch and Emil Paur, to conduct in that order, followed by a return of Gericke.

In 1900, Symphony hall, the orchestra's present home, was built. Dr. Karl Muck assumed the leadership of the orchestra in 1906, to be followed by Max Fiedler, Henri Rabaud, and Pierre Monteux.

Dr. Koussevitzky began his term in 1924. The great Russian leader has brought new beauties to the Boston Symphony concerts, a fresh importance and distinction reflected in the greatly enlarged public, the festivals and special choral concerts, the broadened repertory—new and old—of the regular concerts, and the qualities of performance which are as indefinable as the genius who directs them.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Woolsey Hall March 2

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

FEB 2 0 1932

Famous Pianist, Composer and Instructor

Harold Morris' recent acclamatory reception by music lovers and critics, upon the occasions of his three appearances as composer-soloist with the Boston Sympohny Orchestra, when his Concerto was played under the inspired direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, has greatly enlarged the hope [illegible] who look forward expectantly to the future of American music. Mr. Morris comes from San Antonio, Texas, and is an alumnus of the university of his native State. During his formative years, neither the united dissuasions of parents, nor the "practical" advice of well meaning professors proved effectual to divorce his musical aspirations. During this time, in collaboration with a fellow student Mr. Morris wrote and presented an operetta "The Masqueraders." After receiving his B. A. degree Morris entered Cincinnati Conservatory as a scholarship student, remaining there for four years study. He came to New York in 1919 and made his concert debut as pianist in two Aeolin recitals. Mr. Morris has devoted much time to the preparation of chamber music, all of which has been skillfully presented and appreciated by his audiences. His first piano sonata was introduced by the late Oliver Denton in a New York recital. His sting quartet and trio were chosen by a committe of distinguished critics as representative American works to send a broad. Mr. Morris lives and works in New York. But when the summer days come he retires, with Mrs. Morris and Susanne, their little daughter, to the MacDowell Colony at Peterboro, N. H., where much of the composer's creative work of recent years has been written.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW YORKER

FEB 2 0 1932

SARTORIAL NOTES: Members of the Philharmonic-Symphony wear full evening dress, but members of the Boston Symphony wear tails and black vests, except Mr. Koussevitzky, who wears a white vest. One of the drivers of Tiffany's delivery cars wears gray spats.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

FEB 26 1932

Dr. Koussevitzky's Program.

The [illegible] for the Boston Sympathy Orchestra's concert in Bushnell Hall on Tuesday evening, March 1, will come to a magnificent climax in the Beethoven "Eroica" Symphony—which work, my indefatigable musical friend Miss Frances Johnson tells me, has been played here by the Boston Orchestra on three previous occasions at least; on November 13, 1911 under Dr. Mav Fiedler; on November 27, 1922 in the conductorship of Pierre Monteux; and by Dr. Koussevitzky on February 6, 1927. The symphony, of course, will make up the second part of next Tuesday evening's concert.

The Prokofieff "Classical Symphony" will be used as the opening number of Tuesday's program with the "Lohengrin" Vorspiel to follow. And then will come the "Daphne and Chloe" Suite No. 2 of Ravel—which was played here by the Boston Orchestra on December 3, 1928.

I believe it will not be questioned that the "Lohengrin" Vorspiel has been played here before, but the Prokofieff work will be new to most of those in the big audience Tuesday evening. We had that composer's "Love of the Three Oranges" Suite here in the 1927 concert, with the "Eroica" Symphony—and at that time the Prokofieff music was very new in the orchestra's repertory, the first performance in the United States having been given in Boston November 12, 1926.

It is quite unnecessary to state that there will be an overflowing audience at the concert Tuesday evening; and perhaps, too, it is unnecessary to remind people to get to the hall before 8:15. For at any instant after that hour Dr Koussevitzky may be expected to begin playing!

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST

FEB 27 1932

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give their last pair of concerts but one in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. At the former will come the first performance here of the Symphonic Ode which Aaron Copland dedicated to the orchestra at its fiftieth anniversary last season. The concert will open with Bach's Suite No. 2 in B minor, for flute and strings, with Georges Laurent as soloist, and close with Brahms's Fourth Symphony.

At next Saturday's matinee, Koussevitzky will give the first New York performance of Paul Hindemith's "Konzertmusik" for brass instruments and strings. This score was likewise written for the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its fiftieth anniversary, and first performed in Boston last spring. The program will also include a concerto by Philip Emanuel Bach in D major which has been arranged for a more modern orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg, the son-in-law of Rimsky-Korsakoff. Ravel's "Rhapsodie Espagnole" will also be played and the program will close with the Second Symphony in D major of Sibelius.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL COURIER

FEB 26 1932

Boston Symphony To Play Ravel's Rhapsodie

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which comes to Woolsey Hall next Wednesday evening with its full quota of 110 musicians under the leadership of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will give an unusually popular program according to the announcement recently made.

The Sixth Symphony of Tchaikovsky, better known as the "Pathetic", and Ravel's Rhapsodie Espagnole will vie with each other for popular favor, for both are particularly well liked by all classes of music-lovers.

The novelty portion of the program will be Hindemith's "Konzert-music", written especially for the Boston Symphony's 50th anniversary last year, and being played for the first time outside of Boston here next week. The concert will commence with Philip Emanuel Bach's Concerto, a most acceptable orchestral number.

Providing as it does, one of the high lights of the local musical season, the famous orchestra and its great conductor will no doubt be even more than ever warmly received with such an appealing program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW YORKER

FEB 27 1932

Bandmaster

KOUSSEVITZKY, here this coming week with the Boston Symphony, has his clothes made with great care. When you flail your arms around before an audience you have to feel sure that your coat collar won't hike up and your sleeves look funny. Koussevitzky is probably the best-dressed of the eminent conductors, unless it's Stokowski. (Toscanini doesn't worry about such things.)

They say that Koussevitzky practices with a baton in front of a mirror. This story may have grown out of his antics as a boy in Russia, when he would arrange chairs in a room, bow to them, conduct them, berate them, with the score of some symphony open in front of him. He would sing different parts of the score as he conducted the surprised chairs.

When he was in his twenties he married the daughter of a wealthy Moscow merchant, who promised him anything he wanted as a wedding gift. Koussevitzky said he wanted a symphony orchestra, and although taken aback for a moment, his father-in-law kept his promise; he got together the foremost musicians of Moscow and Koussevitzky assembled his orchestra. The orchestra made him famous. For seven years he took it on tour, giving free concerts, sometimes in small towns along the Volga whose inhabitants had never heard an orchestra before. On these river trips the orchestra travelled by special steamer, another gift to the conductor from his wife's father.

Koussevitzky didn't just leap from chair-conducting to orchestra-leading. He had studied music in the Philharmonic school at Moscow and had played a bit on the double bass in orchestras. Now he is the only living virtuoso on the double bass. He hasn't given a public recital in two years, but every year on his birthday he gives a concert to his intimate friends in his Paris home.

He is always looking for new composers and has discovered or championed a dozen or more young Americans. In the season 1930-31 his orchestra played nine works for the first time anywhere (including two by Americans) and ten for the first time in Boston. He will listen to the first playing of something modern, perhaps by a group of chamber-music amateurs, and seem uninterested throughout. When it is finished he often takes the score and criticizes the interpretation of it in detail, as if he had known it for years.

One of his recreations is taking long morning walks with his Boston terrier, named Droll. This has gone on for seven years. Some say that on these walks he longs for Paris (the only place in which he owns a home). He was pretty firmly established there and making quite a stir when an offer of fifty thousand a year lured him to Boston. He has his own music-publishing house in the French capital with an advisory board of five prominent composers. He overrode the objections of all five of them when he published Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps."

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW HAVEN, CONN.

JOURNAL COURIER

FEB 27 1932

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Who Will Conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra Here Next Wednesday

Boston Symphony In Fine Program

Tchaikowsky 'Pathetic' Symphony And Ravel's Rhapsodie To Be Played Here.

Always one of the highlights of New Haven's musical season, the Boston Sympathy Orchestra's concert in Woolsey hall next Wednesday evening promises to be a particularly appealing occasion this season. The appearance alone of the great orchestral organization of one hundred and ten men under the leadership of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky is magnet enough to draw a great audience, regardless of the program to be played. But the list of numbers to be heard next week will find so much favor with all lovers of fine music that it is a foregone conclusion that Woolsey hall will again hold one of the largest audiences in history for the event.

The first number will be a Concerto of Philip Emanuel Bach, the most talented son of Johann Sebastian Bach. This Concerto has been especially arranged for Dr. Koussevitzky by Maximilian Steinberg, the talented nephew of Rimsky-Korsakov. Steinberg has used a string orchestra with a small choir of wind instruments. His scoring is not in strict accordance with the period, since he gives much of the melody of the slow movement to the English Horn, an instrument of modern usage. In spirit, however, Steinberg's treatment is considered by no means irreverent or anachronistic.

A notable novelty which has had its first American performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is Hindemith's "Konzertmusic." This score, in fact, was written especially for the orchestra on the occasion of its 50th anniversary, and performed in Boston last April. It is having its first performances outside Boston this season. Paul Hindemith is often named as the most talented of the younger German composers. A talented viola player, his creative work nevertheless has done far more to make his name known to the world. The "Konzertmusic" is in reality an orchestral concerto. The composer uses no wood-wind instruments in this piece but gains his rhythmic effects by the use of string and brass instruments only.

The Spanish Rhapsody of Maurice Ravel, foremost of living French composers, will also be played. The composers of France have long been intrigued by the characteristic dance rhythms and melodies of the land across the Pyrenees, and Ravel has most eloquently revealed this influence in his "Rapsodie Espagnole." The master colorist has scored in magnificent orchestral dress such characteristic dances of Spain as the "Habanera" and the "Maleguena." The suite ends with a festal movement entitled, "The Fair."

The symphony of this program will be the sixth of Tchaikovsky in B minor, known as the "Pathetic." This last symphony by the great Russian composer, written shortly before his death has perhaps done more than any other score to immortalize his name. The emotional outpouring of the first movement, the graceful scherzo in five rhythm, the brilliant march movement, and the tragic finale which ends in the very depths of the orchestra, are interpreted by the Russian conductor with an eloquence which will stand as one of the finest which this score has ever had.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

N. Y. SUN

FEB 27 1932

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its fourth visit and last but one of the season to New York to give concerts in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, March 3, and Saturday afternoon, March 5.

At the Thursday concert Serge Koussevitzky will introduce to New York the symphonic ode which Aaron Copland dedicated to the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its fiftieth anniversary last season. The first performance was deferred, however, until this year, when it was played in Boston on February 19 and 20. The complete Thursday program will be:

Suite No. 2, B minor, for flute and strings, Bach
Symphonic Ode..............Aaron Copland
Symphony No. 4, E minor.... ......Brahms

At the Saturday matinee Koussevitzky will give the first New York performance of Paul Hindemith's "Konzertmusik" for brass instruments and strings. This score was likewise written for the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its fiftieth anniversary and first performed in Boston last spring. The program will include a concerto by Philip Emanuel Bach in D major which has been arranged for a more modern orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg, the son-in-law of Rimsky-Korsakov. Ravel's "Rhapsodie Espagnole" will also be played. The program will close with the second symphony in D major of Sibelius.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

N. Y. Herald-Tribune

28 1932

The Boston Symphony Orchestra pays its last visit but one of the season to New York this week under Serge Koussevitzky's direction. The novelty of Thursday night's program at Carnegie Hall is the Symphonic Ode by the New York composer, Aaron Copland. This was dedicated to the orchestra for its fiftieth anniversary season, 1930-'31, but was not performed until February 19 and 20 of this year, in Symphony Hall. It is in one movement; the composer has given no explanation of the score other than its title.

In the concert of Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall, Dr. Koussevitzky will give the first New York performance of Paul Hindemith's Konzertmusik for brass instruments and strings. This also was written for the orchestra's semi-centennial, and first performed in Boston last spring.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BUFFALO, N. Y.

TIMES

FEB 28 1932

THE Boston Symphony orchestra will play next season a new symphony by the Finnish composer, Sibelius, who is forwarding the score to Koussevitsky.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

UNION

FEB 29 1932

Smith College

Smith Instructor's Work to Be Played

"Concerto Sacro," Written by Prof. Josten, on Program of Boston Symphony.

NORTHAMPTON, Feb. 28 — The "Concerto Sacro" by Prof. Werner Josten of the department of music at Smith College is to be the first number played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert Monday evening in Northampton. Under the direction of Sergei Koussevitsky, the orchestra will present a program beginning with Mr. Josten's "Concerto Sacro No. II" and continuing with Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony," Ravel's "Daphne and Chloe" and Brahms' "Fourth Symphony."

The "Concerto Sacro" has the distinction of being published this year by the Juillard Foundation, which each year selects one American symphonic work for publication in order to faciliate its performance by major orchestra. This work was performed for the first time as a concert of the orchestra of the graduate school of the Juillard Foundation in New York in March, 1929. Previously the first movement alone had been performed at Smith College in the commencement concert of 1928. In April, 1929, the Boston Symphony Orchestra performed the second part which it is to perform here next week.

Prof. Josten's list of compositions is a long one. In addition to more than 40 songs, he has written several works for chorals and orchestras as well as some symphonic works. Mr. Josten studied composition in Germany and Austria, chiefly under Dr. Rudolf Siegel. Before coming to America, Mr. Josten was assistant conductor at the Munich Opear House. Since 1923, he has been professor of composition and fugue at Smith College. Several years ago, he became interested in the revival of ancient operas and has given here the first performances in America of Monteverdi's "L'Incoronazione di Poppea," "Orfeo," Handel's "Julius Caesar," "Rodelinda,' and others.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW HAVEN, CONN.

JOURNAL COURIER

FEB 29 1932

Koussevitzky Master Of The Double Bass

Some years ago, in the Conservatory at Moscow, a pupil named Serge Koussevitzky astonished every one by his skill upon the double bass. He had chosen this unusual instrument because every student in the orchestral class was required to specialize in either a brass instrument—or the double bass.

It was not long before the young man was coaxing from his great lumbering instrument a tone, a songfulness, a dignity and grace that no one had dreamt the double bass could possess. That this giant violin had immense, awkward intervals, that it had to be bowed at arm's length, with a stoop, and its bow grasped fistwise like a hack saw, seemed to bother its young master not in the least. Soon the name of Serge Koussevitzky became known across Europe as a double bass virtuoso to whom no one in the present or past could be compared. He made his instrument discourse divinely, as if it were a 'cello of marvelously deepened and enriched tone.

As the Boston Symphony Orchestra which comes to Woolsey Hall Wednesday evening, passes its fiftieth year, its famed precision, ensemble, and tonal beauty excel even the most glorious days of its illustrious past. And these qualities are liberating more than ever before Koussevitzky's ranging artist's vision. . .

132

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1932

Only the Violin Is Lacking

(Bachrach—Boston)

Richard Burgin

Concertmaster and Occasional Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Who at Last Has Had a New Photograph Taken

---

Symphonic Saturday Trans Feb 1 '32

All things went for the better, at the Symphony Concert of Saturday, in the repetition of Mr. Gershwin's new Rhapsody. Before and after the performance, the audience was more cordial; while the performance in itself ran freer; caught at last the rhythmic impetus, the hard, bright tone, the seemingly slapdash progress intrinsic in such a music and essential to it. Even so, most of the impressions received on Friday stood unaltered. Unmistakably Mr. Gershwin is richer in technical resource, more skillful with technical process. Time and again he has taken thought before he wrote and is both the gainer and the loser in this transition from unreflective to considerate composition. The gusto of the Rhapsody in Blue swept the hearer before it. Now he also takes thought as he listens.

Forthwith comes well-grounded suspicion that Mr. Gershwin is neither choice nor self-critical with his musical matter. He fails to distinguish between what is individual to himself and what is commonplace from his theater-world; between the sound metal, the base metal and a fortuitous alloy. He has not learned what to discard. He embraces with an equal zest his platitudes, which may be cheap, and his inventions, which may be distinctive. All who follow the theater have watched Mr. O'Neill pull himself out of that selfsame pit. As he proceeds with symphonic composition, Mr. Gershwin may do likewise. Most young Americans, essaying the arts and praised from the outset in the practice of them, have found self-discipline and self-criticism the difficult necessities.

For the rest there is only to record the pleasure of the audience, on both Friday and Saturday, in the return of Dr. Koussevitzky for the second half of the symphonic year; in the reappearance of Mr. Burgin, recovered from an untimely accident, in the Concert-Master's chair; in such virtuoso-skill and musician-instinct as Mr. Polatschek again disclosed in the measures for solo-clarinet in Mr. Taylor's Carrollian Suite. Not the least of the satisfactions of the Symphony Concerts is the mingling of good will and discrimination. A young composer could ask for no better testing-ground.

H. T. P.

George Gershwin In the Home-Town

New York Hears and Judges His New Rhapsody Much As Did Boston

THE generous Mr. Koussevitzky, who possesses the "bountiful eye" of Scripture, offered his public a rare treat at the concert last Friday of his model orchestra in Carnegie Hall. It is seldom that a Boston Symphony audience is privileged to hear as soloist so eminent a personage as Mr. George Gershwin. Yet Mr. Gershwin not only played the piano at last Friday's exercises, but he co-operated with Mr. Koussevitzky in exhibiting, for the first time west of Boston, his newly completed Second Rhapsody "for orchestra with piano" (as the program carefully described the work).

It need hardly be said that the momentousness of the double event was recognized. Only Mr. Paderewski, perhaps, could have drawn a gathering comparable in numbers if not in kind with that which stood patiently at the rear of the hall last Friday while Mr. Koussevitzky cruelly delayed the appearance of George I. by playing a couple of superfluous introductory numbers by Prokofiev and Vincent d'Indy. [The Herald Tribune

It is not too serious [continues The Sun]. It is American, New York and specifically Broadway. It is jazz, of course, but jazz out of high school with some educational polish. There is no banjo strumming, no derby hatted trumpet and no inordinate use of the nasal mute. The trombone—originator of the true jazz slur—speaks the correct language at times and there is the incessant rhythm, two in a bar, without which jazz does not exist. This is the rhythm of the riveter riveting rivets the live-long day. It sounds just that way. The thematic material suggests the First Rhapsody over and over and the harmonies are characteristic of the Gershwin studio.

The orchestration is generally too thick which is a result of the attempt to fit the jazz style to a symphonic orchestra. The unctuous harmonies of the body of saxophones, trumpets and trombones in a jazz band are sui generis. Keeping the brass choir of a symphonic orchestra incessantly busy trying to supply the place of such harmonies must produce a heavy mass of tone when the rest of the orchestra is striving to balance the brass.

But these are perhaps secondary matters. The rhapsody is spirited, it is full of youth and recklessness, it is, indeed, young America of the untrammeled manners and the cocktail energy. But it is likely that most music lovers will believe that the First Rhapsody expressed America and its musical inclinations even better than this one. Mr. Gershwin possesses a unique talent and his endeavors to put jazz in the artistic category are interesting and commendable. He was heartily applauded after he and the great orchestra had performed his work with extraordinary brilliancy.

With all its immaturities, concludes The Times, the "Rhapsody in Blue" is more individual and originative than the new piece. In fact, the "Second Rhapsody" is imitative in many ways of the "Rhapsody in Blue." One of the figures of the first part, and certain harmonic cadences, and the song-theme of the middle part have all quite direct derivations from the earlier work. Furthermore, the "Second Rhapsody" is too long for its material.

The work was superbly performed. Mr. Koussevitzky led the orchestra as earnestly as if he had been introducing a new symphony by a Roussel or a Miaskovsky, and patiently labored to obtain from the players the last ounce of their energy. It was a virtuoso performance. Mr. Gershwin played a modest piano-part simply but with the composer's authority. There was royal welcome for the composer, the performers, the music. Nevertheless, we have had better things from Mr. Gershwin, and we expect better in time to come.

The Herald Tribune may also write the epilogue: "Needless to say, Mr. Gershwin gives us music employing those idioms with which, long since, he caught the ear of the world. Jazzarella, undiminished in gusto and vitality, dances here and languishes, and has her way with us. The happy few, as Stendhal called them, will recognize and value the skill of her evolutions and the subtlety of her guile. Those who must remain outside the gates, lonely in the outer court, will know, from the nature of the distant cheers, that music's most enlivened daughter is, as usual, bringing down the house."

Day's Report Of Bostonian Concert-Halls

Dr. Koussevitzky to Re-Play Strauss's "Zarathustra" Symphonic Matinee

TRANS. — FEB. 10.

IN February of 1929, after an interval of seven years, Dr Koussevitzky restored to the Symphony Concerts Struss's tone-poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra." In performance and with both audiences it fared well. Next Friday and Saturday he will re-play it. As it happens, Mr. Reiner and the Philadelphia Orchestra revived the piece last month in New York where in recent years it had been seldom heard. For the Herald Tribune Mr. Gilman wrote a preliminary article recalling the ebullient day when "Zarathustra" was new piece in America and the writers about music loosed upon it frenzies of rapture or hymns of hate. He also had a word to say about the enduring qualities of the music thirty years afterward. From that article come the following paragraphs:

It was more than a generation ago, [writes Mr. Gilman] that the unforgettable Huneker, reviewing the first New York performance of "Zarathustra" (in December, 1897, at a Boston Symphony concert under Emil Paur) declared that when the music reached the section called "The Song of the Night Wanderer," he "renounced Bach, Beethoven and Brahms, and became maddeningly intoxicated—not with joy, but with doubt, despair and defiance." "Never," he remarked, "shall I forget that screaming trumpet [sic] as it cut jaggedly across the baleful gloom! Sinister beyond compare was the atmosphere, and I could have cried aloud with Dante, 'Lo! this is Dis!'" Mr. Huneker recommended that "Also Sprach Zarathustra" be played once every season, and the audience he limited to poets, musicians, and madmen. "The latter, being Overmen, would grasp its sad truths." At that time, "Zarathustra' was a nine-days' wonder. Mr. Huneker was not the only critic who was moved to ransack Heaven and Hell for suitable images of praise or blame—though most of the appraisers stuck to Hell (or Bedlam) for their similes.

We have long since learned to view the once amazing score a good deal more calmly. Thirty-five years take serious toll of the modernity, the startlingness, of any music. Strauss's cathedral in tones, "dangerously sublime," with its fantastic arches, half Gothic, half infernal, its "hideous flying abutments, gorgeous façades, heaven-splitting spires," does not awe us as it did in 1897. Its arches are less fantastic, and not even half infernal. Its flying abutments are no longer hideous. The rim of eternity does not seem quite so accessible from its soaring spires as it evidently did in the impressible and innocent nineties.

Has the once mighty pile, then, sunk to the dimensions and the banal obviousness of a parish church? One would think so, if one could overhear the cheery contempt which it is now modish to pour upon its builder, the tonal architect of "Zarathustra," whom certain of the more light-hearted critical morticians of our day would inter in the same forgotten crypt with Raff and Spohr and Marschner and other disintegrated worthies who have had their day of intermittent glory.

But the real truth is [Mr. Gilman continues] that "Zarathustra" has not yet been evaluated. It will bear much further study and long consideration. So let us not be in too great a hurry to bury the architect and wreck his once imposing pile. The work has its durable, surviving beauties, its splendors of contour and decoration. Like most of Strauss's music—indeed, like most of the once "modern" and horrendous music of its time—it has lost a good deal of what its warmest admirers of older days were wont to call its "ugliness" and not a little of its beauty has deliquesced into prettiness. It is possible to fancy that some of the material that went to the building of this cathedral was not stone, but sugar candy. It is not an audience of poets and of madmen who are indicated as ideal observers of certain aspects of "Zarathustra," but an audience of musical ingénues and shop-girls. That B major passage for the violins in thirds, for instance, at the beginning of the coda, drips glucose of the least expensive and most surfeiting variety. But Strauss has never had a very sensitive palate. Hymettus or a lollypop—it has all been one to him.

In this singular work, greatness and triviality stand cheek by jowl, with Strauss seemingly unaware of their propinquity. We find him passing, quite at ease, and with no apparent twinge of conscience, from the elemental grandeur of the C-major introduction, with its thunderous titanic music of the dawn—music which might fitly serve to tell a catastrophically darkened world what men once meant by Daybreak—to the A-flat banality of the passage for organ and divided strings. Did he esteem at its true worth, one wonders, the cosmic roar of those tremendous chords for the full orchestra that announce the lord of day? He is capable, too, of writing such poignant music as those final passagees of the "Grablied," with their passionate brooding upon that "silent isle," that bourn of all dead and distant loveliness, which troubled the heart of Zarathustra—music which still seems to us among the greatest that Strauss has given us; yet before he has got to the end of his huge fantasia, he is lost to us in the screeching commonness of the "Tanzlied."

The work remains for us today [Mr. Gilman concludes] an astonishing composition—a flawed and dubious masterpiece, but a masterpiece nevertheless; music, for all its empty pomposities, trivialities and vulgarities, such as no composer yet born of woman could possibly have written save Richard Strauss: music which storms the imagination and repeatedly takes it captive. There are wonderful things in the score—pages that give us the sense of mysterious immensities; moments that really open a door for us into the world beyond the heavens; things that awe and haunt. Who that has heard it can easily forget, for example, the plangent "Song of the Night Wanderer," with its twelve enigmatic bell strokes and its blend of ecstasy and terrible despair?

It is misleading to regard this score, after the manner of the earlier commentators, as an attempt to "set philosophy to music." To view it thus is to close one's ears to much of its expressiveness. The music is really a tonal account of certain typical adventures of the human soul in its encounter with existence. Most of its subject matter is of the simplest, most elemental, most time-seasoned character. Nature worship, religious rapture, longings, joys and passions, melancholy, introspection, disillusion and despair, songs and dances—this is not "philosophy"; it is much more like an emotional synopsis of the life of man. And these things are the staple food of music.

Another "Tuesday"

At the third of the Tuesday concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon, music of Schubert and Brahms was played. From Schubert there was the ballet music out of "Rosamunde" and the Symphony in B minor, known generally as the "Unfinished"; from Brahms the Fourth Symphony. It might have interested some in the audience to have known that members of the Chicago Opera Company were present. Particularly attentive, following closely every turn of the music, was Mr. Pollak, first conductor of the Chicagoan forces. Among those who had discovered his presence there was considerable conjecture as to whether Dr. Koussevitzky knew of it too. But whether he did or not, he had no more interested listener than his distinguished visitor.

One cannot help pondering over the fate and the changing fortunes of certain works as time rolls on. Schubert's "Rosamunde" music is of a popularity such that hotel orchestras play it as dinner music (or did before the jazz invasion). The "Unfinished" runs it a close second. No one would ever think of ascribing such popularity to Brahms. Indeed, he has often been rated as an intellectual composer who could not possibly attain real or widespread popularity. Yet yesterday the music of Brahms won the warmer reception from an audience who could not be suspected of applauding him just because it was the thing to do. Schubert's music, in spite of its charm and its great melodic beauty, is not without elements which allow attention to wander, which allow a great satiety to creep over one and do its deadly work. While the music of Brahms, unfolding in Koussevitzkian course, rivets interest, carries the listener along with itself, does not relax its hold upon him until the final crashing chord is played.

Conductor and orchestra played at top bent yesterday. No one could possibly hold a music to a more inexorable rhythm than did Dr. Koussevitzky the principal divisions of Schubert's ballet music. Not a hint of retarding or of bending was there throughout these long passages. Yet it all came with the lightest of hands and with never a feeling of the inflexibility which was the chief essence of its charm. The symphony, of course, gave all possible opportunity to make melodies sing. And sing they did. But not sentimentally, not "passionately"; only with lyric nobility of utterance such as Franz Schubert must have wished them to attain.

So much has already been written of Dr. Koussevitzky's way with Brahms that it seems well-nigh impossible to add anything more or anything fresh. Suffice it to say that his illuminating penetration once more wrought miracles with Brahms's music; from glorious beginnings, through the movement of the out-reaching horn call, through the largely conceived and energetic scherzo, through the stupendous final variations, one felt that once more the hand of revelation was at work with the great Johannes.

A. H. M.

Concert-Chronicle

New, from Debussy

Trans Feb 11

AT the Symphony Concerts this week, to familiar pieces by Strauss, Ravel and Prokofiev, Dr. Koussevitzky adds this week what to many might seem an impossibility—a piece of Debussy hitherto unheard in this vicinity. The piece is his "Rhapsodie pour Orchestra et Saxophone," dedicated "à Madame Elise Hall, Présidente de l'Orchestral Club de Boston," and dated 1903. This rhapsody is a piece that was commissioned by Mrs. Hall. There is a strong impression abroad that it was performed at a concert of the Orchestral Club, but the staff of the Allen Brown Music Library report that a complete file of programs discloses no record of such performance. At present writing neither the undersigned nor the librarians have discovered a record of public performance. Though the work is dated 1903, it was not copyrighted until 1919, and then by the publisher, Durand. In the performance at Symphony Hall an English horn, played by Mr. Speyer, will be the solo instrument. It is a curious coincidence that while the search for traces of local public performance seems fruitless, the week's mail brings news of a phonograph recording by the French Victor Company.

It must be remembered that the date which this work bears is only one year later than that of the completion of "Pelléas and Mélisande," that it comes therefore out of Debussy's very prime. Examination of its harmonies and of its interlacing rhythmic schemes confirm the story of the dates. The order of the words in the title, "for Orchestra and Saxophone," is significant. The orchestral developments are proportionately long and full-textured. The solo-part is correspondingly modest, though there are several short but significant cadenzas, and several pleasing lyrical passages. It occurred to the writer while glancing over the pages of the piano-score that probably some day some enterprising but misguided violinist may want to make another "Air for the G-string" out of it. For its lowest note is G-sharp, and it does not extend appreciably more than an octave and a half above this note. But how differently that would sound!

The Rhapsody for Orchestra and Saxophone begins Trés Modéré, 2-4, C-sharp minor; continues later for the larger portion of the work, Allegretto Scherzando, 6-8, G-sharp minor. The rhapsody begins with a pregnant phrase that forms the basis of the slower first portion. The solo instrument first enters with cadenza-like passages which establbish rhythms fundamental to the whole piece, and which further form a sort of refrain for several musical sentences in the slow portion. This division ends with a statement of the initial phrase. The allegretto begins with a rhythm that strongly suggest the rhythm of the first movement of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. Not long does its rhythm prevail. Soon comes a multiplicity of rhythms, some of them suggesting this or that Spanish dance. Thus one finds 6-8 and 3-4, alternating and in combination; measures in which triplets and duplets follow each other. And all this against the rich, shifting harmonies which Debussy used so colorfully. At the height of the last orchestral development the solo-instrument strongly proclaims the initial motif. And at the end there is combination of the phrase derived from this motif with the triplet-duplet measure.

A. H. M.

Programs to Hand

At the Symphony Concerts of next week, Miss Jelly d'Aranyi will be assisting violinist. She will be heard in a Concerto of Mozart in D major and in Ravel's "Tzinganè." In addition to Mr. Copland's Symphonic Ode, noted elsewhere, Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra will play the overture to Mozart's opera, "Figaro's Wedding," and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Preludes."

At the supplementary Symphony Concert on Monday evening next, Mr. Robert Goldsand, a rising young pianist from Vienna, will play the solo-part in Beethoven's First Concerto, long unheard in Boston. Prokofiev's "Classical Symphony" and Strauss's tone-poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra" complete the program.

* * *

The long-promised, once withdrawn and now revised Symphonic Ode of Aaron Copland is announced for production at the Symphony Concerts of next week. It was originally written as one of the pieces to mark the fiftieth year of the orchestra.

* * *

MUSIC

Globe Feb 13

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The novelty on this week's Symphony program is a Rhapsody for orchestra and saxophone (or English horn) by Debussy.. Dr Koussevitzky disappointed others besides the members of the Bruckner Society in dropping from the program the announced Bruckner Symphony. For it he substituted Strauss' Zarathustra." Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony," and Ravel's "Spanish Rhapsody" were the other numbers.

Debussy wrote the Rhapsody played yesterday for Mrs Richard Hall, of Boston, in 1903. Mrs Hall, to whom the piece is dedicated, was the founder and principal supporter of the Boston Orchestral Society, conducted by Georges Longy. She played the saxophone, and persuaded a number of well known musicians to write solos for her. This Rhapsody by Debussy does not appear to have been performed in Boston. One wonders whether he ever sent it to Mrs Hall. It was not published until 1918, after the composer was dead. One wonders, also, whether Debussy would have authorized the substitution of an English horn for the saxophone, since the two instruments, however, similar in range, are quite different in tone quality.

An Admirable Player

The saxophone, strange as it may seem to those who know it only from its use and abuse in present day American popular music, has been used in the past by serious and distinguished composers, though it never won a permanent place in the symphony orchestras. It deserved music more brilliant, more impassioned than this very unrhapsodic rhapsody, which it would have been a kindness to Debussy's memory to suppress. Mr Speyer, an admirable player of the English horn and an excellent musician, did his best with its arduous and ungrateful measures. But he is heard to far greater advantage in such familiar incidental solos as that in the Franck symphony, so often played at these concerts.

The orchestra played Prokofieff's little symphony very brilliantly. It is now one of Dr Koussevitzky's favorite show pieces, so well does it display the abilities of the strings, in particular. The music itself seems more insignificant each time one listens to it, more akin to Liadov's "Musical Snuff Box." Was Prokofieff sneering at what to him may appear the empty formalism of the 18th century? Stravinsky has written far more satisfactoril in 18th century vein, in his piano concerto, and his sonata for piano, both composed later than Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony," however.

What chiefly impresses one in Ravel's "Rhapsodie Espagnole" is the inimitable subtlety of the style and of the scoring for orchestra. Chabrier's noisily vulgar "Espana" has twice the vitality of this thoroughly tasteful yet thoroughly calculated and cold music by Ravel. He has every gift a composed needs save passion. Dr Koussevitzky's well-intentioned endeavors to breathe emotional vitality into this essentially pallid music resulted only in distorting and blurring its outlines.

Modern Masterpieces

One wonders whether what seem today to be original modern masterpieces, like the best of Stravinsky's will within the next 35 years be as thoroughly deflated as Strauss' "Also Sprach Zarathustra" sounded yesterday. In 1897 this tone poem was hailed with prophetic fervors, and commented upon with a parade of erudite learning greater than has ever yet been devoted to the music of Mozart.

Yesterday only the "Tanzlied" section seemed alive. All the rest was either sound and fury, or else appalling banality, as in the "andante religioso" that follows the sonorous opening measures. The "Tanzlied" section intrinsically belongs to that companion piece to "Der Rosenkavalier" which Strauss unwisely neglected to write before inspiration finally deserted him and he descended irreparably to the level of the "Alpine Symphony."

Next week's program promises to be more interesting, with Jelly d'Aranyi as soloist in a Mozart concerto, and in Ravel's "Tzigane," and the first performance of Aaron Copland's "Symphonic Ode." Liszt's "Les Preludes," and the overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," of Mozart, are the other numbers now announced.

P. R.

134

Feb 13

phony Concert --- The Afternoon of Strauss and Zarathustra

With Prokofiev, Debussy and Ravel to Balance The Program

ASK any student of music in the first decade of the present century to name the chief ones among contemporary composers, and his reply would surely have been, "Strauss, Debussy and Ravel." Probably he would have spoken of Debussy and Ravel in the same breath, as of a pair of musical Siamese twins. The musical public, by and large, for a time so regarded them. Yesterday afternoon at the symphony concert these three provided the bulk of the music. From a relatively short-time period yesterday's works from the pens of these three dated: Strauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra" from 1896; Debussy's Rhapsody for Orchestra and Saxophone from 1903; Ravel's "Spanish Rhapsody" from 1907. Add to the program for prelude the delightful little "Classical Symphony" of Prokofiev, and the list of the afternoon is complete.

If Prokofiev had written nothing besides this four-movement symphony which passes in not much more than twelve minutes, his claim to high place among composers would be well established. His assertion that he wrote the music of a Mozart in the modern idiom tells only half the story. It does not tell of the laughter and the joy and the sunshine in this music, of its wit and its sparkle, its exuberance, its expression of the joy of living. For unalloyed pleasure one can find no better source in modern music than this little symphony of Prokofiev. Through flawless performance yesterday afternoon went its dashing Allegro and Finale, its songful Larghetto, its piquant Gavotte.

In his turn came Debussy and with him Mr. Louis Speyer and his English horn. Debussy was at the full tide of his powers when he wrote the Rhapsody for Orchestra and Saxophone at the request of the Bostonian music lover and organizer, as well as amateur player upon the saxophone, Mrs. Elsie Hall. He had just finished "Pelléas et Mélisande," either was writing or was about to write "La Mer." It was not surprising then, through a slow introduction and a gay Allegretto, to find a music as smooth-textured as the great tryptich about the sea, or as subtle as the music to Maeterlinck's drama. Add gentle suggestion of the Spanish dance, through rhythm and occasional coloring of "Spanish" percussion, and a picture of the music is sketched.

A few cadenza-like passages and a few songful phrases excepted, the solo voice does not rise much out of the orchestral texture; and orchestral developments exceed solo measures. As always, Mr. Speyer was every inch the artist, never thrusting himself unduly forward, never strying to take too great advantage of the few moments which he had in which to be heard, always cultivating fineness of tone, neatness of phrase, sensitive and subtle in the molding of melodic line. Yet one wondered why the English horn on this music, even though Debussy may have indicated it as a permissive substitute for the instrument for which it was written. (The piano score, however, contains no reference to English horn.) Debussy was a subtle craftsman in the use of orchestral timbres. At certain high points in this scant solo part one could imagine the wailing tone of the saxophone rather than the thin-edged reedy quality of the English horn. Certainly a "sax" as a solo instrument at a symphony concert would have been a novelty. It is not to Mr. Speyer's discredit to say that within belief the music of Debussy would have been the gainer. For Debussy's music one could have wished the instrument to which the music belongs; for Mr. Speyer one could have wished a music that placed him at greater advantage.

Ravel, writing at the middle of the first decade of the century a "Spanish Rhapsody," gives reason for coupling his name so closely with that of Debussy. That he soon was to tread a divergent path, is another matter. Never was Debussy himself more "Impressionistic" than is Ravel in the first movement of this rhapsody, the Prelude to Night. It reminds of nothing so much, in its general atmospheric character, as of Debussy's "Perfumes of the Night," also—by the way—out of a Spanish piece. Yet one must remember that Ravel did it first, the Spanish Rhapsody anti-dating "Iberia" by a full two years. But with this music of Ravel, as heard yesterday from Dr. Koussevitzky and his men, the world "perfumes" with all the exquisite connotations that can be clustered around it, comes closest to being adequate description. With equal tonal sensitiveness and an added keen rhythmic movement, the conductor made his way [illegible] the [illegible] through [illegible] and the [illegible]tra, in a burst of brilliance, he closed with the "Feria."

For the second time during his reign at Symphony Hall Dr. Koussevitzky placed "Thus Spake Zarathustra" upon a program. He first essayed it in February three years ago. It is Strauss in page after page at his very best; but Strauss also, here and there, at something less than his best. It is Strauss also, as musician rather than Strauss as writer of program music, Nietzsche furnished him an occasion for writing rather than a program. What program there is, is Strauss's own. Out of the eighty chapters of Nietzsche's book Strauss chose nine, taking their titles as sub-titles for his tone poem. Strauss's choice follows an idea of his own, not an argument of Nietzsche; his sub-titles do not even occur in the same order in which the corresponding chapter headings occur in Nietzsche's work. Strauss's program is merely a variant of the program that has been at the root of many a symphony or symphonic poem of the last part of the nineteenth century—the way of man through life, his attempt to find the reason for it all, to establish his place in it, to discover how he might receive the greatest amount of satisfaction from it. Nietzsche is merely a convenient peg upon which to hang such a program. And this much program Strauss must have, for he worked better under this kind of stimulus than when considering his musical matter entirely in the abstract. Granting him his stimulus, then Strauss worked with as great constructive ability and even genius as any out-and-out "classicist."

Here then is Strauss's scheme for the way of his man through life, "freely [oh, very freely] after Nietzsche"; he enters the world grandly, at once tries to orient himself, turns to religion, yearns there to find the answer to his questionings, plunges into the pleasures of passion, again recoils sadly and a bit wistfully when he finds not his solution, delves into the mysteries of science, also to no effect. All fails to satisfy. His "convalescence" is merely a change of viewpoint from dissatisfaction to a light-hearted and buoyant acceptance of life around himself as he finds it. This is his "Dance-Song." In the night he sees that he must delve into himself for his answer, that it is not given to man to solve problems involving the infinite. Thus he attains peace and satisfaction, even though he has not solved his riddle.

The fault of Strauss in the music which he invents for this scheme is the fault which burdens him in greater or less degree in almost all his works, which keeps him just below the rank of the greatest of musicians of all time—a certain critical naiveté in failing to reject musical ideas which are not worthy of the high context in which they find themselves, which are in fact at times positively banal. In "Zarathusra" one could well wish that Strauss had chosen to present the turning to religion by a theme which matched the wondrous music of the introduction [the "sunrise," as it is generally spoken of] rather than the music which suggests a very ordinary Sunday school hymn. Even more, one could wish for a more worthy music for the dance-song. Both programmatically and musically this division is the place for the climax of the whole tone poem. In the program it is the point at which man finds his solution, and that solution is in no sense a "let-down," even though it begins to find its answer to be confined wihtin the finite limitations of man. Musically also, it comes at the very point, near the end, where a supreme climax is in order. The question is not whether the rather ordinary waltz which Strauss here uses suggests Viennese waltzes—say of his namesake, Johann; nor whether his waltz is better or worse than such a waltz. (Probably most critical observers would say "worse"). The question is of the need for a music to fill, programmaticalcly and musically, such a place as that above defined. One need only consider how Wagner, for example, or Beethoven, would have glorified such a moment.

Yet all this is not enough to furnish condemnation for "Thus Spake Zarathustra." It and Strauss are still great enough that they can bear their faults without suffering very considerably. All this is only a rather wistful recognition of the way in which a very great work might easily have been even greater. Two sections out of nine (not counting introduction and conclusion) one can question. The rest are nothing short of the work of high genius. The writer who stated that "the beginning is nothing less than an act of titanic creation" in nowise overstated his case. It is all but matched by the music of passion, the music of yearning, the grave song, of the convalescent, of the night-song, of the poetic and significant conclusion.

With this music Dr. Koussevitzky is discerning, revealing, eloquent. In a very real sense he is better friend to Strauss than was Strauss himself when he wrote "Zarathustra." For in the two weaker divisions of the work, such is his fervor that he all but persuades one that the weaknesses do not exist. Fortunate the composer who is thus blest. And for the rest, the best voice of Strauss is also the best voice of Koussevitzky. One recalls the tremendous grandeur of the sunrise, the infinite yearning, the tenderness and the flaming of passion, the dark mysteries of the fugue representing science, the beauties, now grave, now ethereal, of the final sections. It is hardly necessary, at this late date, to speak of the orchestral refinements of Dr. Koussevitzky's orchestra—of the qualities which make a tremendous work like "Zarathustra" seem almost as if made of the finely and closely woven strands of a huge piece of chamber music. Yet such it was. For all the sweep and the bigness and the fervors and the characterizations which performance drew from this score, that performance brought also refinements equal to those of the tenuous prelude of a Ravel. . . . Thus Spake Koussevitzky.

A. H. M.

Cambridge's Turn With Gustav Holst

Feb 12 — Trans

CAMBRIDGE music lovers—as many of them as can get into Sanders Theater—had the opportunity last evening of greeting and applauding the distinguished guest who is now sojourning in their midst, Mr. Gustav Holst, when he led the Boston Symphony Orchestra through one of his own works. Mr. Holst, as is well known, is at present a visiting member of the faculty of the Division of Music at Harvard University. Last evening he conducted through the ballet music from his opera, "The Perfect Fool." Twice has the music been described in these columns, making further description beside the mark. Suffice it to say that Mr. Holst renewed the excellent impression which he recently made in Boston when he conducted through an entire evening of his own music. Once more we heard phrase if incantation, darksome music of the spirits of the earth; crystal clear music of the spirits water; flickering, glowing, and at times explosive music of the spirits of fire; at the last the cataclysmic chord which would certainly have taught the Haydn of the "Surprise" Symphony a lesson in dynamics. Once more Mr. Holst held his men as in the hollow of his hand, guiding, directing, pointing the music. Once more the tribute from the listeners went far beyond mere perfunctory acknowledgment, was warm, ardent, spontaneous, long-continued.

Dr. Koussevitzky, for his portion of the concert, conducted through Bach's second suite, for flute, strings and harpsichord through Chaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony. A scant score of players gathered close around the conductor's podium for the Bachian suite. Prominent among them was Mr. Laurent with his flute, Mr. Sanromá and harpsichord. Through the longish overture, in large part fugal, and the half dozen dances popular at the time, these forces played. And fugue or dance, long or short, the numbers, in their lightness, their grace, their buoyancy, their elegance, were pure delight. If composers "turn in their graves" as a popular phrase has it, Bach must have done so last evening—for sheer pleasure.

That Chaikovsky's "Pathetic" is one of Dr. Koussevitzky's tours de force has been no secret these several years. Last evening he fully lived up to his reputation with it, while the resonant Sanders Theater pointed many a detail less fully graphic in Symphony Hall. And once more, applause ran loud and long.

A. H. M.

SYMPHONY IN MODERN PROGRAMME

Music by Three Living Composers and Debussy

Post Feb. 13

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Music by three living composers, Prokofieff, Ravel and Strauss, and by one, Debussy, who in the natural order of things should still be with us, made the programme of the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon.

ONE NOVELTY

From Prokofieff came the so-called "Classical" Symphony; from Debussy the Rhapsody for orchestra and saxophone (or English horn), in which the solo-part was played on the latter instrument by Louis Speyer, in the first performance of the music at these concerts. From Ravel, to continue, came the Spanish Rhapsody, and from Strauss his tone-poem inspired by Nietzsche, "Thus Spake Zarathustra."

Many take pleasure in Prokofieff's clever aping of an older musical speech. Others prefer the gifted Russian when he speaks in his own tongue and in the idiom of his own time. The Rhapsody of Ravel prevails today chiefly in the final division, "The Fair." The preceding three movements depend for their effect primarily on ingenious manipulation of harmonies, rhythms and instrumental timbres, and such things inevitably lose their potency with the passing of the years.

A Successful Exercise

Debussy, with other eminent composers, wrote pieces for Mrs. Richard G. Hall of Boston, an accomplished mistress of the saxophone, for performances at the concerts of the Boston Orchestral Club which she founded and supported. The music, pleasing enough to hear and excellently played yesterday by Mr. Speyer and the orchestra, may be described as a successful exercise, in the best Debussyan manner, by one Claude Achille Debussy.

In "Zarathustra," Strauss may be said to have attempted the impossible and failed. He would make music the handmaid of philosophy, a service for which she was never intended. But if he has failed, he has failed magnificently and his failure eclipses the successes of lesser men. More than any other of Strauss' tone-poems, too, "Zarathustra" is uneven in interest. The introduction suggestive of the sunrise, which would have been more effective yesterday had Dr. Koussevitzky achieved a more gradual crescendo, remains one of his most superb pages. Yet the would-be religious succeeding section, "Of the Dwellers in the Rear World," is merely sanctimonious.

"Dance Song" Impresses

Outside the introduction, the most successful passages are now felt to be those entitled "Of Joys and Passions," played yesterday with insufficient breadth, "The Grave Song" and "The Dance Song," together with the poetic sounding of the "Theme of the Ideal" just before the end.

There is still reason to wonder at Dr. Koussevitzky's mysterious pianissimo at the commencement of the Fugato which should characterize the futility of science; but on the whole the performance of yesterday was more eloquent, more just to Strauss' intentions, than the last which the conductor gave here. Particularly is this true of his treatment of the "Dance Song," where he achieved, as he did not before, the rightful note of ecstasy and exhilaration.

MUSIC

HERALD FEB 13

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The 15th program of the Boston Symphony orchestra, conducted by Dr. Koussevitsky yesterday afternoon at Symphony hall, was as follows: Prokofieff, "Classical" Symphony, op. 25; Debussy, rhapsody for orchestra and saxophone or English horn), (first time at these concerts); Ravel, Rhapsodie Espagnole; Strauss, "Also Sprach Zarathustra," tone poem, op. 30 (freely after Friedrich Nietzsche).

Rhapsody is an uncommunicative title and Debussy for once reticently avoided programmatic tags. His silence was hopeful, for one could at least listen unhindered by predisposed and obstructing images. Even so, the music is highly suggestive, strongly reminiscent of his familiar impressionistic compositions. The listener finds no enlightenment, no undiscovered originality, no new slant on the composer. Thoroughly modal, it is one more talented and effective display of blended hues, approaching, passing, melting into each other. As a rhapsody it is sufficiently irregular and disjointed to warrant its title—a series of floating impressions, rich in imagination and free in suggestion. The exquisiteness of Mr. Speyer's playing and the distant, indecisive quality of the English horn deterred any regrets that the instrument specified by Debussy was thus replaced. A saxophone would indeed have changed the whole effect and very likely to its detriment.

Another rhapsody, this one sectioned with subtitles, followed in the more vitally rhapsodic style of Ravel. The composition does not improve on repeated hearings. Picturesqueness is achieved more by means of instrumental devices and by an assortment of pronounced Spanish dance rhythms than by an originality in composition responsible for Ravel's uniqueness. There is a heyday for the cymbals at the close of the "Feria." Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony, modern in content, classic in form, was played yesterday with all the precision and lightness required by a Mozart symphony. On finds in it more than a display of versatility and skill.

"Thus Spake Zarathustra"—is it a tone poem successful in characterizing the complexity of modern life (or was it in 1896) in musical terms? Or should we, despite Strauss's statement that it was not intended to be "philosophical music" but only "my homage to the genius of Nietzsche," follow his explicit captions and attempt to find in it the doctrines of the Superman, a denunciation of the weak ever babbling about righteousness and virtue? Surely music can tell no such tales. Even Straussian orchestral color can indicate no more than the moods accompanying these thoughts. Hanslick remarked that Strauss gave his score the title it has in order to give it a significance which itself it lacks. Huneker said "it should be played once every season, and the audience be limited to poets, musicians and madmen."

The concert will be repeated this evening. The concert next week: Mozart, overture to "The Marriage of Figaro"; concerto for violin and orchestra in D major, No. 4 (soloist, Yelly D'Aranyi); Copland, Symphonic Ode (first performance); Ravel, "Tzigane" for violin and orchestra; Liszt, "Les Preludes," symphonic poem No. 3 (after Lamartine).

J. H. F.

Boston Symphony

Monitor Feb 13

For the fifteenth pair of concerts, Dr. Koussevitzky listed the "Classical" Symphony, Op. 25, by Prokofieff; a Rhapsody for Orchestra and Saxophone (or English Horn) which in this instance was performed with English Horn played by Mr. Louis Speyer (first performance at these concerts); Ravel's "Rhapsodie Espagnole," and "Also Sprach Zarathustra," by Strauss.

Mr. Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony is music of charming, melodious themes and delicately contrived harmonic structure. It exemplifies amazingly well the composer's idea for a modern, orchestral Mozart. It has been placed with equal success upon programs for children and adults, which is a rather good test for it. Each movement is individual in character but of the four, the last is the busiest, and the hearer easily visualizes an orchestra, à la Mozart, with bewigged performers energetically pursuing the score, the while agitated pigtails beat counter rhythms. A joyous occasion for the listener, a taxing one for conductor and orchestra.

It would seem that an excellent opportunity for demonstrating the virtues of a first-class performance on the saxophone was lost yesterday when the English Horn was substituted in the Debussy number. We hold no brief for the saxophone, yet inasmuch as that instrument was designated by the composer, the experiment might have been worth the effort. Of course, in that event, we should not (presumably) have heard the fine work of Mr. Speyer nor would the typical Debussian color have been so much in evidence. From a first hearing one gains the impression that the composer was more interested in writing for a novel combination than in the outcome, although the performance itself was singularly lovely. There was much applause for soloist and orchestra.

Ravel's "Rhapsodie Espagnole" received an exciting reading throughout the four movements, with a climax in the fourth, called "Feria," that revealed the virtuosity of both conductor and men. After this the Strauss tone poem appeared somewhat of an anti-climax, not too successfully accomplished in the first measures because of tonal variance between orchestra and organ—which was unfortunate, since Dr. Koussevitzky had outlined a tremendous example of crescendo.

G. M. S.

135

Rare Beethoven And a New Pianist

As the First Concerto and Mr. Goldsand Come to the Monday Symphonies

Trans. Feb. 16

TWO matters that relate to the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening especially intrigue the reviewer. The first is the remarkable playing of the young pianist, Robert Goldsand, and his discerning choice of a rarely heard piece. The second is the fortune of Strauss's tone poem. "Thus Spake Zarathustra" at its third playing in the short space of four days.

When a novelty out of Debussy was brought to Symphony Hall a few days ago, the matter was thought fit subject for comment. Was it not unusual that so well known a composer should still yield unplayed works? But if a Debussy novelty excites interest, what shall one say when an equal novelty comes out of Beethoven? Mr. Fiedler surprised us a few weeks ago with the "Battle Symphony," not heard for some forty years. But Mr. Goldsand last evening went him one better by playing Beethoven's First Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, Opus 15, hitherto never done at these concerts. The concerto dates from 1797, which was also the year in which the Sonate Pathetique and the First Symphony were composed. There are three movements, the first the usual exposition and development of two themes, the second a long breathed cantilena, chiefly for the solo instrument, the last a rondo of sprightly rhythm. Mr. Goldsand used cadenzas, the principal one very long and full of points at which one thought it would surely lead on into the orchestral tutti. composed by Beethoven himself. The work has all the earmarks of "early Beethoven." Yet it is as well worth hearing as most piano concertos. Though it has not been a great favorite with pianists the neglect into which it has fallen seems rather undeserved.

At any rate, thus Mr. Goldsand's playing persuaded one last evening. The pianist, who is about twenty years of age, was a youthful prodigy, has already attracted considerable attenaion in Vienna, whence he hails; last year made his debut in recital in New York—with excellent success:. Last evening gave us Bostonians a glimpse of the reason for these successes. His technic is of that cleanness for which modern pianists are notedd. His tone is one of purest beauty. His way with his music is that most to be admired, which exalts justice above mere emotion, which leads one step by step along with the composer rather than making one feel that one has had something done to him by the composer through the medium of the artist. This modern way, which is eminently Mr. Goldsand's, is surely the one of the most complete and enduring satisfactions.

It has long been known that the Monday and Tuesday concerts are fortunate in hearing the repertory of the orchestra after it has already passed though two or more performances, thus insuring more completely ripened playing. Having heard Strauss's tone poem on Friday one was glad to sit before it again on Monday to note comparisons. On the whole, there was more freedom and spontaniety in the performance, though one had felt no lack of these on Friday. Specifically, Dr. Koussevitzky progressed even farther in the laudible work of covering up the lapses of the uncritical Strauss. The section treating of religion seemed last evening completely to lose its banality. Of course the difference between banality and wholesome simplicity is of necessity sometimes exceedingly slight, sometimes nothing more than a matter of performance. At least thus one felt last evening when Dr. Koussevitzky infused a beauty the very reserve of cheap into these measures. Probably no one ever will succeed in doing completely a similar service to the dance-song. Its opening measures will always remain exactly what they are. But last evening, even more than Friday, the conductor surely confined these effects to an irreducible minimum. Sooner than one might easily believe it possible he was on his way to a climax which was fully to match that of the music of joys and passions earlier in the tone poem. Thus the whole gained unbelievably in shapeliness and proportion. And of course the grandeur of the introduction which is sunrise, and the poetry of the quiet conclusion, came with surpassing effect. After which one may be pardoned for asking just why an orchestra promptly forgets that its instruments have tuning devices as soon as an organ is introduced into the ensemble.

The classical Symphony is indeed a "thing of beauty and a joy forever." So one feels on every occasion at which one hears it. Last evening an enthusiastic habitue of Symphony Hall was overheard to remark, "Every time they play that piece they play it—" but before he could conclude with the "better" that he had in mind a waggish neighbor interrupted with "faster." Which is only to the good in Prokofiev's little work. One more contrast with Friday one must record, and that is the contrast of audiences. Friday's was duly appreciative, always polite, here and there gave suggestion of enthusiasm. Monday's was enthusiasm personified. It seemed as if Mr. Goldsand could not make enough trips to the front of the stage to bow, and after "Zarathustra" Dr. Koussevitzky was equally recalled. A. H. M.

MUSIC

Globe Feb 16

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

A new pianist and a "new" concerto made a deep impression upon the audience which attended last evening the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony's Monday series. The concerto was Beethoven's Opus 15, in C major, which was performed for the first time by the Boston Symphony Orchestra; the pianist, Robert Goldsand, a young Viennese, 20 years old, made his Boston debut last night.

This C major concerto although generally referred to as No. 1, is really No. 2, having been composed after that in B-flat major. The C major work was written previous to 1798. Why it should have been neglected in Boston for such an incredibly long time is hard to understand. Although distinctly in the composer's earlier style, the true Beethoven sounds forth from many pages. The outward form and mold only are derived from Mozart; the melody, the harmony, the capricious twists and turns in development stem from the Beethoven of approaching maturity.

Mr Goldsand, after a somewhat timid and indecisive beginning, created the impression before he was a third through the first movement that he is a musician of exceptional promise. His technique is unusually supple and clean cut, buoyant and graceful. Both hands are equally sure and firm. His sonorous, transparent voicing of bass parts was as musicianly as his solos and runs. His sense of rhythm is virtually impeccable.

But what impressed above all was Mr Goldsand's unimpeachable style. Not only did he play with the clarity and evenness requisite in 18th century music; he imparted to the melody the long outline and the subtle shades of dynamic emphasis, which bring out the real Beethoven character.

Mr Goldsand without doubt is a serious and very honest musician, for he caused to be made known the fact that the cadenzas he was playing—which, in spots, seemed very un-Beethovenish—were every note from the master.

Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony and Strauss' tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathrustra," comprised the other pieces.

Prokofieff's symphony is something of a musical joke and something of a musical gem. Its pungent humor pokes fun at 18th century musical forms; its cold brilliance of modern harmony and instrumentation give it musical worth. But its whole effect lies in performance. Under a dull conductor and orchestra it would be uninteresting. Dr Koussevitzky and his superb players make it a little tour de force.

Strauss' tone poem is, like many other of his compositions, uneven in ideas and quality. It is melodramatic, it is long. In the "andante religioso," for example, it is banal. Were this section to be deprived of its instrumentation, of Dr Koussevitzky's sinuous interpretation, and played soberly upon a piano, the result undoubtedly would be very commonplace and trivial.

But in spite of these faults, the work has power. It has originality—even when the composer recalls Venus' seductions and Isolde's Love-Death, his measures are more than 50 percent Strauss—and these qualities entitle it to a place among Strauss' greater works; with "Till," "Don Juan," "Death and Transfiguration" rather than with "Don Quixote" and "A Hero's Life." The performance was Dr Koussevitxky at his intense and eloquent best.

AMUSEMENTS

SYMPHONY HALL
TONIGHT AT 8:15
ROLAND HAYES
ONLY BOSTON RECITAL

Thurs. Eve. Feb. 25
Hear the foremost Spanish Singer
SUPERVIA

Post

AY, FEBRUARY 16,

MAKES DEBUT AT SYMPHONY

Robert Goldsand, Pianist Soloist With Orchestra

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

It is not often that either of the supplementary series of Symphony Concerts provides the occasion for an important debut. But the exception which proves the rule came to pass last evening when Robert Goldsand, youthful but distinguished Viennese pianist, praised in New York last season, made his bow to Boston as soloist in the so-styled First Piano Concerto of Beethoven, actually his fourth effort in the form that he was later so notably to enrich and that, oddly enough, had never before appeared on the programme of a Symphony Concert.

Not to be despised is the first period Beethoven, for all its indebtedness to Mozart and Haydn, whether the work that represents it be one of the first piano sonatas, the early piano trios or string trios, the quartets published as Opus 18, or this Concerto of last evening. Possibly this Concerto in C major, so often the vehicle for talented pupils at the conservatories, should, if seriously presented, come from the hands of a pianist, conductor and orchestra of high rank. In such wise was it presented last evening, and to altogether delightful result. The listener might then enjoy the freshness of this youthful music so unstaled by frequent repetition, might revel in the deft skill, the sensitiveness, the ravishing tonal variety even in this simple frame of Mr. Goldsand's playing and take equal pleasure in the finesse that Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra brought to the slender, though by no means negligible orchestral accompaniment.

Mr. Goldsand was warmly applauded last evening. Perhaps if he had offered Tchaikovskian heroics with thunderous tone the enthusiasm over his playing would have been even greater, but no more deserved. Such a performance as his of last evening of such transparent material is a searching test of any virtuoso.

Before the concerto came the "Classical" Symphony of Prokofieff, and after it Strauss' "Thus Spake Zarathustra," both heard at the regular concerts of last week and at that time duly commented upon.

Pianist Stars at Symphony

By MOSES SMITH [illegible] 16

Robert Goldsand, young Viennese pianist playing in Boston for the first time, considerably enlivened the Monday evening series of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts by his playing of the solo part of the first Beethoven piano concerto, in C major.

For some strange reason, this charming work had never been played at a Boston Symphony concert. One was all the more grateful to hear it given such splendid treatment by Goldsand, whose performance was marked by extraordinary rhythmic vitality, unerring and sensitive command of the slightest gradations in tone and a technical dexterity that enabled him to present everything with the utmost clarity. Here was an exceedingly musical player, offering the music for its own sake, without thought of self-display. Combine this with a beautiful accompaniment by the orchestra under Koussevitzky, and you have the result—a performance of a concerto rarely matched in the eight years of the Russian's regime in Symphony Hall.

Prokofieff's "Classical" symphony began the program, and Strauss' "Also Sprach Zarathustra" ended it. The presentation of the latter work was eloquent, superior technically to that of last Friday, when the beautiful closing section was marred by instruments out of tune. The conductor himself seemed more at ease last night than on the previous occasion.

MUSIC

Herald Feb. 16

MONDAY SYMPHONY CONCERT

The fourth concert of the Boston symphony orchestra's Monday evening series took place last evening at Symphony hall, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting. Robert Goldsand, the 21-year-old Viennese pianist and former infant prodigy who has lately attracted very respectful attention, made his Boston debut at this concert as soloist in Beethoven's pianoforte concerto No. 1, op. 15, in C major. The rest of the program comprised Prokofieff's "Classical" symphony, op. 25, and Strauss's tone poem "Also Sprach Zarathustra," op. 30.

Beethoven's first piano concerto (composed later than that listed as the second), was not rated very highly by the composer himself. It is seldom played; this indeed was its first performance by the Boston Symphony orchestra. Yet, though it is distinctly less impressive than the "Emperor" and the one or two other concertos of Beethoven that are still occasionally heard, yet it proved itself last night to be well deserving of rescue from oblivion. Its first two movements (allegro con brio, largo), recall pleasantly the early pianoforte sonatas by the rather formal symmetry of their themes and the manner of their treatment; the final rondo is a delightfully vivacious movement—a kind of light-hearted moto perpetuo in a vein which Beethoven did not often essay.

Mr. Goldsand, by choosing this work in preference to one of those romantic concertos (by Liszt, Rachmanioff, and other skilled exploiters of the pianoforte's power to dazzle) in which it is so easy to astound the multitude, gave one hint of his seriousness. His performance itself confirmed the impression. A highly self-possessed but absorbed young pianist, he played with a clarity and a clean articulation which fully accepted the pianoforte as a percussion instrument and achieved melodic coherence through careful tone-gradation rather than by the merging and overlapping of successive tones. There was as little obvious pedalling as in the playing of Artur Schnabel, whose pupil, we believe, he is not. Only once did any unpleasing squareness of outline result—in the principal melody of the slow movement, which may have had too heavy-footed a gait. In general, his playing combined sensitiveness and grace with a fine sanity which appreciated but did not linger unduly over detail at the expense of the whole design. He has an excellent feeling for rhythm and agility which remains under control; he was thus able to lighten and still lend significance to the arid development section of the first movement and its long but not uninteresting cadenza (written by Beethoven himself) and made much of the lively finale. He was very warmly applauded, and recalled four times to the platform. The pleasing and far from perfunctory orchestral part was admirably played and coordinated with the work of the soloist.

Prokofieff's sparkling and neatly tailored "Classical" symphony received a wonderfully deft and weightless performance. It remains, after many hearings, a diverting and exhilarating piece of work. But one may pardonably doubt whether Mozart, "if he were living now," would write quite in this vein (as Prokofieff's commentator in the Chicago Symphony program books—Mr. Borowsky—suggests, perhaps with the authority of Prokofieff). It is doubtful whether he would rely quite so heavily upon the humorous effect of unexpected modulations, or whether his tunes would have quite the same flavor of clowning impudence. These traits, and something in the bustling brightness of the finale, seem rather to suggest Haydn. But there is a definitely Russian streak in the slow movement.

"Also sprach Zarathustra," the same banality of much of whose musical material, by its contrast with the weight of the thoughts which it attempts to illustrate, grows more and more striking, was admirably performed. But an unintended effect was introduced by a slight discrepancy between the pitch of the organ and that of the rest of the orchestra. Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra were applauded with enthusiasm. S. S.

136

Open Door for Americans at Symphony Hall

Mr. Copland's Symphonic Ode And Other Native Pieces In Prospect

Trans Feb 18

IN A SENSE the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is still with us. At this week's concerts a work written for that anniversary will come to first performance—Aaron Copland's Symphonic Ode. The score bears the date "1928-1929." The dedication runs: "To the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, on the occasion of its Fiftieth Anniversary." Various have been the conjectures as to the withdrawal of the piece last winter, as to the revision it has since undergone. The first question to be asked Mr. Copland was, "Just how much did you change since last year?" The answer came quickly: "Not a note. The changes have all been in notation, to simplify the reading of the parts for the men and of the score for the conductor." The first of which sayings one must take figuratively, since the maker of these paragraphs saw Mr. Copland alter "one note" of the score (no more, no less) only last Tuesday. Speaking further of the changes in notation, Mr. Copeland indicated that they were of two kinds: first, the alteration, of many meters, such as 10-8 into 5-4, and the doubling of the rate of speed, thereby producing a page with a much less crowded appearance—a matter sometimes of greater importance than the uninitiated might suspect. Second, the re-grouping of quick successions of irregular meters, such as 9-8, 7-8, 6-8, 10-8, etc., into 4-4 measures with accent marks indicating former "first beats," rendering difficult and hazardous "trick conducting" unnecessary.

This latter change follows a custom that conductors themselves long since adopted. For example, the final sacrificial dance of Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring," moving at a speed indicated by the metronome mark of 126 for eighth-notes, makes in the first eight measures these eight metrical changes: 3-16, 5-16, 3-16, 4-16, 5-16, 3-16, 4-16, 3-16. Now it is virtually impossible to wave a baton fast enough and to think the changes accurately enough to "beat the time" as written. Even a casual glance at the placing of the notes in the score discloses the fact that the passage in question can be grouped into uniform measures of 2-8, with persistent syncopated accentuation. That this has come to be the practice of conductors has been an open secret for a long time. Mr. Copland wisely incorporates such changes in the new draft of his Ode.

The matter became subject for general discussion with Mr. Copland. "I believe," he said, "that when Stravinsky first wrote such rhythms and meters he was performing a great service to music in calling attention to the fact that the measure need not be always of uniform length, that measures of different lengths could and sometimes should succeed each other. The emancipating effect upon the rhythmic side of composition has been considerable and salutary. But orchestral musicians have learned that an accented note in or near the middle of a measure may easily have the force of a first beat, and readily play them in this manner. Of course, our notation is still lacking in a device to indicate the difference between an accented note in the middle of a measure signifying first-beat accent, and a similarly accented note signifying a syncopation. At present one can only trust to the instincts of performers to recognize the difference." Which is simply one more hole in a system of musical notation as imperfect as English spelling itself.

Turning to the Ode itself, Mr. Copland began by saying: "People will naturally want to know what this work is an ode to. Usually an ode is an ode to something or other. This is not an ode to anything, except to the spirit that is in the music. And I don't know what that spirit is. You, my many listeners, will have to tell me that." A cryptic utterance, but not as perversely so as may appear on the surface. For Mr. Copland then continued along a line of thought which one remembers as characteristic of him on previous occasions. In his opinion so much of a composer's sub-conscious self goes into a work without his being definitely aware of it, that any statement he himself may make concerning the contents is likely to be less accurate than the statement of a practised listener as to what he finds there. In other words, the composer can only tell what he intended to put into a given piece of music. Another competent person can tell far better what he actually did put into it. For which reason Mr. Copland is always wary about indicating the contents of his compositions. Need less to say, there is no program.

"I have tried," Mr. Copland went on, "to do a difficult thing—to write a piece of music of such unbroken logic and so thoroughly unified that the very last note bears definite relation to the very first, a piece of music in which the thought is entirely consecutive and entirely unbroken. Formally the Ode is in five divisions which subtly merge into each other. The first division moves Largamente e maestoso. The theme is the source of the thematic material for all subsequent divisions. It is intended to be monumental in character, to establish a mood which is to remain fundamental throughout the Ode. The first division gives way eventually to an Allegro, which is purely rhythmical in character, a music distinctly of scherzo type. Thi Allegro contains two motives which ar successively developed—the first in a lin for trumpet, the second in activel rhythmed and irregularly accented chord for oboes. This in turn gives way to th third division, Lento, which is a more lyrical treatment of the material of the opening Largamente. Once more the music returns to the scherzo-like Allegro, this time, however, treating only the second of the two motives originally announced and developed. Then comes the conclusion, Lento maestoso. Again the treatment is different from that in the first division. At the beginning the music is one of ascent, there is a striving, an urge upward, and ever more upward. In the last section the striving is rather for breadth than for ascent; so that, while the motion of the beginning might be indicated by a vertical line, that of the close would have to be represented by a horizontal line. But the monumental character of the whole remains."

Mr. Copland believes this tendency to write a thoroughly unified score to be particularly characteristic of all his work. He cites a newer piece as evidence. "Since writing the Ode, I have written a set of Variations for Piano. (1931.) I played it at a concert of the League of Composers. Martha Graham danced it this winter. I tried to make these twenty-one variations the very opposite of the Ode, to seek the maximum of diversity rather than the characteristic unity which is the keynote of the Ode. But my friends tell me that the variations are exceedingly unified, just the same."

The Ode is scored for large orchestra. Flutes, oboes, bassoons are present in fours; clarinets, in three assorted sizes, number five. Eight horns, five trumpets, five trombones and tubas, two harps and a piano are required. The demands upon the percussion corner is considerable, including such subtle nosemakers as woodblock and slap-stick. Strings of course as usual.

Concerning the harmonic idiom Mr. Copland was reticent. "Is the music dissonant, chromatic, diatonic or what?" "How can I say?" was the answer. "These terms are so relative that my own impressions and feelings about them may differ from those of most hearers. That is, where I find only pleasant combinations another may find very dissonant chords. I can only add that I have been told that the Ode is not too easy to listen to."

A. H. M.

Newman and Honegger

To hark back again to the jubilee year of the Symphony Orchestra, the commissioned and commemorative pieces also included a Symphony by Honegger. None was more sharply debated. For the most part the younger generation championed it. Their elders, again for the most part, dealt it hard and bitter words. Last month in London, the orchestra of the British Broadcasting Corporation played it. And who should rise to the defence but Ernest Newman, usually little inclined to the modernists. In the Sunday Times he wrote:

> In spite of a considerable amount of ugliness and of a certain monotony of rhythm, it is a work that undeniably holds the attention even if it dose not give us any particular esthetic pleasure. It deals mostly with crude emotions, but, such as they are, it sets them forth with a logic of their own. We feel, as we do with so much modern music, that the ideas are often at war with the medium. That is to say, Honegger is up against the now common problem of how to make harsh and ugly things sound agreeable and convincing to us in a color-medium that has been evolved with quite other ideals in view.

Program to Hand

From Dr. Koussevitzky for the concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Sanders Theater at Cambridge next Thursday evening:

Classical Symphony	Prokofiev
Symphonic Variations, "Istar"	d'Indy
Spanish Rhapsody	Ravel
Prelude and Closing Scene from the Opera "Tristan and Isolde"	Wagner
Overture to the Opera, "Tannhauser"	Wagner

At the Symphony Concerts of next week Dr. Koussevitzky will revive Mr. Loeffler's early tone-poem, "The Death of Tintagiles"; repeat Hindemith's "Concert-Music" for string and brass choirs; play once more Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony.

At the supplementary matinee next Tuesday the "Eroica" will also be heard along with two numbers from Deems Taylor's Suite, "Through the Looking Glass" and Mr. Carpenter's "Song of

---

Feb 20

Part Four

Trans

There Is Room For A Clearer Understanding

Friendly View of the Debated Copland in The Light Of His Music

AARON COPLAND'S music is American in rhythm, Jewish in melody, eclectric in all the rest. The subject matter is limited but deeply felt. Its emotional origin is seldom gay, rarely amorous, almost invariably religious. Occasionally excitation of a purely nervous and cerebral kind is the origin of a scherzo. This tendency gave him a year or two of jazz-experiment. That has been his one wild oat. It was not a very fertile one

He liked the stridency of high saxophones and his nerves were pleasantly violated by displaced accents. But he never understood that sensuality of sentiment which is the force of American popular music nor accepted the simple heartbeat that is the pulse of its rhythm, as it is the pulse of his own rhythm whenever his music is at ease.

His religious feeling is serious and sustained. He is a prophet calling out her sins to Israel. He is filled with the fear of God. His music is an evocation of the fury of God. His God is the god of battle, the Lord of Hosts, the jealous, the angry, the avenging god, who rides upon the storm. Far from Copland's thoughts are the Lord as shepherd in green pastures, the Lord as patriarch, the God of Jacob, the bridegroom of the Shulamite, the lover, the father, the guide-philosopher-and-friend. The gentler movements of his music are more like an oriental contemplation of infinity than like any tender depiction of the gentler aspects of Jehovah.

Hence the absence of intimacy. And the tension. Because his music has tension. His brass plays high. His rhythm is strained. There is also weight; five trumpets and eight horns are his common orchestral practice. They give the tension and weight of battle. The screaming of piccolos and pianos evokes the glitter of armaments and swords. His instrumentation is designed to impress, to overpower, to terrify, not to sing.

* * *

All this I write is bunk, naturally. But I put it down because it seems to me to provide as good an evocative scheme as any for fitting together the various observations one can make about the way his music is made.

I note the following: His melodic material is of a markedly Hebrew cast. Its tendency to return on itself is penitential. It is predominantly minor. Its chromaticism is ornamental and expressive rather than modulatory. When he sings, it is as wailing before the wall. More commonly his material is used as a framework for a purely coloristic compilation. By coloristic I mean it is made out of harmonic and instrumental rather than melodic devices. This compilation is picturesque and cumulative. It tends to augment its excitement, to add to weight and tension. His dominant idea of form is crescendo. This is Russian, because it is a crescendo of excitement. Of development in the classic German sense, the free development of Haydn and Beethoven, there is none.

His conception of harmony is not form but texture. Hence the absence of marked tonal modulation. His conception of instrumentation is not variety but mass. He has no polyphonic conception at all, because he is alone in his music. His commonest contrapuntal device is a form of canon, usually at the octave or unison, everybody doing the same thing at a different moment. This is counterpoint but not polyphony. He is not walking with God or talking with men or seducing house-maids or tickling duchesses. He is crying aloud to Israel. And very much as if no one could hear him.

The "Piano Variations" have not even this canonic counterpoint. They are a monody, one line repeated, not developed, and lengthened-out from time to time by Oriental flourishes, accented and made sharp, orchestrated, as it were, by slightly dissonant octaves, by grace-notes and arpeggios.

I find the music of them very beautiful, only I wish he wouldn't play it so loud. One hears it better unforced. I miss in his playing of it the singing of a certain still, small voice that seems to me to be clearly implied on the written page.

I also note this: There is a certain resemblance of proceedure between Copland, Antheil, Varèse, Chavez. This in spite of antipodal differences in their personalities and sentiments. Their common homage to Stravinsky honors the White Russian master more than it profits them. It creates a false community and obliterates distinctions. It also smothers quality. The quality that distinguishes American writing from all other is a very particular and special approach to rhythm. It is in these composers when they forget Stravinsky; it is in all American music whatever its school or origins. It is a quiet, vibratory shimmer, a play of light and movement over a well-felt but not expressed basic pulsation, as regular and as varied as a heartbeat, and as unconscious. It is lively but at ease, quiet, assured, lascivious.

* * *

Stravinsky knocked us all over when we first heard him, because he had invented a new rhythmic notation and we all thought we could use it. We cannot. It is the notation of the jerks that muscles give to escape the grip of taut nerves. It has nothing to do with blood-flow. It is spectacularly effective when used to express the movements it was invented to express. It is the contrary when imposed upon our radically different ones. How infinitely superior in simple effectiveness are our popular composers over our tonier ones. They have no technical drama of composition. They are at ease in their notation.

Our high-brow music, on the other hand, is notoriously ineffective. It is the bane of audiences at home and abroad. It is proverbially dull, in spite of the very best will on everybody's part. I deny that it is really as dull as it sounds. There is bound to be fire behind so much smoke. I think our gift, our especial gift, is the particular rhythmic feeling I have described above. That is enough to make an epoch. It takes very little. The rest is appropriate framing. Our weakness is timidity, hence snobbishness and eclecticism.

Today we ape Stravinsky. Yesterday it was Debussy. Before, it was Wagner. Copland's best recommendation is that he is less eclectic than his confrères. I reproach him with eclecticism all the same.

There is real music in his pieces, true invention and a high (sometimes too high) nobility of feeling. He is not banal. He has truth, force and elegance. He has not quite style. There remain too many irrelevant memories of Nadia Boulanger's lessons, of the scores of Stravinsky and Mahler and perhaps Richard Strauss.

I wish they were plain thefts. Theft is refreshing and legitimate. Copland is like certain American poets (very distinguished ones and supply your own examples), who cannot quite forget their collegiate loyalty to Keats and Browning and who are more occupied with an illusory continuation of some foreign tradition or other than with style, which is personal integrity.

This may explain a little why Aaron Copland is at the same time an inspired composer and a comparatively ineffective one. Comparatively, because most American music is less effective in performance than his. In fact, his music is often so near to a real knock-out that I am sometimes left wondering whether it is a case of a knock-out not quite achieved or of an unwise application of the knock-out technic to a case where persuasion were more to the point.

Continued on Page Eight

Considering Copland

Continued from Page Four

In any case, there is a problem of rhetoric for the American composer. The problem of adjusted emphasis, the appropriate stating and effective underlining of the personal invention. This means selection and variety. The forcing of every idea into the key of the grandiose and the sublime is obviously false and in the long-run frightfully monotonous.

I fancy there is more of use to us in the example of Verdi than in that of Wagner, Puccini even than Hindemith, certainly Bizet than Debussy, Schubert than Brahms. Simple clarity is what we need, and we will get it only by a radical simplification of our methods of composition. If Copland's simplifications are perhaps not radical enough for my taste, they are important simplifications all the same.

Because he is good, terribly good. A European composer of his intrinsic quality would have today a world-wide celebrity and influence. It is a source of continual annoyance to me that his usefulness and his beauty are not fully achieved because he has not yet done the merciless weeding out of his garden that any European composer would have done after his first orchestral hearing.

The music is all right but the man is not clearly enough visible through it. An American certainly, a Hebrew certainly. But his more precise and personal outline is still blurred by the shadows of those who formed his youth.

VIRGIL THOMSON

[Reprinted from Modern Music]

Symphony Concert --- Fr

Bitter Tang, Sweet Tang, Side by Side

From Mozart to Mr. Copland In a Symphony Concert Adroitly Arranged

HOW ingenious, when he so wills, is Dr. Koussevitzky as maker of programs! At the Symphony Concert of Friday afternoon there were five pieces on his list—an unusual number promising unusual variety. Four were likely to please the listening public; by precedent one was nearly certain to irk it. The four that asked effortless listening to familiar musical speech were the overture to Mozart's opera, "Figaro's Wedding"; his Concerto in D major for violin with orchestra; Ravel's virtuoso-piece, "Tzigane," for the same pairing; Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "Preludes." The one sure to be cast in an irritating idiom and to exact close following was Aaron Copland's "Symphonic Ode," originally commissioned for the jubilee year at Symphony Hall; deferred at the revising composer's request until this fifty-first season. To make assurance doubly sure the violin-pieces were confided to Miss d'Aranyi, long in high favor and not too often heard hereabouts. She is, moreover, an ingratiating presence; while under the present régime "assisting artists" of the comelier sex are none too frequent at the Symphony Concerts.

As the conductor proposed cannily, so went event unmistakably. Mozart's gay little overture was clapped in delight. Mr. Kreisler or Mr. Heifetz might have envied Miss d'Aranyi her portions of applause, especially after the displayful "Tzigane." Liszt's "Preludes" proved as grateful to the elect of a February Friday at Symphony Hall as it is to the loungers on the grass around the bandstand on The Common of an August Sunday. But when Mr. Copland's "Ode" drew to an end, parquet and lower balcony sat in frigid silence. Fortunately the upper balcony, where youth was listening to music of its own world in characteristic speech, rallied manfully and womanfully to the defence; persisted in such an obstinate rattle of applause that, once by himself and once with the conductor, the composer came to the platform. So fortified, a few of the rebellious in other quarters plucked up courage and added to the plaudits. In Boston Mr. Copland should be accustomed to these receptions. He last underwent one five years ago when his Piano-Concerto set two audiences—and subsequent dinner-tables—by the ears. Perhaps it is to his credit that few of his friends or his foes keep their tempers when they discuss his music. In the intermission indeed, which happened to follow the "Ode," many did not debate. Politely or impolitely, they indicated to Mr. Copland, fortunately out of hearing, whereas, as the French put it, "he descends."

In themselves, in performance, or in both, the four hallowed pieces deserved these matinée raptures. Dr. Koussevitzky materially reduced his orchestra for the Overture to "Figaro's Wedding"; from a band, say, of forty-odd virtuosi gained light-bodied, quick-moving tone as plastic as it was transparent. Mozart's jeu d'esprit asks no other voice. The pace was swift; the accents sure and piquant; the shimmer incessant and playful; the gayety inexhaustible but never breathless; the hint of aristocratic elegance ever present. Now that he has an orchestra capable of the brightest animation and the aptest finesse, no wonder the conductor turns oftener than of old to Mozart. Playing him, Dr. Koussevitzky can give the proof.

In like function and quality, the diminished orchestra also played with Miss d'Aranyi through the Concerto. The piece itself is one of the set written in Mozart's twentieth year at Salzburg. Nowhere does the graver or the subtler composer intrude. All is sweetness and light, fresh invention, felicitous treatment. Sentiment, as the eighteenth-century understood and poised it, plays about the slow movement, never deepening into emotion. The final Rondo is gay touch-and-go between the solo-instrument and the orchestra, for both less fleet than light and graceful. In the first movement let the composer be as inventive and as artful as he will—without forgetting his obligation to charm and elegance. (In Salzburg Mozart wrote for the best people and accomplished virtuosi.)

Miss d'Aranyi served the music well. Throughout her tone was light, clear, sensitive and supple. She played the Andante with an unexpected serenity, as one who had at last subdued a temperamental restlessness. She graced the finale out of mechanism into happy trifling. Her light hand and edgeless tone saved the cadenzas from hard brilliance. Her spaciousness and suavity in the first movement affirmed again the artist who is now poised. From her and from the conductor the ear savored unalloyed the pleasures of Mozart.

In Ravel's "Tzigane" the violinist could loose her more familiar self to the vast delight of the matinée audience. In the long, rhapsodic introduction—really a far-flung cadenza—pace, rhythm and color alike struck fire. In the ensuing ferment, eddying from violin to orchestra and back again, the more of Miss d'Aranyi's gypsy spirit the better. When "Tzigane" was new piece, young gentlemen in Paris and London heard it as Ravel's witty, not to say cynical, comment on the excesses of Hungarian violinists. Hereabouts one and all have played it in unremitting earnest without a hint of this implied derision. Better call it companion-piece in virtuosity to the later "Bolero."

Likely enough the final pages of "Preludes" sound more appropriately from the band-stands out of doors than from the enclosed stage of Symphony Hall. But the general transport was considerable when the bass-drum was smitten two-fistedly and the cymbals were clashed to high heaven; when the brass proclaimed, the strings soared and the wood-winds shrilled. "Apotheosis" was the Lisztian word for these exercises in trumpery. For the fashions in blatancy, like all others. change with the times. Nowadays we prefer another sort of "big" sonorities; but the liking for such reverberations is instinctive in the human ear. Elsewhere the hackneyed and abused "Preludes" gained much from the musical quality of the orchestra, from a conductor who, like Dr. Muck before him, can summon anew the romantic mood and practice in which Liszt wrote. He made music as well as effects when Dr. Koussevitzky's horns or strings were singing for him.

With Mr. Copland's "Symphonic Ode" it is the bounden duty of each one of us to speak the reaction within him, even if it leaves him in a minority of one, as superior in his isolation as Simon Stylites on his pillar The "Ode" is not music to be liked or disliked. Either word is too trivial for its matter or manner. According as the ear hears and the mind receives, it is a penetrating and impressive music, or a music harassing and not to be endured. As ripening composer, as composer in particular of this "Ode," Mr. Copland abounds in qualities antipathetic to most that hear. He writes leanly, flintily, to ears that prefer music cushioned. He writes austerely in a world that is pleased with the phrase, "service with a smile." In an anniversary "Ode" he elects the grand style, which choice is to be at odds with a time that prefers small things in small ways. He declines absolutely to gloss this elevation with a showy rhetoric. When he goes high, he also goes bare. He also declines to compromise or condescend He is, in fact, the recalcitrant composer who will not "co-operate" with his audience. Self-deceiving man, he prefers to speak the truth as it is within him.

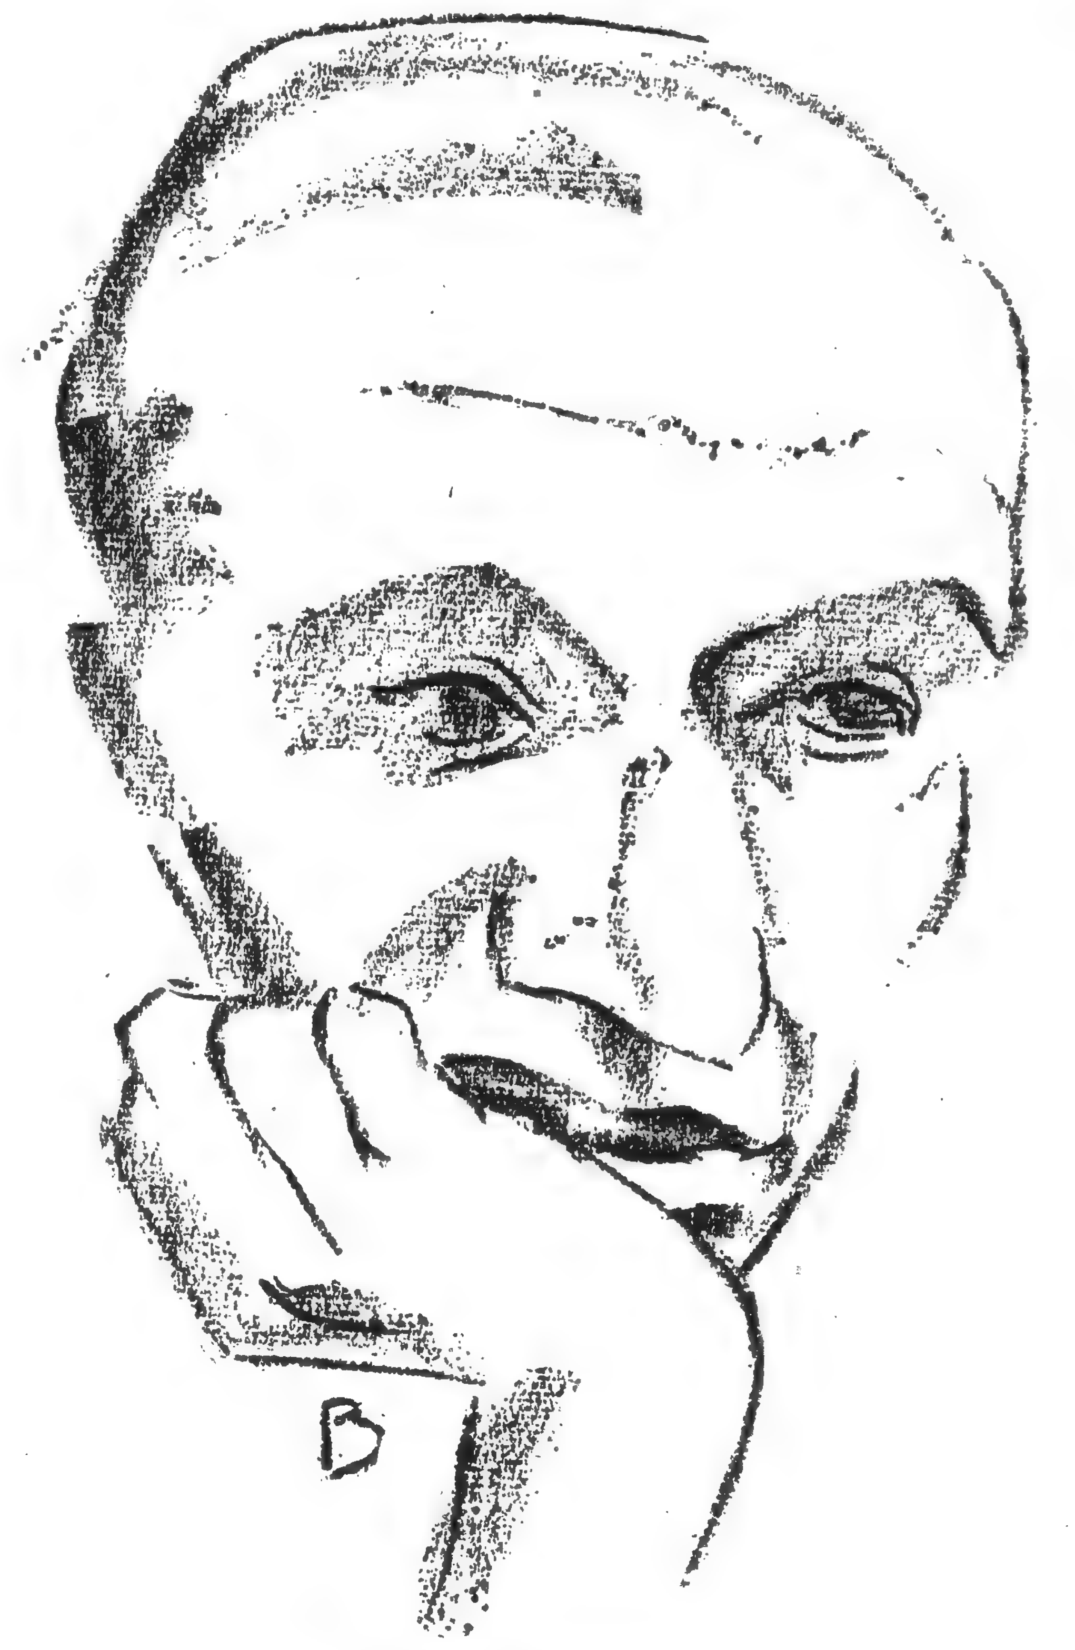
Mr. Copland designs the "Symphonic Ode" on the grand scale. There are five divisions in diversified but generally ascendant line: a spacious, sonorous introduction as of one who would write loftily of large occasion; an ensuing Allegro as of one who would testify in tones to its stir of life, here, now, in this America; a middle Lento that slows into lyrical and silvery movement—the grave and measured emotion of the occasion; a return to the Scherzo of animation; a final expansion upon the heights at last attained. Outspringing motivs from the introduction unify the whole. These divisions are joined by transitional passages of remarkable invention and resource, subtlety and skill. They arrest ear and mind by their significance. They are intensified examples of musical logic. Their intensity saves them from dry cerebration.

Needless to say, Mr. Copland writes also in an individual idiom which is part of the musical speech of his world and time. Like most composers of the new generation, he "can no other," however incredible that state of mind may seem to grandparents. Like Mahler, he uses a full modern orchestra, but with Mahlerian purpose—not only to gain large and deep sonorities, but by the variety of means at his disposal to make finely touched, significant strokes. Mr. Copland's tonal mass in these days is never churning or turbid; on the instant he can open it and a detail comes cleanly through. To those who have ears only for the lush romantics, the "Ode" will seem thin-bodied. On the lips of those who think and feel and hear with the composer, sinewy and fine-muscled would be the truer words.

The texture as the old word went, is less a texture than a silvered, keen-tempered steel, giving back reflections and resonance rather than color. The harmonies are astringent, as whose are not in this third decade of the twentieth century. Yet the bitterness is often tonic. Mr. Copland is persistently dissonant, as who is not in these times, but with a stripped, impinging, meaningful dissonance, a willed not a wanton disharmony. To be ugly (as the detractors call it) with effect is to be justifiably ugly. Finally, in Mr. Copland's Allegros may be heard the true residue of jazz as a music expressive of American urban life. It is not the over-paraded "symphonic" jazz. It is the residue expressed in his own musical terms that a listening composer has within himself distilled from it.

These matters, interesting and defining as they are, less concern the open-minded hearer in the concert-hall than the whole impact and impression of the "Ode." For the first time an American composer of the younger generation, of any generation, save only the transplanted Mr. Bloch, writes in the grand style, sustains himself unbrokenly in it through a whole spacious composition. To this grandeur—to venture the word at last—he joins an austerity to be found among American contemporaries only in Mr. Bloch, which may be part of their common Hebrew heritage as it was in the Old-Testament prophets. It is true that this grandeur and this austerity are expressed in hard-edged, stripped-surfaced modernist speech, but they are there none the less. At Mr. Copland's hand, under the impulses with which he wrote the "Ode," it is capable of them. There is no mistaking the power of the introductory and the final divisions. The one strives and ascends. The other calms and deepens. In the two Allegros is the taut-strung vitality with which we live our urban lives, in this instance by imagined occasion excited and enriched. Into the slow division enters the severer beauty of our day and of this new music, which is the beauty of metal in motion. Hear and weigh these achievements and it is time to salute the composer of the "Symphonic Ode" and the conductor who sounded it from ink on paper. H. T. P.

Composer-Listener



Aaron Copland

From a Sketch Made at Symphony Hall at a Rehearsal of His Much Debated "Symphonic Ode"

It may be definitely announced that Miss Cornell will play but three weeks in Boston in "The Barretts of Wimpole Street." Her stay at the Shubert will end with the performances of Saturday, March 5. As actress-manager she has made this decision in order to appear in as many cities as possible during her tour. Did she play in Boston four weeks, Washington would not see her.

Feminine Ways and Means
Features for Women
Mondays, Wednesdays and Saturdays in the Transcript

138

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

Herald Feb 20

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, gave the 16th concert of its 51st season yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Mozart, Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," and Concerto in D major, No. 4 for violin and orchestra. Copland, Symphonic Ode (first performance). Ravel, Tzigane, for violin and orchestra. Liszt, The Preludes, symphonic poem No. 3. Miss Yelly d'Aranyi was the solo violinist.

One of the chief features of this concert was the fascinating, most musical performance of Mozart's overture. The performance, extremely brilliant, was clear in spite of the appropriately rapid tempo. The contrasting choirs were not daunted by the speed; at all times there was clarity as well as gaiety; no hesitation in entrances; no slurring, no smudging of rapid passages; always sparkle, always euphony. And what a charming overture this is! Would that one could hear the opera again, but where are the singers today who could do justice to the music? Who could sing the Letter duet as it was sung by Mme. Eames and Mme. Sembrich? Are there some who now remember Pauline Lucca's Cherubino? The Count of William Carleton, when the opera was sung in English by the Kellogg-Hess company? He was the ideal Count, graceful, dashing, irresistible in song and action. Poor Edouard de Reszke was unsuited to the role. The music was too high for him; he was heavy when he should have been light-footed, he was not at ease.

It is pleasanter to think of old days than to discuss some of the contemporaneous compositions. Mr. Copland's Ode was written for the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony orchestra. This anniversary, as some may recall, took place last year. Some of the compositions sent in to honor the anniversary were speedily forgotten and will probably never be heard again. Mr. Copland informs the audience that his Ode, which has no connection with any "literary idea," was written at intervals—1927-'29—in various countries and places, ranging from Koenigstein to Santa Fe; from Juziers to Peterboro, N. H. "It is not an Ode to anything other than the particular spirit to be found in the music itself. What that particular spirit is is not for me to say." And then he quotes from the admirable Andre Gide: "Before explaining my book to others, I wait for them to explain it to me. . . . What interests me especially is what I have put into my book without my own knowledge—that part of the unconscious that I should like to name 'la part de Dieu.'" Mr. Copland may have written pages of his Ode without his own knowledge, but we fail to find on any page the inspiring voice and the guiding hand of the Deity. And who will have the courage or ability to explain the Ode to the composer?

This Ode as music—we use the term in the common acceptance of the word—is not music. Sibelius, talking about recent developments in the art, while he does not attach overmuch importance to them as such, recognizes that in each of them "there is an element of truth and justification . . . they have all their 'raison d'etre.' in fact." There is no doubt that Mr. Copland heard his Ode as he wrote it. But was there justification for writing what he did hear? This Ode is to some of us without beauty, without grandeur, without any emotional quality whatever, without significant themes, without the thematic treatment and orchestral expression that might otherwise compel respect. Surely Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra labored zealously to put the work before the audience in as favorable a light as possible. It seemed a pity that the superb orchestra was called on to spend its strength and skill on a work that was alternately jejune and disagreeably bombastic.

There was a fine interpretation of Liszt's Preludes. Any latent vulgarity that may be brought out by sensational conductors was not observable. It is the fashion in some quarters to sneer at Liszt and all his works, yet he has written orchestral pages that the world will not willingly let die. What a debt Wagner owed him, musically as well as pecuniarily! There are other of Liszt's symphonic poems that one would gladly hear interpreted by Dr. Koussevitzky, Mazeppa for example.

Miss D'Aranyi was enthusiastically applauded. Her playing of Mozart's concerto was characterized by purity of tone and taste. Her phrasing might be called Mozartian, if that word conveys the impression made by her appreciation of Mozart's music and the period in which it came to life. Especially charming was her performance of the slow movement, which she did not sentimentalize. As Hazlitt said of a song by Mozart: "It came from the air and returned there." The rondo was played in a delightfully jocose spirit. Perhaps some day violinists and pianists will have the courage to play concertos without cadenzas. As for Ravel's Tzigane, it is frankly a more or less, often less, amusing stunt. There is little music in it. It excites only admiration for a display of technical skill.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week the program will comprise Hindemith's Concert Music for string and brass instruments; Loeffler's Death of Tintagiles (after Maeterlinck-Jean Lefranc, viola d'amore), and Beethoven's Eroica symphony.

SYMPHONY PLAYS ODE OF COPLAND

Jelly d'Aranyi, Violin Soloist, Creates Furore

Post Feb. 20

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

With a programme drawn from Mozart, Aaron Copland, Ravel and Liszt and with the electric Jelly d'Aranyi for soloist, the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon lacked neither variety nor excitements.

MISS d'ARANYI'S VIRTUOSITY

Not before had the temperamental Hungarian violin virtuosa appeared at the regular subscription concerts. The piece from Mr. Copland was the symphonic ode, written in commemoration of the 50th anniversary season of the Symphony Orchestra, but unperformed last year because of difficulties arising at rehearsals, and heard yesterday for the first time in public. Miss d'Aranyi's pieces were a concerto of Mozart, in D major, and the "Tzigane" of Ravel with which to a piano accompaniment, she had already astonished a Jordan Hall audience. Mozart's overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" began the afternoon and "Les Preludes" brought it to a sonorous conclusion.

Miss d'Aranyi is mistress extraordinary of the mechanics of violin playing, but she has hardly an equal control over her own flaming temperament. It has been noted before that her playing of the classics is tinctured with certain ardors and intensities not quite in keeping with their chaste nature. A Mozart more limpid, more untroubled, more pure of line than Miss d'Aranyi's of yesterday is preferred by those who would have this music kept in what, rightly or wrongly, seems to them its proper frame. With the "Tzigane," on the other hand, Miss d'Aranyi could, and did, let herself go, tossing off with seeming ease, yet with infinite gusto, the tests of technical skill with which it bristles, but making of the music, withal, less a show piece than an impassioned Gipsy rhapsody. No wonder that yesterday's audience applauded her as it did. Such exhilaration is rare enough at the Symphony concerts—or at any other.

Copland's Ode

Mr. Copland is an authority on modern music, he has delved deeply into the scores of Stravinsky, Honegger and the rest, learned the secrets of their technique and explained to the initiated their musical processes and their hidden meanings. But has he not in the course of these endeavors made their several idioms so much his own that in composing he unconsciously quotes them, if not literally, at least in substance? There are suggestions of "The Rite of Spring" as well as of "Pacific 231" in the Ode heard yesterday, to mention the most obvious musical resemblances. As a conscientious member of the younger generation of American composers Mr. Copland must needs pay his respect to Tin Pan Alley, nor does his admiration for Stravinsky extend to the bland and urbane Igor of the Violin Concerto and the Capriccio for piano and orchestra.

Mr. Copland's Ode is in the main relentlessly dissonant. His ambition seems to have been to make the orchestra sound, save in a very few passages, as harsh and strident as possible. The scoring, for the most part, is thick and opaque. The chief color impression is of a gray and sodden mass. Yet there are lighter, contrapuntally ingenious sections and the music seems to be logically put together.

Some Hisses Heard

Yesterday's audience heard it with mixed emotions. There were hisses from parts of the hall, while many refrained from applause altogether, yet there was enough of the latter to return the composer several times to the stage.

Had certain melodic ideas been brought into sharper relief, the performance of Mozart's Overture, conspicuous in general for its lightness and speed, would have given the unalloyed pleasure that the accompaniments to the concerto and to Ravel's fascinating "Tzigane" did give. But as between the exacerbations of Copland and the bombasts and banalaties of Liszt, as Dr. Koussevitzky underscored them yesterday, there may be little to choose, so far as esthetic enjoyment is concerned.

VIRGIE WINTERS

Hungarian Violinist Features Varied Symphony Program

By MOSES SMITH

The program for this week's Boston Symphony concerts is of striking interest, for it lists not only a first performance—Copland's Symphonic Ode—but also a "personality" in the soloist, Yelly d' Aranyi, Hungarian violinist. But its composition is one of the queerest jumbles that the supposedly fine art of symphonic program-making has given us in a long time.

The effervescent Mozart of the "Figaro" overture and the D major violin concerto precedes the strident young New Yorker, Aaron Copland. Then comes Ravel's wild tour de force, "Tzigane," in which the astonishingly rugged and passionate fire of Miss d' Aranyi is heard at best. To close the concert there is the "old hat," supposedly obsolete romanticism of Liszt, as heard in "Les Preludes."

If you can stand such an array, you can presumably survive anything. And yet as heard at yesterday's matinee the concert is stimulating. The superb sweep of Miss d' Aranyi in the Ravel work is familiar from her previous appearances here, although, to tell the truth, the substitution of the orchestral accompaniment for the pianistic black and white seemed a hindrance rather than an advantage. Mr. Koussevitzky, in our opinion, could not quite keep up with the soloist. More happily mated were the forces in the Mozart concerto, in which the ensemble was close to perfection, while the violinist played with beauty and Mozartean simplicity. This work is obviously no "applause getter," yet the audience was as cordial after it as it was following the virtuosic "Tzigane."

Copland's work was written to be played during the jubilee of the orchestra last year, but yesterday's performance was the premiere. Despite our distaste for his works previously played here, we grant that there are many powerfully written pages in this new score, and that the composer has made great strides. It is dangerous to judge from a single hearing, yet the work seemed uneven, some of the music being bombastic or sentimental. On the structural side, it has great ingenuity.

Of the Liszt work, it is sufficient to say that the conductor still "believes" in it (for which, in the face of the smart sophisticates, we are glad), and that his and the orchestra's performance was correspondingly eloquent.

Midnight Show

The Scollay will have a midnight show tomorrow night. This time it will feature "Cruising the Southland." The feature picture will be "The Man I Killed," with Lionel Barrymore, Phillips Holmes and Nancy Carroll.

Copland's Symphonic Ode

Written for The Christian Science Monitor

MR AARON COPLAND'S Symphonic Ode was the centerpiece of the sixteenth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season, played in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Feb. 19. This work, dedicated to the orchestra, was one of those composed in honor of its fiftieth season, but for some reason its promulgation was deferred, and it came to its first public hearing at the concert under notice.

Concerning his work Mr. Copland is as cryptic as Stravinsky. In notes supplied to the program book, he disclaims any "literary idea" in connection with his title. "It is not an ode to anything other than the particular spirit to be found in the music itself. What that particular spirit is, is not for me to say." The composer adopts the sentiments of M. André Gide: "Before explaining my book to others, I wait for them to explain it to me. To wish to explain it first would be to restrain its meaning prematurely, because even if we know what we wish to say, we cannot know if we have said only that. And what interests me especially is what I have put into my book without my own knowledge."

We sympathize with Mr. Copland, and we are happy to respond to his appeal and tell him what he has put into his Symphonic Ode. He knows that his work is divisible into five parts. He probably is aware that he is indebted to Stravinsky for his complicated rhythmic patterns, to Honegger for the shape of his melodic line, to Harlem for his lively dances and to these and others for his harmonic idiom. But there is more than this in the work, and perhaps Mr. Copland will be surprised to hear that the key to this mystery which even he himself does not understand is the racial character of the score.

Listening to this music, you are convinced that it has a "literary idea." Let us supply the program: The first section represents the majesty of the ancient Hebrews, the second the pastimes of their descendants on Broadway, the third the melancholy strain in the race; in the fourth we are back on Broadway, but the jazz rhythms are now subtly transformed as we pass to the fifth section and reintroduce us in a powerful crescendo to the august Prophets. We have, in fact, passed by the Piano Concerto and the Two Pieces for string orchestra, and evolved another "Music for the Theater," analogous perhaps to Honegger's "Judith."

Of course much of this music is hard on the ears, and the score is not easy to grasp at a single hearing. Consequently its reception was cool, although, after a poor start, Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra gave it a fine performance. Yet there is impressiveness in the passages which we have assigned to the Hebrew Prophets, especially in the closing section; and there are even pages of much beauty. The most conspicuous of these, and to our notion the most original measures in the score, are to be found in the third section, where nostalgic melodies are sung by solo woodwind and string instruments.

Miss Jelly d'Arányi was soloist for this pair of concerts. She played Mozart's Violin Concerto No. 4 in D major (K. 218) and Ravel's "Tzigane." We have heard other fiddlers play this "Tzigane," but none who could play it as Miss D'Arányi does. Her Mozart, on the other hand, is a little too Bohemian. But she made a tremendous popular success with both numbers.

The concerto opened with the "Figaro" Overture and closed with Liszt's "Les Préludes." An oddly assorted list.

L. A. S.

138

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

Hall Feb 20

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, gave the 16th concert of its 51st season yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Mozart, Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," and Concerto in D major, No. 4 for violin and orchestra. Copland, Symphonic Ode (first performance). Ravel, Tzigane, for violin and orchestra. Liszt, The Preludes, symphonic poem No. 3. Miss Yelly d'Aranyi was the solo violinist.

One of the chief features of this concert was the fascinating, most musical performance of Mozart's overture. The performance, extremely brilliant, was clear in spite of the appropriately rapid tempo. The contrasting choirs were not daunted by the speed; at all times there was clarity as well as gaiety; no hesitation in entrances; no slurring, no smudging of rapid passages; always sparkle, always euphony. And what a charming overture this is! Would that one could hear the opera again, but where are the singers today who could do justice to the music? Who could sing the Letter duet as it was sung by Mme. Eames and Mme. Sembrich? Are there some who now remember Pauline Lucca's Cherubino? The Count of William Carleton, when the opera was sung in English by the Kellogg-Hess company? He was the ideal Count, graceful, dashing, irresistible in song and action. Poor Edouard de Reszke was unsuited to the role. The music was too high for him; he was heavy when he should have been light-footed, he was not at ease.

It is pleasanter to think of old days than to discuss some of the contemporaneous compositions. Mr. Copland's Ode was written for the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony orchestra. This anniversary, as some may recall, took place last year. Some of the compositions sent in to honor the anniversary were speedily forgotten and will probably never be heard again. Mr. Copland informs the audience that his Ode, which has no connection with any "literary idea," was written at intervals—1927-'29—in various countries and places, ranging from Koenigstein to Santa Fe; from Juziers to Peterboro, N. H. "It is not an Ode to anything other than the particular spirit to be found in the music itself. What that particular spirit is is not for me to say." And then he quotes from the admirable Andre Gide: "Before explaining my book to others, I wait for them to explain it to me. . . . What interests me especially is what I have put into my book without my own knowledge—that part of the unconscious that I should like to name 'la part de Dieu.'" Mr. Copland may have written pages of his Ode without his own knowledge, but we fail to find on any page the inspiring voice and the guiding hand of the Deity. And who will have the courage or ability to explain the Ode to the composer?

This Ode as music—we use the term in the common acceptance of the word—is not music. Sibelius, talking about recent developments in the art, while he does not attach overmuch importance to them as such, recognizes that in each of them "there is an element of truth and justification . . . they have all their 'raison d'etre.' in fact." There is no doubt that Mr. Copland heard his Ode as he wrote it. But was there justification for writing what he did hear? This Ode is to some of us without beauty, without grandeur, without any emotional quality whatever, without significant themes, without the thematic treatment and orchestral expression that might otherwise compel respect. Surely Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra labored zealously to put the work before the audience in as favorable a light as possible. It seemed a pity that the superb orchestra was called on to spend its strength and skill on a work that was alternately jejune and disagreeably bombastic.

There was a fine interpretation of Liszt's Preludes. Any latent vulgarity that may be brought out by sensational conductors was not observable. It is the fashion in some quarters to sneer at Liszt and all his works, yet he has written orchestral pages that the world will not willingly let die. What a debt Wagner owed him, musically as well as pecuniarily! There are other of Liszt's symphonic poems that one would gladly hear interpreted by Dr. Koussevitzky, Mazeppa for example.

Miss D'Aranyi was enthusiastically applauded. Her playing of Mozart's concerto was characterized by purity of tone and taste. Her phrasing might be called Mozartian, if that word conveys the impression made by her appreciation of Mozart's music and the period in which it came to life. Especially charming was her performance of the slow movement, which she did not sentimentalize. As Hazlitt said of a song by Mozart: "It came from the air and returned there." The rondo was played in a delightfully jocose spirit. Perhaps some day violinists and pianists will have the courage to play concertos without cadenzas. As for Ravel's Tzigane, it is frankly a more or less, often less, amusing stunt. There is little music in it. It excites only admiration for a display of technical skill.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week the program will comprise Hindemith's Concert Music for string and brass instruments; Loeffler's Death of Tintagiles (after Maeterlinck-Jean Lefranc, viola d'amore), and Beethoven's Eroica symphony.

SYMPHONY PLAYS ODE OF COPLAND

Jelly d'Aranyi, Violin Soloist, Creates Furore

Post Feb. 20

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

With a programme drawn from Mozart, Aaron Copland, Ravel and Liszt and with the electric Jelly d'Aranyi for soloist, the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon lacked neither variety nor excitements.

MISS d'ARANYI'S VIRTUOSITY

Not before had the temperamental Hungarian violin virtuosa appeared at the regular subscription concerts. The piece from Mr. Copland was the symphonic ode, written in commemoration of the 50th anniversary season of the Symphony Orchestra, but unperformed last year because of difficulties arising at rehearsals, and heard yesterday for the first time in public. Miss d'Aranyi's pieces were a concerto of Mozart, in D major, and the "Tzigane" of Ravel with which to a piano accompaniment, she had already astonished a Jordan Hall audience. Mozart's overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" began the afternoon and "Les Preludes" brought it to a sonorous conclusion.

Miss d'Aranyi is mistress extraordinary of the mechanics of violin playing, but she has hardly an equal control over her own flaming temperament. It has been noted before that her playing of the classics is tinctured with certain ardors and intensities not quite in keeping with their chaste nature. A Mozart more limpid, more untroubled, more pure of line than Miss d'Aranyi's of yesterday is preferred by those who would have this music kept in what, rightly or wrongly, seems to them its proper frame. With the "Tzigane," on the other hand, Miss d'Aranyi could, and did, let herself go, tossing off with seeming ease, yet with infinite gusto, the tests of technical skill with which it bristles, but making of the music, withal, less a show piece than an impassioned Gipsy rhapsody. No wonder that yesterday's audience applauded her as it did. Such exhilaration is rare enough at the Symphony concerts—or at any other.

Copland's Ode

Mr. Copland is an authority on modern music, he has delved deeply into the scores of Stravinsky, Honegger and the rest, learned the secrets of their technique and explained to the initiated their musical processes and their hidden meanings. But has he not in the course of these endeavors made their several idioms so much his own that in composing he unconsciously quotes them, if not literally, at least in substance? There are suggestions of "The Rite of Spring" as well as of "Pacific 231" in the Ode heard yesterday, to mention the most obvious musical resemblances. As a conscientious member of the younger generation of American composers Mr. Copland must needs pay his respect to Tin Pan Alley, nor does his admiration for Stravinsky extend to the bland and urbane Igor of the Violin Concerto and the Capriccio for piano and orchestra.

Mr. Copland's Ode is in the main relentlessly dissonant. His ambition seems to have been to make the orchestra sound, save in a very few passages, as harsh and strident as possible. The scoring, for the most part, is thick and opaque. The chief color impression is of a gray and sodden mass. Yet there are lighter, contrapuntally ingenious sections and the music seems to be logically put together.

Some Hisses Heard

Yesterday's audience heard it with mixed emotions. There were hisses from parts of the hall, while many refrained from applause altogether, yet there was enough of the latter to return the composer several times to the stage.

Had certain melodic ideas been brought into sharper relief, the performance of Mozart's Overture, conspicuous in general for its lightness and speed, would have given the unalloyed pleasure that the accompainments to the concerto and to Ravel's fascinating "Tzigane" did give. But as between the exacerbations of Copland and the bombasts and banalaties of Liszt, as Dr. Koussevitzky underscored them yesterday, there may be little to choose, so far as esthetic enjoyment is concerned.

VIRGIE WINTERS

Amer

Hungarian Violinist Features Varied Symphony Program

By MOSES SMITH

The program for this week's Boston Symphony concerts is of striking interest, for it lists not only a first performance—Copland's Symphonic Ode—but also a "personality" in the soloist, Yelly d' Aranyi, Hungarian violinist. But its composition is one of the queerest jumbles that the supposedly fine art of symphonic program-making has given us in a long time.

The effervescent Mozart of the "Figaro" overture and the D major violin concerto precedes the strident young New Yorker, Aaron Copland. Then comes Ravel's wild tour de force, "Tzigane," in which the astonishingly rugged and passionate fire of Miss d' Aranyi is heard at best. To close the concert there is the "old hat," supposedly obsolete romanticism of Liszt, as heard in "Les Preludes."

If you can stand such an array, you can presumably survive anything. And yet as heard at yesterday's matinee the concert is stimulating. The superb sweep of Miss d' Aranyi in the Ravel work is familiar from her previous appearances here, although, to tell the truth, the substitution of the orchestral accompaniment for the pianistic black and white seemed a hindrance rather than an advantage. Mr. Koussevitzky, in our opinion, could not quite keep up with the soloist. More happily mated were the forces in the Mozart concerto, in which the ensemble was close to perfection, while the violinist played with beauty and Mozartean simplicity. This work is obviously no "applause getter," yet the audience was as cordial after it as it was following the virtuosic "Tzigane."

Copland's work was written to be played during the jubilee of the orchestra last year, but yesterday's performance was the premiere. Despite our distaste for his works previously played here, we grant that there are many powerfully written pages in this new score, and that the composer has made great strides. It is dangerous to judge from a single hearing, yet the work seemed uneven, some of the music being bombastic or sentimental. On the structural side, it has great ingenuity.

Of the Liszt work, it is sufficient to say that the conductor still "believes" in it (for which, in the face of the smart sophisticates, we are glad), and that his and the orchestra's performance was correspondingly eloquent.

Midnight Show

The Scollay will have a midnight show tomorrow night. This time it will feature "Cruising the Southland." The feature picture will be "The Man I Killed," with Lionel Barrymore, Phillips Holmes and Nancy Carroll.

Copland's Symphonic Ode

Written for The Christian Science Monitor

MR AARON COPLAND'S Symphonic Ode was the centerpiece of the sixteenth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season, played in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Feb. 19. This work, dedicated to the orchestra, was one of those composed in honor of its fiftieth season, but for some reason its promulgation was deferred, and it came to its first public hearing at the concert under notice.

Concerning his work Mr. Copland is as cryptic as Stravinsky. In notes supplied to the program book, he disclaims any "literary idea" in connection with his title. "It is not an ode to anything other than the particular spirit to be found in the music itself. What that particular spirit is, is not for me to say." The composer adopts the sentiments of M. André Gide: "Before explaining my book to others, I wait for them to explain it to me. To wish to explain it first would be to restrain its meaning prematurely, because even if we know what we wish to say, we cannot know if we have said only that. And what interests me especially is what I have put into my book without my own knowledge."

We sympathize with Mr. Copland, and we are happy to respond to his appeal and tell him what he has put into his Symphonic Ode. He knows that his work is divisible into five parts. He probably is aware that he is indebted to Stravinsky for his complicated rhythmic patterns, to Honegger for the shape of his melodic line, to Harlem for his lively dances and to these and others for his harmonic idiom. But there is more than this in the work, and perhaps Mr. Copland will be surprised to hear that the key to this mystery which even he himself does not understand is the racial character of the score.

Listening to this music, you are convinced that it has a "literary idea." Let us supply the program: The first section represents the majesty of the ancient Hebrews, the second the pastimes of their descendants on Broadway, the third the melancholy strain in the race; in the fourth we are back on Broadway, but the jazz rhythms are now subtly transformed as we pass to the fifth section and reintroduce us in a powerful crescendo to the august Prophets. We have, in fact, passed by the Piano Concerto and the Two Pieces for string orchestra, and evolved another "Music for the Theater," analogous perhaps to Honegger's "Judith."

Of course much of this music is hard on the ears, and the score is not easy to grasp at a single hearing. Consequently its reception was cool, although, after a poor start, Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra gave it a fine performance. Yet there is impressiveness in the passages which we have assigned to the Hebrew Prophets, especially in the closing section; and there are even pages of much beauty. The most conspicuous of these, and to our notion the most original measures in the score, are to be found in the third section, where nostalgic melodies are sung by solo woodwind and string instruments.

Miss Jelly d'Arányi was soloist for this pair of concerts. She played Mozart's Violin Concerto No. 4 in D major (K. 218) and Ravel's "Tzigane." We have heard other fiddlers play this "Tzigane," but none who could play it as Miss D'Arányi does. Her Mozart, on the other hand, is a little too Bohemian. But she made a tremendous popular success with both numbers.

The concerto opened with the "Figaro" Overture and closed with Liszt's "Les Préludes." An oddly assorted list.

L. A. S.

Globe MUSIC Feb. 20

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

This week's Symphony program is one of the most attractive Dr Koussevitzky has offered the Friday and Saturday subscribers this season. Abandoning at last the music of the 1890s, for which he has this season betrayed a hitherto unsuspected devotion, he has turned to Mozart, and to Ravel and Aaron Copland among the moderns, with Liszt's amusingly bombastic "Les Preludes" thrown in as a sop to the surviving Victorians. Jelly (or "Yelly," as she spells her name for Americans who otherwise might mispronounce it) d'Aranyi played the "Tzigane" of Ravel, written for her, with immense gusto and unobtrusive skill. In Mozart's D major concerto she proved herself mistress of the classic style. She was very warmly applauded, and repeatedly recalled to bow her acknowledgments.

The novelty on the program was the first public performance of Aaron Copland's "Symphonic Ode," written for the Boston Symphony's anniversary, but hitherto unplayed. Mr Copland has recently revised his score, changing the notation of the music rather than the music itself, however, so as to simplify the task he sets conductor and players. This "Ode" has no program.

Mr Copland merely quotes from the preface to Andre Gide's "Paludes" a whimsical adjuration to the audience to tell the creative artist the meaning of his work. His musical material, he tells us, is all derived from a two-measure phrase in his own "Nocturne" for violin and piano. This sounds as though he were trying out the late d'Indy's theories about composition, and imposing on his music a too rigorous formal logic.

It is obviously futile to judge so complex and so modern a piece at a first hearing. One can only record random impressions. Mr Copland's earlier works had a vitality and a genuineness here seemingly absent. In this "Symphonic Ode" he is too much the technician and too little the musician with an irresistible impulse to compose. When he does attempt to be emotional and dramatic, as in his coda, the result has a surprising resemblance in effect to the hollow and calculated perorations of Respighi, though the musical means used are different.

This composition, despite some brilliant and moving pages, disappointed at least one of Mr Copland's admirers. He must not let his musical sophistication, acquired in Paris, quench the innate originality and genuineness that have made his other works seem among the most promising yet written by his generation.

Ravel's "Tzigane," thanks to Miss d'Aranyi, sounded much more brilliant than it did several years ago when played by another violinist at these concerts. It is one of those pieces in the vein of "La Valse," and the too celebrated Bolero, in which Ravel's superlative skill as a writer of music is half ironically used in giving 20th Century terms the essence of some long since exhausted 19th Century genre. If Ravel only were blessed with musical ideas of his own, he would be among the greatest composers of all time. But, like Richard Strauss, he has long been reduced to making a little inspiration go a long way by the use of sheer virtuoso technique.

After all, Liszt wrote more dazzlingly than any of them. Respighi's musical best sellers about Rome aren't half so brilliant as "Les Preludes," though slightly more up to date. Copland and Ravel are too self conscious, too fastidious, to let themselves go. Their taste, if not their consciences, will not as a rule let them make an audience sit up and take notice, as audiences still do for "Les Preludes." Played with the gusto Dr Koussevitzky brought to it yesterday, "Les Preludes" is still highly effective, banal as some of it has become.

Put any or all the other music heard yesterday and mentioned above up against Mozart and how its weakness stands out. Even in a rather pedestrian performance the overture to "Figaro" seemed timeless and deathless. Even with a perfunctory accompaniment, the melodic flow of the little violin concerto, written at 19, enthralled the listener. Genius of the first rank, like Mozart's, is incommensurable with any talent, however great.

P. R.

Copland Trans Feb 23

The open-minded and courageous evening audience at the Symphony Concerts received Mr. Copland's Symphonic Ode, last Saturday, more warmly than did the matinée audience of Friday. From all parts of the house came a considerable applause, enough without effort to recall composer and conductor twice over and finally to bring the orchestra to its feet. Seldom have it and Dr. Koussevitzky more exerted themselves to make a piece prevail with hearers. On Saturday, appreciably, they succeeded. Nor was there doubt that many of both the elder and the younger generation found Mr. Copland's "Ode" an impressive music.

Sartorial Note

Members of the Philharmonic Society [in New York] wear full evening dress, but members of the Boston Symphony wear tails and black vests, except Mr. Koussevitzky, who wears a white vest. [The New Yorker.

1932

"SONG OF FAITH" BY SYMPHONY

Carpenter's Choral Creates a Good Impression

Post Feb. 24

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

At the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon, the fourth of the current Tuesday series, Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra added their portion to the widespread observance of the 200th anniversary of the birth of George Washington.

CARPENTER'S 'SONG OF FAITH'

It had been the conductor's intention to make for this commemorative concert an all-American programme comprising two movements from Deems Taylor's charming suite, "Through the Looking Glass," John Alden Carpenter's choral "Song of Faith," written for the United States George Washington Bi-centennial Commission, and Ernest Bloch's "America." For Bloch's descriptive, grandiloquent rhapsody Dr. Koussevitzky substituted the "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven, music in one sense less, and in another sense more, appropriate and certainly a nobler tribute.

For his "Song of Faith" Mr. Carpenter wrote words as well as music. It is as composer not as poet that he has made his mark, and the musical portion of his piece is more distinctive than the text, which might be described as pedestrian. This "Song of Faith" is an "occasional piece" that, in all likelihood, will drop from sight when the purpose for which it was intended has been fulfilled. Nevertheless, it has character, individuality and a power to convince beyond that of most works of its class. The writing throughout is simple, yet never commonplace, and the final pages leave the listener genuinely impressed.

Just before the end occurs an original touch. While percussion instruments mark a clock-like rhythm, the voice of a speaker declaims a "recitative" made up of excerpts from Washington's writings, beginning, "I close this last solemn act of my life" and ending with the words, "I am not afraid to go." The speaker yesterday was Clifton Joseph Furness of the New England Conservatory of Music, who discharged his task sympathetically and with fine enunciation. The words he spoke, and they are beautiful words, some of them, must have been clearly audible in every corner of the hall.

The chorus yesterday was that of the Cecilia Society, trained by Arthur Fiedler, and it gave an excellent account of itself. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted with his usual whole-hearted absorption in the music before him, and the "Song of Faith," thanks in no small measure to the efforts of all of those concerned in the performance, made more than a passing effect.

New Work by Symphony

Amer By MOSES SMITH Feb.

The fourth program in the Tuesday afternoon series of Boston Symphony concerts was unusual in containing a novelty—the first Boston performance of John Alden Carpenter's "Song of Faith" for chorus and orchestra, written for the current bi-centennial rites of Washington.

The work calls, also, for a reader of part of the words, which were written by the composer. Yesterday's reader was Clifton Joseph Furness of the New England Conservatory of Music. The chorus was that of the Cecilia Society, Arthur Fielder, conductor.

The Carpenter work was preceded by two movements from Deems Taylor's suite, "Through the Looking Glass," and followed by an eloquent performance of the Beethoven "Eroica" symphony, a performance, however, of curious unevenness. As thus played, the first movement sagged in continuity, while the other movement developed a crescendo of interest and excitement.

The audience applauded Dr. Koussevitzky and the other performers enthusiastically.

---

of 360.

MUSIC Globe Feb 24

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr Koussevitzky assembled the program for the fourth Tuesday afternoon Symphony concert yesterday, with a view to a musical observance of George Washington's 200th birthday. To that end he selected two movements from an American suite, Deems Taylor's "Through the Looking Glass" and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. John Alden Carpenter's new "Song of Faith" he played in Boston for the first time. A chorus from the Cecilia Society assisted in this.

Carpenter's work, scored for orchestra, organ and voices, was composed expressly for the George Washington Bicentennial Commission for performance in celebration of the first President's 200th anniversary.

The composer wrote the words as well as the music, taking as a motto—which, however, does not appear in the parts to be sung—lines from Walt Whitman. The "Song" is intricate, with frequently changing time signatures and tricky rhythms. Near the end is a section called a "Washington recitative," consisting of brief excerpts from the great patriot's writings. These lines are to be spoken by an unseen man, to the musical accompaniment of side-drum beats and one low note. Yesterday Clifton Joseph Furness of the New England Conservatory recited them.

Harmonically the "Song" is mildly modern, melodically somewhat nondescript and tame. The most impressive part is the opening, which has a stately bass melody played by the double basses and 'cellos. For the most part, the work lacks force and a central point of climax.

There are moments, however, in which Carpenter attains emotional intensity and establishes definite moods which reflect the meaning of the words. Like many another "occasional" piece, the "Song" is a work of uneven merit. More often than not, the muse appears only when she wills; but seldom can she be peremptorily summoned.

It was good to hear "The Looking Glass Insects" and "The White Knight" from Mr Taylor's suite. The whole work is delightful tone painting, achieved with consummate mastery of instrumentation, which reflects as much imagination in the composer as the story of Alice did in Lewis Carroll. Dr Koussevitzky gave Beethoven's ardent symphony a stimulating reading.

Music

Feb 24 Mon,

Tuesday Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave the fourth of its Tuesday afternoon series of concerts in Symphony Hall yesterday. The program, evidently designed in observance of the Washington bicentenary, included "Looking Glass Insects" and "The White Knight" from Taylor's "Looking Glass" Suite; Mr. John Alden Carpenter's "Song of Faith" for chorus with orchestra, written for the Bicentennial Commission, and Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony. The chorus of the Cecilia Society (Mr. Arthur Fiedler, conductor) assisted.

Mr. Carpenter's work, heard on this occasion for the first time in Boston, was written presumably for performance by amateur as well as professional groups. For that reason, probably, its composer has made it blamelessly diatonic, eschewing any touch of the modernist idiom, any harmonic audacity or rhythmic complexity, that might lead the patriotic to accuse him of Soviet sympathies. The score bears as motto Walt Whitman's "For You, O Democracy," from "Calamus." The text, written by the composer, consists of verses which are the product of a musician rather than of a poet. It includes a Song of Freedom, a reminiscence of "Yankee Doodle Dandy," a lullaby and so on. Toward the end there is a spoken passage made up of excerpts from Washington's writings, to an accompaniment of drumbeats. This was effectively read by Mr. Clifton Joseph Furness of the New England Conservatory of Music. The final chorus is an appeal for divine guidance. The work as a whole is workmanlike if not inspired. The performance was admirable and the reception cordial.

L. A. S.

MU

Her

TUESDAY SYMPHONY CONCERT

The program of the fourth Tuesday afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall with Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, was as follows: Deems Taylor, two movements (Looking Glass Insects, The White Knight) from "Through the Looking Glass," Five Pictures from Lewis Carroll, Op. 12; John Alden Carpenter, "Song of Faith" for chorus and orchestra (with chorus of the Saint Cecilia Society and, as speaker, Clifton Joseph Furness); Beethoven, Symphony No. 3 in E flat major, Op. 55 (the "Eroica").

Carpenter's "Song of Faith," of which yesterday's was the first Boston performance, was written at the invitation of the United States Bi-centennial Commission for performance as part of the national celebration of the 200th anniversary of the birth of George Washington. Its motto is a stanza of Walt Whitman's (from No. 5 of "Calamus"—now entitled "For You, O Democracy"), lines which sing of the "indissolubility" of the continent, of the "life-long love of comrades," of "inseparable cities, with their arms about each other's necks." The text of the song was written by the composer himself. Like the motto, it breathes a spirit of love of country and faith in its destiny uncontaminated by the belligerent bombast of the average patriotic ode. It recalls him who "made us free," devotes a quatrain to a reminiscence of Yankee Doodle, another to the red men; another strophe recalls a "sweet lullaby . . . a song my mother knew," yet another recalls the invigorating music of the "Yankee band." At this point there is silence, a ghostly gong sounds, and over a slow, distant drumbeat is heard a voice speaking noble words uttered by Washington—a recitative made up of extracts from the first President's writings. He commends "the interests of our dearest country to the protection of Almighty God," would keep alive in our breasts "that little spark of celestial fire called 'conscience'," invokes "a government by which our lives and our liberties shall be secured" In its last sentences he bids a nobly resigned farewell to life and labor. The work ends with a prayer of faith and hope in a brighter future.

Mr. Carpenter's text is far from being great or even tolerable poetry. Neither is his music of great distinction, though it has a certain diatonic strength, freshness and sincerity that inspires respect, while its lullaby episode is charming. Yet in its whole effect the "Song of Faith," in its underlying humanity, depth of feeling and good taste is so immeasurably superior to the general run of commissioned effusions that it may be considered, if not perhaps an important contribution to music, at least a very worthy contribution to the bicentennial celebration. The work was performed excellently by both orchestra and chorus. The speaker of the recitative did his work with quiet effectiveness.

The two movements—among the most entertaining—from Deems Taylor's suite "Through the Looking Glass" were played in a manner which enhanced their fanciful charm. The highly ingenious orchestration of "Looking Glass Insects" still provokes admiration.

Of the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven the orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky gave an impressive and stirring reading, playing with a fine precision that did not exclude tenderness, with dramatic effect that was not forced, with an emotion that was not hysterical. The large audience was warmly appreciative.

S. S.

1140 Tran

With a Symphonic Bow to The Great

As Dr. Koussevitzky Observes The George Washington Bicentenary

Feb 24

ALTHOUGH there was no note in the program book to that effect, and although it had not been shouted in advance from the house-tops, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's bicentennial celebration of Washington's Birthday chanced to fall upon yesterday's concert in the Tuesday series. The program was in the main planned for it. The official piece of music written for such celebration had a prominent place. Although Beethoven had been played only at the last Tuesday concert, he reappeared yesterday with the one symphony in all the literature best adapted for honoring the memory of a heroic figure, the "Heroic" symphony. But chief interest—or curiosity—probably centered in this "official piece"—John Alden Carpenter's "Song of Faith, for Chorus and Orchestra," "written", as the program book gave information "for the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission for Performance in the Nation-wide Celebration of the 200th Anniversary of the Birth of Washington." In it yesterday the chorus of the Cecilia Society (Arthur Fiedler, conductor) sang, and since Mr. Carpenter also requires a speaker, Mr. Clifton Joseph Furness ("by courtesy of the New England Conservatory of Music") read the allotted lines.

The score bears as its motto lines from Whitman beginning, "Come, I will make the continent indissoluble; I will make the most splendid race the sun ever yet shone upon." The text of the new work, however, as the music, is from Mr. Carpenter's own hands. In an opening chorus Mr. Carpenter invites his hearers to hear again the "Song of Freedom," the "ancient story . . . of the father of our fathers." He inserts a verse about Yankee Doodle (for the ladies to sing) another about the drum-beat of the red man (for male voices). The author seems to hear lullabies which his mother sang to him; they symbolize the song of the motherland guiding her children to a "shining day." Out of it he bids his hearers recall the "Yankee band," bids them again "hear the very voice of the father." Then come the speaker's lines—actual excerpts from Washington's writings—the key-note of which is contained in the opening sentence, "I close this last solemn act of my life by commending the interests of our dearest country to the protection of Amighty God." And the chorus closes with a prayer that "the hand of God be our stay, and our guiding star light our way."

From the mood of this prayer, continuing, as it does, the mood of the chosen sentences of Washington, Mr. Carpenter takes his cue for the mood of his music. Like Stravinsky in his "Symphony of Psalms," he avoids everything that is blatant or noisy or that might give suggestion of hollow pomps. A far deeper note he strikes, the note of faith and assurance which bases itself on the note of reminiscence. Heroics the sophisticated modern shrinks from as from the very pestilence. Mr. Carpenter is only the child of his time when he sedulously avoids them. Thus he set himself the more difficult task of celebrating this event in other than grandiose terms. His very aim may be his undoing, for one could hear everywhere in the halls a regret for the absence of the heroic mold.

His grave music, up-swelling on occasion in noble lines, one listener at least, judged to be of the best that Mr. Carpenter has yet given us. The "material" in itself seems excellent, its treatment is of the high order which we have learned to expect from Mr. Carpenter. As relief from its essential gravity come measures of suggestion of "Yankee Doodle," more measures suggested by the lines about the Red-Men's drums. Skillfully Mr. Carpenter has fitted them into his thoughtful music. To it they subordinate themselves, never do they obtrude or suggest vulgarity. Yet subtly they bring relief, call to mind known musical "material" Not possibly could they better fill their appointed office.

If Mr. Carpenter deserves praise for sounding the memorial note in his music rather than a jingoistic note, it is also very possible that in making such a noble choice he has doomed his new work to a fate of martyrdom. It must be admitted that the noiser note would have been more popular; in it he would have made himself more fully understood. He evidently had his "public" in mind in avoiding his most "modernistic" style in writing, perhaps also in his suggestions of "Yankee Doodle." But if he is not his usual "modernist" self in this work, he is also not the rhetorical, naive, blustering romanticist whom this "public" would have welcomed for this task. His laudable idealism may conceivably have landed him in the place where he is neither sophisticate high-brow nor back-slapping low-brow—a place the location of which far too many idealists know all too well.

As to performance, it is difficult to see how it could have been improved on. With artistry and devotion Dr. Koussevitzky threw himself into the task of projecting this music into the concert hall. With enthusiasm (when composer and conductor called for it), oftener with finesse, the chorus sang their lines. Mr. Furness, from his difficult position behind the chorus (prescribed by Mr. Carpenter's score) read clearly and distinctly and expresively, timed to the drum beats in the score, the quotations from Washington's pen. What was humanly possible to do for the work was thus done for it. Through the doing, some few of us warmed to it. But Mr. Carpenter writing for the "great majority" is not quite the usual Mr. Carpenter. That "great majority" is bound to feel that it is not one of their own who is addressing them. Against that superlative performance is powerless.

But the many who wanted their Washington a great hero had their reward in Beethoven's third symphony. The choice of this symphony for this place was a singularly appropriate one. Conceivably it was written for just such a hero as Washington. The story has often been told how it was written for Napoleon before that worthy became an emperor, when Beethoven held him to be a great revolutionary, democratic leader, how after Napoleon forsook the ideal which Beethoven had attributed to him, the composer inscribed the symphony "to the memory of a great hero." What more appropriate, then, than this symphony on a commemorative Washington program! Performance reached the superb heights which have characterized it when played at other concerts earlier this season.

Witness now Dr. Koussevitzky as program maker in choosing his first piece. No brilliant opening "thriller" would do here. He must find a work which would not dwarf the thoughtful beauties of the work that was to follow. For a Washington program, if he could find an American work, all the better. Of course, he found it, in two movements out of Deems Taylor's suite, "Through the Looking Glass,"—"Looking Glass Insects," "The White Knight." Probably the conventional program maker looked askance at the presence of such a movement as "Looking Glass Insects" at the beginning of a program. But the piece was played, and one observed no fatalities anywhere in Symphony Hall. And the conventional program maker would never in the world have found a piece which fitted into its niche on this particular program as well as Dr. Koussevitzky's choice. Once more one gladly repeats thue line about superb performance.

A. H. M.

Coming of Toch

HEREUNDER is announcement that Ernst Toch, the modernist German composer, will be guest of the Symphony Orchestra at two of its concerts next month. For further introduction, here are the paragraphs in which the New York Times signalled his arrival in that city last week: "The electrical energy which characterizes the piano-concerto of Toch which J. M. Sanromá played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra several seasons ago does not betray itself in the bearing of the composer. For Toch, who has the face of a dreamer and a man of intellect, speaks softly and is evidently, before strangers, of a reserved if not a retiring disposition.

"He has brought with him principally compositions of chamber music, a set of nine songs—settings of words by modern German poets—piano-pieces and other works in the smaller forms, some of them to be heard for the first time in this country. He will also play his second piano-concerto, already referred to, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston. When it was first performed in 1927 at Frankfort in a festival of the International Society for Contemporaneous Music, Toch was not the pianist. At that time he could not have played his concerto. He had not the requisite virtuosity.

"Toch was not trained as a pianist. He did not study this instrument intensively until after his twentieth year, and then only because he found himself at the mercy of indifferent interpreters of his music. It was necessary to be capable of representing himself on the keyboard. Then his playing, like his composing, was interrupted by the war. 'He could not have played his concerto three years ago,' said the composer's wife, 'but he can now.' Bostonians, and in all probability the publics of other American cities, will be able to decide for themselves whether Mr. Toch's recently acquired virtuosity is equal to his own demands upon it as composer.

Ernst Toch, the notable German composer of the post-war generation, is making a brief visit to the United States. By invitation of Dr. Koussevitzky he will be guest of the Boston Orchestra at a pair of Symphony Concerts in the course of March. At them he will play the piano-part in his Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, first heard here three years ago with Mr. Sanromá as pianist; then warmly received. The program may also contain other compositions by Toch in the smaller or the larger orchestral forms.

Continued on Following Page

Continued from

Concert-Chronicle

Trans. Feb 26

Hindemith Again

ONCE again one can make the suggestion that in a sense the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is still with us. It is curious that only a week after one of the works written for that anniversary came to first performance (Copland's Ode) another of the anniversary works should have its first repetition. The reference is of course to Paul Hindemith's "Konzertmusik" for Strings and Brass Instruments, which is on this week's list at Symphony Hall. More than many another of the anniversary works this "Concert Music" last year won favor.

This Concert Music appears to be a successor to the form which Hindemith has long held in high favor. Says a recent writer (Andrew Fraser, in Essays on Music, Oxford University Press, 1930), after examining the composer's exercises in this form: "These eight concerti (mostly in four movements) are, taken as a whole, remarkably terse and closely wrought, though single movements can be too drawn-out. The most powerful rhythms come to be sustained by the vitality of the themes, but there are times when the themes seem to be stretched out on a most uncomfortable Procrustean bed to fit the technical exigencies of the moment. Melodies, in fact, are apt to be considered only for the possibilities they offer for contrapuntal treatment, and the quality of the thematic material consequently suffers. In most cases, Hindemith guards against these dangers successfully, but here and there one feels that the music is ceasing to be intellectual and is becoming merely cerebral."

In this latest piece of Concert Music, however, observers appeared to detect a note entirely the opposite of "cerebral." The word "romanticism" actually slipped into two reviews, and the term "long-breathed melody" into one. And there was all but common consent that the young composer's increasing maturity was adding to his musical stature.

From last year's analysis one may recapitulate: The Concert Music is in two movements, (1) "Moderately fast, with Power," expanding to "Very broadly, but always flowingly"; (2) "Lively." A three-fold massing of sonorities begins the first movement, a martial music for brass continues it; there is a broadly worked out recapitulation and extensive coda. The second movement is a fugue with a song-like middle section. The fugue-theme is largely in very rapid sixteenth notes, with many repeated notes. It seems more significant than the usual merely "serviceable" fugue-subject.

A. H. M.

In Koussevitzkian Ways at Cambridge

Trans. Feb 26

THE term, "virtuoso orchestra," is frequently applied to the group of musicians under Dr. Koussevitzky's charge. It was never a more fitting term than at the concert in Cambridge last evening. Dr. Koussevitzky turned the scintillant ensemble skill of the band to a wide variety of tasks throughout a notably diversified program. With a thought to the possibility of continuing the commemorative rites for the late Vincent d'Indy, he repeated for the benefit of the Cambridge audience the recently revived "Istar" Variations. As introductory contrast, he played Prokofiev's sparkling "Classical" Smyphony; then, to disclose still other interpretative possibilities, rounded off the first half of the program with Ravel's "Spanish Rhapsody." After intermission, the evening was solidly Wagnerian. The familiar Koussevitzkian manner with Wagner—carefully inflected, slow-paced, meaningful—was evident in the Prelude and Closing-Scene of "Tristan and Isolde." Last of all, by way of a surprising contrast, came a succinct and powerful performance of the Overture to "Tannhäuser."

Since it was first made known here, Prokofiev's symphony in the style of Mozart has established a perennial appeal. It would be ironical indeed if the composer, who is an exponent of many of the more advanced precepts of orchestral composition, should become popular with the general audience chiefly by reason of this "Classical" Symphony written in the manner of music's early age. Yet the composer's contribution is even here original and distinctive. It has the wit that only a keen mind could conceive, the gracefulness of a sensitive artist and a light-heartedness as radiant and as welcome as the sunshine. Pardonably, Dr. Koussevitzky makes of it a crisp virtuoso piece. The Larghetto sings its airy song; the Gavotte frames a lilting musical quip; the Finale darts and glints to a smiling close. Little wonder that yesterday's audience made such a delighted stir over it.

As Sibelius and Smetana in their respective fields, d'Indy brings to the musical scene a note of marked individuality. It is not every composer who can write a symphonic poem of variations which describes in tone the gradual divesting of a mythical goddess's raiment as she proceeds through the various stages of Hades, without falling into the pitfalls of literalism. The attentiveness of the audience and the earnestness of Dr. Koussevitzky attested last evening to the compelling quality of this music. Individual instrumental choirs wove an enshrouding cloak about the central mood and figure; the mind followed absorbedly their separate strands and colors; yet every detail appeared an essential part of a consistent and unified whole. One by one the wisps of sound fell away. Glowing with vitality, the instruments finally announced the naked theme. Dr. Koussevitzky successfully transmitted just the right combination of austerity and sensuousness which distinguishes the score. For pure vibrant tone, the unison playing at the climax of the work has seldom been equaled in recent remembered occasions.

Though in the treatment of characteristic Spanish rhythms it foreshadows to some extent the celebrated "Bolero," Ravel's "Spanish Rhapsody" presents the composer in an earlier manner. The evocation of a nocturnal mood in the opening division suggests in its veiled harmonies the familiar technique of French impressionism. In his later works Ravel's music has become more pungent and vital. Yet the piece served as a brilliant contrast to the two preceding numbers and attested Dr. Koussevitzky's proverbial discernment in program-building and gave fresh evidence of the versatility of the Orchestra.

Dr. Koussevitzky's way with Wagner is still something of a puzzle to many listeners. A performance of the Prelude and Closing-Scene from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde" more finished in detail and more carefully molded could scarcely be conceived. Yet the exceptional pains he took with the piece appeared to dissipate rather than to intensify the sublimely passionate mood. On the other hand, the power and eloquence of his "Tannhäuser" Overture came as a distinct surprise. Dr. Koussevitzky's pace was exceptionally rapid. He brought the contrasting divisions into dramatic relation with each other, made an exceedingly compact and unified whole and achieved the utmost in expressive nuance. The performance was one of amazing virtuosity. Not suspecting that this hackneyed overture could possess such possibilities of eloquence, the audience outdid itself in enthusiastic clapping.

N. M. J.

1140 Tran

With a Symphonic Bow to The Great

As Dr. Koussevitzky Observes The George Washington Bicentenary

Feb 24

ALTHOUGH there was no note in the program book to that effect, and although it had not been shouted in advance from the house-tops, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's bicentennial celebration of Washington's Birthday chanced to fall upon yesterday's concert in the Tuesday series. The program was in the main planned for it. The official piece of music written for such celebration had a prominent place. Although Beethoven had been played only at the last Tuesday concert, he reappeared yesterday with the one symphony in all the literature best adapted for honoring the memory of a heroic figure, the "Heroic" symphony. But chief interest—or curiosity—probably centered in this "official piece"—John Alden Carpenter's "Song of Faith, for Chorus and Orchestra," "written", as the program book gave information "for the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission for Performance in the Nation-wide Celebration of the 200th Anniversary of the Birth of Washington." In it yesterday the chorus of the Cecilia Society (Arthur Fiedler, conductor) sang, and since Mr. Carpenter also requires a speaker, Mr. Clifton Joseph Furness ("by courtesy of the New England Conservatory of Music") read the allotted lines.

The score bears as its motto lines from Whitman beginning, "Come, I will make the continent indissoluble; I will make the most splendid race the sun ever yet shone upon." The text of the new work, however, as the music, is from Mr. Carpenter's own hands. In an opening chorus Mr. Carpenter invites his hearers to hear again the "Song of Freedom," the "ancient story . . . of the father of our fathers." He inserts a verse about Yankee Doodle (for the ladies to sing) another about the drum-beat of the red man (for male voices). The author seems to hear lullabies which his mother sang to him; they symbolize the song of the motherland guiding her children to a "shining day." Out of it he bids his hearers recall the "Yankee band," bids them again "hear the very voice of the father." Then come the speaker's lines—actual excerpts from Washington's writings—the key-note of which is contained in the opening sentence, "I close this last solemn act of my life by commending the interests of our dearest country to the protection of Amighty God." And the chorus closes with a prayer that "the hand of God be our stay, and our guiding star light our way."

From the mood of this prayer, continuing, as it does, the mood of the chosen sentences of Washington, Mr. Carpenter takes his cue for the mood of his music. Like Stravinsky in his "Symphony of Psalms," he avoids everything that is blatant or noisy or that might give suggestion of hollow pomps. A far deeper note he strikes, the note of faith and assurance which bases itself on the note of reminiscence. Heroics the sophisticated modern shrinks from as from the very pestilence. Mr. Carpenter is only the child of his time when he sedulously avoids them. Thus he set himself the more difficult task of celebrating this event in other than grandiose terms. His very aim may be his undoing, for one could hear everywhere in the halls a regret for the absence of the heroic mold.

His grave music, up-swelling on occasion in noble lines, one listener at least, judged to be of the best that Mr. Carpenter has yet given us. The "material" in itself seems excellent, its treatment is of the high order which we have learned to expect from Mr. Carpenter. As relief from its essential gravity come measures of suggestion of "Yankee Doodle," more measures suggested by the lines about the Red-Men's drums. Skillfully Mr. Carpenter has fitted them into his thoughtful music. To it they subordinate themselves, never do they obtrude or suggest vulgarity. Yet subtly they bring relief, call to mind known musical "material" Not possibly could they better fill their appointed office.

If Mr. Carpenter deserves praise for sounding the memorial note in his music rather than a jingoistic note, it is also very possible that in making such a noble choice he has doomed his new work to a fate of martyrdom. It must be admitted that the noiser note would have been more popular; in it he would have made himself more fully understood. He evidently had his "public" in mind in avoiding his most "modernistic" style in writing, perhaps also in his suggestions of "Yankee Doodle." But if he is not his usual "modernist" self in this work, he is also not the rhetorical, naive, blustering romanticist whom this "public" would have welcomed for this task. His laudable idealism may conceivably have landed him in the place where he is neither sophisticate high-brow nor back-slapping low-brow—a place the location of which far too many idealists know all too well.

As to performance, it is difficult to see how it could have been improved on. With artistry and devotion Dr. Koussevitzky threw himself into the task of projecting this music into the concert hall. With enthusiasm (when composer and conductor called for it), oftener with finesse, the chorus sang their lines. Mr. Furness, from his difficult position behind the chorus (prescribed by Mr. Carpenter's score) read clearly and distinctly and expresively, timed to the drum beats in the score, the quotations from Washington's pen. What was humanly possible to do for the work was thus done for it. Through the doing, some few of us warmed to it. But Mr. Carpenter writing for the "great majority" is not quite the usual Mr. Carpenter. That "great majority" is bound to feel that it is not one of their own who is addressing them. Against that superlative performance is powerless.

But the many who wanted their Washington a great hero had their reward in Beethoven's third symphony. The choice of this symphony for this place was a singularly appropriate one. Conceivably it was written for just such a hero as Washington. The story has often been told how it was written for Napoleon before that worthy became an emperor, when Beethoven held him to be a great revolutionary, democratic leader, how after Napoleon forsook the ideal which Beethoven had attributed to him, the composer inscribed the symphony "to the memory of a great hero." What more appropriate, then, than this symphony on a commemorative Washington program! Performance reached the superb heights which have characterized it when played at other concerts earlier this season.

Witness now Dr. Koussevitzky as program maker in choosing his first piece. No brilliant opening "thriller" would do here. He must find a work which would not dwarf the thoughtful beauties of the work that was to follow. For a Washington program, if he could find an American work, all the better. Of course, he found it, in two movements out of Deems Taylor's suite, "Through the Looking Glass,"—"Looking Glass Insects," "The White Knight." Probably the conventional program maker looked askance at the presence of such a movement as "Looking Glass Insects" at the beginning of a program. But the piece was played, and one observed no fatalities anywhere in Symphony Hall. And the conventional program maker would never in the world have found a piece which fitted into its niche on this particular program as well as Dr. Koussevitzky's choice. Once more one gladly repeats thue line about superb performance.

A. H. M.

Coming of Toch

HEREUNDER is announcement that Ernst Toch, the modernist German composer, will be guest of the Symphony Orchestra at two of its concerts next month. For further introduction, here are the paragraphs in which the New York Times signalled his arrival in that city last week: "The electrical energy which characterizes the piano-concerto of Toch which J. M. Sanromá played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra several seasons ago does not betray itself in the bearing of the composer. For Toch, who has the face of a dreamer and a man of intellect, speaks softly and is evidently, before strangers, of a reserved if not a retiring disposition.

Ernst Toch, the notable German composer of the post-war generation, is making a brief visit to the United States. By invitation of Dr. Koussevitzky he will be guest of the Boston Orchestra at a pair of Symphony Concerts in the course of March. At them he will play the piano-part in his Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, first heard here three years ago with Mr. Sanromá as pianist; then warmly received. The program may also contain other compositions by Toch in the smaller or the larger orchestral forms.

"He has brought with him principally compositions of chamber music, a set of nine songs—settings of words by modern German poets—piano-pieces and other works in the smaller forms, some of them to be heard for the first time in this country. He will also play his second piano-concerto, already referred to, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston. When it was first performed in 1927 at Frankfort in a festival of the International Society for Contemporaneous Music, Toch was not the pianist. At that time he could not have played his concerto. He had not the requisite virtuosity.

"Toch was not trained as a pianist. He [illegible] this instrument intensively have played his concerto three years ago,' said the composer's wife, 'but he can now.' Bostonians, and in all probability the publics of other American cities, will be able to decide for themselves whether Mr. Toch's recently acquired virtuosity is equal to his own demands upon it as composer.

Concert-Chronicle

Continued from Preceding Page

Concert-Chronicle

Trans. Feb 26

Hindemith Again

ONCE again one can make the suggestion that in a sense the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is still with us. It is curious that only a week after one of the works written for that anniversary came to first performance (Copland's Ode) another of the anniversary works should have its first repetition. The reference is of course to Paul Hindemith's "Konzertmusik" for Strings and Brass Instruments, which is on this week's list at Symphony Hall. More than many another of the anniversary works this "Concert Music" last year won favor.

This Concert Music appears to be a successor to the form which Hindemith has long held in high favor. Says a recent writer (Andrew Fraser, in Essays on Music, Oxford University Press, 1930), after examining the composer's exercises in this form: "These eight concerti (mostly in four movements) are, taken as a whole, remarkably terse and closely wrought, though single movements can be too drawn-out. The most powerful rhythms come to be sustained by the vitality of the themes, but there are times when the themes seem to be stretched out on a most uncomfortable Procrustean bed to fit the technical exigencies of the moment. Melodies, in fact, are apt to be considered only for the possibilities they offer for contrapuntal treatment, and the quality of the thematic material consequently suffers. In most cases, Hindemith guards against these dangers successfully, but here and there one feels that the music is ceasing to be intellectual and is becoming merely cerebral."

In this latest piece of Concert Music, however, observers appeared to detect a note entirely the opposite of "cerebral." The word "romanticism" actually slipped into two reviews, and the term "long-breathed melody" into one. And there was all but common consent that the young composer's increasing maturity was adding to his musical stature.

From last year's analysis one may recapitulate: The Concert Music is in two movements, (1) "Moderately fast, with Power," expanding to "Very broadly, but always flowingly"; (2) "Lively." A three-fold massing of sonorities begins the first movement, a martial music for brass continues it; there is a broadly worked out recapitulation and extensive coda. The second movement is a fugue with a song-like middle section. The fugue-theme is largely in very rapid sixteenth notes, with many repeated notes. It seems more significant than the usual merely "serviceable" fugue-subject.

A. H. M.

In Koussevitzkian Ways at Cambridge

Tran. Feb 26

THE term, "virtuoso orchestra," is frequently applied to the group of musicians under Dr. Koussevitzky's charge. It was never a more fitting term than at the concert in Cambridge last evening. Dr. Koussevitzky turned the scintillant ensemble skill of the band to a wide variety of tasks throughout a notably diversified program. With a thought to the possibility of continuing the commemorative rites for the late Vincent d'Indy, he repeated for the benefit of the Cambridge audience the recently revived "Istar" Variations. As introductory contrast, he played Prokofiev's sparkling "Classical" Smyphony; then, to disclose still other interpretative possibilities, rounded off the first half of the program with Ravel's "Spanish Rhapsody." After intermission, the evening was solidly Wagnerian. The familiar Koussevitzkian manner with Wagner—carefully inflected, slow-paced, meaningful—was evident in the Prelude and Closing-Scene of "Tristan and Isolde." Last of all, by way of a surprising contrast, came a succinct and powerful performance of the Overture to "Tannhäuser."

Since it was first made known here, Prokofiev's symphony in the style of Mozart has established a perennial appeal. It would be ironical indeed if the composer, who is an exponent of many of the more advanced precepts of orchestral composition, should become popular with the general audience chiefly by reason of this "Classical" Symphony written in the manner of music's early age. Yet the composer's contribution is even here original and distinctive. It has the wit that only a keen mind could conceive, the gracefulness of a sensitive artist and a light-heartedness as radiant and as welcome as the sunshine. Pardonably, Dr. Koussevitzky makes of it a crisp virtuoso piece. The Larghetto sings its airy song; the Gavotte frames a lilting musical quip; the Finale darts and glints to a smiling close. Little wonder that yesterday's audience made such a delighted stir over it.

As Sibelius and Smetana in their respective fields, d'Indy brings to the musical scene a note of marked individuality. It is not every composer who can write a symphonic poem of variations which describes in tone the gradual divesting of a mythical goddess's raiment as she proceeds through the various stages of Hades, without falling into the pitfalls of literalism. The attentiveness of the audience and the earnestness of Dr. Koussevitzky attested last evening to the compelling quality of this music. Individual instrumental choirs wove an enshrouding cloak about the central mood and figure; the mind followed absorbedly their separate strands and colors; yet every detail appeared an essential part of a consistent and unified whole. One by one the wisps of sound fell away. Glowing with vitality, the instruments finally announced the naked theme. Dr. Koussevitzky successfully transmitted just the right combination of austerity and sensuousness which distinguishes the score. For pure vibrant tone, the unison playing at the climax of the work has seldom been equaled in recent remembered occasions.

Though in the treatment of characteristic Spanish rhythms it foreshadows to some extent the celebrated "Bolero," Ravel's "Spanish Rhapsody" presents the composer in an earlier manner. The evocation of a nocturnal mood in the opening division suggests in its veiled harmonies the familiar technique of French impressionism. In his later works Ravel's music has become more pungent and vital. Yet the piece served as a brilliant contrast to the two preceding numbers and attested Dr. Koussevitzky's proverbial discernment in program-building and gave fresh evidence of the versatility of the Orchestra.

Dr. Koussevitzky's way with Wagner is still something of a puzzle to many listeners. A performance of the Prelude and Closing-Scene from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde" more finished in detail and more carefully molded could scarcely be conceived. Yet the exceptional pains he took with the piece appeared to dissipate rather than to intensify the sublimely passionate mood. On the other hand, the power and eloquence of his "Tannhäuser" Overture came as a distinct surprise. Dr. Koussevitzky's pace was exceptionally rapid. He brought the contrasting divisions into dramatic relation with each other, made an exceedingly compact and unified whole and achieved the utmost in expressive nuance. The performance was one of amazing virtuosity. Not suspecting that this hackneyed overture could possess such possibilities of eloquence, the audience outdid itself in enthusiastic clapping.

N. M. J.

Symphony Concert ---

Afternoon Of Beethoven By Koussevitzky

Trans. Feb 27

The "Eroica" Full-Statured, Loeffler Transformed, Hindemith Replayed

IN the performance, at the Symphony Concert on Friday, of Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra did the offices of a conductor and of players in the first rank. They vitalized once more a long-familiar music, regained its vehemence, tension and manifold energy; so restored to hearers, a century and a quarter later, the surprise, the wonder, in which the first audiences must have listened. Some, of course, will say that the "Eroica" is a "classic"; therefore needs no such rejuvenation. The very fact that it is a "classic" makes the process the more imperative. Elsewhere, if not at Symphony Hall, most of us have sat under dutiful performances of the "Eroica" in which the orchestra sounded all the notes; while the conductor obeyed all the interpretive conventions that he happened to remember. Then the Symphony ran to the "inordinate length" of which Beethoven's Viennese detractors early complained. Then it passed as venerable, respectable, and lifeless, museum-piece—the notion at the back of many heads about the "tiresome classics." One elated listener confessed yesterday that in his time he had instinctively associated them with the dusty busts on top shelves in his schoolroom.

Subconsciously Dr. Koussevitzky may remember Goethe's saying that every "classic" must be revitalized to each succeeding generation—if it is to remain itself. Certainly with the "Eroica" he did the works of such faith and practice; while the orchestra played in the conductor's image. Plodding analysts have counted thirty or forty changes in the main theme through the first movement. Nobody was in the mood to test the count, on Friday afternoon, while Beethoven was surging forward with irrepressible and exhaustless energy, shaking his fist at the high gods, stilling his outcries only that they might rise again. Dr. Koussevitzky re-asserted the grandeur of the progress, the epic vastness of the conflict, the might of will with which the composer informs it. The unprepared audience of 1805 must have listened with deepening awe. In 1932 there was a hint of it in the tense silence of the matinée audience. Research has discovered that the orchestras of Beethoven's time, and long afterward, were catch-as-catch-can bodies who gave what we moderns would judge sorry performances of symphonic masterpieces. And yesterday there were the weight, the splendor, the driving urge upon the rhythm, of the Koussevitzkian strings. In transition or when Beethoven calmed, the conductor was not less divining. Then also the transparancy of the wood winds was complement to the power of the strings.

The pitfall for the slow movement is less sentimentality than a kind of unction, as though Beethoven were mourning for his hero with hands crossed upon his breast and eyes piously upturned. So conceived, the Funeral March lags, while phrases and periods soften. Read objectively, the music proceeds austerely, inevitably. The tension does not slacken when the measures of lament are less epical and universal than introspective and individual; for the instant putting by humanity in the mass that Beethoven may open his own heart. Dr. Koussevitzky illuminated these contrasts; yet in pace and accent, in advancing and cumulating line, held firm to the poignant severity of a slow movement not to be compared until Beethoven twenty years later set hand to a ninth and final Symphony. The tone of the orchestra reflected this tensity; yielded nothing to softness; spoke nobly, as the old philosopher had it, of Beethoven's soul.

The pace was swift through the scherzo, so swift that only the quick hands and lips of the players and the quick ears among the listeners could sound and catch the flying figures. The exhilaration, the excitement, were irresistible. Here at last was Beethoven, flinging out, striding the hills, up and down a wind-blown, jocund world. The strings were keen; the horns glowing. . . . Then to the finale of the variations with Beethoven convulsive in exultation, prodigious with power. From end to end, the "Eroica" is a Symphony of tension. Again Dr. Koussevitzky kept it unrelaxed through every convolution of the changeful patterns; while strings and horns sang together deep and full; or through some interstice the flutes embroidered clear. The conductor stayed these energies only for the songful measures that are halo to the end. "The greatness of the "Eroica," wrote Mr. Gilman the other day in the program-book of the Philharmonic Society, "remains for men to marvel at." In twenty-five years of the Symphony Concerts that greatness seldom stood clearer than it did yesterday from Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra.

In the earlier half of the concert the conductor fulfilled two other obligations as essential as the vitalizing and the liberation of a "classic." We are all in degree creatures of environment, by which fate it is the bounden duty of an illustrious conductor and an illustrious orchestra to play music written in their own city and country—so long, be it also said, as that music can hold its own in the concert-halls of the world. Yesterday Dr. Koussevitzky's choice lighted upon Mr. Loeffler's tone-poem, "The Death of Tintagiles," written—in revision—thirty years ago, played at Symphony Hall after a nine-year interval, for the first time by the present conductor and orchestra. Once more a Bostonian audience called and recalled its oldest, widest established and most honored composer. If Mr. Loeffler is a Bostonian institution, he is also, contrary to precedent, an institution much alive and cordially regarded.

With surprise remembering ears heard the "Dramatic Poem." To the best of recollection, never before "at these concerts" has it sounded so dramatically, at such pitch of poignancy and power. The now neglected Maeterlinck was in full vogue when Mr. Loeffler wrote "Tintagiles." Under the conductor's hand upon the composer's music the Belgian poet's thin, mannered little play became a persisting parable, a universal tragedy. There were the forces of darkness incarnate in the Queen and her music. There were the feeble hands and the longing hearts of the children of light beating vainly and piteously against them out of the measures for Tintagiles and his sister. Dr. Koussevitzky's strings lent their power to the obscurantists. Mr. Loeffler and Mr. Lefranc's viola d'amore, with the voices of the woodwinds now and then aiding, plead for the idealists at the closed door. Over both swirled from the orchestra the atmosphere of fate and solitude and desolation, where there is none to help or heed. From the earliest times there has been no questioning the poetry of Mr. Loeffler's music. Now the temperament and the imagination of Dr. Koussevitzky also dramatized it. In this warming and heightening marks of its day that the piece betrays thirty years after, vanished. A week ago the carpers made merry—in their superior way—over Mr. Copland's saying that a composer does not always know all he has put into his music. What Dr. Koussevitzky drew yesterday from "The Death of Tintagiles" was the immediate and sufficient proof.

Conductor and orchestra discharged a third obligation of their high place—to make known deserving and characteristic music of this instant day—when they re-played Hindemith's Concert-Music" for strings and brass, written for the jubilee year at Symphony Hall. Now, in preparation for performance at New York, came the second hearing promised last spring. No warmer was the mood of the audience toward the piece; while for most repetition confirmed impressions already received. The "Concert-Music" remains technically interesting, well-shaped formally; is wholly self-contained; upsprings, advances and rounds, skilfully conducted, exhilaratingly alive. In quick movements Hindemith is plainly of classic descent; in slow movements romantic—almost against his will—by German heritage. He writes inevitably in the modernist idiom dissonant and multi-keyed, but he does not affect or exaggerate it. His invention is ready if not always distinguished. He weaves counterpoint with inexhaustible dexterity and resource; for individuality turns it now genial and flowing, now biting and witty. He is fertile and pungent with combinations, contrasts or isolation of his instrumental voices.

At the beginning of the "Concert-Music" Hindemith strikes out sharp rhythms, running figures, massed periods, full-voiced. In time there is clear modern melody; a lithe, keen, spirited almost festal, fugue; a return to large and sonorous melodic curve; a whip-lash climax with the resumed fugue. Nobody is stirred in the old emotional sense; but more than one finds here the restless strength, there the quest for a stripped beauty, from the mind rather than the heart, that both mark our time. The one animates, the other enriches, the "Concert-Music." H. T. P.

The Symphony Orchestra announces a repetition of Bach's Mass in B minor on the afternoon and evening of Easter Sunday, March 27, in Symphony Hall. As in the festival performances last spring, the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society will provide the chorus. The quartet of solo-singers will also be the same: Mmes. Evans and Matzenauer, Messrs. Crooks and Gange. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct. As heretofore, there will be two "sessions," beginning at 4.30 and 8.30 with a dinner-interval between. The prices of tickets, both "sessions" included, are $1.50, $2, $2.50, $3 and $4. They are now on sale at Symphony Hall to which mail-orders may also be sent. The proceeds will be added to the Pension Fund of the orchestra.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Her Feb 27

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the 17th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, which took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall, was as follows: Hindemith, concert music for string and brass instruments. Loeffler, "The Death of Tintagiles," dramatic poem (after the play of Maeterlinck), for orchestra and viola d'amore—Jean Lefranc, viola d'amore. Beethoven, Symphony No. 3, "Eroica."

One has heard too little of Hindemith's music in Boston to form a just opinion of its worth. Other American cities have been more fortunate; perhaps less fortunate. There was a time in Germany when he was regarded as the white-haired boy; the hope for the glorious future; greater even than Schoenberg. In England they look on Hindemith coolly. When his "concert music for piano, brass and harps" was performed in London early this month an able and fair-minded critic remarked: "The more one hears of the later Hindemith the more exasperating his work. From time to time, some little theme is shown at first in sympathetic fashion, then submitted to the most mechanical processes known to music. Any pleasant jingle seems to mesmerize the composer, who repeats it much as Bruckner repeats his themes . . . Hindemith abuses the liberty shown to a modern."

But Hindemith is not always mesmerized by a pleasant jingle. Witness his oratorio recently performed with great success. The title is forbidding, "The Unending," but the performance takes only two hours. The "Concert Music" played yesterday is of "the later Hindemith," for it was composed for the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony orchestra; it was performed here last April and proved to be one of the few compositions sent in worthy of the occasion. This music is more than interesting. It cannot be called "noble," not even "grand," but it holds the attention by its strength in structure, its spirit, festal without blatancy. For once there is no too evident desire to stun the hearer. It is as if the composer had written for his own pleasure. It is virile music with relieving passages—few in number—that have genuine and simple beauty of thought and expression; exciting at times by the rushing rhythm.

It was high time to hear Mr. Loeffler's "Death of Tintagiles" again, for though the revised version is now 31 years old, the music is as dramatically emotional as when it was first performed; even more to be appreciated today than it was when audiences still favored square-toed compositions with the old formulas, and were suspicious of composers who freed themselves from confining shackles of tradition. The raging measures suggesting the storm without the castle have lost nothing of dramatic intensity which, wild as it may be, is always musical. The mystery, the suspense of those waiting for the dread something to happen, the agony of Ygraine as she hears the boy crying on the other side of the keyless iron door—all this is forcibly suggested to those familiar with Maeterlinck's little tragedy—suggested, for Mr. Lieffler is too fine an artist to write merely panoramic music; while to those who do not know, or do not care for the symbolism in this play, Mr. Loeffler's music in itself is to them eloquent and moving. The performance was excellent in the general spirit and the expressive detail. Dr. Koussevitzky, Mr. Lefranc and the orchestra paid this tribute to the composer. He was present; was called to the platform several times; was enthusiastically applauded.

One would have had the Funeral March in the symphony taken at a little faster pace. It is long, as though the mourning for the hero would never end, and if the tempo taken is a shade too slow, the funeral procession is likely to drag weary feet to the grave. The problem of the fitting tempo is not an easy one to solve. One does not wish to hurry the hearse; one does not wish to keep the grave-diggers and the orator of thet day waiting.

With this possible exception, the performance was impressive. But the symphony itself gains by performances at long intervals; for some great occasion; it is not a symphony for once in two or three years. Beethoven realized its dangerous length. After the first public performance, he inserted this note in the score: "Since this symphony is longer than an ordinary symphony, it should be performed at the beginning rather than at the end of a concert, either after an overture or an aria, or after a concerto." Conductors in all countries have paid little heed to his request.

No wonder that many in Vienna when they first heard the symphony were dismayed, and found it grotesque and boresome. But was there an orchestra in Vienna or in all Europe at that time capable of playing the symphony as it should be played, and how many conductors, the composer included, were competent to interpret it?

The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra will be out of town next week. The program of the concerts on March 11 and 12 will be: Bach, C. P. E., concerto, D major, for orchestra, arranged by Steinberg. Stravinsky, suite No. 1 from the ballet "Pulcinella" (after Pergolesi) for small orchestra. Debussy, Nocturnes-Nuages, Fetes. Sowerby, "Prairie," poem for orchestra. Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

141

AY, FEBRUARY 27,

MODERNIST HONORED BY SYMPHONY

Post

Hindemith's Piece Gains on Rehearing Loeffler's Poem

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

A classic, Beethoven, a modernist who yet has his roots in the past, Hindemith, and a resident composer who has seen his music become a fixture in the repertory, Charles Martin Loeffler, shared the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon.

HINDEMITH'S MUSIC

Hindemith's piece, which headed the programme, was the "Concert Music" for strings and brass instruments written for the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and given its first performances last April, while Beethoven's with which the concert ended, was the "Eroica" Symphony. Between them came in its first performance under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction of Mr. Loeffler's tone-poem, "The Death of Tintagiles."

When Hindemith's "Konzertmusik" was first heard here there were those who found it to be one of the soundest and most satisfying of the several works composed for the Orchestra's Golden Jubilee. Only the symphonies of Roussel and Honegger could in this respect stand beside it. A re-hearing of the music yesterday tended to raise the listener's good opinion of it.

Dissonance If Unavoidable

Your Teutonic modernist, and Hindemith, Toch and Berg are all cases in point, does not seek dissonance wantonly and for its own sake, but arrives at it contrapuntally as did Bach, Schumann and Wagner and Straus before him. He does not forswear melody of the long-breathed type, substituting for it the short, ejaculatory phrases that bespeak the over-wrought nerves, the temperament uncontrolled.

All of these virtues, positive and negative, reside in this "Konzertmusik."

Here is music as self-evolving as anything of Bach. Its creation was an act of composition, not of mere piecing together of effects, borrowed or original. There is evidence in it of a technique that may only be described as masterly and of a genuine musical impulse, not untinged with the romanticism that your simon-pure ultra modern composer has endeavored at least until very recently to banish from his consciousness.

Loeffler's "Tintagiles"

Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra played Hindemith's piece as though they believed in it, and they were eloquent, in turn, with Loeffler's "Tintagiles." Perhaps it was the performance, perhaps it was not, but the fact remains that "La Mort de Tintagiles" sounded fresher yesterday, seemed in every way a more vital, more enduring music than when it was last heard here nine years ago. It is posible that we have learned not to try to associate the music too closely with Maeterlink's play. To do this is to suspect it being over-substantial, too thickly textured, too heroic of voice to serve as commentary on this piteous drama of marionettes. Nor does the music that would suggest the baleful Queen seem as once it did, truly horrendous. Such things time inevitably softens.

Today it were better to hear "La Mort de Tintagiles" as music for its own sake, conscious in a general way that it depicts the age-old contest between the forces of evil and the innocent beings whose fateful destiny drags them down, despite all struggles and protests.

Composer in Audience

In yesterday's performance of this still persuasive "dramatic poem" the important part for viola d'amore was expressively played by Mr. Le Franc. The composer, who was present in the audience, was summoned many times to the stage to acknowledge the applause.

Later the audience paid tribute to the impressive performance of the masterpiece of Beethoven with which this season Dr. Koussevitzky had already honored the memory, first of Edison and then of Washington.

MUSIC

Globe Feb 27

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchest

Dr Koussevitzky's program for week's Symphony concerts incl Hindemith's "Konzertmusik," strings and brass; Loeffler's "Mort Tintagiles," and Beethoven's "Eroi Symphony. Hindemith's music written for the Boston Sympho 50th anniversary, and first perfor here last April.

The viola d'amore solo in Loeffl familiar tone poem was played by J Lefranc, first viola of the orches Mr Loeffler was repeatedly called the stage by the hearty applau which he shared with Dr Koussevitz Mr Lefranc, and the orchestra. once the prophet was not with honor in his own, or at least his ado ed country.

Hindemith's "Konzertmusik" m be counted among the notable wo dedicated to the Boston Symphony l season, along with the symphonies Roussel and Honegger and "Symphonie de Psaumes" of Strav sky. Here the composer has avoid he wilful eccentricities, the ironica nti-romantic bias that so often anno isteners to his music. For, like ma another artist of his generati Hindemith is at heart a romantic who would wholeheartedly have c tinued the 19th century tradition if war had not made 19th century rom ticism seem futile.

Modern Greek Work

In this "Konzertmusik" he is a s cessor of Wagner and Brahms, able avoid their mannerisms, and to ble in a single stream of invention th manners, which were, after all, le diverse than their contemporaries su posed. This modern German work w yesterday applauded as cordially though it had been French or Russia At last this audience is recoveri from its wartime obsessions.

Dr Koussevitzky's eloquent a dramatic reading brought out the r meaning of Loeffler's tone poem bett than a delicately impressionist tre ment, like some of the past interpre tions of Loeffler hereabouts, could ha done. If one forgets the little play Maeterlinck to which the title and t program notes refer, and considers th "Mort de Tintagiles" as pure mus one's admiration for Loeffler's gre creative talent grows. How little mu 35 years old sounds today as fresh, brilliant, as evocative of moods a dreams as does this tone poem.

If Mr Loeffler had only been a muc touted Parisian, Viennese, or London instead of a quietly sincere musicia buried in provincial Boston it is n only possible, but certain that his fam today would be world-wide and secur Not that he has not a great reputatio among connoisseurs, here and els where. But his is not now one of th names youthful musical amateurs fe obliged to utter with frequent "ohs and "ahs." It was good to note th applause yesterday, from orchestr and audience, to whom Mr Loeffler ha so long been a familiar and respecte figure.

Captures True Spirit

Dr Koussevitzky was as usual les successful with the "Eroica" than h is with the other great Beethoven symphonies, or with those of Brahms. H did not distinguish between forte and fortissimo. Too often the tone, especially of the strings, became coarse and noisy. Too often there was a lack of absolute precision in the ensemble. He made of the noble adagio a thing of long-drawn-out wails and sighs, essentially unheroic. Only in the finale did he capture the true spirit of the music and let it enthrall the listener, as it still can and should.

Beethoven is one of those composers who do not need to be "interpreted," made to speak out eloquently. Play exactly what is written, and add the nuances of phrasing and accentuation without thought of more than clarity of line and texture, and Beethoven will impose himself on an audience. To "interpret" his music, beyond this is to misinterpret it. P. R.

142

Boston Symphony

Feb 27 Mon

For the seventeenth program of the Boston Symphony season, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky presented in Symphony Hall, Boston, on the afternoon of Feb. 26, this program: Hindemith, Konzertmusik for string and brass instruments; Loeffler, "La Mort de Tintagiles"; Beethoven, Symphony No. 3 in E flat.

Hindemith's Konzertmusik, composed for the fiftieth anniversary of the orchestra, was heard for the first time last season. It was then described in this place as one of the more considerable of the compositions written for the jubilee. That impression was confirmed by the performance under review. The beginning is inauspicious, but the promise thus not given is well fulfilled. There is more than instrumental and contrapuntal ingenuity in this piece. There is musical expressiveness and sound adaptation of means to ends.

Mr. Charles Martin Loeffler's "Tintagiles," a dramatic poem after the play of Maeterlinck, for orchestra and viole d'amour, had gone unheard at these concerts for nine years. It has come to be an established custom that Mr. Loeffler shall be represented annually on the programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, not merely because he is one of the most distinguished of living composers, but also because there is genuine appreciation and admiration for his work. The "Mort de Tintagiles" is his op. 6. Composed originally in 1897 for orchestra and two violes d'amour, it was later remodeled into its present form, in which it had its first performance in 1901. Mr. Loeffler's way with Maeterlinck is very different from that of Debussy, though Tintagiles inhabits the same sort of shadowy land in which Pelléas and Mélisande live. This music is more full-blooded; it is admirably knit music, which still possesses dramatic power. The solo part was played—and well played—by M. Jean Lefranc, first viola of the orchestra. The composer was present to receive the plaudits of the audience. L. A. S.

Two Glasgow teams have been selected to go forward to the final of the Scottish Community Drama Festival. They are the Carntyne Y. M. C. A. Players in "Vindication," and the Pantheon Club in "The Home Front."

Radio stations and film studios are receiving complaints from parents that the frequent use of stuttering for comic effect is distressingly inspiring children to imitate speech impediments.

Mr. Walter Walker, formerly a stock actor in Boston and now in the films, is often mistaken in Hollywood for one of the many visiting bankers who are now financially interested in motion picture producing.

Modern Works Well Played by Symphony Orchestra

By MOSES SMITH Amer

Charles Martin Loeffler's dramatic poem, "La Mort de Tintagiles," is revived at this week's symphony concerts, after being unheard since 1923. It is preceded by Paul Hindemith's "Konzertmusic" for brass and strings, which was written for the Symphony Orchestra's Jubilee last year. Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, played earlier in the week, rounds out the program.

Bostonians may well be proud to have a composer of the stature of Loeffler in their midst. Whether he ought to be classed as an American composer is another matter. In most of his important works, as in this poem, he is predominantly French. "La Mort de Tintagiles," given a stunning performance under Koussevitzky at yesterday's matinee, with Jean Lefranc playing the beautiful solo viole d' amore, made a profound impression. It is music written from the heart, directed to the heart of the listener. There are pages of great beauty, surcharged with emotion, or painting delicately and descriptively. The composer was enthusiastically applauded when he came on stage at the end of the performance, and was recalled several times.

Music of another manner and matter, but thoroughly persuasive in its way, was the Hindemith work. On second hearing the work was even more impressive than last year. The rapid sections have great rhythmic power; the massed brass instruments have uncommon sonority. The slower-moving parts, despite all Hindemith's protestations to the contrary, are romantic, almost sentimental, in flavor. And they disclose the composer as one of the great—and few—melody-makers of our time. It is a rare thing to be able to give whole-hearted praise to the work of an ultra-modern composer. But Hindemith seems to have avoided their glaring weakness—which is over-sophistication—and to write naturally and unaffectedly. This does not mean that his music is naive; it is of our fleet 20th century, certainly, but it is without pose or sickening mannerism.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

MAR 1 - 1932

Noted Orchestra Leader In Characteristic Pose

DR. SERGE KOUSSEV[illegible]

Dr. Koussevitsky, noted conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, arrived with his musicians in Hartford at noon to-day for the concert to be given by the Boston symphony at the Horace Bushnell Memorial hall to-night.

This evening's program, which is one of the most interesting ever presented by any symphony group in Hartford, is the final event of the current Bushnell concert series.

Koussevitsky himself will attract quite as much attention as the orchestra. The conductor is a striking figure, who has the reputation of vying with Stokowski for sartorial elegance and personal charm. Typically Russian in appearance, he conducts with much grave and savoir faire, and leads his orchestra through the mazes of even the most difficult music with an ease which is, one hears, a delight to the eye.

Romance clings about his name, and the story is told of his having received the gift of a symphony orchestra from a very rich father-in-law as a wedding present. With that orchestra he toured Russia for seven years, taking it to small towns where no symphony music had ever been heard, traveling on the Volga in a steamer which also was purchased by the fairy godfather. And with it he achieved an enviable reputation.

The conductor had prepared for this career by learning to play on the doublebass, and studying at the Philharmonic school in Moscow. At the moment, it is understood, he is the only living virtuoso on the double-bass, and gives a concert to his intimate friends on that instrument just once a year, on his birthday in Paris where he has his permanent home. In that city, too, he owns a publishing company, which he operates with the help of five prominent composers as advisory board. But it was necessary to override the objections of all of them when he insisted on publishing Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps."

The spirit which was indicated by that insistence is felt throughout Koussevitsky's career, for he delights in finding and introducing new composers, and has been the means of bringing many of them—American and European—to public attention.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS

MAR 4 - 1932

Who's Who in the Day's News

Fourteen years ago Serge Koussevitzky was conduc~~ting an orchestra~~ wearing mittens on the banks of the frozen Volga. It is hastily explained that the mittens had so many holes in them that the musicians could finger the strings. "We must keep up with our music," said Kerensky, in the midst of the fighting, and Koussevitsky did the best he could.

With his fingers still half frozen he went to Paris and then climbed swiftly to the leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, rebuilding it after Dr. Karl Muck went to Fort Oglethorpe. His great acclaim and his distinguished presence as he conducted the Bostonians at Carnegie Hall Thursday night made all this seem "far away and long ago."

He is the only great virtuoso of the bull fiddle—the only artist to make it a solo instrument. Landing, unheralded in Berlin, from Paris, he hired a large room and filled it with empty chairs. Then he conducted to an invisible orchestra. Thus he rehearsed, and when he was ready he hired the best manager in Berlin to advertise his first concert—incidentally, he also had hired an orchestra. The fates swung a kindly baton and quick-timed him up the heights. He boycotts both Russia and Italy—the latter country for what Mussolini's bravos did to Toscanini. He is fifty-eight.

Senator Daniel O. Hastings of Delaware double shoots the headlines today. It is his fifty-sixth birthday and it was he and no other who stirred up the Congressional move against Wall Street shorts. On October 2 of last year, he wrote Richard S. Whitney urging that he chain up his Bears. On December 14, he introduced a resolution to investigate the Stock Exchange and the resolution just adopted by the Senate banking and currency committee is a modification of his original draft.

Senator Hastings went to Congress in 1920 and moved obscurely in the social hinterland until a clever little vaudeville skit made him a blazing success, late in 1929. At a dinner company, he put on an imitation of Tom Heflin denouncing the Pope. From then the S. R. O. sign was up at all dinners attended by the Senator. The act was so successful that he dressed the part, statesman's uniform and all.

He is short, fat and humorous, with a mischievous eye—bored by Senate debates and rarely participating. He was Secretary of State, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court and deputy attorney general of Delaware.

News of Music

Boston to London Trans. Mar 3

ONCE more comes evidence to refute the mistaken assertion that the pieces commissioned for the jubilee of the Symphony Orchestra have been seldom played outside Boston. Hindemith's "Concert-Music," repeated at Symphony Hall last Friday and Saturday, is now going the rounds of German and English orchestras. Ten days ago it was heard at one of Sir Henry Wood's concerts in London and drew praise from more than one reviewer. Said The Morning Post for example:

> The first performance in England of Hindemith's Konzertmusik for strings and brass made a good impression. The two outer movements seemed noisy, but the slow movement was immediately understandable and the fugal third movement sounded extraordinarily well. One looks with interest to a second performance. A single hearing gives little opportunity for reasoned judgment, but manifestly this music, often forbidding though it seems, has besides its abundant vitality a fundamentally musical quality expressive in a way no other art could be.

The Times was more doubtful: "After the interval Sir Henry Wood introduced us to another specimen of Hindemith's 'Konzertmusik,' this time a work for strings and brass. It was played with tremendous vigor; the volume of string tone in the long melody of the slow movement was magnificent, as were certain brilliant chordal passages for the brass. Elsewhere the writing for the brass seemed futile in its perversity. Strauss and Hindemith together make one wish that composers had never given the bass tuba its permanent but incongruous place in the orchestra."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. SUN

MAR 4 1932

Who's News Now

The One-Time Leader of an Orchestra Which Wore Mittens.

By LEMUEL PARTON

Fourteen years ago Serge Koussevitzky was conducting an orchestra, all the members of which wore mittens, on the banks of the frozen Volga. It is hastily explained that the mittens had so many holes in them that the musicians could finger the strings. "We must keep up with our music," said Kerensky, in the midst of the fighting, and Koussevitsky did the best he could. With his fingers still half frozen he went to Paris and climbed swiftly to the leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, rebuilding it after Dr. Karl Muck had gone to Fort Oglethorpe. His great acclaim and his distinguished presence as he conducted the Bostonians at Carnegie Hall on Thursday night made all this seem "far away and long ago."

He is the only great virtuoso of the bull fiddle—the only artist to make it a solo instrument. Landing unheralded in Berlin from Paris, he hired a large room and filled it with empty chairs. Then he conducted to an invisible orchestra. Thus he rehearsed, and when he was ready he hired the best manager in Berlin to advertise his first concert—incidentally, he had also hired an orchestra. The fates swung a kindly baton and quick-timed him up the heights. He boycotts both Russia and Italy—the latter country for what Mussolini's bravos did to Toscanini. He is 58 years old.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

N. Y. SUN

MAR 5 - 1932

Music and Musicians

By W. J. HENDERSON

BERNARDINO MOLINARI conducted Ravel's "Bolero" in Philadelphia last week. Doubtless many young music lovers will bewail his omission of this exciting composition from his New York program. But the season is not yet at an end; there may be a performance of the "Bolero." The writer of these Saturday reflections will endeavor to avoid hearing that piece of music when it again shatters the peace of the art domain. From some public reactions discovered lately this recorder derives a suspicion that he is not alone in his feeling of fatigue under the incessant steam hammerings of some contemporaneous music. May it not be possible that the gradual return of Mozart into general favor is a sign not to be overlooked? First Bach and then Mozart. Does it not mean something?

There was a demonstration of extraordinary warmth when Bruno Walter recently played the solo part of Mozart's A major piano concerto, acting as conductor at the same time. It could not be that the feat alone sufficed to evoke such vigorous approval. There must have been something in the music itself and in the truly Mozartean performance. It is no news that Mozart was opposed to all exaggerations, and that he demanded a smooth, flowing style, always tasteful and elegant. Mr. Walter gave us that. We enjoyed it. We were not conscious of any irresistible driving force, nor of any irritation of nerves. All was reposeful, serene, beautiful—in the sense attributed to that abused adjective by the Greeks.

When the "Bolero" was produced in London one of the newspaper writers said:

> "By the time a solo trombone gets hold of the second tune the orchestra is waking up. The audience is now smiling—but rather nervously, for there is something slightly sinister about the effect on one's nerves of that inexorable rhythm. The climax of the piece approaches. The trumpets are screaming the tunes; and the orchestra, which at the beginning of the dance had seemed almost lethargic, now seems like a horde of dervishes, and the end is a frenzy. The audience welcomes the end—there is a feeling in the air that if the thing had gone on another five minutes, some one might have become hysterical."

In Paris in 1793 a frenzied mob of revolutionists danced a dance even more hysterical than the bolero. Drunk with brandy stolen from chalices, wrapped in the robes of priests, and laden with spoils from sanctuaries, the people stormed into the convention. Several members sprang from their chairs, and, taking the hands of flaunting girls of the Paris streets, danced with them the mad dance of that time, the carmagnole. Nothing could stop that dance but a Corsican megalomaniac and a "whiff of grape shot."

* * *

Puts and Calls in Beauty.

IT MUST be clear to most music lovers that the time has not arrived for the formation of a correct judgment about contemporaneous music. The late Henry Edward Krehbiel wrote long ago about a symphony of Bruckner, "It may be beautiful twenty years hence; it is not beautiful now." That pronouncement can be made about much of the music produced in this troubled period. Those of us who grew up with Bach and Beethoven, Brahms, Wagner and Strauss, may not be ready to assimilate new formulae and new conceptions of fundamental materials for musical composition. Many of the young men and women now in the conservatories will undoubtedly find little difficulty in adjusting their receptivity to that which is not uncommon in their day.

Some of the oldest music lovers mourn bitterly the advent of every modernist work. Some have been heard to say that if that is what music is going to be they will be forced to feed their appetite for beauty with some other art. For their comfort it may be pointed out that the modernists themselves do not desire to see the creations of the old masters relegated to desuetude. They are among the most earnest students of Bach and Beethoven. One might note that Serge Koussevitzky, the distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, swings with the ease and grace of a pendulum from Hindmith to Brahms and from Beethoven to Aaron Copland. He had the benefit of an extended residence in the modern Athens, Paris, before coming to this country and he returns every summer to that center of intellectual curiosity to refresh his soul in the market place of signs and wonders.

In spite of all that has been done in urging the world to listen to the gospel of Schoenberg and his kind, there are far more performances of the ancients than of the moderns. In our own land Philadelpia evidently aspires to the position of leader in experimental musical art and Leopold Stokowski is one of the high priests of modernism. Yet this same Mr. Stokowski is one of the foremost interpreters of Brahms, whose music lies light years away from the ideals and achievements of the new adventurers.

It is altogether likely that the art of music will continue to make its development untouched by the theories of young gentlemen desiring to subject it to exploratory operations. Men are pretty much the same sort of beings now that they were in the days of the Cæsars, although they clothe themselves differently, wear their hair differently, and do not speak Latin.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

UNION

MAR 1 - 1932

SUPERB PROGRAM IS GIVEN AT SMITH BY KOUSSEVITZKY

Boston Symphony Pleases Large Audience with Presentation Running Gamut of Emotions.

"Classical" Symphony, Op. 25, Prokofieff Allegro,
  Larghetto,
  Gavotte,
  Finale.
"Concerto Sacre" No. 2 for String Orchestra and Piano, Josten Lament,
  Sepulchre and Resurrection.
"Daphnis et Chloe," Ballet (Second Suite), Ravel
  Lever du Jour,
  Pantomime,
  Danse Generale.
Symphony in E minor, No. 4, Op. 98, Brahms
  Allegro non troppo,
  Andante moderato,
  Allegro giocoso,
  Allegro energico e passionato.

By WILLARD M. CLARK.

NORTHAMPTON, Feb. 29—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, appeared in John M. Greene Hall tonight thrilling a huge audience with a superb program magnificently played. The more we hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra and have the opportunity to compare itt with the Philadelphia or New York Philharmonic orchestras the more we are convinced that the Boston organization stands preeminent in the country today.

Always a fine program arranger, Mr. Koussevitzky provided a program that ran the gamut of emotions. It was a program that left some a little dazed when it was over. It opened with the "Classical" Symphony by Prokofieff. This little symphony was written by the composer with the intent of writing as he believed Mozart would have written for a modern orchestra. It is one of the most charming and intriguing works imaginable. It breathes joy from the opening allegro through the provokingly short Gavotte and Finale. Although dealing with a much larger organization than Mozart, Prokofieff has kept the same clear outline of Mozart.

Especial interest was manifest in the "Concerto Sacro" No. 2 for string orchestra and piano by Werner Josten, professor of fuge and composition at Smith College. The work was first played in 1929 by the orchestra of the Juilard Graduate School under the direction of Albert Stoessel

Of his work Prof. Josten writes: "The mysterious dark triptych painted for the Isenheim altar at Colmar by Grunewald gave me the idea for this piece." Mr. Josten has written two Concerto Sacro about this subject. Tonight the second was played titled "Lament" and "Sepulchre and Resurrection." Mr. Josten's music was as mysterious and brooding as his pictorial inspiration. Using only strings and piano he evoked a warmth of tone and passages of intense melodic interest. In the Lament the mind turned more than once to Bach. The two movements were played without pause and at its close sincere applause brought the composer twice to the platform.

No more striking contrast could be imagined than the "Daphnis et Chloe" Ballet (second suite) by Ravel. Here is a work rich in color, rhythm and brilliance. Within it harmonic and polyphonic anarchy reign supreme It is one of the finest examples of impressionism to be found today. Musically it follows closely the story of Daphnis and Chloe from the awakening of Daphnis through the miming of the story of Pan and Syrinx to the general dance which ends the suite. It was superbly played with a wealth of tonal color and exquisite nuance. Mr. Koussevitzky has a sympathetic understanding of the French composers and has made their works known both here and abroad especially in Russia.

The most substantial item on the program followed intermission. If the first part of the program presented material that weighed heavily upon one's absorbing capacities, still greater demands were made if one were to take in all that Mr. Koussevitzky had to give through the medium of the Brahms "Symphony in E Minor, No. 4", the last from that great master of the Symphony.

Probably the strongest movements of the symphony are the last two. Mr. Koussevitzky seemed to be saving himself for the final movement as the third did not seem to have the sweep and brilliancy we have heard on occasion. The final movement, however, was a veritable panorama of multiphased subjectiveness in its varied and chaconne like treatment of the thematic fragment which is its base.

Here the consummate capacity of Mr. Koussevitzky for passionate and powerful utterance and of the orchestra for virtuosity, was of a magnitude scarcely to be surpossed.

Springfield
2 Republican

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA HEARD AT NORTHAMPTON

Led by Koussevitzky in Program Brilliantly Done, it Proves Again Its Rank as Great Organization

By FRANCIS REGAL

Northampton, Feb. 29—The Boston Symphony orchestra, conducted by Dr Serge Koussevitzky, appeared this evening at John M. Greene hall in the most brilliant and interesting concert of the season in the excellent course given by the Smith college department of music. In this course a large place is made for orchestral music and three noted American orchestras are heard each season, but tonight's concert was a fresh reminder that the Boston orchestra under its present leader has come to be once more the foremost orchestra in the country. The perfection of its playing tonight was marvelous, but the interest of the performance went far beyond virtuosity.

Whether the program was highly interesting or not depends largely on the point of view. There are serious music lovers who would not be likely to find much nourishment in it until the advent of the fourth symphony by Brahms with which the concert closed, and indeed in the grave inwardness of this lovely work there were spiritual depths not plumbed in the immensely clever "Classical Symphony" by Prokofieff or the poetic and beautiful "Daphnis and Chloe" ballet (second suite) by Ravel. In the hands of an ordinary conductor and orchestra neither of these would be first rate; Mr Koussevitsky and his fellow virtuosi made them both of thrilling interest.

Piece by Smith Professor

In some ways the interest of the evening centered about the second number, a striking and highly original "Concerto Sacro," No 2, for string orchestra and piano composed by Werner Josten of the Smith-college faculty of music. Born at Elberfeld, Ger., and a pupil of Dr Rudolf Siegel in composition, Mr Josten was assistant conductor at the Munich opera house before coming to this country, and since 1923 he has been the teacher of fugue and composition at Smith college. He has published a number of important works, for orchestra, chorus, songs, etc., and several have won general recognition. Of those which have been heard here the concerto played tonight seems the most remarkable and individual. Its theme was suggested by a religious painting by the Rhenish artist Gruenewald at Colmar, and the four movements of which the last two were heard tonight, deal with the annunciation, the miraculous birth of Christ, "Lament" and "Sepulchre and Transfiguration."

In the setting the composer was fortunate in many ways. The introduction of the piano in combination with strings alone gives a chance for many powerful and striking effects in which the orchestral possibilities of the piano are developed with great skill. Much of it is richly dissonant giving a weird cathedral-like effect, and then lapses into concord all the more beautiful against this clangorous background. The orchestra played the work superbly and the impression made was deep. At the close the composer was called on to come forward and acknowledge the enthusiastic applause.

Other Highlights of Program

Much could be said of the extreme cleverness of Prokofieff's brilliant effort to put Mozart into modern form, but the virtuosity of the composer was matched by the exquisite delicacy and brilliance of the performance. No less remarkable was the playing of the orchestra in Ravel's superb suite which may outlast his sensational "Bolero"; some of its effects are among the most trenchantly beautiful in the whole range of modern orchestral music. By comparison the noble symphony of Brahms of course seemed sour and almost dull, but it has in it the stuff of great art and tonight it was greatly played.

143

Wonderful Playing By Orchestra

Hfd. Courant 3-2-32

Boston Symphony, Under Dr. Koussevitzky, Gives Brilliant Concert in Bushnell Hall

BY WALTER BROWN.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky, Director, in final concert of Bushnell Series, Tuesday evening March 1, in Bushnell Memorial Hall.

PROKOFIEFF
  "Classical" Symphony, Op. 25
  I. Allegro
  II. Larghetto
  III. Gavotte
  IV. Finale
WAGNER Prelude to "Lohengrin"
RAVEL "Daphnis et Chloe," Ballet: Second Suite
  Lever du Jour—
  Pantomine—
  Danse Generale
BEETHOVEN Symphony No. 3 in E-flat major, Op. 55, "Eroica"
  I. Allegro con brio
  II. Marcia funebre: Adagio assai
  III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace; Trio
  IV. Finale: Allegro molto

Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra, at the very top of their superlative form, gave a gorgeous evening of music to the capacity audience assembled Tuesday evening in Bushnell Hall. Whether the sharp, short brilliance of Prokofieff, the lovely cadences of the "Lohengrin" Prelude, the sonorous complications of Ravel, or the stately powers of Beethoven's "Eroica" were most effective seemed, as the playing was done, to be merely the matter of which was heard; there was mighty reading and mighty playing, and there was appreciation, deep and genuine, of and for the whole program. Dr. Koussevitzky recalled over and over again, seemed well pleased alike with his reception and with the playing his men accorded the music—and well he might. It was an evening of extraordinarily fine playing.

The Prokofieff and the Ravel numbers came fresh and new to the ears of most of the music-lovers present—and it is more than possible that many found far greater joy in the works than they expected. The "Classical" Symphony is what its name implies, save that it is in rather brief symphonic form. It is brilliantly melodic in many of its measures, especially in the shining second movement; but its charm of melodic statement is obvious from the very first notes that are heard and its spirit, as Dr. Koussevitzky reads it, is delightful throughout.

In the Larghetto we had the first glimpse of the exquisite covered tone that the orchestra delights in when the opportunity serves; the Gavotte was charming in its rhythmic grace, and the Finale—capping the cleverness and brightness of the whole—was played with a most delightful suavity.

Then the "Lohengrin." And how many there were in that vast audience, familiar with every note of the music, who felt that they never had heard it played with finer effect, lovelier tone, more exquisite blending of romance and poetry! The climax was electrical in its force, the building up and the diminishing of tone alike were wonderfully effective.

Ravel in this Second Ballet Suite has much to say—and says it with distinguished power. And surely no more distinguished reading of his score could be asked for than was given Tuesday evening, no finer rendition of his tremendously complicated but most effective work. From the beginning strange waters ripple in weird light; tone builds up higher and higher to climax succeeding climax; strange effects occur and recur in the music, provocative, imaginative, fascinating. And always the playing in all the choirs, in all contrasts, in melodies or crashing tonal structures — always the playing was magnificent.

The symphony, of course, crowned the program in its own right. It was given a reading that showed no inhibitions as to the enjoyment of beauty at the full; as to expression of the dramatic; in the use of very elastic tempo for the sake of contrasts between movements in the work. The grand swing of triumph up to the climax of the Allegro was thrilling; the solemn portentousness of the Funeral March sang in beautiful tone—tone like a benediction. And the Scherzo shone in the beauty of its sharply contrasting tempo and spirit.

In the Finale again and again there was that effect of magic of those facile hands, pleading the ultimate in tonal beauty from the instruments of the orchestra. And the climax was superb.

A wonderful concert, ending an orchestral season at Bushnell of great interest. And Hartford is fortunate that another great orchestral season impends.

144

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
MAR 2 - 1932

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT TRIUMPH

Serge Koussevitzky and His Musicians Acclaimed at Bushnell Memorial.

WELL-VARIED OFFERINGS

Wagner, Beethoven and Ravel Selections Heard by Capacity Audience.

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra were the featured attractions at the Bushnell Memorial, last evening, on the occasion of the sixth and final concert in the Bushnell symphonic series. The event was one of the most brilliant and interesting of the many musical successes staged at the Bushnell memorial the current season, and in many ways was one of the best and most absorbing symphonic recitals ever given in Hartford's new auditorium. Dr. Koussevitzky and his players were at their best and they offered an exceptionally well selected as well as most exquisitely rendered program. The hall was filled to capacity, and the ovation which followed each number was a remarkable tribute to director and musicians. The program was as follows:

Prokofieff "Classical Symphony, Op. 25
Wagner Prelude to "'Lohengrin"
Ravel "Daphnis et Chloe," Ballet: Second Suite
Lever du Jour—
Pantomime—
Danse Generale
Beethoven Symphony No. 3 in E-flat major, Op. 55, "Eroica"

For many years Boston Symphony concerts have been outstanding events in the musical life of Hartford, and last evening proved no exception. For many years the orchestra was heard either in Parsons' theater or in Foot Guard hall, with a brief sojourn at the Capitol theater before the Bushnell Memorial was opened to the public. Music lovers in this city recall with affection the names of Muck, Gericke, Fiedler, Monteux and others. Under the leadership of Dr. Koussevitzky the orchestra has scaled new musical heights, and standards of excellence have been increased from year to year. The program offered last evening proved of exceptional popular appeal, and the various numbers were received with great enthusiasm.

Interpretative and Dramatic.

Dr. Koussevitzky presented his customary well trained and capable band of players, thoroughly versed in the interpretative side of musical expression, and laying also a delightful emphasis on the dramatic aspects of the subject at hand. There was the usual splendid body of strings, carefully rehearsed, and inspired by one of the greatest of all living concert masters, Richard Burgin, who is also the assistant conductor of the orchestra. The wood wind and brass choirs cooperated in praiseworthy fashion and the blending of tone left nothing to be desired. The orchestra, now in its fifty-first season, has steadily grown in musical achievements and the incomparable standards of the Bostonians have been maintained during the entire Koussevitzky regime without interruption.

As is an invariable Boston Symphony custom, there were no encores. Dr. Koussevitzky was recalled several times and he graciously shared the applause with his players.

The Prokofieff "Symphony" was given a splendid and altogether satisfactory reading. This work, the product of one of the greatest living Russian composers, is a spontaneous and well written effort, living up to its name of "Classical Symphony," in several incidental features bearing the unmistakable signs of the influence of the Russian school. Although intended by the writer to be Mozartian in its spirit, its interpretation bore the signs of the influence of Koussevitzky, the master, who was evidently desirous of exploiting the works of his fellow countryman. The "Symphony" was given with a beauty of phrasing and with a finish which was exuberant in its joyous episodes. The strings sang with the spirit of youth and there were dramatic moments of importance.

From Wagner's "Lohengrin."

Another popular chord was struck in the presentation of the immortal "Prelude" to Wagner's "Lohengrin," a work frequently heard, but one which is always welcome. Here Dr. Koussevitzky gave fine effects in shading and expression. The familiar themes gradually died away and the concluding melody was beautifully sung by three first violins.

Probably the highest musical and artistic episode of the concert came in the rendition of the Ravel number. Here was a colorful variety of tone, ranging from the delicate flute to the crashing crescendos of the brass and the percussion. Here was Ravel at his best, leading the way into new fields of musical expression and giving a unique vent to the versatile talent of this master of orchestral color. Here Dr. Koussevitzky obtained effects of a really extraordinary nature and gave an unusual and altogether delightful interpretation to this exquisite outburst of melodic effort.

Beethoven Selection.

Beethoven at his best was personified in the famous "Eroica Symphony," a work heard numerous times in Hartford, yet one which is yet to wear out its welcome. The stirring episodes of the opening movement gave way to the delicacy and the pathos of the "Marcia Funebre," and here Dr. Koussevitzky gave an interpretation which left an impression of rare melodic beauty.

The lovely "Gavotte" was appealing and was rhythmically interesting, showing a variety of tone and a singing legato turning without pause into a staccato remarkably well voiced and placed with the marks of a real genius. The "Finale" was given with a splendor of tone and an amazing volume and the climax was a masterful effort.

The Boston orchestra will be heard in the first concert of the Bushnell symphonic course next season and the coming of these capable players into this community will again be one of the artistic treats of the year.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW HAVEN, CONN.
TIMES
MAR 3 - 1932

Boston Symphony Thrills Audience At Woolsey Hall

The magic wand of Serge Koussevitsky, poised in seductive elegance or blatant abandon in the hands of the master conductor, drew from the Boston Symphony orchestra, last night, at Woolsey hall, such music as has not been heard there in years.

The audience was almost paralyzed with the grandeur, the splendor of the program, and awoke as from a deep dream to applaud less vociferously than is its characteristic. And there were no encores.

Could any one seriously ask for an anti-climax to tne Tschaikowskly "Pathetique?" Unthinkable.

So when the first round of applause had died, and the master appeared to acknowledge it with a bow of the same elegance he displayed in his conducting, the crowd was satisfied and went its way, just a bit stunned by the glory of it all.

It's easy for the average observer to wax much too eloquent about Koussevitsky. But what more natural, after hearing, for example, the Spanish Rhapsody of Ravel? Or Hindesmith's "Concert Music for String and Brass"? Or the Bach Concerto

To one who observed the master at close range, it seemed as if there must never have been such a conducto. He didn't tear his hair. He didn't twist his slender, elegant figure into distortions of ecstasy. His body below the belt, his head scarcely moved, in fact, except in the presence of a magnificent effort, but the slender graceful hands did the work. He talked to his orchestra as no voice could. Sometimes even in the supreme moments of his direction he slowly moved his lips, and evoked from his musicians such tones as are seldom heard.

But the direction was largely in the magic baton. Sometimes it was elegantly, even superciliously poised, and then when he wanted tones he forgot all show of grace and grabbed the slight wand like a massive club.

Then again a return to the more delicate and more superficial poise. Grace resides in his slender frame and there was nothing but supreme grace in his conduct of his orchestra. It was an esthetic, as well as a musical feat. There must be few conductors like Koussevitsky. There have been few such concert as his celebrated orchestra gave.

W. S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL COURIER
MAR 3 1932

MUSICAL MOMENTS

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By Miles Kastendieck

Serge Koussevitsky and his Boston Symphony orchestra, played in Woolsey hall last night before an audience that overflowed the seating capacity of the house. In fact, hundreds of people seeking admittance to the annual performance of this great orchestra, were turned away. The concert was one of the finest heard here in years.

Familiar as the playing of the Boston Symphony is, it is impressive to hear again the rich mellow tone, the balance of parts, and the sterling quality of the performance of these musicians, under the direction of so distinguished a conductor. For the poised authority and dynamic grace Koussevitsky's conducting is reflected in the finished playing of the orchestra.

On past occasions, the program for these concerts has often been disappointing. The numbers last evening were thoughtfully selected and well arranged. The "Concerto in D of C. P. E. Bach, second son of the great John Sebastian, was arranged for orchestra at Koussevitskys request. This good, substantial eighteenth-century music made a compelling opening for the concert.

Two modern compositions completed the first half: Hindemiths "Konzertmusic for String and Brass Instruments and Ravels "Rhapsodie Espagnole.

As a piece composed last year especially for the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Hindemith's composition left the impression of old-fashioned jubilee music in modern dress. It disclosed the railroad influence not only of Hindemith's own experiences in traveling on trains but also of Honegger's "Pacific 231." Ravel's work is a fascinating study in modern orchestral writing.

The old Spanish rhythms offer a variety of opportunities for numerous color effects and Ravel has seized them all. Only a great orchestra really succeeds playing a composition of this nature because of the demands made on the musicians for subtleties of nuance. Needless to say, the performance last evening was superb.

Tchaikowsky's sixth symphony, called "Pathetic" after the cool reception of the first performance, was the final number on this program. It ranks as one of the great modern symphonies and last night it received a magnificent performance. Musical intellectualists look down on Tchaikowsky because they believe he was too emotional in his writing.

They forget the remarkable instrumentation of his scores and overlook the sincerity and humanity that finds its outlet in this earthly music. But in this work, the composer recorded the heights and depths of human feeling, leaving memorable passages such as the second theme of the first movement, the five-four rhythms of the second and the profound pathos of the final theme. In his reading of the score, Koussevitsky revealed the composers as well as his own greatness.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
MAR 5 - 1932

Music of the Day

By EDWARD CUSHING

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays in Brooklyn—'Sadko' at the Metropolitan—Jacqueline Salomons in Recital

MR. KOUSSEWITSKY and the Boston Symphony Orchestra played a symphony by Sibelius at the Academy of Music last night—the Second, in which (if commentators are to be believed) the composer surveys the history of his people. It is an impressive work; there is much in it that seizes immediately upon the imagination, that arrests and stimulates. Typically Sibelian is the form which, despite the conventional division into four movements (a sonata-allegro, slow movement, conjoined scherzo and finale) discloses that inclination toward continuity which culminates in the single movement structure of the Seventh Symphony. It should be played, one feels, without pauses between parts, even where these are sanctioned by the composer, for its effect is of continuous, not sectional design.

The traits of style characterized of the later Sibelius are all present in this music—the thematic material is fragmentary; no phrase ends with a full stop, melodically speaking; the harmonic idiom is harsh, the instrumentation thin and biting until the finale. What the composer has to say in this strange language of his is for the individual listener to decide; definitely it is something important, something deeply pondered and felt, and said with the equivalent of as few words as possible.

Mr. Koussewitsky is an eloquent expositor of Sibelius; he has played us in recent times the First, Third, Fourth, Sixth and Seventh symphonies; he should be urged now to play us the Fifth. An Eighth, unpublished, unperformed as yet, has been promised to the Boston Symphony and its distinguished leader for its world premiere. Perhaps we shall hear it before the season is out. There is perhaps no living composer from whom one is more eager to hear or from whom one may expect a masterpiece with as little risk of disappointment.

Last night's program concluded with Wagnerian excerpts: the prelude and finale from "Tristan und Isolde," the "Tannhaeuser" overture. Mr. Koussewitsky has a way of his own with this music.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BRROKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES
MAR 5 - 1932

MUSIC

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Serge Koussevitsky returned to the Academy of Music last night with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the fourth concert of the "Boston Series."

The virtuoso orchestra was in fine form last night under the scholarly baton of the great leader. As usual, the violin sections were breath-taking in their unity, revealing again the crystal clear tone Koussevitzky demands, the wide dynamic range and technical mastery long associated with the orchestra.

A crowded house warmed again to the Koussevitzky interpretations. Scorning superficial tricks, gallery sops, the Boston conductor read his entire program with the deep, musical sympathy that won and holds for him his high, unassailable position among orchestra leaders.

The feature of the program was the second Sibelius symphony, but the audience responded most enthusiastically to the prelude and Liebestod from Wagner's great opera "Tristan." The program included the second suite of Bach and Loeffler's poem, "The Death of Tintagile."

W.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
Brooklyn Standard Union
MAR 5 - 1932

High Notes of the MUSIC WORLD

By JOSEPH A. MILLER

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY AT THE ACADEMY

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, most welcome of regular visitors to Brooklyn, paid its fourth call of its season of five visits at the Academy of Music last night, and gave what we felt at the time (and still feel) was one of the greatest concerts we have ever heard Dr. Koussevitzky conduct.

The Boston Symphony, considered by many the premier orchestra in the United States—if not the world—may not be as great as some of its adorers believe, but it is certainly one of the very best. It has, in our opinion, certain very definite shortcomings, it has not the full-throated volume, the robustness, the manliness, if you please, of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society orchestra. Under its gifted leader it still falls short of the inspired greatness of the New York organization under Toscanini or Walter. But it has a beauty of tone, a sweetness and a tenderness that somehow give the orchestra great distinction. It need make no apology to anyone's band.

That peculiar beauty and tenderness, that softness and honeyed sweetness was never more manifest than it was last night when the orchestra played the ineffable, the almost heavenly "Love Death" from Richard Wagner's "Tristan and Isolda." We have heard that great music many, many times, played by orchestra and by pianists, sung on concert stage and in full regalia on the operatic stage, but we confess that we never heard it rendered as it was last night. Somehow the beauty and the tragedy, the tenderness and the heartbreak of the "Love Death" were brought out under Dr. Koussevitzky's magic hands as never before.

The main number of the program was the Second Symphony of that granite genius, the Finnish composer, Sibelius. The great musician, who is still living in his native land, is best known for his "Finlandia," which is a pity, for his symphonies are fit to rank among the greatest ever composed.

There is a rugged grandeur in this Second Symphony, something that makes one think of the rocks and the brooding mountains, the deep forests and the broad fields and the lakes and the bays of his country. In a real sense this is great, patriotic music, for, properly understood, the Symphony is a cry of praise for the composer's own country.

The final number was the ever-loved "Tannhauser" overture, played as Wagner wrote it for its first production, not as later revised for the "Paris version," the rather longer version than Toscanini usually plays.

It is in this overture that the weakness of the Boston Symphony is most manifest, for there are passages, triumphal shouts, marches and ensembles that require the brasses and the percussions that only the Philharmonic possesses; on this orchestra the passages seem a bit subdued.

But what of it? Standing by itself, the "Tannhauser" overture is a glorious composition which tells the whole story of that magnificent opera; and as played by Mr. Koussevitzky it is a memorable thing.

145

ERALD TRIBUNE, SATURDAY, MARCH 5,

MUSIC

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

(Reprinted from yesterday's late editions)

Mr. Copland's 'Symphonic Ode' by the Boston Symphony, for the First Time Here

Fourth evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; at Carnegie Hall.

PROGRAM

1. Bach....Suite No. 2, in B minor, for Flute and Strings
   Flute solo: Georges Laurent
2. Copland.................Symphonic Ode
   (First time in New York)

INTERMISSION

3. Brahms——Symphony No. 4, in E minor, Op. 98

BIRTHDAYS involve offerings, unless one is very careful. Anything may happen—purple cravats with forked lightning picked out in emerald green; pen-wipers, bronze bookends; your best friend's Complete Works (inscribed). If you are an orchestra, and ancient and famous, subject to anniversary celebrations, jubilees, and so forth, the peril is great. For music which is written in your honor by eminent composers, desirous only of celebrating your fiftieth or other anniversary, must be accepted, and—what is more important —performed.

One suspects that the great organization which adds such luster to the Sacred Codfish was slightly embarrassed by the flood of birthday offerings which deluged it upon the occasion of its fiftieth anniversary; it is even whispered that the obligatory display of certain of those symphonic pen-wipers and bookends and autographed copies has been attended with elaborately suppressed anguish.

* * *

Among these disconcerting benefactors, Mr. Aaron Copland, the American composer who has made New York a capital of musical modernism, is certainly not to be included. Mr. Copland is known to be a protégé of Mr. Koussevitzky. The gold of his inspiration is no sooner materialized in the form of ink and score-paper than it is earmarked for Boston. So it is quite certain that, although Mr. Copland's "Symphonic Ode," which we heard Thursday night from those wizardrous players who have made the East Wind lyrical, was composed for the Orchestra's Fiftieth Anniversary, its public exhibition did not irk the conductor or his band.

* * *

Mr. Copland appears to have written his "Symphonic Ode" in 1927-'29. The Orchestra's semi-centenary was observed last season. One conjectures that the Ode would have been performed before this if Mr. Koussevitzky had not felt that politeness to foreign benefactors required that he clear the center table of birthday offerings from Messrs. Hindemith, Honegger, Respighi, Roussel, Stravinsky and other eminent foreigners anxious to have a finger in the jubilee pie, before he opened the packages that were postmarked "Brooklyn" or "Washington" or "Colorado Springs."

However that may be, Mr. Copland has now been heard from.

* * *

Mr. Copland has been reported as saying that "people will naturally want to know what this work is an ode to. Usually an ode is an ode to something or other. This is not an ode to anything except to the spirit that is in the music. And I don't know what that spirit is. You, my many listeners, will have to tell me that." Mr. Copland at this point quoted a saying of André Gide: "Before explaining my book to others I wait for them to explain it to me. . . . What interests me especially is what I have put into my book without my own knowledge—that part of the unconscious that I should like to name 'la part de Dieu'."

* * *

But surely Mr. Copland did not need to drag in either Gide or le bon Dieu. His ode is self-contained and self-sufficient. It has no literary basis, no "program," no subtitle or motto. It is just an ode to itself—Mr. Copland has made that clear; and in being merely that, it is being as regular as an anxious Congressman. Does not the Indisputable Authority tell us that an ode, "in modern usage," is "any lyric of lofty tone dealing progressively with one dignified theme"? Mr. Copland himself assures us that the musical material of his Ode is concerned with the treatment of a single theme. He has spoken of one of the five sections of the work as being "lyrical," and of the opening and close as being "monumental." The case could not be clearer for regularity.

* * *

But one suspects that Mr. Copland, made timorous in a fearful time, has carried the principle of thrift, as applied to imaginative substance, somewhat beyond reasonable limits. Mr. Copland is a serious, a most earnest composer, purposeful, self-respecting, intelligent, determined to have his say whatever the dull-witted and the unresponsive may think of his outgivings. And this is all to the good. It was my pleasure and privilege to praise Mr. Copland's widely execrated Piano Concerto when it was played here five years ago. But in comparison with that gusty and joyously challenging work, the new Ode is, for the most part, impotent and unrewarding.

Hearing it, one visions Mr. Copland lost in agonizing lucubration, praying Heaven to make him Hard and Stripped and Sharp-Edged and Astringent and all the other things that a composer must learn to be in order to escape the sin of sensibility—entreating the gods, in short, to make him worthy of Stravinsky.

* * *

The trouble with Mr. Copland's Ode is not that it is too dissonant or too harsh—it is not as good as that. It suffers from an ancient curse: sterility. It may be worthy of Stravinsky—the drained and lifeless Igor of the Concerto for Violin; but it is scarcely worthy of Mr. Copland.

Aaron Copland

Whose new "Symphonic Ode" was heard Thursday night

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. SUN

MAR 4 1932

Plays Copland's Symphonic Ode

Boston Symphony Orchestra Performs Work That Was a Feature of Its Golden Jubilee.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra came to town again yesterday like the suspected Trojans, "donna ferentes." It seems that the reverend organization had a fiftieth birthday last year and received so many presents from composers that it has not yet finished exhibiting them to an admiring world. Another was accordingly produced last evening at the concert in Carnegie Hall.

This was Aaron Copland's symphonic ode which was a feature of the festival gayeties in Boston. Mr. Copland informed the erudite annotator of the programs that he composed this ode while going to and fro over the earth, Koenigsberg, Peterboro, New York, Santa Fe, Briarcliff Manor, Juziers (France), and other points on railways, air routes and steamship lanes.

He also whispered aloud that it grew out of a two-measure phrase in his nocturne for piano and violin. The phrase was uttered in the nocturne and permitted to pass without descant, but the composer felt that it offered material for expansion, and so it became the principal theme in this ode. It is a noteworthy fact that this little two-measure phrase, which started on its professional career with the unassuming publicity of piano and violin, has in the ode attained to the proclamation of piccolo, three flutes, three oboes, English horn, E flat clarinet, two B flat clarinets, bass clarinet, three bassoons, double bassoon, eight horns, five trumpets, three trombones, two tubas, kettle drums, side drum, cymbals, tam-tam, triangle, wood block, glockenspiel, slap stick, two harps, piano and the customary strings. We submit that here is enough tone producing agency to make almost any two-measure phrase sound like an Ingersoll oration.

Under its panoply of instrumental pomp and circumstance, Mr. Copland's ode strode magnificently forward to a grandiloquent conclusion which evoked much applause. The author of the magnificence was called from his hiding place to receive the approbation of the multitude and shake hands publicly with the concert master of the celebrated orchestra, which had bestowed a great performance on his work.

The ode is, of course, largely in the musical language of the modernists. It is made with uncanny skill. Mr. Copland has never thought more clearly nor expressed himself more lucidly. The logic of his form and the process of his development show a mastery of the contemporaneous methods and a foundation resting on the ideas of Liszt and Strauss, but without imitation of either. The germinal theme given out in long-drawn tones by brass is expanded through passages of great ingenuity in the strings, some of them touching the outlines of ancient fugato and others enriched with the clashes of the new polytonal counterpoint, with other pages in which woods, especially the oboe, are persuaded to be more lyrical than modernists are wont to make them, and some time before the coda in a choral of indisputable power in spite of its violent modal aberrations. The coda is founded on a vigorous and vivacious expansion of the root theme, and the powers of brass thunder it to the conclusion already noted.

Strength and even imagination are found in this composition. But there is the unfailing subterfuge of the modernist when old fashioned music seems imminent. Something is done to thrust it mercilessly aside, a screech, a crash or a smash and the mold is broken. A writer in the Curtis Institute magazine, Overtones, declared recently that he had heard the students discuss every quality of music save one—beauty. That was never mentioned. This is one result of the incessant campaign of the liberators of the art. But Mr. Copland's ode comes at times close to old fashioned tonalities and accepted musical beauty, and this offense against the religion of his kind he will doubtless have to explain. At any rate his composition is one of the most interesting the modernists have recently given us and it deserved the felicitous introduction it had last night.

The concert began with Bach's suite in B minor, for flute and strings. The solo flutist was Georges Laurent, who played very beautifully with the admirable support of a small group of strings. He was enthusiastically applauded. The final number on the list was the fourth symphony of Brahms.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAPH

MAR 5 - 1932

Copland Work Heard Here

Boston Symphony Plays Composer's Dedicatory "Symphonic Ode."

by Walter D. Shackleton

The gracious, yet intensive Dr. Koussevitzky and his prime band arrived in town for the week-end Thursday night in his fourth Boston Symphony concert series of the season.

As he had George Gershwin's second rhapsody in his portmanteau for first hearing the last time he was here, Dr. Koussevitzky this time brought along Aaron Copland's Symphonic Ode for its New York premiere. The ode was composed for the golden anniversary of the Boston band which was last year and, naturally, it was heard in Boston at that time. But for some reason a year has elapsed before it reached New York ears.

Brooklyn Cradle of Culture

To date, it seems the much ridiculed town known as Brooklyn has contributed most of modern American musicians. Copland, like Gershwin, was born there. Also Copland's Symphonic Ode, which, by the way, he says has no connection with a literary idea and is not an ode to anything but the spirit of the music, is on the pattern of Gershwin's symphonic output.

Also as Gershwin expanded a shorter piece, Copland says he took a phrase from his "Nocturne" for the violin and piano for the theme of his ode. The theme is repeated through what he terms the five sections of the ode.

It is to be regretted that if the heavy clumping which repeats throughout the piece, lasting, also like Gershwin's, twenty minutes, is the theme, then it should be left in the nocturne where it cannot be heard as clumping on a violin and where the piano part can soften it up. With a full orchestra, augmented by plenty of brasses, clatter instruments and assorted drums the effect is much too raucous.

Composer Should Know

Yet, the composer, who should know his work, says the first section moves into the second with "feathery brightness."

Dr. Koussevitzky read it with his customary care, yet he seemed to be far from at ease or in feeling with its spirit, which he undoubtedly would deny.

Nevertheless, he was a different conductor when he raised his baton and swung his band into Brahms' symphony in E minor, which he gave us with vigor and unrepressed earnestness.

For his first number of the three number program, the doctor gave us Bach's Suite No. 2 in B minor, for flute and strings. The doctor always has taken a delight in his dances and again he did with Bach's suite, reading with fineness for phrasing yet with evident self enjoyment of the work. Georges Laurent was the flute soloist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

MAR 4 - 1932

CONCERTS

Koussevitzky Gives a Novelty.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, came to town last night for the fourth concert of the season's Carnegie Hall evening series. The program was made up of Bach's Suite No. 2, in B minor, for flute and strings; Brahms's Fourth symphony, and as a novelty, at least for this city, Aaron Copland's "Symphonic Ode."

Mr. Copland wrote this music for the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony, which was observed last year, and accordingly the work has already been performed in Boston. It is written in one movement and requires about twenty minutes to play. To quote from the composer's contribution to the program notes about his work:

"The title is not meant to imply any connection with a literary idea. It is not an ode to anything other than the particular spirit to be found in the music itself. * * * The musical origin of the ode is a two-measure phrase to be found in my Nocturne for violin and piano. This phrase, stated in the violin piece without development, seemed rich in possibilities for expansion. In various guises it forms the principal thematic material of the Ode."

But the impression, after one hearing, is that the composer has not disguised enough, or perhaps placed too great faith in his thematic material. For the composition, scored as it is for very large orchestra, has more body than weight. This does not mean that Mr. Copland worked in vain. On the contrary, there are pages in the Ode that are authentic, that reveal that he has something to say and is finding the way to expression. This is true of the third section, which was well conceived and had a broadly lyrical and flowing line. Other sections of the music were at least interesting, if clearly derivative in many places. But the point to be stressed is that Mr. Copland is not seeking to astound in this music, but to hew to the line. In sincerity there may be growth.

Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra played the work with rich tone and close care for rhythm and color. Mr. Copland could not have asked for a better performance. At the end of the composition there was prolonged applause and a persistent cry of "Bravo" from a man in the upper part of the hall. The composer came out on the platform to share the tribute.

The Bach suite, played by an ensemble of less than a score of men, with Georges Laurent as flue soloist, was delightfully realized. This music has gayety and grace and charm, and the players imparted to it a warmth that is not commonly associated with Bach.

The Brahms E minor symphony had also a distinguished performance, although this interpretation was not the equal of another heard here this year. There was not always absolute clarity, but there was sweep and passion that reached stirring intensity in the closing pages of the first movement. On the whole, it was a reading that was nobly expressive, and the audience responded with corresponding enthusiasm.

H. T.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. JOURNAL

146 MAR 4 1932

BOSTON BAND PLAYS COPLAND'S 'ODE'

Bach Also Offered With Small-Size Ensemble

Orchestra in Premiere of Composition at Carnegie

By IRVING WEIL.

If conductors keep on reducing their orchest:as at the present rate for the performance of old music, very soon one or another of them will be waving a stick over two fiddles and a 'cello. For the Bach B minor suite, which opened last night's concert of the Boston Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, Serge Koussevitzky had a homey little group of about 15 men in front of him. But unfortunately, Carnegie Hall isn't quite as homey a little place as that, and Bach sounded a good deal like a whisperer among composers.

We rather believe this whole notion of trying to reproduce the conditions under which music was can be done, or at any rate, is done. to be a misguided and inconsistent one. In the first place, nothing can be done ,or at any rate is done, about the principal condition, and that is the size of the music room in which the performance is given. And, therefore, all the other attempted conditions are topsy-turvey and invalid.

WRITTEN FOR STRINGS.

This Bach suite which Mr. Koussevitzky played was, it is true, written for performance by aboot fifteen to eighteen strings, one flute and a harpsichord, but that was only because Bach had no larger orchestra at his disposal. Certainly he would rather have had one twice or three times the size and we doubt if he would have changed much in his music, except to add to the number of flute parts, if he had commanded a great body of strings.

Gustav Mahler once conducted this same suite when he was at the head of the Philharmonic here and he used all his strings and four flutes. Also, he played the harpsichord "basso continuo" part himself, directing from his bench. The result was superbly virile, instead of archaic Bach; and of the two, we at least, certainly prefer the former.

Perhaps Mr. Koussevitzky wanted to emphasize the difference between the 18th century and what was coming next on his program, which happened to be the New York premiere of contemporary music making use of pretty much the largest orchestra possible. This was Aaron Copland's "Symphonic Ode," written for last season's 50th anniversary year of the Boston Orchestra but deferred in performance until a couple of weeks ago in Boston.

EXPRESSION SECRET.

Mr. Copland, in this "Ode," which he says isn't an ode to anything except the spirit of the music itself, kept his expressive purpose a secret, for no apparently clear or logical reason. The music discloses that he must have had a considerably definite intent of this sort, for it is not merely a matter of pattern-weaving or simply a succession of mood states.

It is, indeed, full-bodied and vividly provocative, frequently exclamatory and stirring in effect. It is closely knit on the basis of a fecund theme and moves through a shifting range and exciting variety of rhythm that twice rushes into a kind of jazz tattoo. It seemed to us that Mr. Copland might have had in mind his own musical commentary on the spirit of "contempo" and that he is an optimist about it.

Mr. Koussevitzky and his men gave a vital performance of the "Ode" and it evoked a good deal of enthusiasm. The concert closed with the Brahms Fourth Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. World-Telegram

MAR 4 1932

Boston Band Pays Tribute to Copland as Composer

Gives "Symphonic Ode" Its Premiere Here in Carnegie Hall Concert, to Mixed Reception by Audience.

By PITTS SANBORN.

"We moderns" scored mightily last night. To Carnegie Hall had come the Boston Symphony Orchestra, offering a program in three parts. The first went to Bach, the third to Brahms. Between those deities of the triune canon did Beethoven appear? By no means. It was Aaron Copland, O Buelow, O Brooklyn!

Mr. Copland's compositions are far from unfamiliar to local audiences, especially his "Music for the Theatre." The work performed yesterday (for the first time in New York) is a "Symphonic Ode," one of a number of pieces by prominent composers which were written expressly for the fiftieth anniversary, in 1931, of the Boston Symphony.

The "Symphonic Ode" was composed at intervals and in a number of countries between August, 1927, and September, 1931 (Mr. Copland seems to have been what in old-fashioned parlance was called fore-handed). The work is in a single movement, requiring about twenty minutes for performance. It demands a very large orchestra, including a piano and many pulsatile instruments.

The dedication reads (naturally enough):—"To the Boston Symphony Orchestra—Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor—on the occasion of its fiftieth anniversary." Incidentally, because of the surpassing difficulty of execution the "world premiere" was postponed until the present season.

Philip Hale, program annotator to the Bostonians, quotes information furnished him by the composer with regard to this score:—"The title 'Symphonic Ode' is not meant to imply any connection with a literary idea. It is not an ode to anything other than the particular spirit to be found in the music itself. What that particular spirit is, is not for me to say." Then Mr. Copland quotes Andre Gide:—

"Before explaining my book to others, I wait for them to explain it to me. To wish to explain it first would be to restrain its meaning prematurely, because even if we know what we wish to say we cannot know if we have said only that. And what interests me especially is what I have put into my book without my own knowledge—that part of the unconscious that I should like to name 'la part de Dieu'."

Opening Vigor Impressive.

Nothing could be further from the intention of this reporter than to summon a "particular spirit" from the vasty deep of the ode's unconsciousness. If Mr. Copland declines to tell on himself, you can be sure his secret will be kept in this place—kept even if known!

Without indiscretion, however, one may be permitted to say that the principal subject of the ode recalled a familiar theme in the "Death and Transfiguration" of Richard Strauss and that from time to time Petrouchka grinned his tragic grin in Mr. Copland's gaberdine.

Moreover, the writer was duly impressed by the brazen and percussive vigor of the ode's canonic opening. Deponent admits his inability now to proceed further in the matter.

Magnificently played (barring one conspicuous slip), the ode was received by the great audience with some applause, a little hissing and leather-lunged shouts of "Bravo!" on the part of a highly demonstrative enthusiast.

Playing Close to Perfection.

In the case of Bach's B minor suite for flute and strings Mr. Koussevitzky cut his forces down to thirteen strings, one harpsichord and two flutes (the second flute reinforcing the first flute in tutti passages).

This miniature band, with Georges Laurent as soloist, performed the beautiful music most excellently. The concluding "Badinerie" came about as near to perfection as anything we are likely ever to hear in this naughty world.

The Brahms of the evening was the E minor symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

MAR 4 - 1932

Music of the Day

By EDWARD CUSHING

The Boston Symphony Introduces a Copland Ode—An Uncut 'Die Walkuere'—A Concert by the People's Chorus

WHEN members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra assembled on the stage of Carnegie Hall last night for the fourth evening concert of the season here, it seemed to the startled observer, as some wag expressed it, that the depression had drastically hit this substantial body, for only a mere handful of players were assembled around the feet of the eminent Mr. Koussevitzky as he lifted his baton. The first number, however, was the Bach Suite, No. 2, in B minor, for strings and flute, explaining this deficiency in numbers. It received the usual and admirable Koussevitzky interpretation of the elder classics, sensitive, limpid, impeccably styled. The flute soloist, Georges Laurent, and the player of the double bass deserve special mention for the perfection of their performance.

With the second number, the novelty of the evening, Aaron Copland's "Symphonic Ode," a striking contrast was introduced. The full strength of the orchestra membership filled the stage and blared forth with heavily accented brass the intricate cross rhythms of this piece composed by the young American composer for last season's jubilee of the Bostonians, but for some reason remaining unheard until last week in Symphony Hall. This was its introduction to New Yorkers, and Mr. Copland came upon the stage to acknowledge applause in which both shouts and hisses were mingled, together with a peal or two of intolerant laughter.

The composition has great vitality, but it is self-conscious and unconvincing, for obviously it is more skillfully manufactured than emotionally realized. Somewhat overweighted in the brass and thematically without sufficient contrast, it is nevertheless a full-blooded and able work by one whose musicianship is, fro mthe modernist's point of view, most artfully developed.

The evening concluded with Brahm's Symphony in E minor, a work which, placed thus upon the program, made Mr. Copland's opus appear very much like the exciting but indigestible lining to an otherwise reliable and nourishing sandwich. A trifle crusty and roughly cut, this final and largest slice, after the conductor's way with Brahms, but, nevertheless, still Brahms, and genius.

T. B. W.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. AMERICAN

1932

BOSTON SYMPHONY HEARD AT CARNEGIE; 8 HOURS OF OPERA

By GRENA BENNETT.

Serge Koussenitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra made a graceful gesture toward American music at last night's concert in Carnegie Hall and gave Copland's "Symphonic Ode" its first New York performance.

According to Mr. Copeland's program notes, the "Ode was composed at intervals from August, 1927, to September, 1929, in a number of countries and places. Konigstein, Germany; Santa Fe, New Mexico; Peterboro, New Hampshire; Briarcliff Manor, New York; Juziers, France, and New York City." And apparently in each of these places Mr. Copland added som' strange and unusual effect—growling, rumbling, thrilling or thumping —forming a mosaic in which the pieces did not fit and the colors shrieked at each other.

He had, however, a definite idea of rhythm which was maintained for nearly all of the work's thirty minutes of din. But on that woof he wove a warp of unbeautiful and disturbing design.

It was a brave and bold orchestra that lent its magnificent tone and talent to the pages of acid, nerve-wracking dissonance and cacophony.

The composer appeared with the conductor at the conclusion of the piece.

The program began with a superb reading of Bach's B minor suite, played by sixteen members of the orchestra and featuring the flute. Georges Laurent, flutist, played brilliantly, with splendid technic, beautiful tone and remarkably broad phrasing. Brahms' E minor symphony brought the program to a close.

* * *

Concert-Chronicle

Trans Mar 7

Stravinsky, Major and Minor

AT the Symphony Concert of Saturday, the Suite for Small Orchestra drawn by Stravinsky from his ballet, "Pulcinella," was repeated to the considerable entertainment and the hearty applause of the audience. It is indeed a humorsome, obvious, generally amusing succession of little pieces, the more enjoyable for adroit and spirited performance. One in particular, the duet between double-bass and trombone, was so well received that for the first time within memory the leader of the double-basses, Mr. Daniel Kunze, was called from his seat to bow acknowledgment. Two months ago at both concerts, Stravinsky's new Violin-Concerto was welcomed with applause beyond its deserts; while the Suite from his "Petushka" was replayed to warm plaudits. As every sign goes, Stravinsky is now established composer with the public of the Symphony Concerts no more to be questioned than Debussy or Ravel, Strauss or Sibelius.

Why, then, should not some of his masterpieces be heard afresh at Symphony Hall as well as such minor stuff as the Suite from "Pulcinella" and the Violin-Concerto? "Œdipus Rex," out of his later years, cries for the repetition Dr. Koussevitzky has often proposed but not yet accomplished. . . . "The Rite of Spring" has not been replayed in five seasons and many are wondering how it bears time and change. . . . The earlier "Song of the Nightingale," a pungent and vivid music, has lain these six years on the library shelf. . . . There are also highly characteristic works that Boston has never heard and never will hear unless Dr. Koussevitzky bestows them upon it. The burlesque "Renard" requires the theater and high visibility. The folk opéra-bouffe, "Mavra," might or might not bear transfer from stage to concert-hall. Unless recollection slips a concert-performance has crossed the conductor's mind. More than once, as well, he has contemplated a performance of "Les Noces" as tone-poem, and "Les Noces" is one of Stravinsky's enduring masterpieces. In the theater Bostonians will never hear it. Are the four necessary pianists an insuperable obstacle elsewhere?

H. T. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST

MAR 4 - 1932

Music : By Oscar Thompson

"Symphonic Ode" by Copland Given First New York Performance at Boston Symphony Concert

WITH the return of the Boston Symphony to Carnegie Hall last night, there was new American music to be heard and pondered. Aaron Copland, composer of the "Symphonic Ode" introduced by Serge Koussevitzky, was called to the platform and greeted with shouts, as well as applause. Apparently there were individual enthusiasms that outran the cordiality of the many.

On first hearing the work was more severe and cerebral than emotional or exciting and possibly would have been considered repellent a few seasons ago, though harshness is not its chief characteristic today. It represents no mean order of craftsmanship. A play of varied rhythms is manipulated with a skill that would be of credit to any of Mr. Copland's European contemporaries. The scoring comes off, presumably, about as was intended. It all marches, though one does not feel any very weighty momentum.

There are rather remote jazz sugestions, but the atmosphere of the work is not that of Mr. Copland's earlier ventures in a semi-popular idiom.

THE "Ode" is cosmopolitan enough to raise a question as to kinships in several directions, but it does not sound derivative in the sense of much music that acknowledges Stravinsky, Hindemith, Schoenberg or, as the case may be, Ravel or the modern Italians, as its prototypes.

These considerations stated, a question remains as to what the listener may hope to get out of this music. The composer is authority for the assurance that it has no program. It is not a ode to anything. As to what the "particular spirit" of the music is, Mr. Copland confesses himself unprepared to say. Perhaps with absolute music, so called, no "particular spirit" is necessary. Design, sonorities, rhythmic successions, sundry details that can be regarded as purely musical rather than in any sense literary or even emotional, can justify a composition such as this "Ode"; the ear can find its satisfactions in beauty, power or some other salient attribute of the material and the handling of that material.

The musical origin of the "Ode," as Mr. Copland informs us, is a two-measure phrase in his "Nocturne for Violin and Piano," written six years ago. In various guises it is the basis of a five-sectional structure, with an imperceptible passing from one section to another—three in slow tempo, two in fast. This structure is readily perceived and the material as readily recognized in its several permutations.

But for this reviewer the work sounds like a praxis, representing in the abstract something which, when transferred to paper and realized in sound, is not very musical. The passing of a little time may change this feeling; we can only record today that the writing seems to us more individual than the ideas and that the result strikes us as barren of any meaning or message or musical appeal.

The program also included the second of Bach's Coethen Suites, that in B minor, for flute and strings, well played by a handful of the orchestra's members, with Georges Laurent achieving gratefully the virtuoso part for flute, and the Brahms Fourth Symphony, wherein Mr. Koussevitzky did many notably fine things with his band, without, however, realizing for us the inner essence of this music.

In many respects a brilliant one, the performance had more of external edge and bite than it had of the ruddy inner glow and the darker undertow that are never long disseverable from the Brahms symphonies.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST

MAR 5 - 1932

Ruminations

On the Question of Whether It Helps Music to Have It Misunderstood

By OSCAR THOMPSON

THE composer of the novelty of Thursday night's Boston Symphony concert, Aaron Copland, is one of those advanced musicians of the day who espouse the art of Mahler. Like the composer he admires and champions, he disdains the sort of thing carried to an extreme in Strauss. In supplying program notes for his "Symphonic Ode," he points out that the title "is not meant to imply any connection with a literary idea. It is not an ode to anything other than the particular spirit to be found in the music itself." He continues: "What that particular spirit is, is not for me to say." He then quotes Andre Gide as expressing his meaning.

Said Gide: "Before explaining my book to others, I wait for them to explain it to me. To wish to explain it first would be to restrain its meaning prematurely, because even if we know what we wish to say we cannot know if we have said only that. And what interests me especially is what I put into my book without my knowledge—that part of the unconscious that I should like to name 'la part de Dieu.'"

We feel that there has been no end of nonsense written and talked on this subject of program music. Either music has some definite idea or appreciable mood to express, or it has not. If it has not, no listener can tell a composer what his music means.

Listeners, it is true, have a way of forming images and making the equivalent of programs for every type of music, from Bach to the beer garden. But what absurd forms these take, what distortions, what utter disagreements, what wild notions, that the composer could never conceivably sanction outside of a lunatic asylum.

To read the various constructions placed upon Beethoven's Seventh Symphony—any one of which, if justified, would put the others in a ridiculous light—is sufficient to cause us to be thankful that Beethoven did not leave it entirely to his listeners to tell him what he meant by the nature painting in the Sixth. Otherwise those cuckoo calls as we last heard them might have been interpreted as Till Eulenspiegel thumbing his nose. Mr. Copland's Ode is, of course, in another category. He was not painting nature. But we still believe he knows, better than any listener, what it is all about and can tell us more than we can tell him.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

MAR 6 - 1932

MUSIC IN REVIEW

Hindemith and Sibelius Figure Brilliantly on Koussevitzky Program—Harold-Samuel Plays Bach.

By OLIN DOWNES.

A kind of program, rich in interest and in admirable diversity, for which audiences at orchestral concerts in New York wait long and usually in vain, was given by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall.

The concert opened with the concerto in D major, not of J. S. but of Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach. The first and third movements of this concerto are genial, excellently written eighteenth century music, but the slow movement is something else. It has a depth, a pathos and beauty of which the great Johann Sebastian himself would not have been ashamed. Hearing this concerto played by five solo instruments at a concert of the Society of Ancient Instruments in Paris, Mr. Koussevitzky asked Maximilian Steinberg to arrange it for a small orchestra of flute, two oboes, bassoon, horn and strings. This orchestration might even be larger without loss—or at least fuller in the first and third movements. The music was played with delightful sonority and finish—a most entertaining piece at its lightest; but when the composer sings of the burden of life, and grief, and the mystical consolation that he finds in his art—then indeed the gay finale jars upon the mood and the thoughts of the preceding movement. And how eloquently, in that movement, did Mr. Gillet's oboe breathe the composer's thought!

The eighteenth century Bach was then contrasted wtih a new and inspiriting piece of modernism, in the instance of a first New York performance of Paul Hindemith's "Konzertmusik" for brass and stringed instruments. This is one of the many offerings composed expressly in celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is now past, but which produced a number of important novelties, thanks to the cooperation with Mr. Koussevitzky, of composers ~~in~~ America and in Europe. One of the best of these novelties, in the writer's esteem, is the music of Hindemith heard yesterday.

It is music unqualifiedly modern in idiom, not necessarily as extreme as Hindemith's most extreme pages, but music completely, naturally, masterfully, in the contemporaneous Hindemithian idiom. This means polytonity, brilliant and vigorous counterpoint, which has found a new astringency and bite from the extension of harmonic boundaries. The music is therefore plentifully dissonant but vigorous, logical, sure of itself and alive.

And this is a sane life, a healthy spirit. Emotionally the music does not go very deep, or try to. That is not Hindemith's purpose. But it ranks with the writer as authentic and excellent music, which in its three movements combines melodic with strong rhythmic elements, and in three movements which follow fairly simple formal principles gives abundant entertainment and stimulus to the listener. There is a laughter in it, and a reckless mastery. The finale has something about jazz in rhythmic figures and the like, but this is not obvious or clumsy fooling. It is woven into the weft of Mr. Hindemith's sparkling technic and his generally joyous and insolent ways. What excellent, what amusing music!

The third piece on this list was the brilliant and Goyesque Spanish Rhapsody of Ravell—sheer genius of instrumentation, of a manner in music akin to that of "pointillisme" in painting. There is an intentional crudity and violence of contrast, achieved by the subtlest and most accurate and modern means. Spain is reflected on no modern canvases with more "atmosphere" and shimmer and contrast of color than on this orchestral canvas of Ravel. And in pages, such as the "Prelude à la nuit," there is more than mere color. There is the suggestion of the fantastique, the violent, the macabre, as in the gibbering cadenzas of the clarinets and bassoons. There is something of Goya's spirit.

These three works, played with ravishing tone and virtuosity, were separated by the intermission from Sibelius's Second Symphony. All of them sink in the perspective of the impression made by Sibelius's great symphony. Older than any of the other music except that of eighteenth century Bach, utterly unpretentious and innocent of the slightest attempt to impress or please, the symphony carried away the audience by its primeval power and sweep, its spaciousness and stride and its predominant pulse of heroism and noble tragedy. This work, composed as long ago as 1901-1902, represents the culmination of Sibelius's early "period." Nevertheless it has not the suggestion of the conventional or complacently accepted. The reason why even this early work of Sibelius has waited so long for unqualified recognition is now becoming clear. It is simply the fact that owing to whatever factors of heredity and environment he is a giant in an age of pigmies.

Young men alert to study the last chord or style of a Stravinsky or a Schoenberg do not consider this simple stuff of which heroes and sagas are made important. Conductors of the conventional German persuasion find that this lies outside the domain of the symphonic gospel according to Beethoven or Brahms. Modernists of the more purple die find nothing upon which sophistication or the dernier cri can feed. And Sibelius has gone his great and lonely way. There is no need now to describe the Second Symphony in detail or to hymn its praises, things which have been done again and again in these columns. The effect of the music yesterday was unanswerable. Mr. Koussevitzky interpreted the work not merely with understanding but in a way which thrilled to its spirit. The final peroration was overwhelming, and the inevitable climax of mighty music and masterly interpretation that had gone before. The symphony swept triumphantly to its end. There was no arguing with it or about it, for it spoke with the large utterance of early gods, and the audience did befitting homage.

---

ou

Hindemith's 'Concert Music'

Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays Work for Strings and Brass First Time Here.

N.Y. Sun. Mar. 7

By W. J. HENDERSON.

At its matinee concert in Carnegie Hall on Saturday, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky played for the first time here Paul Hindemith's "Concert Music" for strings and brass instruments. When Hindemith's C major quartet, his first important composition to be heard here, was performed on January 11, 1922, the writer noted the independence of the work in its unhesitating employment of old tonalities, long established polyphonic methods, even of strict counterpoint, clear statement of themes, working out in the old manner, and above all the inclusion of pages made grateful by the sustained lyric line.

To be sure, the composer frequently employed the dissonances and spasmodic tone speech of his fellow modernists, but we felt that because of his infidelities they might stigmatize him as a pariah. He has survived well, and in the new work heard Saturday the traits seen in the quartet were again observed. The "Concert Music" was another issue from that Pandora's box, the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Orchestra, which was celebrated with extended rites and ceremonies last year. It is a good work, based on interesting and even beautiful musical ideas and built with an uncommon command of form.

There are two sections, the first beginning with a vigorous and swift moving figure, behind which soon rises a broad phrase for the brass. The treatment of the themes is rich in resource. There is a part which shows that the composer could write a fugue with the best of them if he so minded, and there is a lyric song of genuine beauty as well as originality. The second section is a fast-slow-fast structure and contains some brilliant orchestration as well as some modernistic music, which by means of some judicious intermingling of old wine becomes a stimulant of delightful flavor.

In such a composition Mr. Hindemith places himself upon solid rock. He does nothing that can fairly be called freakish, nothing that is not properly within the province of music as a mode of beauty, nothing that should fail to commend itsel to the taste of cultivated music lovers, except those wrapped in despair since Brahms ceased to create. The present writer believe eight years ago when he heard th C major quartet that Hindemith ha found the open gate to the future the composition played Saturda confirmed the faith. The "Concer Music" will undoubtedly stay wit us for some time.

Meanwhile, so wide are the graciou arms of music that she can embrac more than one species of modernism The Ravel "Rhapsodies Espagnole which followed the Hindemith piec was indeed a different sort of musi but extremely beautiful in its decorative version of Spanish dance However, every music lover know the work; it needs only to say tha it was played with that opulent ton and technical virtuosity which glorify so many of the gifts of the Boston organization.

The matinee began with C. P. E. Bach's D major concerto for orchestra, presented in the Maximilia Steinberg arrangement. This suav and sonorous music, performed wit elegance of style and meticulous finish, moved the audience to long applause. The closing number was th second symphony of Jan Sibeliu which Wilhelm Gericke and the Boston musicians brought to us in January, 1910, and which has be heard since that occasionally. Th Finnish master is gradually impo ing his worth on the minds of musi lovers.

148

Mr. Copland's Ode Heard in New York

By An Applauding Audience, By Reviewers With Various Minds

TRANS. — MAR. 7

SO FAR, Mr. Copland's "Symphonic Ode" has been played in two cities—in Boston by Dr. Koussevitzkv and the Symphony Orchestra a fortnight ago; in New York last Thursday evening by the same hands. On either occasion only one reviewer was well disposed; at Symphony Hall this department; at Carnegie Hall Mr. Henderson of The Sun. Next day he wrote "Under its panoply of instrumental pomp and circumstance, Mr. Copland's Ode strode magnificently forward to a grandiloquent conclusion which evoked much applause. The author of the magnificence was called from his hiding place to receive the approbation of the multitude and shake hands publicly with the concert-master of the celebrated orchestra, which had bestowed a great performance on his work.

"The Ode is, of course, largely in the musical language of the modernists. It is made with uncanny skill. Mr. Copland has never thought more clearly or expressed himself more lucidly. The logic of his form and the process of his development show a mastery of the contemporaneous methods and a foundation resting on the ideas of Liszt and Strauss but without imitation of either. The germinal theme given out in long-drawn tones by brass is expanded through passages of great ingenuity in the strings some of them touching the outlines of ancient fugato and others enriched with the clashes of the new polytonal counterpoint; with other pages in which woods especially the oboe, are persuaded to be more lyrical than modernists are won to make them, and some time before the coda in a chorale of indisputable power in spite of its violent modal aberrations The coda is founded on a vigorous and vivacious expansion of the root-theme and the powers of brass thunder it to the conclusion already noted.

"Strength and even imagination are found in this composition. But there is the unfailing subterfuge of the modernist when old-fashioned music seems imminent. Something is done to thrust it mercilessly aside, a screech, a crash or a smash and the mold is broken. A writer in the Curtis Institute magazine, Overtones, declared recently that he had heard the students discuss every quality of music save one—beauty. That was never mentioned. This is one result of the incessant campaign of the liberators of the art. But Mr. Copland's Ode comes at times close to old-fashioned tonalities and accepted musical beauty, and this offense against the religion of his kind he will doubtless have to explain. At any rate his composition is one of the most interesting the modernists have recently given us, and it deserved the felicitous introduction it had last night."

Sterility?

The expected champion, Mr. Gilman of The Herald Tribune, heard the Ode regretfully and wrote accordingly: "One suspects that Mr. Copland, made timorous in a fearful time, has carried the principle of thrift, as applied to imaginative substance, somewhat beyond reasonable limits. Mr. Copland is a serious, a most earnest composer, purposeful, self-respecting, intelligent, determined to have his say whatever the dull-witted and the unresponsive may think of his outgivings. And this is all to the good. It was my pleasure and privilege to praise Mr. Copland's widely execrated Piano-Concerto when it was played here five years ago. But in comparison with that gusty and joyously challenging work, the new Ode is, for the most part, impotent and unrewarding.

"Hearing it, one visions Mr. Copeland lost in agonizing lucubration, praying heaven to make him Hard and Stripped and Sharp-Edged and Astringent and all the other things that a composer must learn to be in order to escape the sin of sensibility—entreating the gods, in short, to make him worthy of Stravinsky. The trouble with Mr. Copeland's Ode is not that it is too dissonant or too harsh—it is not as good as that. It suffers from an ancient curse: sterility. It may be worthy of Stravinsky—the drained and lifeless Igor of the Concerto for Violin; but it is scarcely worthy of Mr. Copland."

Doubts and Scruples

In The Evening Post, Mr. Thompson first wanders about and about, as one of hesitant mind, then pulls himself together for not too confident judgment: "On first hearing the work was more severe and cerebral than emotional or exciting and possibly would have been considered repellent a few seasons ago, though harshness is not its chief characteristic today. It represents no mean order of craftsmanship. A play of varied rhythms is manipulated with a skill that would be of credit to any of Mr. Copland's European contemporaries. The scoring comes off, presumably, about as was intended. It all marches, though one does not feel any very weighty momentum. There are rather remote jazz suggestions, but the atmosphere of the work is not that of Mr. Copland's earlier ventures in a semi-popular idiom.

"The Ode is cosmopolitan enough to raise a question as to kinships in several directions, but it does not sound derivative in the sense of much music that acknowledges Stravinsky, Hindemith, Schoenberg or, as the case may be, Ravel or the modern Italians, as its prototype. These considerations stated, a question remains as to what the listener may hope to get out of this music. . . . Design, sonorities, rhythmic successions, sundry details that can be regarded as purely musical rather than in any sense literary or even emotional, can justify a composition such as this Ode. The ear can find its satisfactions in beauty, power or some other salient attribute of the material and the handling of that material "For this reviewer the work sounds like a praxis [or test-exercise], representing in the abstract something which, when transferred to paper and realized in sound, is not very musical. The passing of a little time may change this feeling; we can only record today that the writing seems to us more individual than the ideas and that the result strikes us as barren of any meaning or message or musical appeal."

The Times, represented at the concert by H. T., was also brief and of no decided mind: "The impression, after one hearing, is that the composer has not disguised enough, or perhaps placed too great faith in ,his thematic material. For the composition, scored as it is for very large orchestra, has more body than weight. This does not mean that Mr.Copland worked in vain. On the contrary, there are pages in the Ode that are authentic; that reveal that he has something to say and is finding the way to expression. This is true of the third section, which was well conceived and had a broadly lyrical and flowing line. Other sections of the music were at least interesting, if clearly derivative in many places. But the point to be stressed is that Mr. Copland is not seeking to astound in this music, but to hew to the line. In sincerity there may be growth. . . . He could not have asked for a better peformance."

Addendum

By way of brief footnote, the reproach of derivative matter was also urged in Boston against Mr. Copland's Ode. He was accused of picking a motif here, another there; of taking cue for his procedures now from the celebrated Ixe, again from the less renowned Zed. As a matter of fact nearly all that may be accounted derivative in the Ode passed long since into the common stock of music into which every composer dips nowadays subconsciously. Unless he is blessed with an originality well-nigh inconceivable or isolates himself beyond belief from the world, he may hardly escape the music created around him, read by his eye or sounded in his ear. Grant Mr. Copland all the derivations with which he is reproached; add for good measure a few more that may be discovered—and the essential questions still remain: To what use did he put them and how far did he stamp them with his own quality? On that score even to lukewarm or hostile hearers, the Ode speaks for itself. Page after page, it is unmistakable Copland.

RUSSIAN LIST BY SYMPHONY

Fifth of Tuesday Afternoon Concerts Given

Post Mar 9

For the fifth of the Tuesday symphony concerts, which befell yesterday afternoon, Dr. Koussevitzky had prepared a Russian programme. On it were the "Classical" Symphony of Prokofieff, the pictorial Prelude to Moussorgsky's opera "Khovantchina," Tcherepnin's Eight Miniatures "After a Russian Illustrated Alphabet," which the composer himself had introduced to us earlier in the season, and finally, the "Pathetic" Symphony of Tchaikovsky.

Of Dr. Koussevitzky's and the orchestra's way with these so widely dissimilar symphonies, much has already been written. It is difficult to imagine a more ingratiating performance of the one or a more eloquent projection of the other than conductor and men have so often given, and gave again yesterday. Some may find Dr. Koussevitzky's pace in Moussorgsky's Prelude unduly slow, but the dawn which here steals over the housetops of Moscow is no sudden Southern sunrise, while the temptation to make the most of the exquisite sonorities which exist in Rimsky-Korsakov's version of his friend's music must be great indeed. The miniatures of Tcherepnin were presented by Dr. Koussevitzky with no less conviction and communicative ardor than when they were heard under their composer's baton and as has already been observed, there is in this delightful if unpretentious suite much suitable material for the impending Pop concerts. No doubt more than one of these pieces will find its way to Mr. Fiedler's programmes.

Throughout the afternoon the audience was more than unusually cordial in its reception of the music, in its tribute to the vitalizing performance of these Slavic pieces.

Dr. Koussevitzky's Russian Afternoon

Trans. Mar 9

THE fifth Tuesday concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, brought yesterday, unannounced and unheralded, an all-Russian program; Prokofiev's "Classical" Symphony; the Prelude to Musorgsky's opera, "Khovantchina"; Nicolai Cherepnin's Eight Miniatures After a Russian Illustrated Alphabet; Chaikovsky's Sixth Symphony, in B minor, popularly known as the "Pathetic."

The charm of Prokofiev's little symphony does not fade. After much repeated hearing one does not find oneself tiring of it. Nor is there a particle of evidence that conductor and men tire of playing it. It has long been a particularly bright star in the large and bright constellation of things that Dr. Koussevitzky does superlatively well. Its brightness was entirely undimmed yesterday.

And what a gorgeous thing the prelude to Musorgsky's "Khovantchina" is! One hardly needs the description that it "illustrates the coming of dawn over the Red Square in the Kremlin at Moscow" to feel the cumulative force of it, to perceive its magnificent coloring. And yet the imagined visual image and the perceived aural effects greatly heighten each the other. Once more hats off to conductor and men in token of a performance that fully matched the high imaginings of the composer.

Eight of Cherepnin's miniatures after Benois have come to be the order of the day: Arab-boy, Egypt, Baba-jaga, Stars, "Mama," General, The Forest, The Czarina. Fanciful, imaginative, in places mildly descriptive they are. And, it can now be said, one prefers Dr. Koussevitzky's way with them to that of the composer. Hearing them yesterday one begins to suspect that they will hold higher place than one had imagined.

And after the intermission, Chaikovsky's "Pathetic." That Dr. Koussevitzky habitually works wonders with it has become a by-word here in Boston these years. Its deep gloom he intensifies; its marvellous grace he intensifies; its stirring clamors he intensifies. And all without stepping out of the essential frame of the work, without sacrificing proportion or inherent character of the several parts. Everything is part of a wondrously conceived, astoundingly grandiose scheme. Through it Koussevitzky is beckoning to Chaikovsky across space and time: "You builded better than you knew."

A. H. M.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

An all-Russian program was chosen by Dr. Koussevitzky for the fifth Tuesday afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which was given yesterday in Symphony hall. Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony, Op. 25, Moussorgsky's prelude to "Khovantchina," N. Tcherepnin's Eight Miniatures "after a Russian illustrated alphabet" (Arab-Boy, Egypt, Babajaga, Stars, Mama, General, the Forest, the Tsarina), and Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony (the "Pathetic"), Op. 74, in B minor, were the works performed to the evident pleasure of a large audience.

It was a program which set forth in reversed order a condensed panorama of changing musical fashions—from the would-be neo-classicist Prokofieff back to the emotional romantic Tchaikovsky, by way of the colorist Tcherepnin and a Moussorgsky half nationalist, half impressionist. The extraordinarily neat workmanship of Prokofieff's attempt to project Mozart (or was in Haydn?) into the present, once more compelled admiration, while its sparkling spirits, its slyly humorous modulations into irrelevant keys, brought involuntary smiles—even laughter. To write a musical joke that will raise a laugh—not derision—by purely musical means, and without calling in the aid of such comic instruments as the contra-bassoon, is an achievement. Of purer beauty, unmarred by confusion of styles and purposes, was the charming prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khovantchina," with its irresistible suggestion of morning freshness and fragrance, its limpidly floating melody that might be a Russian folk song. The prelude was beautifully played by the orchestra, with exquisite purity of tone and calmness of mood.

ADVERTISEMENT

Tcherepnin's miniatures, vividly drawn and colored little sketches, of admirable conciseness, were generally pleasurable in their unassuming way. Of these pieces, inspired by an illustrated alphabet, some may have liked best "The Forest," with its idyllic picture of moonlight, faun, and dryads—a picture for which the painter had helped himself liberally to the colors on Debussy's palette; others may have preferred "Maman," with its charming berceuse-like tune, or the toy warfare of "General," or the miniature ceremonial pomp of "The Tsarina." All were pleasing, if unimportant.

The tunes of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" symphony are so good, its lamentations so poignant, its outbursts so effective, that one could wish that a relentless hand armed with a pruning knife had gone through the score to cut out two-thirds of the endless and insufferable reiterations by which the material was inflated into a symphony of dignified proportions and into a target for the not wholly undeserved contempt of modern musicians. The movement that wears best is the delightful and exhilarating third movement. Dr. Koussevitzky's reading of the work, brilliantly effective as a whole, seemed, however, often to accentuate unduly the posturing self-pity that exudes from its groaning phrases.

S. S.

Herald Mar. 9

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

For the fifth concert of the Tuesday afternoon series Mr Koussevitzky presented an all-Russian program.

Obviously the conductor is fond of the Prokofieff "Classical" Symphony, for it has become one of the staple items of his programs. Mr Koussevitzky's beautiful treatment of Mozart is carried over to the Mozartian aspects of Prokofieff's work. The conductor's profound understanding of the meaning and spirit of the moderns does the rest. Each delicate significance, every last gleam of irony—as in the bright shimmer of the larghetto—Mr Koussevitzky indicates with point and deftness.

The orchestra used its most varied and mysterious colors in evoking the picture of the break of dawn over the Red Square in the Kremlin at Moscow, as portrayed in Moussorgsky's Prelude to the Opera "Khovantchina."

Aside from their sustained charm, Nikolai Tcherepnin's fantastic "Eight Miniatures" are perfect examples of the ability of Russian music to make a definite pictorial effect without waste or superfluity of material. "The Tsarina," ending the suite, set the stage admirably for the last portion of the program—Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony.

Those who expected this work to mark the highest point in the program were not disappointed. It was beautifully played. The first movement, in particular, bore superb emphasis on each emotional significance. Each movement, however, was heard with rapt eagerness, and it is a tribute both to work and performance that when the last note had faded into oblivion, there was a moment's definite reluctance on the part of the audience to tear itself away from the spell.

The last concert of this series occurs Tuesday afternoon, April 19.

Globe Mar 9

Trans. Mar. 9

Hindemith in New York

In the second concert of the Symphony Orchestra in New York last week, Dr. Koussevitzky included Hindemith's "Konzertmusik" written for its jubilee and lately played at home. The audience received the piece warmly. With scarcely an exception the reviewers were like-minded. Said Mr. Henderson in The Sun:

> In such a composition Hindemith places himself upon solid rock. He does nothing that can fairly be called freakish; nothing that is not properly within the province of music as a mode of beauty; nothing that should fail to commend itself to the taste of cultivated music-lovers, except those wrapped in despair since Brahms ceased to create. The present writer believed eight years ago when he heard the quartet in C major that Hindemith had found the open gate to the future; the composition played Saturday confirmed the faith.

And Mr. Thompson in The Evening Post: "This 'Konzertmusik' is one of the sturdiest and most convincing works that have come out of Central Europe in the post-war years. It avoids the romantic and the frankly emotional, but the effect is not merely that of ingenious writing in an advanced idiom. There is material that stands muster for its own sake and it is used, polytonally and otherwise, with a sure hand. Each of the two movements proceeds inexorably toward its goal. The brass writing is bold; the strings bite deep. This may not be music to build affections, but it is music to silence the scoffer and provoke thought."

See Page 150 for Mar 8 criticisms

Plays and Players --- Music and Musician

From Western Pen Prairies In Tone-Poem

To the Symphony Concerts, Bearing Gifts, Comes Leo Sowerby

TO INTRODUCE to the audiences at the Symphony Concerts Leo Sowerby, composer of music in Chicago, whose tone-poem, "Prairie," will be played for the first times in Boston and the East on Friday and Saturday. . . . Mr. Sowerby was born in Michigan at Grand Rapids on May 1, 1895. At fourteen he went to Chicago to study music. His teachers were Lampert and Percy Grainger for the piano; Arthur Olaf Andersen for harmony, counterpoint and composition—all of the American Conservatory. He has had no further instruction and is thus in a full sense a product of Chicago. During the German War he was a bandmaster in the American Army. In 1921 he went to Rome as first holder of the fellowship in music at the American Academy. To secure this grant he was not obliged to enter any competition. It was allotted to him in recognition of works already composed and played. Since his return from Rome he has been teacher of theory and composition in the American Conservatory at Chicago and organist in Chicago churches.

For a personal touch, let Karleton Hackett of the Chicago Evening Post repeat the words with which he hailed the youth's appointment to the Roman fellowship: "Well, young Leo Sowerby, our own red-headed Sowerby, has been chosen as the first American composer to join the American Academy at Rome. . . . An enterprising youth is Mr. Sowerby, and not for nothing did nature use her most brilliant pigments on his exterior decoration. The inside of his head was as well provided for as the outside, and he has the nerve to tackle anything."

The best proof of these sayings was the concert of Sowerby's works given by members of the Chicago Orchestra under Eric De Lamarter in 1917. The city was flooded with posters bearing the startling legend: "Leo Sowerby: His Works." The concert was proposed only a month before it was to take place. Sowerby, was then twenty-one years old; had intensively followed the study of music for no more than seven years. Of the works to be played not more than half or two-thirds existed in definitive form. Much actual composition was still to be done and more orchestration A piano-concerto with soprano obbligato was to be heard for the first time. In it Mr. Sowerby was to make his début as concert-pianist. Most of his daytime hours were spent, as Mr. De Lamarter says, "in nagging students at the American Conservatory into a knowledge of musical theory." Most of the nights preceding the concert were spent on his scores. On the night immediately before it he and his friends were still at work on the score of the concerto at three o'clock in the morning. That was the young man's way of conserving his energies for his pianistic début! The score, by the way, was not completely assembled until eleven o'clock on the day of performance.

The chief influences on the formation of Sowerby's style were those of Franck and d'Indy. But there were other temporary influences. Mr. De Lamarter, writing of Sowerby at the age of seventeen, mentions one: "Hence it came that the obsession of Max Reger, who was his high god for a season or so, ceased when he decided that ink-floods, prolific and erudite vanity, and a silo-seasoned fantasy, were not the concomitants of absolute art." In 1917, in Sowerby's twenty-first year, Mr. De Lamarter writes: "At present Vincent d'Indy—and ever César Franck—is the palladium of utter musical truth to him, with the modifying influence of Percy Grainger, like a gleeful imp in the background of the French master's Gothic solemnity." After a notable performance of something of Schönberg by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, there was also a time when this composer affected Sowerby as is evident from a Suite for Violoncello and Piano. But in the Concerto above mentioned (it was later revised into a somewhat less exuberant version, without the soprano voice) he showed a tendency to free himself from his models. The Grainger spirit, however, has now and again cropped out, as witness such titles as "Irish Washerwoman" (1919); "Money Musk" (1924); "Pop Goes the Weasel" (1927).

Indeed, there is probably no factor in modern musical method that Sowerby has not at one time or other explored. Jazz had its inning with two works for Paul Whiteman's orchestra, entitled "Syncopata" and "Monotony," one of which was played in Boston. His use of modern devices will become evident on the harmonic side from a note about his Second Symphony, presently to be quoted; on the rhythmic side from the analysis of "Prairie." which is the point of departure for this article. It has been said that Sowerby, whose backgrounds have brought him into relatively little contact with the currents of European music, has been able thus to stick more closely to that which is indigenously American. If one were to mention a single outstanding quality in him, it would probably be his exuberance of spirit, an exuberance so great that it carries a definite originality inevitably in its train. That this originality sometimes amounts to nothing more or less than waywardness, only helps to prove the point. He once said to a friend, in discussing the dictum of certain critics that a certain work of his was formless: "Form, I guess, is doing what they expect you to do."

Sowerby has been a prolific composer. Of the several lists of his works that have come to hand, every one includes some titles that the others do not contain, indicating creative activity to the point of prodigality. Though still under forty, he already has to his credit no less than ten orchestral works of considerable dimensions, including two symphonies; a cantata that requires thirty-five minutes in performance ("The Vision of Sir Launfal" 1926); an equal number of pieces of chamber music, including a full string quartet, a sonata for violin and piano, another for 'cello and piano. More or less of his chamber music has been played at the Berkshire festivals. There is also a Symphony for Organ.

The following comment on Sowerby's Second Symphony written by Glenn Dillard Gunn, after the first performance on March 29, 1929, by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, will throw some light on the composer's musical present: "In the first movement the themes are so striking, the harmonies so stirring, and the development so impressive in its application of the technic of tonal beauty that the subtitle [sonatina] is misleading. This is sane modern music. It expounds an art of counterpoint that is greatly complex. But one need not listen to it horizontally as melody against melody. One can hear it at all times vertically as chord superimposed upon chord."

Of the second movement: "Its melodies discourse warmly of beauty. Its harmonies glow with a curiously penetrating light." Of the last movement a fugue: "An instantly recognizable harmonic structure which may be dissonant but is never cacophonous." Of the whole,—"It is not necessary [for Sowerby]to write a thesis on polytonality to disguise any possible poverty of ideas; for there is none. This composer, though an American, is an artist with imagination, feeling, and the skill to correct the distorted idiom of the present and set music again in the right direction."

That apologists for the "distorted idiom" feel otherwise is apparent from Paul Rosenfeld's recent article, "The New American Music" in Scribner's Magazine. Mr. Rosenfeld writes, "The American works which have recently called themselves to critical attention as distinguished manipulations of sonorous material . . . are signed by one of these seven names: Villa-Lobos, Carlos Chavez, Carl Ruggles, Aaron Copland, Roy Harris, Edgar Varese, Roger Sessions." Sowerby he puts into a list of which he says, "It is surely too early to dismiss' them. Others on it are Carpenter, Gruenberg, Whithorne, Morris, Marion Bauer, John Powell, Howard Hanson. Which saying obviously will damn Sowerby for some readers but will only enhance anticipation in others.

"Prairie" was sketched in February of 1929; scored in March and April of the same year. It was played for the first time by the National High School Orchestra at its training camp in Interlochen, Mich., on Aug. 11, 1929, the composer conducting. It is scored for the usual large orchestra. On the flyleaf of the score is a part of the poem of Carl Sandburg on which "Prairie" is based:

> Have you seen a red sunset drip over one of my cornfields, the shore of night stars, the wave lines of dawn up a wheat valley?
>
> Have you heard my threshing crews yelling in the chaff of a straw-pile and the running wheat of the wagon boards my cornhuskers, my harvest hands hauling crops, singing dreams of women, worlds, horizons?

Mr. Borowski's program-note for the first performance in Chicago, March 20, 1931, contained the following quotation, the source of which was not acknowledged: "The symphonic poem, 'Prairie,' is constructed in such a way that sections seeking to interpret the moods of the poet's 'red sunset,' 'shore of night stars,' 'wave lines of dawn,' 'threshing crews yelling in the chaff of a strawpile' follow one another in succession without break or special line of demarcation. At the end, the composer has sought to recall the mood of the beginning which suggests the hush, and perhaps monotony, of the vast stretches of farm-land whose beauty Midwesterners too seldom appreciate, and which Mr. Sandburg has idealized in so American a way in his poem. The composer prefers to make no detailed anaylsis of the purely musical contents of the score, as he feels this scarcely right or necessary in the case of an orchestral 'poem.' Though he desires to make clear that he has not wished to write 'program music,' he asks only of the listener that he imagine himself alone in an Illinois cornfield, far enough away from railways, motor cars, telephones and radios to feel himself at peace and at one with the beauty that is about him. If the situation has something of the 'homely' about it, so much the better for the situation."

To the lecturers upon the Symphony programs at the Boston Public Library Mr. Sowerby has written in a somewhat similar vein: "The work is one in which the portrayal of mood is more important than the development of themes." He has indicated, however, five themes as particularly significant. From a study of the score, one readily discovers the reason for Mr. Sowerby's reluctance to quote themes. For these themes cannot be definitely connected with the pictures suggested in the preceding paragraph, nor are they the only themes of significance. One sees that Mr. Sowerby's inventiveness has once again served him prodigally. The mood is the thing in this tone-poem. And that mood is two-fold, corresponding to the two paragraphs quoted from Mr. Sandburg. There is the quiet, poetical mood of the first paragraph. There follows the raucous, super-energized mood of the second paragraph; after which there is return to the first mood, somewhat broadened, somewhat glorified.

The analyst is as reluctant as Mr. Sowerby to intrude upon this fluid, poetic succession of moods with discussion of the themes. Suffice it to say that three of Mr. Sowerby's five belong to the first division of the tone-poem, the other two to the active middle division. Mr. Sowerby's tempo-indications give further clue to his poetical scheme: "Somber and slow"; "faster but darkly"; "quietly"; "animated"; "much more slowly"; "quietly, mysteriously." Then the section devoted to yelling crews and running wheat: "Fast and machine-like." This section of high exuberance, shows also that the composer has been neither blind nor deaf to the modernist gods of irregular and free rhythm. The section bears the unusual meter signature 7½-4. Later a 7-4 meter signature is explained by a parenthesis 4-4+1½-4+1½-4 The whole is a huge pedal point on a tonic in D minor, broken only here and there, with uncanny intuitive skill, by an occasional measure or two of relief, followed invariably by a resumption of the grinding pedal. The mood grows to the wildest possible exultation. Then, to conclude, the magnified poetical mood of the beginning.

A. H. M.

Eastward Bound

(By Courtesy of C. C. Birchard)

Leo Sowerby: Chicagoan Composer

For the First Times, on Friday and Saturday, He Will Have Place in the Symphony Concerts

Concert-Chroni

Revival from Stravinsky

AT the Symphony Concerts of tomorrow and Saturday, Dr. Koussevitzky will revive the Suite drawn by Stravinsky from his version of Pergolesi's "Pulcinella" as "opera-ballet" in one act, made for the Diaghilev Troupe in 1919, produced in Paris in 1920. Mr. Monteux included numbers from the Suite in a pair of Symphony Concerts nine years ago last December. No part of it has since been heard at Symphony Hall. . . On the flyleaf of the score—writes A. H. M.—stands this note:

> The subject of "Pulcinella" is taken from a manuscript found at Naples and dating from the year 1700. It contains a large number of comedies in which the traditional hero of Neapolitan comedy plays a part. The episode chosen for the "book" of this ballet is entitled "Four Similar Polichinelles."
>
> All the young girls are in love with Pulcinella. The young men, stung by jealously, try to kill him. When they believe themselves to have been successful in this, they dress like Pulcinella to call on their sweethearts. But Pulcinella has had a substitute replace him, who feigned death under the blows of his enemies. Pulcinella himself, in the garb of a magician, brings his double back to life. When the young men, believing themselves rid of him, are visiting their fiancées, the real Pulcinella puts in his appearance and arranges their marriages. He himself weds Pimpinella, with the benediction of his double who in his turn appears as a magician.

From time to time in the "opera-ballet" a tenor, a soprano and a bass sing airs and concerted numbers of Pergolesi. These with other themes from Pergolesi, furnish Stravinsky with his material. Through long passages he acts merely as orchestrator. Elsewhere his own invention furnishes additional sparkle and verve. Though the two do not exactly blend, there is, curiously enough, no feeling of incongruity. Mr. Monteux played only the first half and the Finale of the Suite, calling it Suite One. Dr. Koussevitzky proposes to play all the numbers, viz.:

I. Sinfonia (Overture). This largely in the olden contrapunt style, enriched somewhat by Stravi skian harmonic devices.

II. Serenata. This serenata, chief sung by an oboe in the Suite, is th tenor air in the ballet, "Ment l'erb tta pasce l'aguella," a sort Siciliano.

III. Scherzino; Allegro; Anda tino. All in the light Italian co trapuntal style of Pergolesi's da sometimes dubbed Scarlatian. T Allegro has a brilliant, display violin-solo against a graceful then for woodwinds. The Andantino largely a duet between flute and viol with the featheriest possible acco paniment in the strings.

IV. Tarantella. The whirling It ian dance of this name, for fu orchestra.

V. Toccata. Brightly rhythm largely for wind instruments.

VI. Gavotta, with two variatio Again a typical dance-rhythm, th time entirely for winds. Each var tion faster and more brilliant th the preceding matter.

VII. Duetto. A quick-moving, iro cal movement in which a solo-doub bass and a solo-trombone are pron nent.

VIII. Minuetto and Finale. T Minuet brings many interesting co binations and contrasts of orchestr timbres. The Finale is impetuou More than many another portion the ballet or the suite it shows Stravinsky's characteristic hand.

At the Symphony Concerts of next week on March 18 and 19, Dr. Koussevitzky will mark the hundredth anniversary of the death of Goethe, at Weimar, March 22, 1832, by the performance of Wagner's "Faust" Overture and Liszt's "Faust" Symphony.. In the Finale of the Symphony a small choir from the Harvard Glee Club will assist.

Plays and Players --- Music and Musician

From Western Pen Prairies In Tone-Poem

To the Symphony Concerts, Bearing Gifts, Comes Leo Sowerby

TO INTRODUCE to the audiences at the Symphony Concerts Leo Sowerby, composer of music in Chicago, whose tone-poem, "Prairie," will be played for the first times in Boston and the East on Friday and Saturday. . . . Mr. Sowerby was born in Michigan at Grand Rapids on May 1, 1895. At fourteen he went to Chicago to study music. His teachers were Lampert and Percy Grainger for the piano; Arthur Olaf Andersen for harmony, counterpoint and composition—all of the American Conservatory. He has had no further instruction and is thus in a full sense a product of Chicago. During the German War he was a bandmaster in the American Army. In 1921 he went to Rome as first holder of the fellowship in music at the American Academy. To secure this grant he was not obliged to enter any competition. It was allotted to him in recognition of works already composed and played. Since his return from Rome he has been teacher of theory and composition in the American Conservatory at Chicago and organist in Chicago churches.

For a personal touch, let Karleton Hackett of the Chicago Evening Post repeat the words with which he hailed the youth's appointment to the Roman fellowship: "Well, young Leo Sowerby, our own red-headed Sowerby, has been chosen as the first American composer to join the American Academy at Rome. . . . An enterprising youth is Mr. Sowerby, and not for nothing did nature use her most brilliant pigments on his exterior decoration. The inside of his head was as well provided for as the outside, and he has the nerve to tackle anything."

The best proof of these sayings was the concert of Sowerby's works given by members of the Chicago Orchestra under Eric De Lamarter in 1917. The city was flooded with posters bearing the startling legend: "Leo Sowerby: His Works." The concert was proposed only a month before it was to take place. Sowerby, was then twenty-one years old; had intensively followed the study of music for no more than seven years. Of the works to be played not more than half or two-thirds existed in definitive form. Much actual composition was still to be done and more orchestration A piano-concerto with soprano obbligato was to be heard for the first time. In it Mr. Sowerby was to make his début as concert-pianist. Most of his daytime hours were spent, as Mr. De Lamarter says, "in nagging students at the American Conservatory into a knowledge of musical theory." Most of the nights preceding the concert were spent on his scores. On the night immediately before it he and his friends were still at work on the score of the concerto at three o'clock in the morning. That was the young man's way of conserving his energies for his pianistic début! The score, by the way, was not completely assembled until eleven o'clock on the day of performance.

The chief influences on the formation of Sowerby's style were those of Franck and d'Indy. But there were other temporary influences. Mr. De Lamarter, writing of Sowerby at the age of seventeen, mentions one: "Hence it came that the obsession of Max Reger, who was his high god for a season or so, ceased when he decided that ink-floods, prolific and erudite vanity, and a silo-seasoned fantasy, were not the concomitants of absolute art." In 1917, in Sowerby's twenty-first year, Mr. De Lamarter writes: "At present Vincent d'Indy—and ever César Franck—is the palladium of utter musical truth to him, with the modifying influence of Percy Grainger, like a gleeful imp in the background of the French master's Gothic solemnity." After a notable performance of something of Schönberg by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, there was also a time when this composer affected Sowerby as is evident from a Suite for Violoncello and Piano. But in the Concerto above mentioned (it was later revised into a somewhat less exuberant version, without the soprano voice) he showed a tendency to free himself from his models. The Grainger spirit, however, has now and again cropped out, as witness such titles as "Irish Washerwoman" (1919); "Money Musk" (1924); "Pop Goes the Weasel" (1927).

Indeed, there is probably no factor in modern musical method that Sowerby has not at one time or other explored. Jazz had its inning with two works for Paul Whiteman's orchestra, entitled "Synconata" and "Monotony," one of which was played in Boston. His use of modern devices will become evident on the harmonic side from a note about his Second Symphony, presently to be quoted; on the rhythmic side from the analysis of "Prairie," which is the point of departure for this article. It has been said that Sowerby, whose backgrounds have brought him into relatively little contact with the currents of European music, has been able thus to stick more closely to that which is indigenously American. If one were to mention a single outstanding quality in him, it would probably be his exuberance of spirit, an exuberance so great that it carries a definite originality inevitably in its train. That this originality sometimes amounts to nothing more or less than waywardness, only helps to prove the point. He once said to a friend, in discussing the dictum of certain critics that a certain work of his was formless: "Form, I guess, is doing what they expect you to do."

Sowerby has been a prolific composer. Of the several lists of his works that have come to hand, every one includes some titles that the others do not contain, indicating creative activity to the point of prodigality. Though still under forty, he already has to his credit no less than ten orchestral works of considerable dimensions, including two symphonies; a cantata that requires thirty-five minutes in performance ("The Vision of Sir Launfal" 1926); an equal number of pieces of chamber music, including a full string quartet, a sonata for violin and piano, another for 'cello and piano. More or less of his chamber music has been played at the Berkshire festivals. There is also a Symphony for Organ.

The following comment on Sowerby's Second Symphony written by Glenn Dillard Gunn, after the first performance on March 29, 1929, by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, will throw some light on the composer's musical present: "In the first movement the themes are so striking, the harmonies so stirring, and the development so impressive in its application of the technic of tonal beauty that the subtitle [sonatina] is misleading. This is sane modern music. It expounds an art of counterpoint that is greatly complex. But one need not listen to it horizontally as melody against melody. One can hear it at all times vertically as chord superimposed upon chord."

Of the second movement: "Its melodies discourse warmly of beauty. Its harmonies glow with a curiously penetrating light." Of the last movement a fugue: "An instantly recognizable harmonic structure which may be dissonant but is never cacophonous." Of the whole,—"It is not necessary [for Sowerby]to write a thesis on polytonality to disguise any possible poverty of ideas; for there is none. This composer, though an American, is an artist with imagination, feeling, and the skill to correct the distorted idiom of the present and set music again in the right direction."

That apologists for the "distorted idiom" feel otherwise is apparent from Paul Rosenfeld's recent article, "The New American Music" in Scribner's Magazine. Mr. Rosenfeld writes, "The American works which have recently called themselves to critical attention as distinguished manipulations of sonorous material . . . are signed by one of these seven names: Villa-Lobos, Carlos Chavez, Carl Ruggles, Aaron Copland, Roy Harris, Edgar Varese, Roger Sessions." Sowerby he puts into a list of which he says, "It is surely too early to dismiss' them. Others on it are Carpenter, Gruenberg, Whithorne, Morris, Marion Bauer, John Powell, Howard Hanson. Which saying obviously will damn Sowerby for some readers but will only enhance anticipation in others.

"Prairie" was sketched in February of 1929; scored in March and April of the same year. It was played for the first time by the National High School Orchestra at its training camp in Interlochen, Mich., on Aug. 11, 1929, the composer conducting. It is scored for the usual large orchestra. On the flyleaf of the score is a part of the poem of Carl Sandburg on which "Prairie" is based:

> Have you seen a red sunset drip over one of my cornfields, the shore of night stars, the wave lines of dawn up a wheat valley?
>
> Have you heard my threshing crews yelling in the chaff of a straw-pile and the running wheat of the wagon boards my cornhuskers, my harvest hands hauling crops, singing dreams of women, worlds, horizons?

Mr. Borowski's program-note for the first performance in Chicago, March 20, 1931, contained the following quotation, the source of which was not acknowledged: "The symphonic poem, 'Prairie,' is constructed in such a way that sections seeking to interpret the moods of the poet's 'red sunset,' 'shore of night stars,' 'wave lines of dawn,' 'threshing crews yelling in the chaff of a strawpile' follow one another in succession without break or special line of demarcation. At the end, the composer has sought to recall the mood of the beginning which suggests the hush, and perhaps monotony, of the vast stretches of farm-land whose beauty Midwesterners too seldom appreciate, and which Mr. Sandburg has idealized in so American a way in his poem. The composer prefers to make no detailed anaylsis of the purely musical contents of the score, as he feels this scarcely right or necessary in the case of an orchestral 'poem.' Though he desires to make clear that he has not wished to write 'program music,' he asks only of the listener that he imagine himself alone in an Illinois cornfield, far enough away from railways, motor cars, telephones and radios to feel himself at peace and at one with the beauty that is about him. If the situation has something of the 'homely' about it, so much the better for the situation."

To the lecturers upon the Symphony programs at the Boston Public Library Mr. Sowerby has written in a somewhat similar vein: "The work is one in which the portrayal of mood is more important than the development of themes." He has indicated, however, five themes as particularly significant. From a study of the score, one readily discovers the reason for Mr. Sowerby's reluctance to quote themes. For these themes cannot be definitely connected with the pictures suggested in the preceding paragraph, nor are they the only themes of significance. One sees that Mr. Sowerby's inventiveness has once again served him prodigally. The mood is the thing in this tone-poem. And that mood is two-fold, corresponding to the two paragraphs quoted from Mr. Sandburg. There is the quiet, poetical mood of the first paragraph. There follows the raucous, super-energized mood of the second paragraph; after which there is return to the first mood, somewhat broadened, somewhat glorified.

The analyst is as reluctant as Mr. Sowerby to intrude upon this fluid, poetic succession of moods with discussion of the themes. Suffice it to say that three of Mr. Sowerby's five belong to the first division of the tone-poem, the other two to the active middle division. Mr. Sowerby's tempo-indications give further clue to his poetical scheme: "Somber and slow"; "faster but darkly"; "quietly"; "animated"; "much more slowly"; "quietly, mysteriously." Then the section devoted to yelling crews and running wheat: "Fast and machine-like." This section of high exuberance, shows also that the composer ha been neither blind nor deaf to the modernist gods of irregular and free rhythm. The section bears the unusual meter signature 7½-4. Later a 7-4 meter signature is explained by a parenthesis 4-4+1½-4+1½-4 The whole is a huge pedal point on a tonic in D minor, broken only here and there, with uncanny intuitive skill, by an occasional measure or two of relief, followed invariably by a resumption of the grinding pedal. The mood grows to the wildest possible exultation. Then, to conclude, the magnified poetical mood of the beginning.

A. H. M.

Eastward Bound

(By Courtesy of C. C. Birchard)

Leo Sowerby: Chicagoan Composer

For the First Times, on Friday and Saturday, He Will Have Place in the Symphony Concerts

Concert-Chronicle

pre

Revival from Stravinsky

AT the Symphony Concerts of tomorrow and Saturday, Dr. Koussevitzky will revive the Suite drawn by Stravinsky from his version of Pergolesi's "Pulcinella" as "opera-ballet" in one act, made for the Diaghilev Troupe in 1919, produced in Paris in 1920. Mr. Monteux included numbers from the Suite in a pair of Symphony Concerts nine years ago last December. No part of it has since been heard at Symphony Hall. . . On the flyleaf of the score—writes A. H. M.—stands this note:

> The subject of "Pulcinella" is taken from a manuscript found at Naples and dating from the year 1700. It contains a large number of comedies in which the traditional hero of Neapolitan comedy plays a part. The episode chosen for the "book" of this ballet is entitled "Four Similar Polichinelles."
>
> All the young girls are in love with Pulcinella. The young men, stung by jealously, try to kill him. When they believe themselves to have been successful in this, they dress like Pulcinella to call on their sweethearts. But Pulcinella has had a substitute replace him, who feigned death under the blows of his enemies. Pulcinella himself, in the garb of a magician, brings his double back to life. When the young men, believing themselves rid of him, are visiting their fiancées, the real Pulcinella puts in his appearance and arranges their marriages. He himself weds Pimpinella, with the benediction of his double who in his turn appears as a magician.

From time to time in the "opera-ballet" a tenor, a soprano and a bass sing airs and concerted numbers of Pergolesi. These with other themes from Pergolesi, furnish Stravinsky with his material. Through long passages he acts merely as orchestrator. Elsewhere his own invention furnishes additional sparkle and verve. Though the two do not exactly blend, there is, curiously enough, no feeling of incongruity. Mr. Monteux played only the first half and the Finale of the Suite, calling it Suite One. Dr. Koussevitzky proposes to play all the numbers, viz.:

he suite it shows Stracteristic hand.

I. Sinfonia (Overture). This largely in the olden contrapunt style, enriched somewhat by Stravi skian harmonic devices.

II. Serenata. This serenata, chie sung by an oboe in the Suite, is t tenor air in the ballet, "Ment l'erb tta pasce l'aguella," a sort Siciliano.

III. Scherzino; Allegro; Anda tino. All in the light Italian co trapuntal style of Pergolesi's da sometimes dubbed Scarlatian. T Allegro has a brilliant, displayf violin-solo against a graceful then for woodwinds. The Andantino largely a duet between flute and viol with the featheriest possible accor paniment in the strings.

IV. Tarantella. The whirling It ian dance of this name, for fu orchestra.

V. Toccata. Brightly rhythm largely for wind instruments.

VI. Gavotta, with two variatio Again a typical dance-rhythm, t time entirely for winds. Each var tion faster and more brilliant th the preceding matter.

VII. Duetto. A quick-moving, iro cal movement in which a solo-doub bass and a solo-trombone are pro nent.

VIII. Minuetto and Finale. T Minuet brings many interesting co binations and contrasts of orchest timbres. The Finale is impetuo More than many another portion

At the Symphony Concerts of next week on March 18 and 19, Dr. Koussevitzky will mark the hundredth anniversary of the death of Goethe, at Weimar, March 22, 1832, by the performance of Wagner's "Faust" Overture and Liszt's "Faust" Symphony.. In the Finale of the Symphony a small choir from the Harvard Glee Club will assist.

150

Herald

ATURDAY, MARCH 12, 193

MUSIC

SOWERBY'S "PRAIRIE"

By PHILIP HALE

The 18th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conductor, took place in Symphony hall yesterday afternoon. The program was as follows: C. P. E. Back-Steinberg, concerto in D major for orchestra; Stravinsky, suite from the ballet, "Pulcinella" for small orchestra (after Pergolesi); Debussy, two nocturnes: nuages and Fetes; Sowerby, "Prairie," poem for orchestra (first time in Boston); Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

Mr. Sowerby's "Prairie" was composed in 1929, and performed at Interlochen, Michigan, in that year. There have been performances by the symphony orchestras of Detroit and Chicago in 1931. Here is an American composer who cannot say that he has been slighted by conductors. The long list of his works with dates of performances shows that he has been recognized.

"Prairie" has for an argument passages from a poem by Carl Sandburg, who asks: "Have you seen a red sunset drip over one of my cornfields?" The poet also asks if the reader has seen "the shores of night stars, the wave lines of dawn up a wheat valley?" Mr. Sandburg is further inquisitive. He asks if the reader has heard "threshing crews yelling in the chaff of a strawpile and the running wheat of the wagon boards" and harvest hands singing dreams of women, worlds, horizons." Perhaps corn-huskers and harvest hands in Illinois sing of women; this is indeed probable; but we doubt if they sing of horizons. The lines from this poem might well suggest both pictorial and emotional music. Mr. Sowerby in his description of his music tells us that the sections seek to interpret the moods of the poet; that the beginning "suggests the hush and perhaps monotony of the vast stretches of farm land," and then he remarks that he has not wished to write program-music.

Mr. Sandburg is an American poet who sings of his country. Mr. Sowerby's music might have been written by any foreigner feeling the hush and monotony of the plain near his village. Unfortunately in "Prairie" there is no suggestion of nationality. One does not complain because the composer has made no use of what are loosely known as "folk songs" or art-songs in the folk-song manner. One does not ask for example that the corn-huskers should warble sweetly that good old song, "When the corn is waving, Annie dear." It is true "that the orchestra gives one an idea of the threshing crews yelling, in fact they make a devil of a noise, but it would be a greater pleasure to be told in music the dreams of the farm hands about horizons.

In "Prairie" the composer shows a lack of imagination. He does not even remind one of the hush and monotony of the prairie. With what simple means Borodin showed us the loneliness of a Russian steppe! Nor are Mr. Sowerby's lusty workers in the cornfield any different from orchestral shouters in any country from China to Peru, or from demons below or heavenly hosts above chorusing rage or joy.

"Prairie" is uninterestic music, program or no program. How different is "The Plains," in Ode Symphonie by Jabez Tarbox (1854). Mr. John Phoenix wrote a long analysis of this "greatest musical achievement that has been presented to an enraptured public."

"The Symphonie opens upon the wide and boundless plains in longitude 115 degrees West, latitude 35 degrees 21:03 North, and about 60 miles from the west bank of Pitts river. These data are beautifully and clearly expressed by a long (topographically) drawn note from an E flat clarinet . . . A few notes on the piccolo calls the attention to a solitary antelope, picking up mescal beans in the foreground." The continuing analysis shows that Jabez Tarbox could be pictorial, imaginative, emotional.

The suite "Pulcinella" had not been played here by the orchestra since 1922. There are amusing sections; some ingeniously orchestrated; but for full appreciation there is need of the stage dances. The Concerto by C. P. E. Bach, well arranged by Steinberg, with its beautiful slow movement; the nocturnes by Debussy, and Strauss's masterpiece which must henceforth always be associated with Dr. Koussevitzky's amazingly brilliant interpretation, were keenly relished by the audience.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is arranged in memory of Goethe's death, March, 1832: Wagner's A Faust overture and Liszt's . . . Faust Symphony. In the rformance of the Symphony the Har d Glee Club will assist.

Post

DAY, MARCH 12, 1

SYMPHONY PRESENTS A NOVELTY

Sowerby's "Prairie" One Piece From Five Composers

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Symphony Concert of yesterday was one without a symphony, one which offered music by five composers, and one which ran to pieces either familiar or of no great consequence.

FOR FOURTH TIME

Yesterday, for the fourth time since his coming to Boston, Dr. Koussevitzky found place on a programme for the concerto in D major of Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach as arranged, at the conductor's own suggestion, by Maximilian Steinberg. The first and last movements of this work which Dr. Koussevitzky rescued from oblivion are not important; the Andante that comes between is music of haunting beauty which deserves the emphasis Dr. Koussevitzky has put upon it, even if the other divisions do not. Finely and expressively played yesterday, this Concerto was warmly applauded.

Like all conductors, Dr. Koussevitzky has his favorite pieces. Not only Bach's Concerto, but Debussy's Nocturnes "Clouds" and "Festivals" and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," also played yesterday, have several times been heard in Symphony Hall since Dr. Koussevitzky has been among us. Whether or not they have been heard to surfeit is purely a matter of individual opinion. At all events the performance of Debussy's musical impressions was yesterday again a triumph for conductor and players, while many have praised Dr. Koussevitzky's version of "Till," which yesterday plainly pleased the audience as a whole.

Solo for Double Bass

Only a hypercritical carper would suggest that Dr. Koussevitzky has steadily failed, at least in degree, to bring from this music either the folksy spirit or the sly and ironic humor which are its most characteristic qualities. With him, some feel, the one is partially lost in misplaced sentimentality, the other in a too conscious manipulation of effect. Perhaps it might suffice to say that the Koussevitzky "Till" is over-interpreted.

Of the remaining pieces on yesterday's list, one, Leo Sowerby's "Prairie," was a novelty; the other, the suite for small orchestra from Stravinsky's ballet "Pulcinella," after Pergolesi, had not been heard here since Mr. Monteux introduced it to us in 1922. No doubt "Pulcinella" is as charming on the stage as various London reviewers found it to be when Diaghliev's Russian Ballet presented it in the British capital 13 years ago. But in the concert hall, despite Stravinsky's ingenious efforts to give it point and color, Pergolesi's music is for the most part tenuous and at times it is dull. The performance yesterday was a remarkable one and especial praise must be written of Mr. Kunze's playing of the measures for solo double-bass.

Sowerby's "Prairie"

Inspired by a poem of Carl Sandburg, Mr. Sowerby, whose name appeared yesterday for the first time on a Symphony programme, would in his "Prairie" suggest in tone the sweep and expanse of a Western wheat field, the boisterous activity of the reapers, and again the far-stretching, billowing fields. If there is beauty in this American vista, there is also monotony. Both are reflected in Mr. Sowerby's music; the latter, one feels, more than the former.

This tone poem displays harmonic and rhythmic resourcefulness and, saving an occasional turgidity, is well orchestrated, but it shares the crying fault of so many contemporary pieces, a lack of salient thematic ideas.

Globe MUSIC mar 12

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The unfamiliar numbers on the program of yesterday's Symphony concert were the suite from Stravinsky's ballet "Pulcinella" and a tone poem, "Prairie," by the young Chicago composer, Leo Sowerby. The concerto for orchestra arranged at Dr Koussevitzky's suggestion by Steinberg from a chamber piece by Carl Philip Emanuel Bach, two of Debussy's nocturnes, and Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" filled the remainder of the concert.

Mr Monteux, 10 years ago, conducted here excerpts from Stravinsky's "Pulcinella," which included some of the numbers heard yesterday, but there has been no other performance in Boston. Stravinsky's score is based on music by Pergolesi, which he arranged, with some alterations and additions, for a ballet produced in 1920 by Diaghilev's company. Only a careful study of the scores would show just what Stravinsky drew from Pergolesi and what he contributed.

The result is a spirited and charming succession of brief movements, full of rhythmic vitality and melodic grace, but rather fragmentary when heard as a concert piece, without the accompanying stage spectacle for which it was intended. If the great 18th century composer sometimes speaks with a Bolshevik accent, it merely adds piquancy to the music. The scoring is a miracle of ingenuity and quite in 18th century style. There is in one section a prominent solo part for the double bass, which won Mr Kunze several rounds of applause.

Mr Sowerby's "Prairie," played for the first time in Boston, is meant to suggest lines from the like-named poem by Carl Sandburg. The listener is asked to imagine himself alone in a remote prairie cornfield, feeling in succession the moods suggested by the poet's phrases "red sunset," "shore of night stars" "wave lines of dawn," and "threshing crews yelling in the chaff of a straw pile." The composer disclaims any intention of writing "program music" of the literal pictorial type, however.

The opening measures, suggestive of sunset, have in their sonorous shifting harmonies genuine atmospheric quality. They do evoke a mood. But, like most American composers, Mr Sowerby is incapable of sustained eloquence, yet eager to be dramatic, to be intense, to be heroic. He soon falls into a rather naive bombast, akin to the flights of rhetoric of the old-fashioned "spread eagle" orator. His music lacks subtlety of style and complexity of texture. The scoring for orchestra suggests that he composes at the organ, and then arranges for orchestra, as Schumann too plainly composed at the piano, and then orchestrated. The performance was painstakingly eloquent. It was applauded with some degree of cordiality.

Dr Koussevitzky's conducting in the "Nuages" and "Fetes" of Debussy, and in Strauss' "Till" had in addition to the fervor, the eloquence that marks nearly all his interpretations, a clarity, a precision, a brilliance of style as well as of substance that indicated once more how notable his progress as a conductor has been. Now in music like this, which he loves, and which he knows thoroughly, he has all the attributes of a really great conductor. Enthusiasm, temperament, and unsparing energy and industry he has always shown. Now these great and rare qualities frequently bear fruit in performances which it would be hard for any conductor and any orchestra to surpass.

One does not share his enthusiasm for the concerto made by Steinberg from music by C. P. E. Bach. Whatever the original chamber piece may be like, this concerto for orchestra is turgid, with more sound than musical substance. The andante, especially, is dry and dull, just what an andante should not be.

Next week, in honor of the centenary of Goethe's death the program will be Wagner's "Faust" overture and Liszt's "Faust" symphony. P. R.

MUSIC

Herald mar 8

MONDAY SYMPHONY CONCERT

Dr. Koussevitzky's program for the fifth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra's Monday series, was as follows: Beethoven, Symphony No. 4 in B flat major, Op. 60; Debussy, Two Nocturnes (Nuages, Fetes); Sowerby, "Prairie," Poem for orchestra; Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel," Op. 28. It was a program that fell with unusual distinctness into two violently contrasted portions, with the intermission lying like a frontier between the "absolute" music of Beethoven on the one side and the pictorial and programmatic music of Debussy, Sowerby, and Strauss on the other. To attempt, while in the midst of the program's second half, momentarily to project the mind back into Beethoven's B flat symphony, was to realize vividly how different a function now was being performed—by tone and timbre—that two different arts were in question.

The orchestra played the symphony with exceeding grace, spirit, and clarity. One of the least frequently performed of the nine, perhaps because less portentous than, for example, the third and fifth, it is predominantly sparkling and joyous, with the exception of the two adagios—the foreboding introduction and the meditative second movement. It thus conflicts unpardonably with the accepted portrait of the frowning and tortured Beethoven.

In "Nuages" and in "Fetes" Debussy's incredibly cunning synthesis of instrumental timbres, of delicately shifting harmonies and significant rhythms—devised for their suggestive force—excited undiminished admiration both by its power of evoking scenes and moods and by the subtle beauties of sound it evolved.

Sowerby's "Prairie," a poem for orchestra based on a poem of the same name by Carl Sandburg, seemed, for all its American subject, to owe much to Debussy's technique of tone-painting. This is perhaps hardly a reproach, for nobody has yet satisfactorily explained exactly how to write recognizably American music that is not Negroid, if indeed the thing is conceivable. But Mr. Sowerby can be justly reproached with having failed both to live up to the elaborate program outlined in the poem and to give us music that is tolerably interesting in its own right, conscientiously and carefully made though it is. The passages in which the "red sunset," the "shore of night stars," the "wave lines of dawn," are depicted may be recognized with the exercise of a little imagination and good will. But one feels that this is not "homely" but tired and sophisticated music; it lacks the spirit of its subject.

"Till Eulenspiegel" wears better than most of Strauss's descriptive tone poems —perhaps because it is the least subjective, because in it the composer is for once not glorifying himself or exulting in his own domestic felicity. The picaresque humor and the musical unity and charm of the piece make it enduringly delightful. It was brilliantly played last night—Dr. Koussevitzky has always found it particularly congenial.

A large audience applauded with energetic warmth. S. S.

Post mar 8

FIFTH MONDAY SYMPHONY

Pieces From Regular List Are Performed

The last but one of the season's Monday concerts took place at Symphony Hall last evening before the usual capacity audience. For this concert there was no soloist and Dr. Koussevitzky had made the programme entirely from pieces played during the present season at the regular concerts. Of these Debussy's two nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," Leo Sowerby's "Prairie" and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" were taken from the programme of the concert of last Friday and Saturday. Before them came Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, heard much earlier in the season.

With the Fourth Symphony, as with several of the others, Dr. Koussevitzky has always notably excelled. It is his particular virtue and distinction so to have presented this genial composition that the listener has never been troubled by any misgivings as to its inferiority to the gigantic works that precede and follow it in the series of the nine symphonies. Necessarily the Fourth Symphony seems less imposing than the "Eroica" and the Fifth, but Dr. Koussevitzky has convinced us, if we stood in need of such persuasion, that it is no less a masterpiece. Clearly symphony and performance found favor with last evening's audience.

Both Strauss' tone-poem and the Nocturnes, alike heard often in Symphony Hall during the years that Dr. Koussevitzky has been with us, are pieces upon which players and conductor may exercise their respective virtuosity. As at the concerts of last Friday and Saturday the Chicagoan composer's tone-poem that would suggest both the expanse of a Western wheatfield and the activity of the laborers therein came between the compositions of Debussy and Strauss, and was perforce overshadowed by them. The general verdict on Mr. Sowerby's music has been that the composer achieved here but a partial success, although other pieces of his, as yet unheard in Symphony Hall, have disclosed a pronounced talent.

MUSIC

Globe mar 8

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr Koussevitzky chose a varied program, with Leo Sowerby's orchestral poem, "Prairie," as newest music, for the fifth Symphony concert of the Monday evening series. He began with Beethoven's Fourth Symphony and continued with two Debussy Nocturnes, "Cloud" and "Festival," and Richard Strauss' perennially fresh and fascinating "Till Eulenspiegel." The Symphony excepted, all this music had been played at the subscription concerts last week.

Possibly one of the rarest pleasures and most edifying details of this life is to discover something new and beautiful in things to which one has become accustomed and takes more or less for granted. In most respects the concert last evening proved such a pleasure. It is difficult to describe the satisfaction, the real thrill one accustomed to this orchestra experienced time after time in noting the virtual perfection of orchestral detail, the sure, smooth functioning of the choirs, and the inexpressibly beautiful tone.

No less in the Symphony than in the other pieces was this to be enjoyed. This Symphony bears a charm of its own; a bucolic charm suggestive of kindly Nature on a Summer's day, and of crude and hearty rustic humor. Dr Koussevitzky brought out all of this in a performance both sensitive and fleet-footed, with impressive rhythmic subtlety.

Sowerby's music at a second performance did not dispel an impression formed Saturday evening that the piece is a work of occasional merit, but monotonous and much too long. The beginning and the ending are the most effective parts, most convincing of the composer's stated purpose in suggesting sunset, a corn field, and so forth. In these portions the instrumentation is clear and well-balanced; in the climaxes more often than not it is too heavy. Above all, it is not salient music.

Not much can now be said in praise of Debussy's ineffably beautiful Nocturnes or Strauss' tone poem which has not been said before. Their merits and their power over the listener are too well known to be dwelt upon profitably. Dr Koussevitzky played them with full use of all the technical resources at his command, the result being performances which, it seems to one person, could not be bettered.

The last concert of this series will be given April 25.

Goethe: All Things To All Men in the Theater

Dramatist and Also Producer, Manager as Well as Actor, Decorator at Need, On Ducal Boards

TO celebrate the Goethe centenary, the best dramatic companies of Germany are coming together at Weimar, where for twenty-six years the great poet directed a theater. All of Goethe's plays are on the program. "Götz von Berlichingen," "Iphigenie auf Tauris," "Torquate Tasso," "Clavigo," "Egmont," and "Faust" will receive the interpretation which only German actors and actresses, steeped in the Goethe tradition, can give them. Representative troupes from Berlin, Dresden, Munich, Frankfurt and Vienna will compete. The place of honor goes to the Burgtheater, which will produce "Torquato Tasso" on the anniversary day, March 22. Aslan, noted for his interpretation of such classic rôles as Hamlet and for his equally talented rendering of such modern heroes as Lenormand creates, will play the title rôle. For these actors and for their directors, producing a season of Goethe is no effort at all. It calls for no unusual preparation or the learning of new parts. Goethe is the pivot man of German managers. His imprint, with that of Schiller, goes deepest in the national theater which he helped to create.

Johann Wolfgang von Goethe was a man of the theater. He grew up worshipping the puppet-plays. The Seven Years' War meant nothing to him save that his father's house was occupied by highly picturesque soldiers and that a French company, fresh from Paris, opened its doors and kept them open all during the occupation of Frankfurt. The boy had free tickets to attend every performance. From Molière and Corneille he learned to love the stage. At school he wrote minor plays even before he succeeded in writing minor verses. His first important work was "Götz von Berlichingen." He had really won fame in the theater even before his "Werther" made him the idol of every sentimentalist in Europe. It is peculiarly fitting that his masterpiece should have been written not for the study but for the stage, and that he should have spent more than a quarter of a century as the director of the Duke of Weimar's tiny theater.

Goethe participated in the dramatic life of Weimar for more than fifty years, and actively directed the ducal enterprise much of the time. When he died his mere presence had raised Weimar to the rank of the second court of all Germany, and his direction of the Weimar theater had given it a prestige throughout Europe which is even today reflected in certain of the mannerisms and convictions of the German producer.

* * *

When Goethe first came to Weimar there was not a more delightful, spritely, youthful court in all Central Europe. The Duke was young. He had just married. Everybody was full of the joy of living. Not a week passed without someone suggesting amateur theatricals, in which the ladies of the court, the ministers of state, and Goethe himself, as official poet and literary luminary, played their parts. As the author of "Götz von Berlichingen," Goethe naturally came to direct these dilettante activities. His nature was strong. He could not even play without throwing in all his energy and all his dogmatic will power. He ruled his aristocratic actors and actresses as ruthlessly as if they had been performing poodles. Like a despot he settled their intrigues over rôles by distributing the parts himself, he silenced their petty squabbles by making himself the arbiter in all questions concerning performance, and thus he stopped for once and for all every discord which would have been bad for art, however attractive and pleasant intrigue and squabble may be in themselves for the insatiable dabbler in "private theatricals."

At first the Weimer stage was simply a preening ground for Goethe and his obedient friends, and a testing ground for popular plays and Goethe's own dramas. As such it contributed to the author's knowledge of the theater, and thus to his preparation for writing for it, but it could hardly be taken seriously as a national German theater. Occasionally it reached distinction in the production of Goethe's "Iphigenia," which he carefully directed in its first prose version long before rendering it somewhat less dramatic by all its vigorous lines into stately poetic meters. Occasionally it reached distinction through the appearance of Goethe himself upon the boards.

"Never shall I forget," writes Goethe's physician—who must be considered as a somewhat prejudiced witness, "the impression made by Goethe in his Greek costume as Orestes at the production of his "Iphigenia." We seemed to see before us an Appolo. Never before had we seen in a man such a combination of physical and spiritual perfection as we saw in Goethe that day."

While flattering, this commentary may explain the ascendency which Goethe soon took in Weimar theatricals. He was not only a visiting author of note. He was a handsome actor and a director who made the best of everything. In comedy, especially in farce, he made a great hit, whether he was trying to clown his way through Shakspeare or through a Shrovetide play of his own adaptation. In tragedy his diction was too curt and vehement and his gesture too stereotyped and stiff and angular, but these defects were in part offset by the dignity of his demeanor, his good looks, and his complete assurance.

He appreciated the problems of stagecraft in a way which even today few regisseurs have bettered. He is the first director—probably because of his great interest in all the phenomena of light and color—ever to take full advantage of an outdoor setting. His theater burned down. His company was producing his own vaudeville, "Die Fischerin," where his text calls for a search all along a river bank for Dortchen, the heroine, whom her lover fears drowned. Goethe placed his production in a great grove of elms near the palace, and sent groups of supernumeraries clamboring up neighboring hills, wandering through distant patches of trees, and moving constantly hither and thither along the real river bank. Every man carried a torch. On the promontory there were lighted signal fires.

* * *

It was, as Goethe himself says, "in very piano fashion" that the amateur theater of Weimar gradually became a professional theater and Goethe took over the duties of a paid professional manager. Since the days of his first enthusiasm for theatricals he had become interested in statecraft, in mineralogy, and in a score of other activities which disputed his time with the theater. None the less, his master the Duke begged to be amused, and Goethe, now forty-two years of age, deigned to take up a job as stage manager and man of all work in connection with his many more important duties. He had almost lost contact with actors and actresses during ten years of transition while his aristocratic amateurs and he himself were playing at other things, and a small hired company did plays for them. This company had gone from bad to worse. The Duke had taken over the new little theater building himself. Naturally, since Goethe was the only one in Weimar who really had distinguished himself in the world of drama, he was called upon to perform.

Goethe was not delighted. He still loved the theater, but he had other ambitions than directing. Also, he had been to Italy. He had seen the world, and he realized how pitifully inadequate even the best theater which Weimar might afford must seem to true metropolitans. The Duke's small building held only a gallery, a row of gallery boxes, and his own loge. There was hardly room enough for the numerous public required to make the venture—even with the aid of a subsidy—successful. If Goethe had not been the idol of the students of Jena University, who trooped over in motley attire on every occasion to support his latest venture, it is certain that Weimar alone would have been too small a place to make its ducal theater pay. As it was, Goethe sent his company touring every season. At the watering places along the Rhine it made enough extra money to eke out its budget. The magic name of Goethe, whose Götz and Werther were by now the heroes of a whole generation, sufficed to attract actors where salaries where certainly inadequate. Goethe did not have a big troupe, or a great one, but it was devoted.

Modern directors will be comforted to read of the difficulties Goethe faced. His financial manager wrote to him when one of his stars demanded a costume.

"If none of the mantles in stock will answer the purpose . . . to buy a new dress must remain out of the question. Perhaps she can use Mary Stuart's white satin dress; or perhaps the white satin dress in the wardrobe, the bodice of which Demoiselle Jagemann has recently been wearing, may be altered to fit her, and will do."

Goethe knew all the pangs of presenting a full battle scene with but a handful of "supers." He knew the misery of refurbishing old scenery to make it represent quite other woods and fields, quite other vegetation, than was originally intended. He faced these difficulties philosophically:

"A good actor soon makes us forget miserable, unsuitable scenery — whereas the finest scene only makes us feel all the more the want of good actors."

Starting out with poor scenery and poor actors as well, Goethe set himself the task of improving his company. His methods are enlightening. In the first place, he took absolute control. He made himself a despot. In this he was aided greatly by his reputation in the field of letters, and by the awe in which his troupe stood of him. But this time he was dealing not with intelligent amateurs, but with the class of sometimes illiterate, always improvident wanderers who in his day and generation went into professional acting. He was forced to use the iron hand, and to go into their private lives.

"When a man gives his wife a pair of black eyes, this may concern the theater very much, if she is cast to play a young heroine's part the same evening. It should therefore be laid down very distinctly on this occasion that any actor who beats his wife will at once be confined in the main guard by order of the committee."

Goethe worked with the full ducal power behind him. He commanded actresses to remain in their rooms under arrest, he imposed fines, and he even put recalcitrant actors into prison. He was bent upon making something out of his poor company, in spite of the fact that at the outset his aid in command summed up the impression which they produced by calling them a band of "fools, idiots, evil-minded persons, cabal-mongers, lickspittles and bandits."

Goethe drew up a list of rules. First among them was the idea which summed up the whole: "The theater must come first." He kept his troupe incessantly at work. His favorite, Christiane Neumann, was a girl actress who had married early and who had two children during the few years that she was with the company. When Christiane was unable to appear upon the stage she none the less had to appear at the theater. She was replaced in her role by a girl who simply acted the part in pantomime, while she herself spoke her lines or sang her solo songs from the wings.

"When there was a performance," Goethe later told Eckermann, "my interest was not so much in the pieces as in observing whether the actors played as they ought."

He drilled his troop like soldiers. He insisted that they follow his rules implicitly, unquestioning. Because, as he once put into the mouth of Prologue:

"From all the ends of Germany we come Now first together—strangers each to each —"

He had great difficulty in making them speak pure German instead of dialect. No few of his rules are simply manuels of pronunciation. Others give advice upon one's conduct in a drawing room:

"A very gross error, which should be avoided, is for an actor, who is sitting, and watns to move his chair forward, to place his hand between his legs, seize the chair, and, rising slightly, drag it forward with him. This is not only contrary to the canons of beauty, it also conflicts with decorum."

Goethe in acting was influenced strongly by the French, by Molière's school and by the Commedia dell' arte. He did not care—nor would he have been able with the limited means at his disposal—to represent actual appearance upon the stage. He wished the theater to remain frankly the theater, its actors to be mere actors, its scenery to be mere scenery. He respected its artifice and convention. In his rules he states, "The actor should always bear in mind that it is for the sake of the public he is on the stage. . . . Accordingly actors should never, in a mistaken attempt at naturalness, play to each other as if no third person were present." He denies the tradition of the "Fourth Wall," which Ibsen, William Archer and Stanislavsky held holy. He would have no patience with the Theatre Libre or with the Stage Society. On the other hand, the modern master of the theater, like Copeau, treating the stage frankly as a stage, and building up his own conventions as he goes along, must find Goethe stimulating in spite of his forced lapses into pettiness. Goethe stands for the Presentational stage as it has been distinguished of late from the Representational. He does not demand that the actors should be taken as real people instead of as actors. He demands only that the public should come into the theater intent upon taking part in a spectacle.

"The stage and the hall," he says, "the actors and the audience, constitute essentially a single whole."

Goethe was a canny manager. He recognized in Schiller the coming playwright, and, without jealousy, encouraged him. He turned over to Schiller his own notes for a play about Wilhelm Tell, and was generously pleased when Schiller made such an exceptionally fine job of it. He knew the theater better than some of his own plays would seem to indicate. In producing he never let his love for philosophy run away with him.

* * *

No modern theater director more easily matched ideals and finances. He set his standard of acting as high as his troupe could reach. He read the works of the greatest playwrights and kept constantly before his eyes the pictures of the masters in order that his mood and his stage pictures might resemble them. But he did not make mad leaps into eccentricity of repertory.

"I looked for good pieces," he told Eckermann, years later, "from tragedy to farce, every species was welcome; but the piece was obliged to have something in it to find favor. It was necessary that it should be great and clever, cheerful and graceful, and, at all events, healthy and containing some pith. All that was morbid weak, lachrymose, and sentimental, as well as all that was frightful, horrible, and offensive to decorum, was utterly excluded."

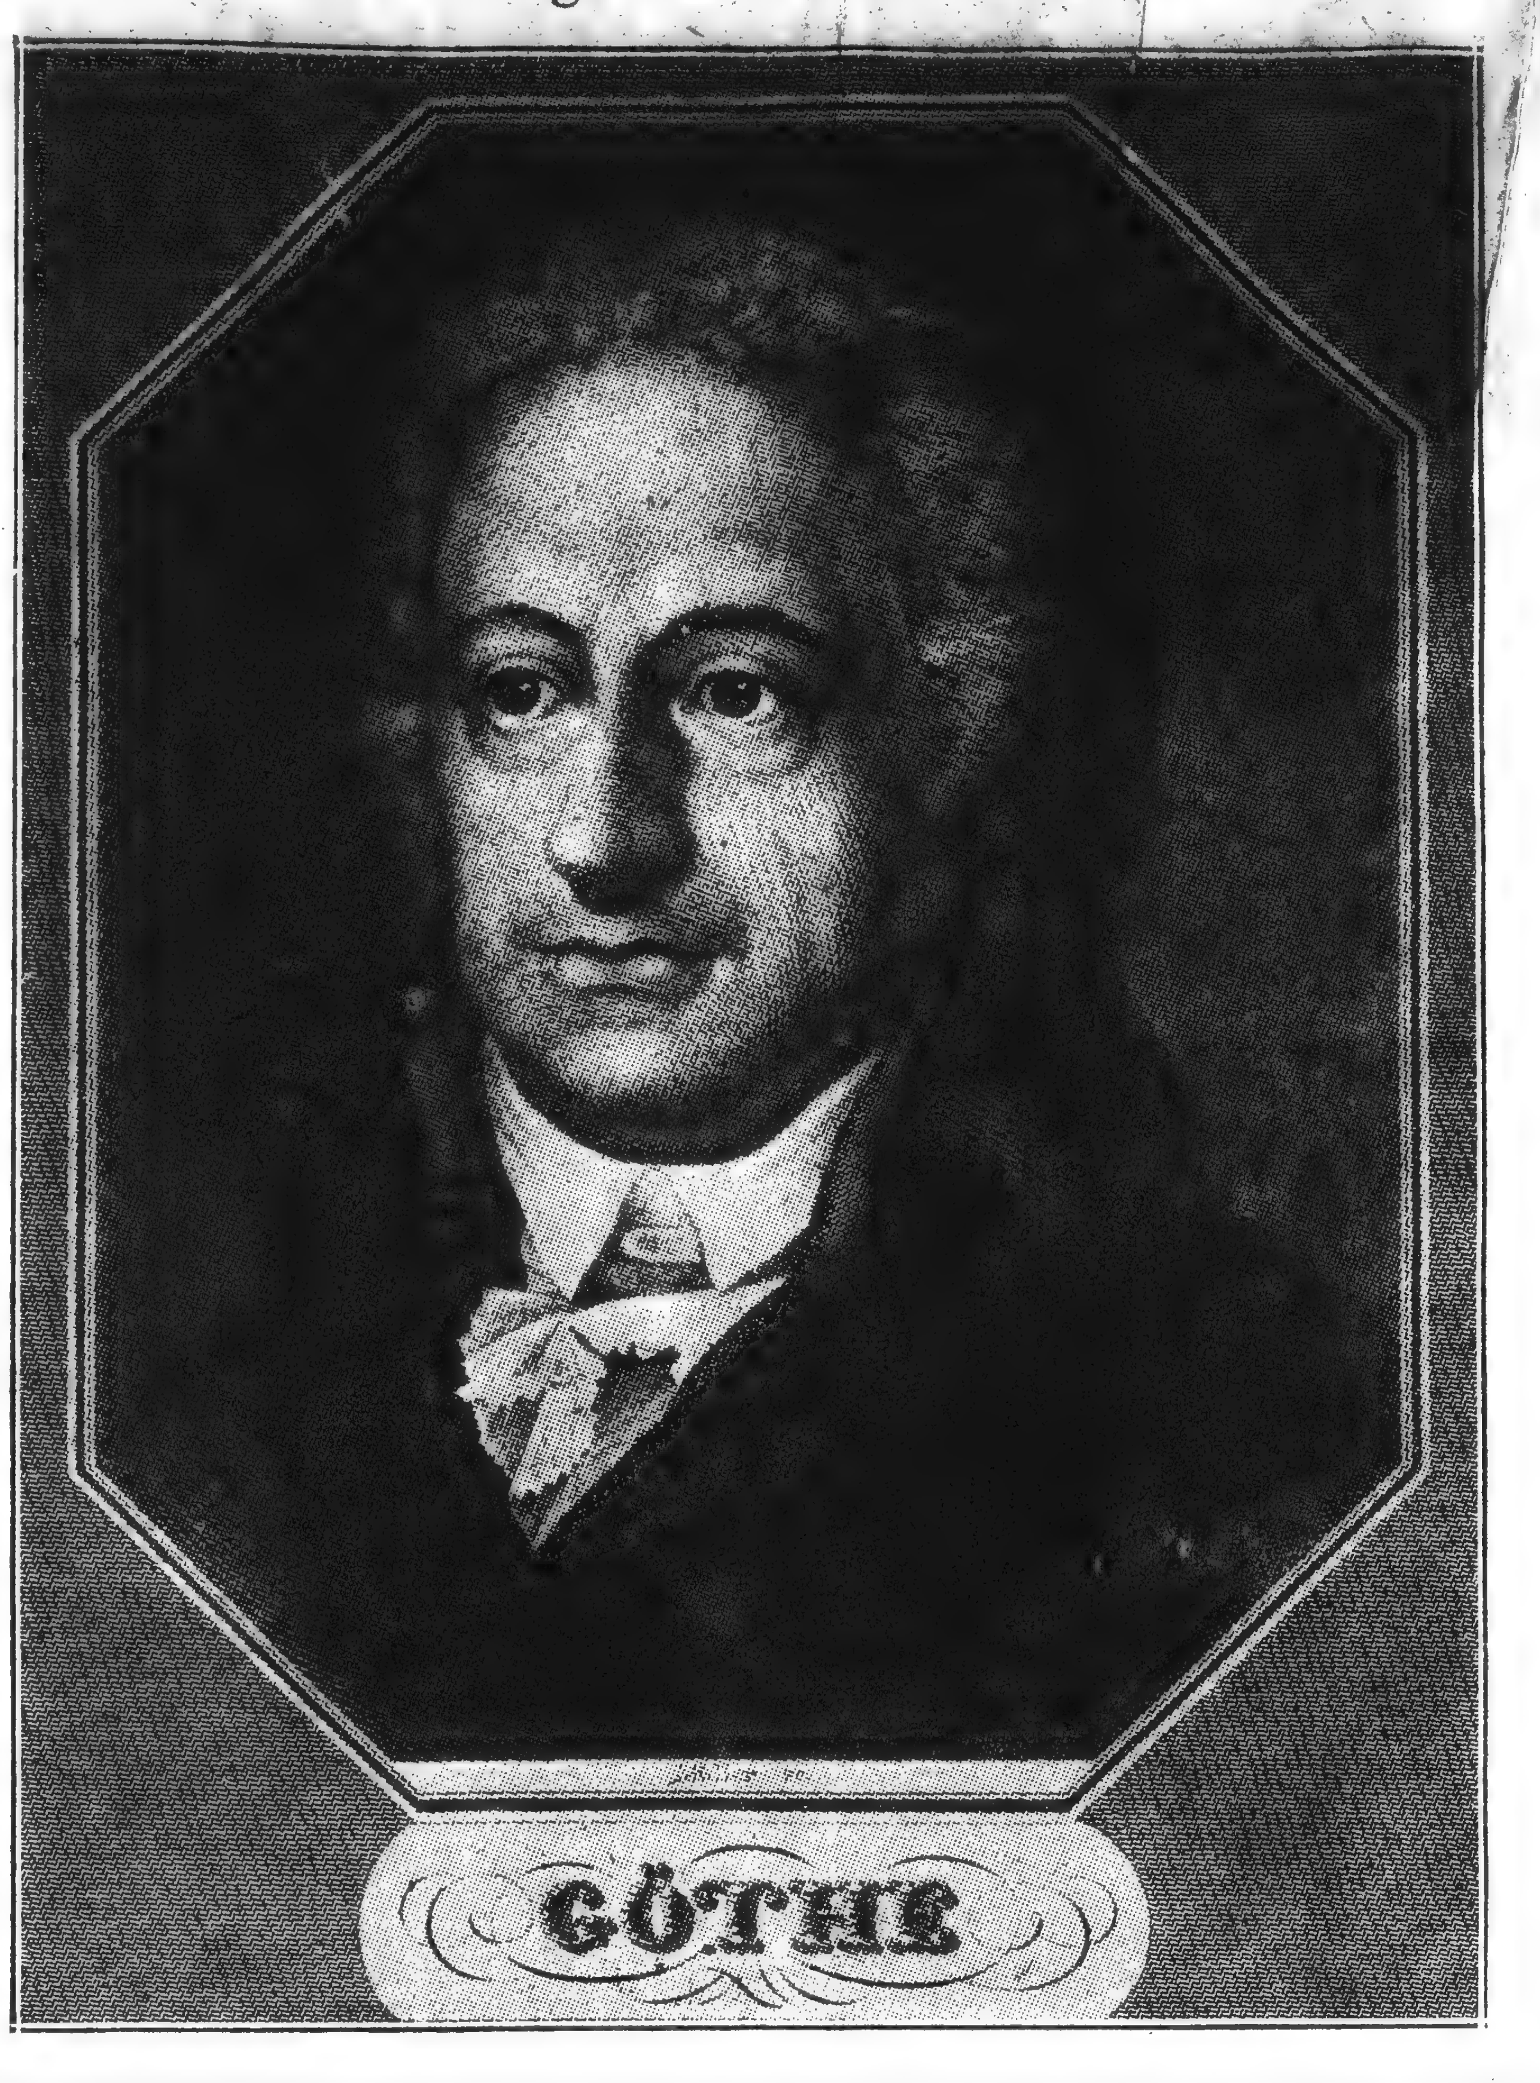
Certain of his phrases, his cry for the healthy and the cheerful, his horror at the morbid and the offensive, would sound pat in the mouths of theatrical managers today. But Goethe did not want goody-goody pieces. He enthusiastically embraced Schiller's idea that once a week the theater should give a play "for the male sex exclusively." In his old age, after he had left the Weimar Theater because the Duke insisted upon having a performing dog admitted, he often scoffed at the decadence of theatrical art, which must bow to the least adult susceptibilities in the audience. His final utterance upon the theater, after he had given it a shape it held in Germany for a hundred years, formed its traditions of acting and presentation, and written at least two of its classics, was a bitter warning to keep the audience vigorous and masculine, hearty and full of sap, in a word—of age.

"When Molière wrote, girls were in the convent, and he was not forced to think about them. But now we cannot get rid of these young girls, and pieces which are weak, and therefore proper, will continue to be produced."

It is fitting that Goethe's final utterance should be a protest against the censorship, not of an organized state authority even, but of an audience becoming more and more squeamish, more and more unwilling to consider the great problems of the Greeks. With his wide knowledge of these classics which children were driving off the stage, his deep understanding for all forms of drama, and his delight in so shaping a play upon the boards as to satisfy his most exacting rules of excellence, Goethe must remain in the history of the theater as perhaps the supreme metteur en scéne and practicing playwright. There are few others, among them Molière, who rival or surpass him in any department. There is none who equals him in all. To have set the way, for better or for worse, which Germany's stage was to follow, was no small feat. To have laid down rules which made clowns into heroes, made country girls into heroines, was prestidigitation. And to have encouraged Schiller, to have given Schiller a hearing while at the same time contributing to world literature original dramas of the calibre of "Faust"—that was genius.

William Leon Smyser

The Sage That Weimar Knew



Goethe: Had His Mind Encountered the Films

An Imaginary Conversation With Eckermann About Sound and Sight in The Cinema

"WELL, what news do you bring me, my dear Eckermann?" asked Goethe sociably, looking up tolerantly from his writing desk. "It almost seems as if some unusual occurrence has troubled your ordinarily judicious composure."

"I am conscious," answered Eckermann, whose excitement had somewhat diminished in the face of the calmness of the master, "that the report which I have been entrusted with for confidential submission to you sounds unusual enough. A foreign charlatan, who arrived with today's mailcoach, offers to exhibit tonight in the theater of the Grand Duke a new kind of motion picture art, which he designates by the suspicious name of 'sound film.'"

"Only vulgar credulity," answered Goethe, frowning, "lets itself be led so far astray as to conclude that there is necessarily something amazing behind an unfamiliar name. I should not have expected that of you, my friend!"

"I must also add," Eckermann, evidently shamed by the reprimand, continued with a certain discreetness, "that His Royal Highness the Grand Duke has expressed the desire that the Ministry of State examine this proposal and pass judgment whether it is adapted to afford His Highness an agreeable entertainment."

"Hm. . . . So we may expect something of consequence," said Goethe, with a smile, after some reflection. "Come and get me at the appointed hour, so that we may both see exactly what a sound film is."

"My dear friend," remarked Eckermann, as he stood with Goethe in the afternoon before the machine of the courteous itinerant entertainer, "to tell the truth, I must confess that the whole thing is an enigma to me."

"Not so fast! Not so fast!" warned the poet with a shake of his head, "you allow yourself to be carried away all too easily to hasty judgments, my dear Eckermann. You find a strange pleasure in allowing yourself to be governed by first impressions instead of examining carefully all phases of a problem and keeping firmly in mind wherein it differs from others. Have you never seen a tool, the use of which you understood only after helpful instructions?"

"None the less it would be proper," Eckermann suggested timidly, "to require some security from the man, so that no danger may be feared from those screws and lenses and cranks. I almost believe . . . ."

* * *

"We are not going to believe anything before evidence has given us a more definite basis for our opinion!" interrupted Goethe mildly, at the same time watching fixedly the preparations of the man, who was stretching a square white canvas over the proscenium of the stage. "There is nothing here to cause us to suspect anything to arouse our anxiety. Therefore, master your doubts beforehand, my friend!"

"I don't know myself what gave me that impression," Eckermann conceded by way of excuse. He was watching with some apprehension the gradual darkening of the auditorium. "Although I should like it better if the foreigner did not exercise his arts in the darkness."

"After all is said and done, the foreigner has a certain talent for ventriloquism," said Eckermann, taken aback, as the first pictures danced over the screen. "That is the only way it can be explained. . . ."

"Let us pay attention rather to what is being done than the way in which it is done!" advised Goethe, not without a slight frown. "If I comprehend rightly what is taking place here, it strengthens in me the impression that we have here a mechanism which makes it possible, by means of unknown forces, for the movements of human figures to be imitated by means of shadows and for them to be accompanied by many sorts of correspondingly suitable voice sounds."

"Perhaps," Eckermann ventured to remark casually, "the owner of this surprising apparatus is seeking to deceive us by an unseemly optical illusion. We are not even certain where he comes from!"

"I nevertheless suspect that there is behind it all a great law, by means of a knowledge of which we may arrive at inestimable results," answered Goethe forcefully, without noticing the objection of his friend. "Although much of what is passing before our eyes vexe

Continued on Page Eight

Goethe: From His "Faust" Much Music

Liszt and The Others Who Set Hands to His Master-Work

ON a certain glum and sodden London day in the early part of this century, when English music critics had little to do but chant hymns to Sir Edward Elgar and wrangle amiably over the aesthetics of program-music (the wild men of the Polytonal Age were still in their cradles), the enquiring Ernest Newman laid out before him on his desk for purposes of comparative study and appraisal the scores of all the musical settings of Faust. He found that they numbered, in one form or another, "something like thirty or thirty-five." "Faust," he declared, "is perhaps the most popular of all subjects with musicians, far outdistancing in favor the Hamlets and Othellos and Romeo-and-Juliets and all the other lay figures which composers are fond of using to show off their own garments."

* * *

He then proceeded to these general observations: "It cannot be said that they have added very much, on the whole, to our comprehension of the drama; indeed, with half a dozen exceptions, the Faust-symphonies and Faust-operas and Faust scenes have quite failed to justify their existence. One of the main difficulties in the way of the musician—even supposing him to have the brain capacity to rise to the height of the psychology of the thing—is the enormous range and wealth of material of the drama itself. The First Part of Goethe's work alone, or the Second Part, is quite sufficient to tax the constructive capacity of any composer to the uttermost; but to reshape the whole of Faust in music is a desperate undertaking.

"Since Goethe's day, we are bound to see the Faust picture through his eyes; any harking back to earlier forms of it is quite out of the question. And Goethe, while he has enormously extended and deepened the spiritual elements of the story, has by this very means set the musician a problem of discouraging difficulty. No musical version of the play, in the first place, can be adequate unless it embraces Goethe's Second Part as well as the First.

"Due opportunity, again, must be given for the exposition of all the essential motives of the drama, and they are many, indeed. The composer is thus on the horns of a dilemma. If he wants his work to stand in the same gallery with Goethe's, he has to run a line through Faust's soul long enough and sinuous enough to touch upon all its secret places; but anyone who tries to do this soon perceives how hard it is to focus so vast a scene and to keep the picture within one frame of reasonable size. An opera or a symphony that should attempt to cover all the psychological ground of the drama would take at least ten or twelve hours in performance.

"Apparently the only rational course for the future composer who may think of setting the Faust subject is to take two or three evenings over it, after the manner of Wagner's 'Ring of the Nibelung'; and, until this is done, we shall have to rest satisfied with the more or less inadequate versions we have at present. The cosmic quality of the subject, one would think, should have attracted more of the first-rank men, considering how many of the second and third rank it has tempted."

And then the astringent Mr. Newman pays his respects to that setting of Goethe's drama "which has given to so many honest but uninstructed people their first, perhaps their only, idea of 'Faust'": he means, of course, the opera of Gounod—"this banal thing, this cheap vulgarization of Goethe, this blend of the pantomine, the novelette, and the Christmas card, still represents 'Faust' in the minds of nine musical amateurs out of ten! . . . The most pleasing elements in Gounod's work, the really lovely if not always profound love-music, are precisely those that withdraw it furthest from Goethe; for here it is clearly not Faust speaking to Marguerite, but any man to any woman, any Edwin to any Angelina."

Mr. Newman says nothing of the use made by Gustav Mahler of the second part of "Faust" in his Eighth Symphony—which is scarcely to be wondered at, in view of the fact that Mahler's Symphony was not yet composed. Mr. Newman's brilliant and suggestive study dates from 1905, and the symphony was not produced until 1910. Mahler's work presents us with a setting for voices and orchestra of the Final Scene of "Faust" (prefaced by an elaborate setting of the Latin hymn "Veni Creator Spiritus"). Mahler sought to plumb the bottomless spiritual philosophy of the "Faust" Epilogue, and achieved an impressive commentary upon Goethe's marvelous essay in cosmic symbolism, as will be remembered by those who heard the performances of Mahler's gigantic score (the so-called "Symphony of a Thousand") by the Philadelphia Orchestra under Mr. Stokowski in the spring of 1916.

* * *

Whether Mr. Newman, if he could have added to his "Faust" study a discussion of Mahler's prodigious score, would have felt that any of the spiritual quality of Goethe's conception had found its way into Mahler's heart and thence into the pages of his symphony, is not for us to guess at. Mahler undertook a task that would have taxed the genius of a Beethoven or a Wagner. Bayard Taylor reminds us that in Goethe's poem are "circles within circles, forms which beckon and then disappear; and when we seem to have reached the bottom of the author's meaning, we suspect that there is still something beyond." How, indeed, shall any music save the greatest convey, without numerous haltings and lapses and futilities, Goethe's transcendent imaging of "the victorious vitality of God and the omnipotence of Divine Love"?—the unique ecstasy, the mystical passion, the otherworldliness, the ineffable serenity and tenderness, the rapturous exaltation of the original?

It is curious that Bayard Taylor, writing almost half a century ago, should have spoken of the closing scene of "Faust" as "a symphony": "an ever-rising and ever-swelling symphony, with its one theme of the accordance of Human and Divine Love"; as—again—"this mystic Symphony of Love." It almost seems as if he had previsioned the tonal possibilities of Goethe's poem.

Mr. Newman passed in review the settings of "Faust" by Boito, Wagner, Rubinstein, Henry Litolff, Henri Hugo Pierson, Berlioz, Schumann and Liszt—settings in various forms, through various musical instrumentalities. It is the conclusion of Mr. Newman (who is happily able to discuss music without either a hardening of the heart or a softening of the brain) that "every purely orchestral setting of the subject pales before the magnificence of Liszt's "Faust Symphony"; and be it remembered that Mr. Newman is no blind worshipper at the Lisztian shrine. Liszt's symphony comprises three movements, entitled, respectively, "Faust," "Gretchen," and "Mephistopheles" with a choral epilogue in which Goethe's final lines, "Alles verganliche ist nur ein Gleichniss," etc., are set for male chorus and solo tenor; and Mr. Newman thinks that "the larger scale on which the picture is painted permits Liszt both a breadth and an intimacy of psychology which are impossible in the one-movement overtures" (Wagner's, for instance, or Rubinstein's—a tone-poem which he calls "Ein musikalisches Charakterbild.")

* * *

In the long first movement (Faust) of Liszt's works, remarks Mr. Newman, "we really do feel that Faust is being analyzed with something of the same elaboration and the same insight as in Goethe's poem. The "Faust" movement is extraordinarily fine character-drawing, and certainly the only instrumental Faust study that strikes one as being complete. In the "Margaret" movement he incorporates very suggestively a reference here and there to the phrases of the "Faust" movement, thus not only sketching Margaret herself, but giving the love-scenes in a form of the highest concentration. This section is surpassingly beautiful throughout. . . . Almost the whole Margaret is there, with her curious blend of sweetness, timidity and passion; while Faust's interpositions are exceedingly noble. All that one misses in Liszt, I think, is the tragic Margaret of the scene in the Cathedral and the prayer to the Mater Dolorosa. "The 'Mephistopheles' section is particularly ingenious. It consists, for the most part, of a kind of burlesque upon the subjects of the 'Faust' movement, which are here passed through a continuous fire of irony and ridicule. . . . The being who exists, for the purposes of the drama, only in antagonism to Faust, whose main activity consists only in endeavoring to frustrate every good impulse of Faust's soul, is really best dealt with, in music, not as a positive individuality, but as the embodiment of negation—a malicious, saturnine parody of all the good that has gone to the making of Faust."

Lawrence Gilman

[Reprinted from the Program Book of the Philadelphia Orchestra]

Symphony --- Films -

A Symphony Concert for Superlatives

Conductor and Orchestra at High Pitch Through Notable Program

Mar 12

THROUGH the whole Symphony Concert, yesterday afternoon, the orchestra played at the top of its powers. In the slow movement of Emanuel Bach's Concerto, the limpid depth and flow of the string-tone was nothing less than a new beauty infused into a music already beautiful. In the quick movements there was equal reason to marvel at lightness, plasticity and glint; while the players on the wind instruments were little masters of arabesque. . . . In the Suite drawn by Stravinsky from his adaptation to Diaghilev's stage of Pergolesi's ballet, "Pulcinella," the conductor again used a small orchestra out of which even the first double-bass and the trombone shone as virtuosi. Each in its kind, the solo-oboe in another movement hardly excelled them. Stravinsky is unsparing in technical exaction. Frequently he demands fleet pace and light tone to the utmost. At every turn of a music that, outside a few songful pages, is incessantly turning, the orchestra answered to composer and conductor. Notable also was its sense of style. It differentiated Pergolesi's pungent Italian melodies from Emanuel Bach's deeper-voiced German song. Elsewhere in his Concerto it had spun counterpoint, tossed about figures. Now it caught the flash of Pergolesi's Neapolitan brilliance or the bolder surfacing of Stravinsky's humors.

Out of repertory, which Dr. Koussevitzky never permits to stale, Debussy's "Clouds" and "Fêtes" began the second part of the concert. Composer and conductor could hardly have played upon an orchestra more sensitive to rhythm and color, more alert to every subtlety and significance of detail. Another beauty far removed from that of Emanuel Bach's slow movement was at its command. . . . Then followed the novel piece of the day, "Prairie," tone-poem by Mr. Leo Sowerby of Chicago. He uses the orchestra thick-voiced, in groups and choirs rather than as individual instruments. He cultivates full tone and rich, cushioning harmonies. Again summoning its sense of style, the orchestra played this broad-based and layer-like music according to its quality, which is not the quality of music written in the characteristic idiom of today. . . . Finally Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel." For it the orchestra of the composer's young imagination—capable, and at ease, with each technical demand, superlatively flexible, charactering and narrating by every musical means, playing not only as so many virtuosi but as so many voices to this mock-heroic epic of Till.

Many in the audience had sat by while Dr. Koussevitzky, and the players with him, were upbuilding the orchestra, season after season, to its present range and perfection. Often in the process some believed it over and prematurely praised. Now that it has become such a paragon as it was yesterday, too many take its glories for granted. While it is secure in this golden prime, sooner rather than later, Europeans should hear it. Such performances of Emanuel Bach's Concerto, Debussy's two Nocturnes, Strauss's Rondo, would elate them.

Praises of the conductor may begin with his program. It contained no symphony, no magniloquent tone-poem, no lengthy suite or set of variations. The longest piece upon it hardly exceeded twenty or at most twenty-five minutes. Most ran shorter. The five items—an exceptional number—were agreeably diversified in form and style. Two, the Nocturnes and Till's Rondo, are acknowledged masterpieces. In the slow movement, Emanuel Bach's Concerto does not lag too far behind. Each piece, moreover, had a particular interest, even if Mr. Sowerby's tone-poem appreciably disappointed it. It would not be reasonable to say that every program through a long series of symphony concerts should be assembled to this pattern; but three or four in the course of a season are refreshing and enlivening.

They are proof also of our happy release from the old Teutonic bondage of overture, concerto, symphony; from the pedantic notion that a symphony, or perhaps a four-square tone-poem, must be the foundation-stone of a "serious" concert. Such programs are one of the means by which Dr. Koussevitzky keeps twenty-four pairs of concerts, in less than seven months to the same audiences, undeadened by routine. The other day, Mr. Gilman in New York hailed him as one of the three or four felicitous program-makers in an orchestral America curiously barren of such talents. The compliment was just.

Though Mr. Sowerby's orchestral poem fell below expectation, the production of it for the first time in the East was creditable to the conductor. He is keen for the new music of American composers, so long as it measures up to the standards that he imposes upon Europeans as well. Within this prescription he likes it the better, if it is written by one of the younger men. (Mr. Sowerby is still in the middle thirties). In the nature of things—often for a living not to be gained otherwise—many American composers live in the East, for the most part around New York. In the nature of things again, with the musical riches of the present world outspread before them, they breathe a more or less cosmopolitan air; need sometimes to withdraw into their American and individual selves that they may better release them.

On the other hand few American composers dwell and work in the Middle West. Relatively isolated, they often write a regional music, born of their environment. Mr. Sowerby is one. There is not a reason why their music, within the standard specified, should not be heard in the East. Rather there is every reason why it should be. Michigan and Illinois, the lake-country of the North, are a part of these United States no less than New York or New England. They should have and are gaining spokesmen in the arts. Again Mr. Sowerby is one. (The day's work detained him in Chicago. An audience that plainly liked his tone-poem wondered at his absence). Now Dr. Koussevitzky, as he grows in knowledge of this America of ours, is broad-minded enough to understand these regional conditions, to act accordingly.

There is also praise to write of the conductor through yesterday's concert. . . . These many years he has studied Debussy's two Nocturnes, mastering every detail, refining upon every subtlety. Who excels him in drawing the march in "Fêtes" out of whispers of the air; or in working the illusion of puffy cloud slow-moving across a stillness by sound expressed? Yet thirty years after, the Nocturnes from his hand keep the strange beauty that audiences at the turn of the century first knew. . . . Listen to the truculently humorous Stravinsky of "Pulcinella" setting double-bass and trombone to a duet; or rhythmic and little else in tarantella and toccata; or feathery light and fine-fingered through the scherzino; or leading forth old Pergolesi to descant like a singing-boy through the Stravinskian oboe. Igor chameleon-like, and Dr. Koussevitzky ready at every change of coat to match him.

It is far cry back to the limpid depths, the musical quintessence of Emanuel Bach's slow song. The temptation to overdo or underdo lurks before and behind. Dr. Koussevitzky holds the belance even. He is neither sentimental nor prosaic. He outspreads the pure glow of tonal beauty. . . . Forward again to Strauss's "Eulenspiegel," and Dr. Koussevitzky is preeminently the conductor in the vein, master of himself, his orchestra and the music before him. The Strauss who would make an old and often simple form the container of new and artful matter; the Strauss of a tonal folk-tale sauced with both ribaldry and irony, but sympathetic withal; the Strauss in young prime who achieves two tours de force—the weaving of a musical pattern as intricate as it is lucid, self-contained and self-sufficient, yet keeping pace with the fable of Till, universalizing him and it upon the general imagination. Dr. Koussevitzky's conducting may pass for the third. From him and from his orchestra come Strauss's web and Till himself in musical life and fabulous being.

And the composers? Once more there is reason to wonder over these Emanuel Bachs of the eighteenth century. In their finales they make light play with a convention. In their first movements they are proving their "science," variously graced, with counterpoint. Yet in the slow movements between they open the heavens upon our ears. There is no explanation—except the mystery of man at his work. . . . For Debussy of the Nocturnes, there is only to reaffirm a beauty and a poetry, peculiar to him and no other, persisting down the years. Similarly, Strauss's "Eulenspiegel" remains a masterpiece of the cerebral qualities making music, shot here and there with a young man's tenderness for an old rascal. . .

Stravinsky of "Pulcinella" via Pergolesi? Cher Igor! You may take that gay, flowing, light-minded, light-fingered old Italian of the Neapolitan operas; point and burnish him until he becomes a seven-nights' diversion for Diaghilev's sophisticates in post-war Paris and London. You may also work into him as much as may be of your own rather boisterous humor, your fine frenzies of rhythm, your knowing devices and well-found gewgaws. But your native Petersburg and Pergolesi's native Naples are a long way apart; the Latin remains the Latin, and you are a Russian, more or less cosmopolite. The twain hardly blend and, cher ami, there is, or there used to be, such a thing as taste. (Between ourselves out upon it!)

In Northern Germany there is a flat, lakish, rustic, farming province, once the Grand Duchy of Mecklenburg. There, over expanses of soil and sky, you may see "red sunsets," "night stars," "waves of dawn," "threshing crews" working at the grain—the images that Mr. Sowerby would evoke tonally in "Prairie"; that Mr. Sandburg's free verse suggested. German poets, in their turn, have sung the Mecklenburgian scene. Now, if Mr. Sowerby had written "Mecklenburg," instead of "Prairie," over his orchestral poem, and for motto quoted a German stanza, one hearer would have discovered no incongruity in either title or quotation.

For with good will and sharpened expectation, he heard nothing saliently American, nothing regional of the Middle West, from Mr. Sowerby's music. Nor could he detect anything individual, as of the composer himself, except an exuberance of spirit that laid on and spared not alike with the earthy din of the threshers and the solitary ecstasies of sunset, night and dawn. Instead, he heard a music that lacked clear outline; that was over-thick with orchestral sound, sometimes over-driven with rhythmic energy; that conjured up scarcely an indicated image: that bore witness to little but the composer's ardent temperament; that in procedure and texture seemed more of 1910 than of 1930. Willy-nilly, he heard "Prairie" so, and was sorry for his dull-eared self, as another hearing may prove; for a Sowerby, after all these years, still inarticulate under stress of his own creative emotion.

H. T. P.

* * *

Ernst Toch as guest and Dr. Koussevitzky as host have agreed upon Friday, March 25, and Saturday, March 26, for his visit to the Symphony Concerts. On both days he will play the solo-part in his Concerto for Piano and Orchestra originally heard at Symphony Hall three seasons ago from Mr. Sanromá. Since Mr. Toch comes as notable modernist composer, the program may include other pieces from his hand.

* * *

"As I Will, So I Bid"

Boston Symphony   Serge Koussevitzky   (Turner—Boston)

y Paul V. Winters, Now on Exhibition at the Public Library

Monitor Mar 12

The Boston Symphony Orchestra season's eighteenth program (March 11-12) contained by way of unfamiliar pieces Mr. Leo Sowerby's orchestral poem, "Prairie," played for the first time in Boston, and the Suite from the Stravinskyan ballet, "Pulcinella," unheard in Boston for nine years.

Mr. Sowerby's piece, based on a poem of the same name by Mr. Carl Sandburg, bears a quotation which speaks of sunset over cornfields, the "shore of night stars," the "wave lines of dawn up a wheat valley," the cries of threshing crews and the songs of harvest hands. It has been Mr. Sowerby's aim to paint the moods thus severally indicated. In realizing his aim, he has eschewed too great a reliance on the methods of the "moderns." Ears that were affronted by Mr. Copland's "Symphonic Ode" probably will be soothed by this tone poem, for neither in dissonance nor in piercing sonorities nor in complexity of rhythms does it compete with that musical lamentation. Its material consists of themes which, if they are not distinguished are recognizable. Perhaps it was not without reason that Dr. Koussevitzky placed this score between the "Nuages" and "Fêtes" of Debussy and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel."

These three works constituted the second half of a program on which the "Pulcinella" Suite occupied the place of honor. This position was perhaps an exaggerated tribute. It cannot be said that this music represents the greater Stravinsky. Indeed it is one of the first of those works in which its composer, instead of continuing to rely on the inspiration which had enabled him to write the "Sacre" and the "Noces," chose to ally himself with various ancients. This ballet music, written "after Pergolesi," falls between two stools. As an entire work, it is neither Pergolesi nor Stravinsky. But the parts of it which are most pleasing —those contained in the Finale— are those in which Stravinsky prevails.

The program opened with an entrancing performance of the C. P. E. Bach-Steinberg Concerto in D major for orchestra. If Stravinsky had heard it he might have gathered that if you must tinker with the ancients, this is the way to do it.

For one thing all the composers represented on the program would have been grateful if they could have heard it performed, and that is for the beauty of tone, the virtuosity and the musicianship with which their works were set forth.

L. A. S.

SATURDAY, MARCH 12, 1932

TO BE MADE A

Leo Sowerby's "Prairie" Fails to Stir Symphony Audience

By MOSES SMITH

Leo Sowerby, Chicago composer, makes his bow to local Symphony-concert-goers in this week's program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which, under Serge Koussevitzky, presents "Prairie," a poem for orchestra, after the poem of the same name by Carl Sandburg.

Those who come to hear cacophony are disappointed, as evidenced by the performance at yesterday's matinee, nor does one hear the amusing vulgarity of such fetching pieces as "The Irish Washerwoman," which have been played at piano recitals here. The fact that the work was first performed by a high school orchestra should have been sufficient warning that, heavy as was the orchestration, the harmonic content would not be "impossible."

Nor was it, in actual performance, though Sowerby is hardly lady-like in his methods. The musical mood is presumably evocative of the subject expressed by the title. Easterners can hardly judge decisively whether the composer has been successful in this respect. Even if he has, the music seemed to us monotonous, dull; climaxes seemed unprepared. The music did not grow, it did not flow; it simply sounded. For once, at least, we found ourselves in thorough accord with a conservative audience, which, being unable to make anything of this tonal discourse, scarcely bestirred itself to applaud. We assume, though we cannot guarantee, that the orchestral performance was competent.

Stravinsky's "Pulcinella" suite, revived after a single hearing 10 years ago, fared better. One's enjoyment would have been keener if the program notes, instead of dilating on various performances, had given the listener some clue as to the connection between the movements of the suite and the scenario of the ballet.

C. P. E. Bach's D major concerto (arranged by Steinberg), Debussy's Nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes," and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" were the other numbers on the program. The performance of the Strauss work was brilliant—excessively brilliant and labored. This Till had apparently exhausted his merry pranks, and his youthful zest had become heavy-girthed pompousness.

Symphony --- Films -

A Symphony Concert for Superlatives

Conductor and Orchestra at High Pitch Through Notable Program

Mar 12

THROUGH the whole Symphony Concert, yesterday afternoon, the orchestra played at the top of its powers. In the slow movement of Emanuel Bach's Concerto, the limpid depth and flow of the string-tone was nothing less than a new beauty infused into a music already beautiful. In the quick movements there was equal reason to marvel at lightness, plasticity and glint; while the players on the wind instruments were little masters of arabesque. . . . In the Suite drawn by Stravinsky from his adaptation to Diaghilev's stage of Pergolesi's ballet, "Pulcinella," the conductor again used a small orchestra out of which even the first double-bass and the trombone shone as virtuosi. Each in its kind, the solo-oboe in another movement hardly excelled them. Stravinsky is unsparing in technical exaction. Frequently he demands fleet pace and light tone to the utmost. At every turn of a music that, outside a few songful pages, is incessantly turning, the orchestra answered to composer and conductor. Notable also was its sense of style. It differentiated Pergolesi's pungent Italian melodies from Emanuel Bach's deeper-voiced German song. Elsewhere in his Concerto it had spun counterpoint, tossed about figures. Now it caught the flash of Pergolesi's Neapolitan brilliance or the bolder surfacing of Stravinsky's humors.

Out of repertory, which Dr. Koussevitzky never permits to stale, Debussy's "Clouds" and "Fêtes" began the second part of the concert. Composer and conductor could hardly have played upon an orchestra more sensitive to rhythm and color, more alert to every subtlety and significance of detail. Another beauty far removed from that of Emanuel Bach's slow movement was at its command. . . . Then followed the novel piece of the day, "Prairie," tone-poem by Mr. Leo Sowerby of Chicago. He uses the orchestra thick-voiced, in groups and choirs rather than as individual instruments. He cultivates full tone and rich, cushioning harmonies. Again summoning its sense of style, the orchestra played this broad-based and layer-like music according to its quality, which is not the quality of music written in the characteristic idiom of today. . . . Finally Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel." For it the orchestra of the composer's young imagination—capable, and at ease, with each technical demand, superlatively flexible, charactering and narrating by every musical means, playing not only as so many virtuosi but as so many voices to this mock-heroic epic of Till.

Many in the audience had sat by while Dr. Koussevitzky, and the players with him, were upbuilding the orchestra, season after season, to its present range and perfection. Often in the process some believed it over and prematurely praised. Now that it has become such a paragon as it was yesterday, too many take its glories for granted. While it is secure in this golden prime, sooner rather than later, Europeans should hear it. Such performances of Emanuel Bach's Concerto, Debussy's two Nocturnes, Strauss's Rondo, would elate them.

Praises of the conductor may begin with his program. It contained no symphony, no magniloquent tone-poem, no lengthy suite or set of variations. The longest piece upon it hardly exceeded twenty or at most twenty-five minutes. Most ran shorter. The five items—an exceptional number—were agreeably diversified in form and style. Two, the Nocturnes and Till's Rondo, are acknowledged masterpieces. In the slow movement, Emanuel Bach's Concerto does not lag too far behind. Each piece, moreover, had a particular interest, even if Mr. Sowerby's tone-poem appreciably disappointed it. It would not be reasonable to say that every program through a long series of symphony concerts should be assembled to this pattern; but three or four in the course of a season are refreshing and enlivening.

They are proof also of our happy release from the old Teutonic bondage of overture, concerto, symphony; from the pedantic notion that a symphony, or perhaps a four-square tone-poem, must be the foundation-stone of a "serious" concert. Such programs are one of the means by which Dr. Koussevitzky keeps twenty-four pairs of concerts, in less than seven months to the same audiences, undeadened by routine. The other day, Mr. Gilman in New York hailed him as one of the three or four felicitous program-makers in an orchestral America curiously barren of such talents. The compliment was just.

Though Mr. Sowerby's orchestral poem fell below expectation, the production of it for the first time in the East was creditable to the conductor. He is keen for the new music of American composers, so long as it measures up to the standards that he imposes upon Europeans as well. Within this prescription he likes it the better, if it is written by one of the younger men. (Mr. Sowerby is still in the middle thirties). In the nature of things—often for a living not to be gained otherwise—many American composers live in the East, for the most part around New York. In the nature of things again, with the musical riches of the present world outspread before them, they breathe a more or less cosmopolitan air; need sometimes to withdraw into their American and individual selves that they may better release them.

On the other hand few American composers dwell and work in the Middle West. Relatively isolated, they often write a regional music, born of their environment. Mr. Sowerby is one. There is not a reason why their music, within the standard specified, should not be heard in the East. Rather there is every reason why it should be. Michigan and Illinois, the lake-country of the North, are a part of these United States no less than New York or New England. They should have and are gaining spokesmen in the arts. Again Mr. Sowerby is one. (The day's work detained him in Chicago. An audience that plainly liked his tone-poem wondered at his absence). Now Dr. Koussevitzky, as he grows in knowledge of this America of ours, is broad-minded enough to understand these regional conditions, to act accordingly.

There is also praise to write of the conductor through yesterday's concert. . . . These many years he has studied Debussy's two Nocturnes, mastering every detail, refining upon every subtlety. Who excels him in drawing the march in "Fêtes" out of whispers of the air; or in working the illusion of puffy cloud slow-moving across a stillness by sound expressed? Yet thirty years after, the Nocturnes from his hand keep the strange beauty that audiences at the turn of the century first knew. . . . Listen to the truculently humorous Stravinsky of "Pulcinella" setting double-bass and trombone to a duet; or rhythmic and little else in tarantella and toccata; or feathery light and fine-fingered through the scherzino; or leading forth [illegible] Pergolesi to descant like a singing-[illegible] through the Stravinskian oboe. Igor chameleon-like, and Dr. Koussevitzky ready at every change of coat to match him.

It is far cry back to the limpid depths, the musical quintessence of Emanuel Bach's slow song. The temptation to overdo or underdo lurks before and behind. Dr. Koussevitzky holds the belance even. He is neither sentimental nor prosaic. He outspreads the pure glow of tonal beauty. . . . Forward again to Strauss's "Eulenspiegel," and Dr. Koussevitzky is pre-eminently the conductor in the vein, master of himself, his orchestra and the music before him. The Strauss who would make an old and often simple form the container of new and artful matter; the Strauss of a tonal folk-tale sauced with both ribaldry and irony, but sympathetic withal; the Strauss in young prime who achieves two tours de force—the weaving of a musical pattern as intricate as it is lucid, self-contained and self-sufficient, yet keeping pace with the fable of Till, universalizing him and it upon the general imagination. Dr. Koussevitzky's conducting may pass for the third. From him and from his orchestra come Strauss's web and Till himself in musical life and fabulous being.

And the composers? Once more there is reason to wonder over these Emanuel Bachs of the eighteenth century. In their finales they make light play with a convention. In their first movements they are proving their "science," variously graced, with counterpoint. Yet in the slow movements between they open the heavens upon our ears. There is no explanation—except the mystery of man at his work. . . . For Debussy of the Nocturnes, there is only to reaffirm a beauty and a poetry, peculiar to him and no other, persisting down the years. Similarly, Strauss's "Eulenspiegel" remains a masterpiece of the cerebral qualities making music, shot here and there with a young man's tenderness for an old rascal. . .

Stravinsky of "Pulcinella" via Pergolesi? Cher Igor! You may take that gay, flowing, light-minded, light-fingered old Italian of the Neapolitan operas; point and burnish him until he becomes a seven-nights' diversion for Diaghilev's sophisticates in post-war Paris and London. You may also work into him as much as may be of your own rather boisterous humor, your fine frenzies of rhythm, your knowing devices and well-found gewgaws. But your native Petersburg and Pergolesi's native Naples are a long way apart; the Latin remains the Latin, and you are a Russian, more or less cosmopolite. The twain hardly blend and, cher ami, there is, or there used to be, such a thing as taste. (Between ourselves out upon it!)

In Northern Germany there is a flat, lakish, rustic, farming province, once the Grand Duchy of Mecklenburg. There, over expanses of soil and sky, you may see "red sunsets," "night stars," "waves of dawn," "threshing crews" working at the grain—the images that Mr. Sowerby would evoke tonally in "Prairie"; that Mr. Sandburg's free verse suggested. German poets, in their turn, have sung the Mecklenburgian scene. Now, if Mr. Sowerby had written "Mecklenburg," instead of "Prairie," over his orchestral poem, and for motto quoted a German stanza, one hearer would have discovered no incongruity in either title or quotation.

For with good will and sharpened expectation, he heard nothing saliently American, nothing regional of the Middle West, from Mr. Sowerby's music. Nor could he detect anything individual, as of the composer himself, except an exuberance of spirit that laid on and spared not alike with the earthy din of the threshers and the solitary ecstasies of sunset, night and dawn. Instead, he heard a music that lacked clear outline; that was over-thick with orchestral sound, sometimes over-driven with rhythmic energy; that conjured up scarcely an indicated image; that bore witness to little but the composer's ardent temperament; that in procedure and texture seemed more of 1910 than of 1930. Willy-nilly, he heard "Prairie" so, and was sorry for his dull-eared self, as another hearing may prove; for a Sowerby, after all these years, still inarticulate under stress of his own creative emotion.

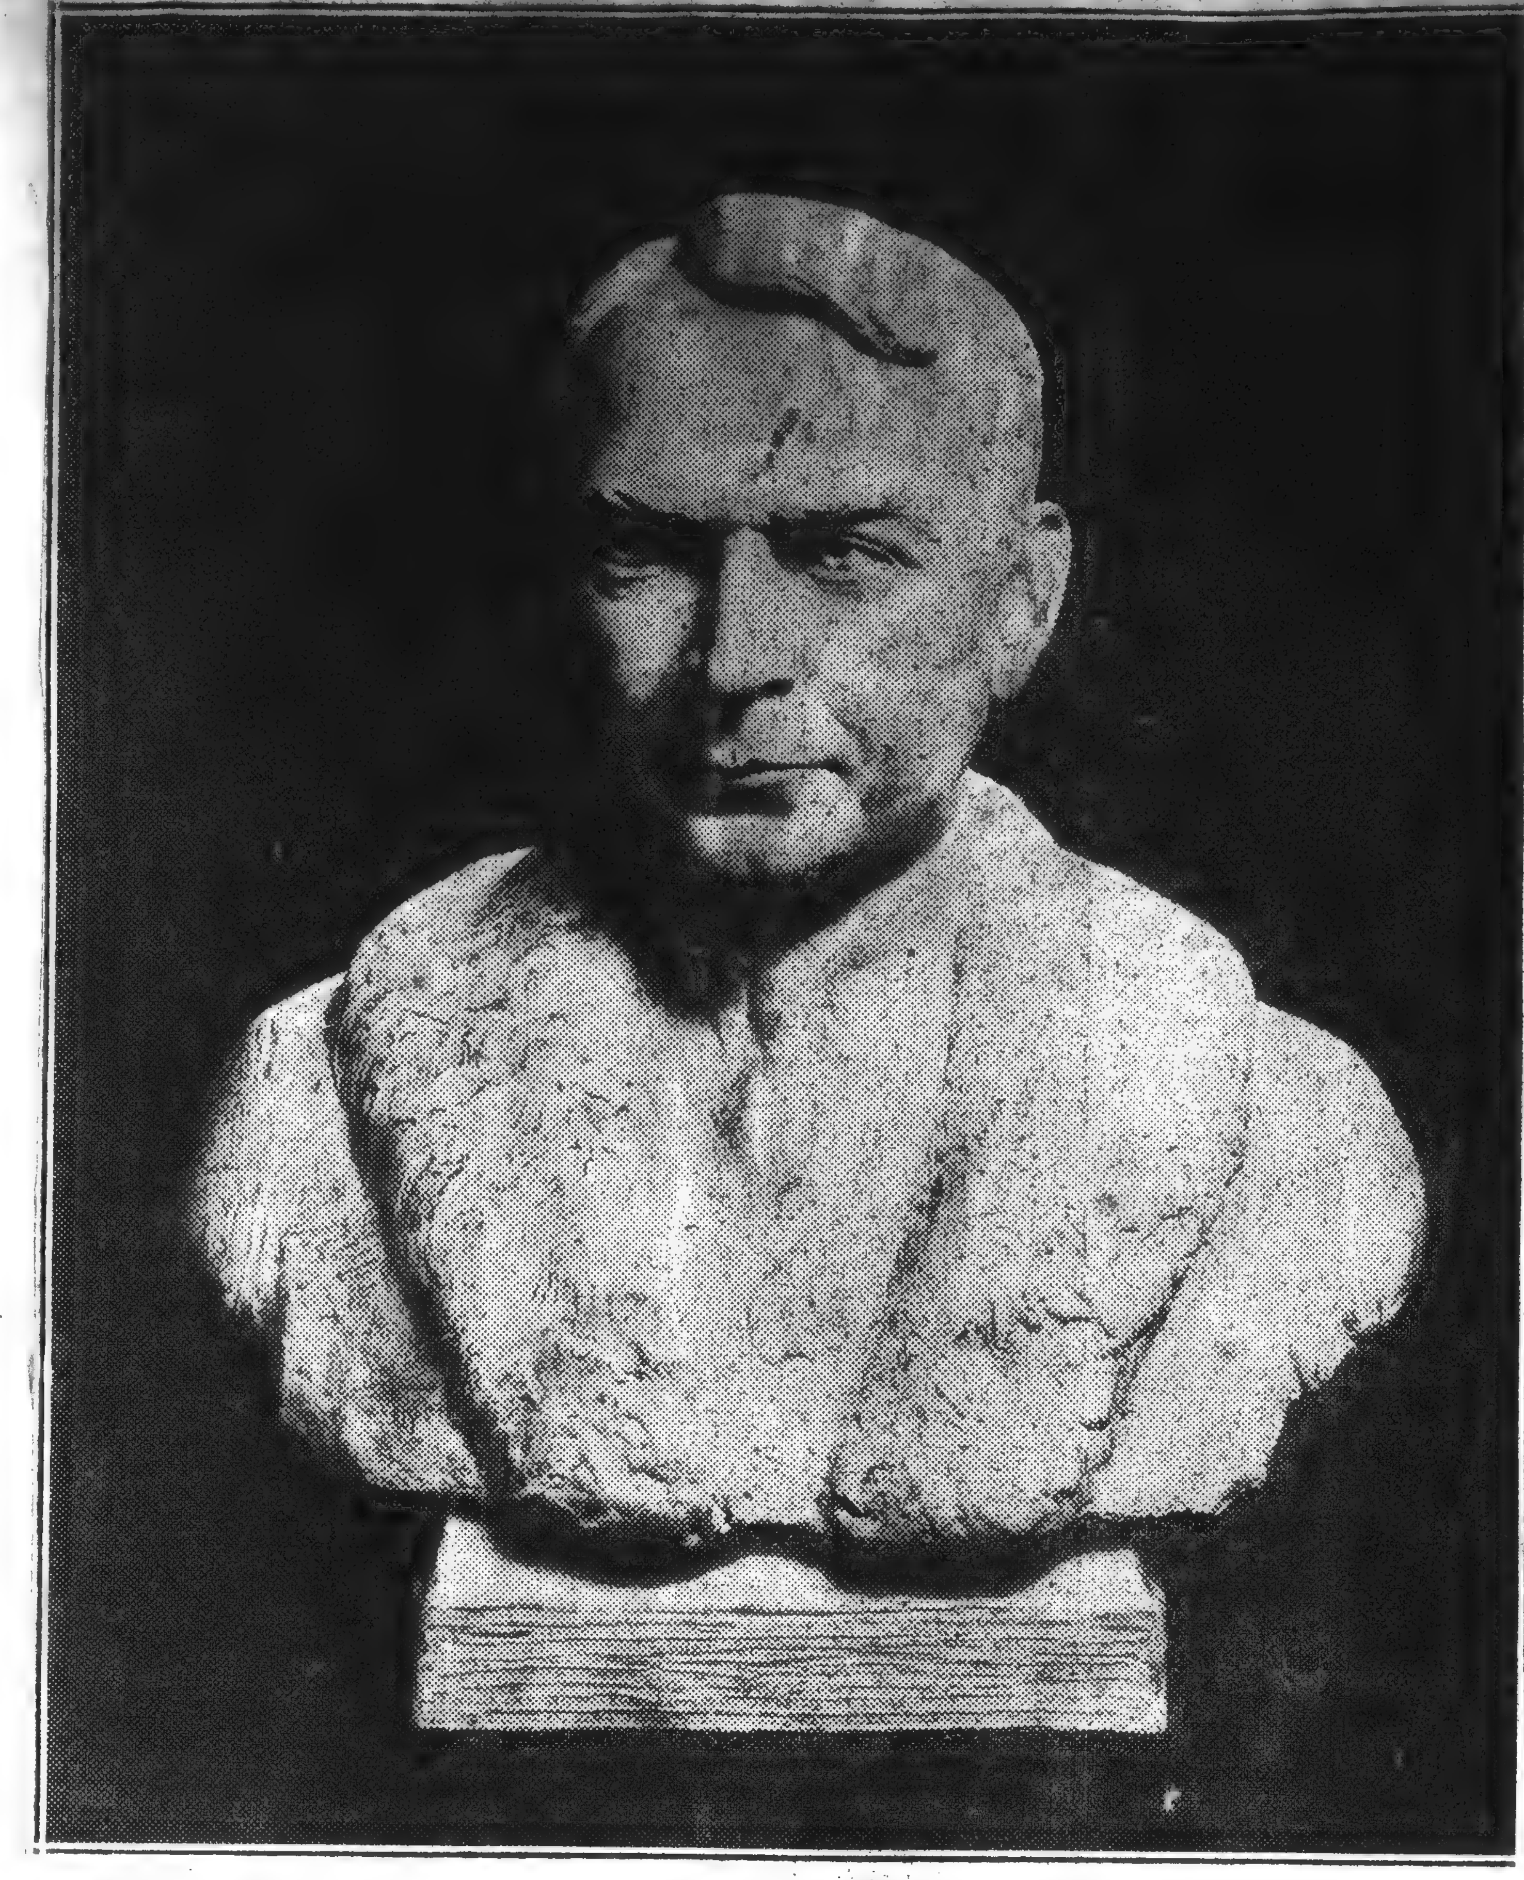
H. T. P.

* * *

Ernst Toch as guest and Dr. Koussevitzky as host have agreed upon Friday, March 25, and Saturday, March 26, for his visit to the Symphony Concerts. On both days he will play the solo-part in his Concerto for Piano and Orchestra originally heard at Symphony Hall three seasons ago from Mr. Sanromá. Since Mr. Toch comes as notable modernist composer, the program may include other pieces from his hand.

* * *

"As I Will, So I Bid"



Serge Koussevitzky (Horner—Boston)

From a Bust Lately Made by Paul V. Winters, Now on Exhibition at the Public Library

---

Suite fro
"Pulcinella," un
nine years.

Mr. Sowerby's piece, base a poem of the same name by Mr. Carl Sandburg, bears a quotation which speaks of sunset over cornfields, the "shore of night stars," the "wave lines of dawn up a wheat valley," the cries of threshing crews and the songs of harvest hands. It has been Mr. Sowerby's aim to paint the moods thus severally indicated. In realizing his aim, he has eschewed too great a reliance on the methods of the "moderns." Ears that were affronted by Mr. Copland's "Symphonic Ode" probably will be soothed by this tone poem, for neither in dissonance nor in piercing sonorities nor in complexity of rhythms does it compete with that musical lamentation. Its material consists of themes which, if they are not distinguished are recognizable. Perhaps it was not without reason that Dr. Koussevitzky placed this score between the "Nuages" and "Fêtes" of Debussy and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel."

These three works constituted the second half of a program on which the "Pulcinella" Suite occupied the place of honor. This position was perhaps an exaggerated tribute. It cannot be said that this music represents the greater Stravinsky. Indeed it is one of the first of those works in which its composer, instead of continuing to rely on the inspiration which had enabled him to write the "Sacre" and the "Noces," chose to ally himself with various ancients. This ballet music, written "after Pergolesi," falls between two stools. As an entire work, it is neither Pergolesi nor Stravinsky. But the parts of it which are most pleasing —those contained in the Finale— are those in which Stravinsky prevails.

The program opened with an entrancing performance of the C. P. E. Bach-Steinberg Concerto in D major for orchestra. If Stravinsky had heard it he might have gathered that if you must tinker with the ancients, this is the way to do it.

For one thing all the composers represented on the program would have been grateful if they could have heard it performed, and that is for the beauty of tone, the virtuosity and the musicianship with which their works were set forth.

L. A. S.

SATURDAY, MARCH 12, 1932 American

TO BE MADE A

Leo Sowerby's "Prairie" Fails to Stir Symphony Audience

By MOSES SMITH

Leo Sowerby, Chicago composer, makes his bow to local Symphony-concert-goers in this week's program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which, under Serge Koussevitzky, presents "Prairie," a poem for orchestra, after the poem of the same name by Carl Sandburg.

Those who come to hear cacophony are disappointed, as evidenced by the performance at yesterday's matinee, nor does one hear the amusing vulgarity of such fetching pieces as "The Irish Washerwoman," which have been played at piano recitals here. The fact that the work was first performed by a high school orchestra should have been sufficient warning that, heavy as was the orchestration, the harmonic content would not be "impossible."

Nor was it, in actual performance, though Sowerby is hardly lady-like in his methods. The musical mood is presumably evocative of the subject expressed by the title. Easterners can hardly judge decisively whether the composer has been successful in this respect. Even if he has, the music seemed to us monotonous, dull; climaxes seemed unprepared. The music did not grow, it did not flow; it simply sounded. For once, at least, we found ourselves in thorough accord with a conservative audience, which, being unable to make anything of this tonal discourse, scarcely bestirred itself to applaud. We assume, though we cannot guarantee, that the orchestral performance was competent.

Stravinsky's "Pulcinella" suite, revived after a single hearing 10 years ago, fared better. One's enjoyment would have been keener if the program notes, instead of dilating on various performances, had given the listener some clue as to the connection between the movements of the suite and the scenario of the ballet.

C. P. E. Bach's D major concerto (arranged by Steinberg), Debussy's Nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes," and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" were the other numbers on the program. The performance of the Strauss work was brilliant—excessively brilliant and labored. This Till had apparently exhausted his merry pranks, and his youthful zest had become heavy-girthed pompousness.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, TUESDAY, MARCH 15, 1932

ers --- Music and Musician

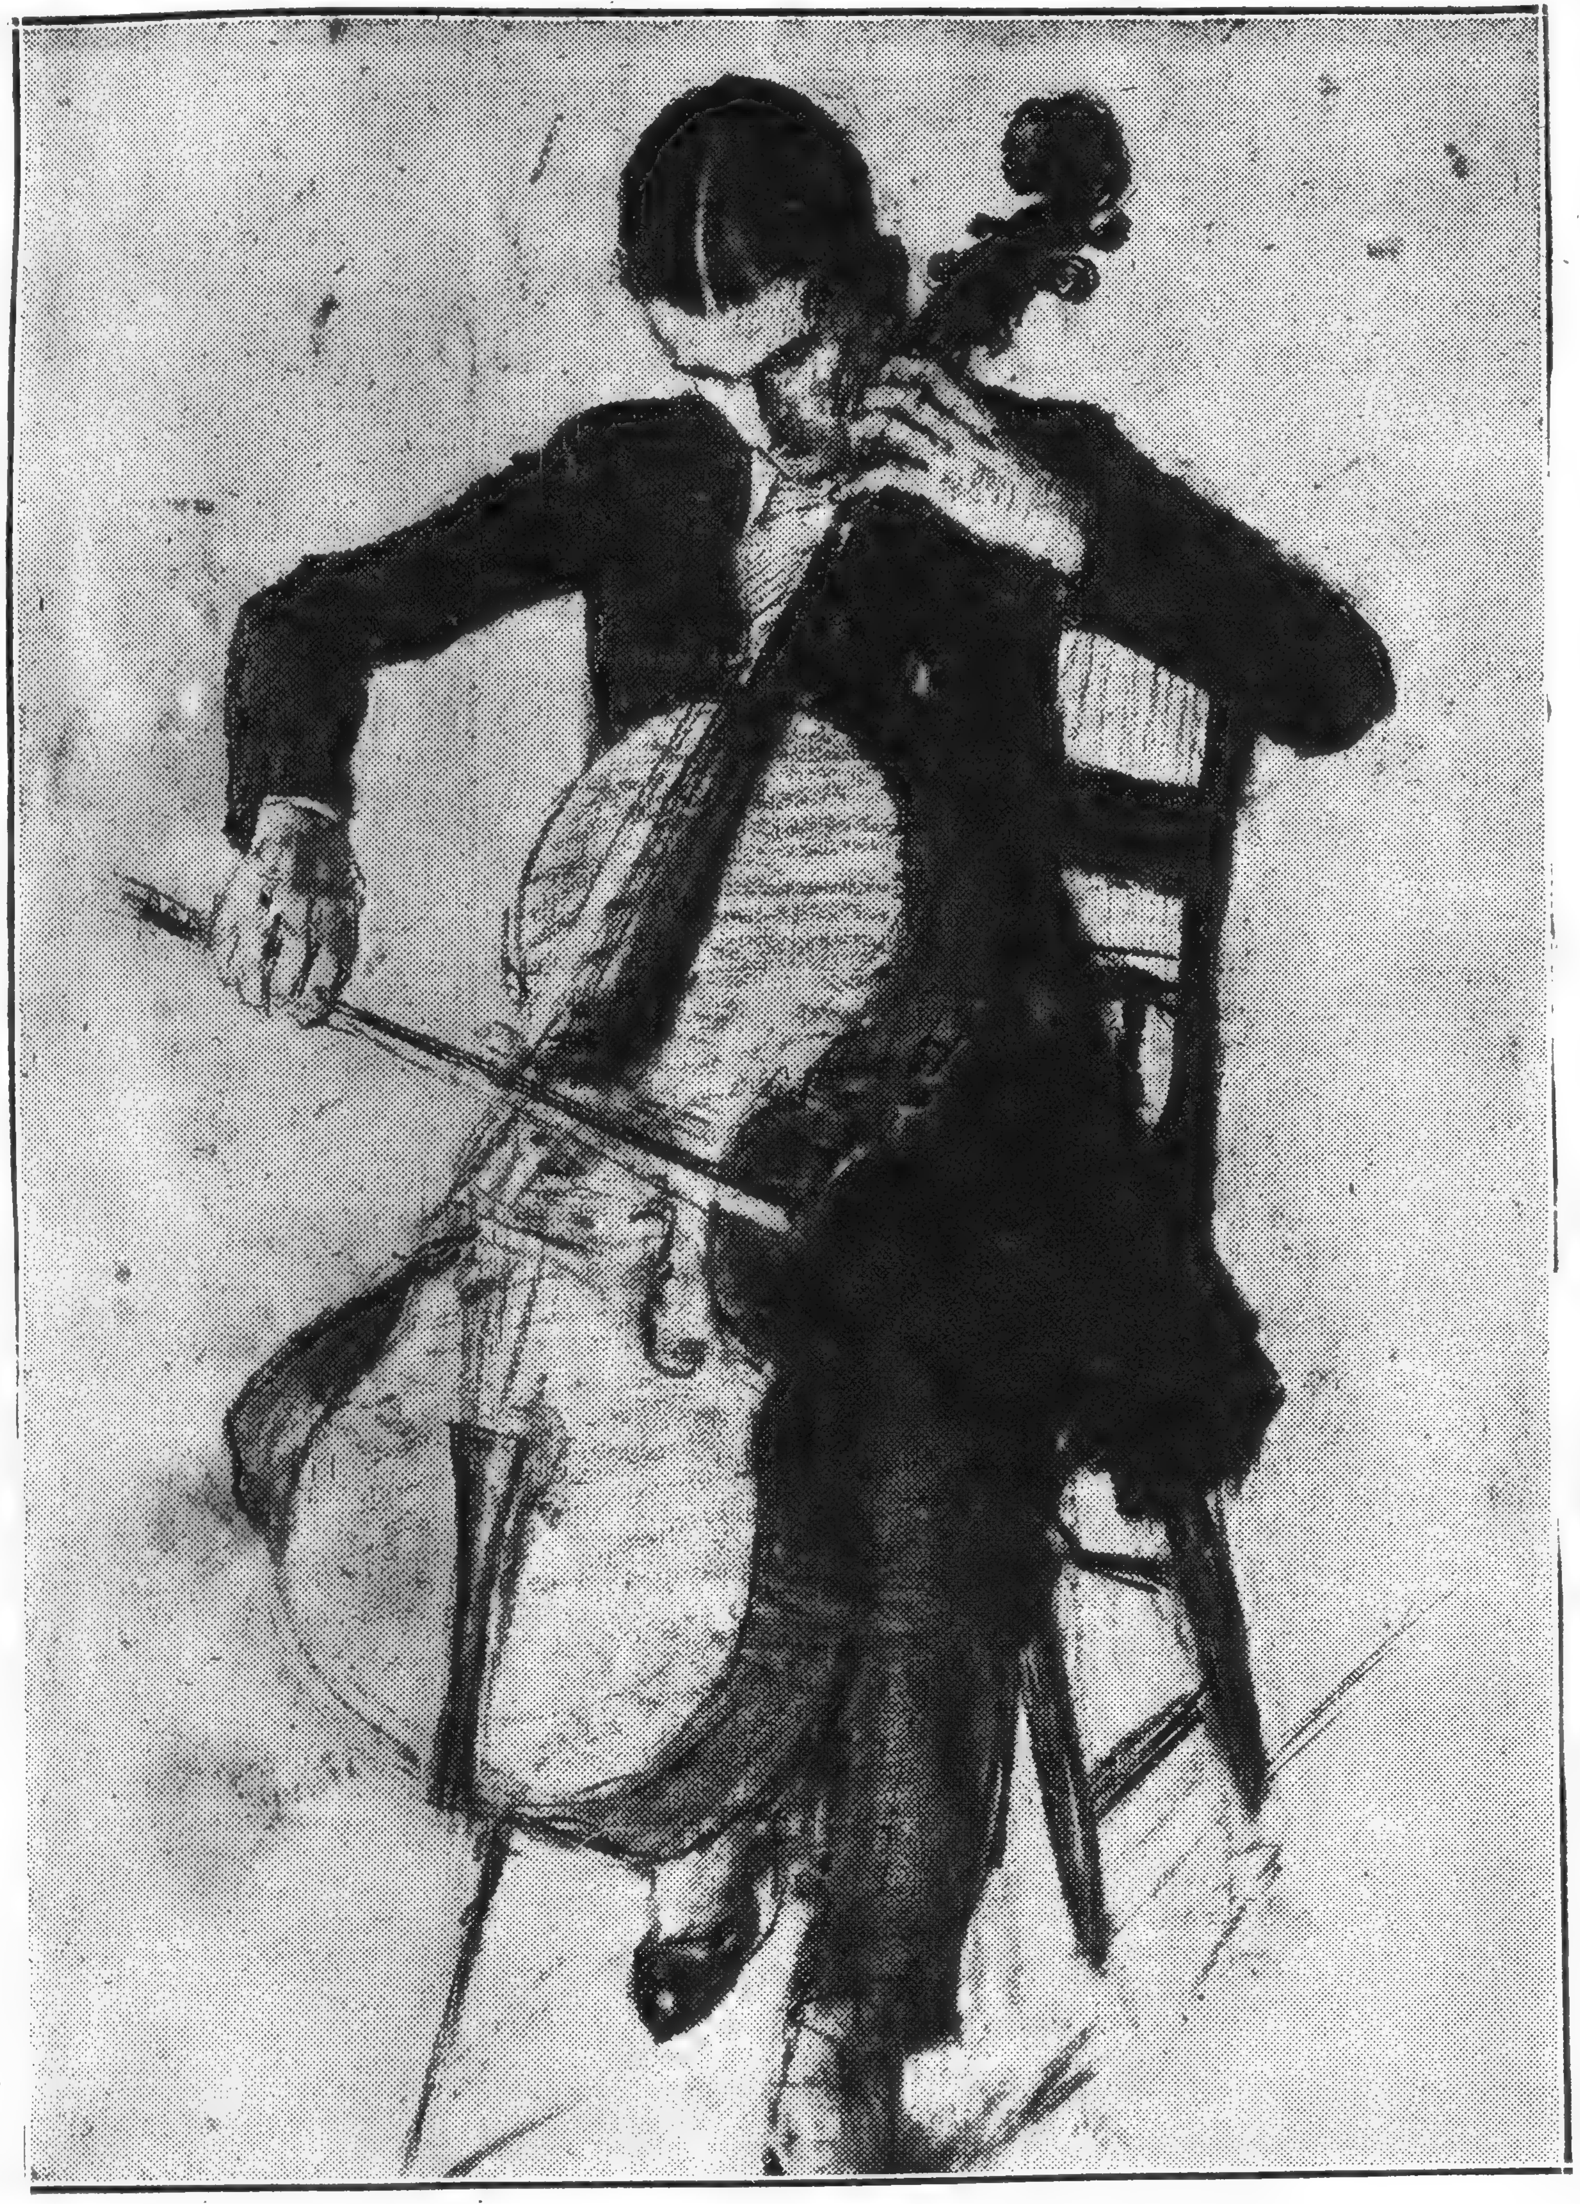
One Art to Another



Yves Chardon

Violoncellist of the Symphony Orchestra, Who, Variously Assisted, Announces a Concert of Novel Chamber-Music in Jordan Hall on Thursday Evening. Mrs. Calvin Gates Page Made the Drawing

Virtuosities for a Symphonic Monday

SOMETIMES an audience at the Symphony concerts for no explainable reason, receives a superlative performance as calmly as the routine accomplishments of the day's work. Such was the case last evening in the next to the last of the season's concerts of the Monday series. It was difficult to imagine how the musicians could play more brilliantly or be more sensitive to the inflections of their music; yet the response of the audience was strangely apathetic. Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra gave a flawless performance of Beethoven's Fourth Symphony which was a thing of living beauty; yet, save for an aroused and insistent few (who made their clapping felt despite the prevailing indifference) it was all every-day pleasure. For the pulsing rhythms of Debussy's "Fêtes" the applause was of a better volume. Sowerby's ill-fated "Prairie" won considerably less approval than any other piece of the day. Strauss's lusty "Till Eulenspiegel," finally, received a moment or two of hearty praise before the shuffle of departure.

Some, at least, sat before Dr. Koussevitzky's performance of Beethoven's exuberant Symphony in B-flat major with increasing delight. They nodded not once during the entire symphony; missed not a single bubbling note—infrequent experience with any large work of formal dimensions. Here was music translucent and sparkling, clear as water from an inexhaustible spring. Here was a slow movement that sang snatches of melody from individual instruments now alone and independent, now reflecting answering voices, now combined in counterpoint—all slender and cheerful with a grace that is rare in the composer's more solemn symphonies. Here was an engaging antiphonal banter of choir against choir, and a pervading sense of motion and light that is not commonly associated with the name of Beethoven. In this truly inspired performance, Dr. Koussevitzky disclosed the composer's amazingly fertile imagination and constructive genius as readily as in performances of the more familiar odd-numbered symphonies.

The orchestra likewise lavished distinctive refinements upon the two Nocturnes of Debussy, "Clouds" and "Fêtes." The individual instruments wove the wispy strands of "Clouds" with utmost delicacy. The double basses edged their floating body of sound with a low-toned, darksome fringe. The woodwinds breathed sweet aural tracery. For "Fêtes," Dr. Koussevitzky invoked pungent timbres; kept rhythm at nervous pulse. The color and flavor of this fantasy was a present delight, with neither flaw, roughness, nor a single lapse in illusion.

With Leo Sowerby's cramped prairie and over-towering threshing machine, Dr. Koussevitzky was as earnest as with any new work. Objection to the Chicagoan's music seems to hinge upon the difference between his avowed aim and his actual accomplishment. To one who has lived among the plains and their sunsets, the composer shows no spaciousness in his harmonies, no freedom in his jostling rhythmic figures. To one who also knows the strange mechanical giants of the harvest, Mr. Sowerby's threshing machine seems more plausible and possibly no less deserving of recognition than Honegger's locomotive and Converse's "Flivver." At least its puffing and grunting is quite characteristic, particularly in the rolling blasts from the kettle drums. And the imaginative mind may even find this music expressive of the soul or personality of the mechanical beasts which are the slaves of our times Judged in this light, it discloses a considerable degree of craftsmanship. Yet the general audience will perhaps rightly say Mr. Sowerby's piece has too much threshing machine and not enough prairie, and that, whatever the case, it is rather inarticulate.

For a brilliant close, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." Dr. Koussevitzky was alive to every humorous contrast and arresting change of pace. The musicians could not have responded more quickly nor more skillfully. It was, in all, a Monday concert alive and colorful; diversified in program, stirring and faultless in performance. N. M. J.

Modernists And Dr. Koussevitzky

With Copland's Ode for Text Clean-Cut Defence of Both Composer and Conductor

IN the New York Sun of last Saturday, Mr. W. J. Henderson, whose long years of reviewing in opera house and concert-hall have made him only the more open-minded and discriminating, wrote as follows about recent performances of modernist pieces by the Boston Orchestra, still debated at home and abroad: "There have been many observances of anniversaries, but music has enjoyed none of such prolonged delight as that of the fiftieth year of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The date of the semi-centennial fell in 1931; we are still listening to the compositions prepared for the festival. Three of them have fallen upon our ears within a week. These were Aaron Copland's 'Symphonic Ode,' Paul Hindemith's 'Concert-Music' for strings and brass, both played by the Boston musicians, and Ottorino Respighi's 'Metamorphosen,' performed by the Philadelphia Orchestra last Tuesday evening. The audiences responded to the revelations with uncertain demonstrations.

"All three of the compositions proved to be well worth hearing, but it can hardly be doubted that the palm must be awarded to Mr. Copland. The music of the gifted German was perhaps more disputable in its proclamation; while the Italian master's score gave the impression of hard work and a grand marshaling of methods with a modicum of spontaneity. However, it may sound better the next time we hear it. And there will be a next time, for so long as Italian conductors visit our orchestral platforms we shall surely enjoy repetitions of Italian novelties. . . .

"Some interesting conversations followed the productions of Copland's and Hindemith's work. One gentleman, who contemplates with regret, indeed, one might say even views with alarm, the propaganda for modernistic music, voiced his sorrow that such music was performed at all. He hoped that its day was nearly over, and he will without doubt rejoice greatly when he reads what Respighi has said about the death of atonality in Italy. The distinguished Italian did not tell us whether polytonality has also met its doom. But possibly it will have to go into the silence since it is distinctly hostile to the Italian sense of beauty.

"Another gentleman unhesitatingly condemned the Hindemith composition as commonplace and vulgar. That commentator was a determined modernist, and, although he went into no details, one suspected that his objection to the 'Concert-Music' was derived from its liberal employment of old tonalities and key-relationships and its introduction of such time-worn devices as a fugue. You see, it would take an almost superhuman ingenuity to write a fugue in atonal music; in canonic composition the rule of the key is tyrannical.

"This traveler along the musical highways found Hindemith's composition interesting and in moments even beautiful. Possibly the modernist who condemned it was offended by the composer's proclamation of a sustained lyric melody of the sort originated by the early fathers who dwelt in the country of the olive and the grape. Well, 'de gustibus non est disputandum.' Wars have been started by a difference in tastes. The modernist has theories and the basic one is that it is impossible to compose any more worthwhile music in the old manner and that therefore we must invent new methods.

"This recalls an experience of John Stuart Mill set forth in his autobiography. Enjoying rapturously Weber's 'Oberon,' he began to be tormented about the future of music. He reflected that there were only five tones and two semi-tones in an octave and that they could be put together only in a limited number of ways of which only a few were beautiful. Most of these must have been already discovered and hence there could be no future Mozarts or Webers. 'This source of anxiety,' he concluded, in comforting meditation, 'may perhaps be thought to resemble that of the philosophers of Laputa, who feared lest the sun should be burnt out.'

"The writer of these rambling reflections came out of the glare of new ideas with the suspicion that the New York composer had the best of the argument. Perhaps Mr. Copland's music lacked the technical expertness and professional routine of the other music, but it had much more of the adventurous spirit of the voyager into new territory and of the irresponsibility of unbridled enthusiasms. Or shall we descend to the speech of the byways and assert that Mr. Copland recklessly said what chanced to come into his mind and did not give a continental whether it was high art or not?

"The score had juice in it, sometimes bitter, sometimes sweet, but at any rate, liquid. One gets a bit impatient with the sawdust stuff that comes out of the mills of the present gods of music. The worthlessness of the bulk of this music is the result of the inability of most of the modernists to perceive that they are impoverishing their own art by refusing to mingle the old materials with the new. They labor under the delusion that they can create an entirely new art. This something that has not yet been done in any of the fields in which man has sought for expression of his ideals of beauty. Even the modern novel has its roots in the works of Publius Ovidius Naso, and architecture owes its vitality at this moment to the Egyptians and Babylonians.

"In the end, the writer confesses to a certain pleasure in discovering force in a composition written by a resident of this monstrosity of a town. Conductors live habitually with their eyes toward the East and see signs and wonders beyond the stormy waters of the North Atlantic. It is difficult for most of them to discern anything excellent in this land. To be sure, most of them come from abroad and have been brought up in the belief there is no art in the United States. Mr. Koussevitzky has been here long enough to learn at least that it is wise to be politic, and so he bestows his august attention from time to time on American music. Thus Mr Copland's ode obtained a performance by the Boston Orchestra and it was a good performance. That, at any rate, the work deserved. This music lover expects to hear the composition again, perhaps under the commanding direction of Leopod Stokowski." . . .

May this department add that Mr. Copland's "Ode" was not only played in Symphony and Carnegie Halls by the Boston Orchestra. Mr. Copland was also commissioned by it to write a piece for the semi-centennial rites.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, FRIDAY, MARCH 18, 1932

ys and Players --- Music and Musicians

The Little Figure in the Great Room

(Vossische Zeitung)

Liszt As He Worked in Weimar, Goethe's City, Upon His Faust Symphony, Played Today and Tomorrow at Symphony Hall in Honor of the Poet

On English Stages

Goethe's First Faust

FAUST." Part I came out in 1808; but the so-called "Urfaust" represents Goethe's conception of the play as he had formulated it about the year 1775. It was given to the world in 1887, and students of the two texts know well the differences between them. The "Urfaust" is in effect the tragedy of Gretchen pure and simple and planned without regard for much that Goethe incorporated into the play afterwards. There is, for instance, no prologue, no Easter scene, no Walpurgis Night. In the actual "Urfaust" indeed there is no compact with the devil, but that was supplied in the drama which the company of the Aachen Stadttheater now played in London. They also restored Valentine to his proper proportions. These are necessary supplements, but otherwise the draft of 1775 is probably as good a condensation of the First Part as could be devised for a single evening's performance; and for an English audience in particular it is most likely to represent all that they regard as best in the play. Indeed, in view of the comparative shortness of the "Urfaust," it is surprising to find how many of the most telling things in the later version are already there.

It is now acted in a series of some twenty scenes, the scenery for which had a certain constant element in the two Gothic arches which form the feature of Faust's study. By simple but effective changes this background was duly changed to serve the necessary place, whether cellar, bedroom, church, street, prison. The performance was well received, as it deserved to be; but to see "Faust" in this form makes it quite intelligible why Goethe was not satisfied with so undiluted a tragedy. For there is nothing to alleviate this plan tale of seduction and murder. "Sie ist gerichtet!" is Mephistopheles's last word of triumph, and there is no voice from above to interpose with "Sie ist gerettet." But beauty there is in plenty, from the point when Margarethe, in her blue room and blue dress, wonders "wer heut' der Herr gewesen ist," until at least her fall from innocence.

For Faust himself there can be perhaps no great sympathy. So far from having been the scholar of the monologue he appears as a rather ordinary healthy young man, who to his credit does his best to retrieve what he has done—as perhaps Goethe meant him to be even then, and not past the possibility of redemption, though there is no hint of it. But the chief honors must go to Mephistopheles, a statuesque figure, though capable of nimble motion, truly the disillusioned spirit of perpetual denial, cynical with the aspiring student, where he draws laughter; cool and monchalant when telling old Marthe of her husband's death, and possibly at his most devilish when singing the cynical "Was mach'st du hier bei Liebchen's 'Thür'?" just before the slaying of the blunt and honest Valentin. The Auerbach-cellar scene with its horseplay was managed in lively manner enough; but it is not certain that eighteenth-century drunkenness is as amusing as it was once. The costumes, it should be added, approximate to the year 1775.

The Aachen company were called before the curtain many times at the end, and the lover of good acting went away satisfied; but it is possible the more philosophical student of Goethe's stupendeous production may have had not a few questions to settle with himself on the way home. [The Times

Liszt for Goethe -

In Honor To Goethe Music From "Faust"

Wagner and Liszt Joined in Rarely Heard Overture And Symphony

Tran. Mar 19

THE Symphony Orchestra usually confines itself to composers' centenaries. Until it marked, yesterday afternoon, the hundredth anniversary of the death of Goethe—actually on Tuesday next—casual memory recalled only one such honor to a poet: Dr. Muck's pair of concerts in 1916 to note the three hundredth return of Shakspeare's death-day. Then the program was a miscellany suggested by the plays. Now two numbers filled it—Wagner's "Faust Overture," Liszt's "Faust Symphony." Through this Goethe year, as the Germans name it, they have been often mated in concerts in his own country—by Dr. Muck again, at Hamburg only three weeks ago. The close friendship of the composers, as well as the common source of their subject-matter, binds together overture and symphony. Both, besides, are the expression of kindred musical temperaments. Who does not know the tale of the motiv from the "Faust Symphony' that reappears bodily in "Die Walküre?"

The orchestra paid homage to Shakspeare as world-figure who was also of this English-speaking race; whose plays, in degree, go to and fro upon our stages. Goethe is also enduring world-figure; but almost never do we Americans see any of his plays acted; while to read him, most of us must take down a translation. Musically again, we associate him, if we frequent symphony concerts, with Beethoven's hackneyed "Egmont" Overture. Or, if we prefer choral concerts, with Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust." In the theater there is always Gounod's opera, though it partakes less of Goethe than of Parisian librettists, less of his surcharged poetry than of vendible cosmopolitan romanticism. Wagner's Overture is no repertory piece with the conductors; while for a revival of Liszt's large-scaled and full-freighted Symphony, there must usually be an occasion. Neglected above all, even in this centenary year, is Schumann's setting of scenes from "Faust" for solo-voices, chorus and orchestra—music, especially in Part III, that might well win Dr. Koussevitzky's ear and so his audiences. By many a proof with the Symphonies, he is masterful as well as devoted Schumannist.

It is custom to smile gently at the condoctor's predilection for commemorated centenaries. Professional habit may have prompted him, last season, to recollect the hundredth year of Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony." But who would have expected him to remember, a few weeks ago, the century of Lewis Carroll—that darling of Anglo-American humor—and discover on the library-shelves Mr. Taylor's "Looking-Glass" Suite? Goethe, of course, is another story. The whole world of letters and the arts, of scholarship and philosophy, is now doing him honor. We who, under pressure of the daily round, cannot often take "the road to Weimar"—as Professor Perry will phrase it at the University rites next Tuesday—have at least in the back of our heads a notion of his manifold greatness. (There are summers still for reading and once upon a time there was a book-drenched youth.)

Besides, the marking of the centenary is an international event; whereas we of Boston and Cambridge, like every other community in the known world, are tied closely to our town-pumps. That maxim of newspaper offices, "Local news first," seems sometimes to be also rule of Bostonian and Cantabridgian life. Recently there was a bi-centenary of Goya, the Spanish painter, and the cultivated world heeded—all but America. Or a century of the French "romantics"—Hugo, Delacroix, and their upstanding breed—but what echoes of it sounded to the banks of the Charles? Steele and Dryden, who wrote in our very tongue, who still have places—a little dusty, top and bottom—in our libraries, were centenarians not long ago; while scarcely an American twittered in their praise. By all the Congressional gods a self-contained nation we. . . .

Therefore the more the wisdom of Dr. Koussevitzky when he reminds Bostonians of the Goethe centenary; when by the music that he and the orchestra play and the manner of the playing, he impresses it upon our imaginations. Yesterday afternoon the audience at Symphony Hall was part of the great world engaged, these days, in a common homage to greatness. It will be such again this evening. The condition is stimulating. After all, the Symphony Concerts are one of the few seats of the arts remaining in this changing city; while the conductor in his best estate should be not only a practising musician, but a man, as well, of wide and influential culture. Dr. Muck was such; now again is Dr. Koussevitzky.

As it happened also, the conductor's reward was immediate. Six years ago, he included Liszt's "Faust Symphony" in a pair of concerts. To the best of recollection, it fell below the expectation that Dr. Koussevitzky's abilities, sympathies and capacity for work had already raised. True, the orchestra was not then what it now is, but all the shortcomings were not to be laid at its door. Inevitably Dr. Koussevitzky has ripened in his eight seasons in Boston. He has enjoyed freedom at one of the last and firmest outposts in America of that vanishing condition. Opportunity after opportunity has opened before him. He has seized it eagerly, improved it largely. He has worked in stimulating contacts with the orchestra he has upbuilt, with composers who have gladly laid their manuscripts on his table. His admiring audiences and, in particular, the connoisseurs that sprinkle them have reacted upon him. He has vitalized classics; recalled unjustly forgotten music; kept open ears and hands for new. To the fervor of incessant work he has joined its discipline. His reputation, his prestige, his authority, have gained accordingly. He who came to Boston as able and rising conductor, now practises there as conductor in the first rank.

None other could have accomplished such a performance of the "Faust Symphony" as came to pass in this centenary concert. With the end of the first movement demur ceased. There it had been no more than momentary impression of a conductor minded to wring something from every phrase and every period, even though they were no more than necessary structural progress. For the instant, as it seemed, this needless zeal brought over-emphasis and lingering pace. Ears less finicking might hardly have noticed. For them, and rightly, the Fausts of this tone-poem rose upon each other as The Hero expands into life in "Ein Heldenleben" or Don Juan flames across Strauss's measures. The Faust of meditations, perplexities, searchings and despairs; the Faust who with action would clarify and soothe his confused spirit; the Faust prompted by sensuous impulse, vision and delight; the Faust who may wear romantic splendor; the Faust upon whom his fate recoils darkly—all were there in tonal image, life, diversity, contrast. Strauss himself has done no larger, finer, more variegated feat of psychological delineation through music; nor better intertwined the musical and the delineative course. Of all this, Dr. Koussevitzky missed nothing and enhanced much. To his audience came both outer lineaments and inner contents. Above all it felt the romantic glows, the romantic shadows with which Liszt has invested these figures of tonal imagination. Seldom has the conductor been more penetrating and divining, more master of his fervid self.

Out of the "Gretchen" music the conductor distilled the sensuous beauty, the glamourous poetry, the haunting wistfulness with which Liszt (after Goethe) has infused it; while the orchestra played to the utmost of finely molded phrase, sensitized accent, blended euphonies and luminous tone. Clear came the image of Gretchen in her simplicity, sweetness and maiden passion, in her dream that for the while is fulfillment, in the residue that is piteous memory. From the texture of Liszt's music exhaled the romantic atmosphere veiling this image. Through it at the composer's will strode the amorous-heroical Faust. Illusion could hardly have pierced deeper into hearers, been wrought fuller upon them.

So to the mockeries, and ironies, denudings and travesties, darts and bites of the music of Mephistopheles—sneering accents and grimacing flourishes. Dr. Muck, it used to be custom to say, achieved it by sympathetic temperament. Yet Dr. Koussevitzky, who by nature is of quite another spirit, fell not a whit behind. It was Liszt, after all, who for both wrought this tour de force of malevolent imagination hardly to be found elsewhere in music. If he caught a suggestion from Berlioz, how he bettered the instruction!

Last to the stilled, suspensive moment, the wondrous transition of the sustained chords, the descent from the opening heavens of the mystical chorus. The clear young voices of the choir from the Harvard Glee Club were the very medium for such music. While Mr. Rulon Robison's soaring tenor tones were its complement. If Dr. Davison can instil Bach's intricate counterpoints into this youth, he can also persuade it to sing without artifice and in rarefied tone these rapturous measures. So came the "Faust Symphony" full circle; for in this close is the final illumination of a music that otherwise would have stopped at psychological, sensuous or demonic delineation. With the mystical chorus Liszt fulfills Goethe, and the purpose of the day was through music to honor the poet. . . . As for Wagner's overture, call it so much preluding in the fashion of the romantical German thirties; beside Liszt's Symphony no more than a darkening of counsel.

H. T. P.

HERALD MAR. 19

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The 19th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conductor, was in memory of Goethe, who died on March 22, 1832. The program comprised Wagner's "Faust" overture and Liszt's "Faust" symphony. The orchestra was assisted in the performance of the symphony by the Harvard Glee Club, which had been rehearsed by Dr. Davison; the tenor solo was sung by Rulon Y. Robison.

Goethe told Eckermann, his Boswell, that it was wholly impossible to find music that would suit his "Faust." When he said that Mozart might have composed it, he probably had in mind the duet of the Don and Zerlina, the scene in the graveyard, and the entrance of the Statue in the supper room; he added that Meyerbeer might be the man but he was too much bound up with the Italian theatres (Meyerbeer's "Robert le Diable" had not yet been produced). Berlioz was in the world. Two years later he sent his "Eight Scenes in Faust" to Goethe, who never acknowledged the gift nor the accompanying letter, for he had consulted Zelter, his musical guide, philosopher and friend, and Zelter had spoken contemptuously of the music. Nor did Goethe mention Rossini in connection with "Faust" though Rossini after his "William Tell" thought of writing an opera based on Goethe's poem, and so did Beethoven.

It was a happy idea to put Wagner's overture and Liszt's symphony together on the program. Some day we hope to hear Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust" conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky. That magnificent composition is dated 1845-6; Wagner's overture 1844; Liszt's symphony, 1853-4—the revision was made in 1857 when the final chorus was added, and the first performance took place. Liszt may have been led to compose his symphony by the thought of Berlioz. There are orchestral pages that remind one strongly of passages in the "Damnation of Faust," as in the symphony there are harmonic progressions and thematic material to which Wagner of the music-dramas gaily helped himself. There is no doubt that Liszt's idea of allowing Mephistopheles to parody in devilish mockery, as became the spirit that denied, preceding themes given to Faust and Gretchen, was derived from the finale of Berlioz's "Fantastic" symphony in which the theme characterizing the loved one is made the subject of obscene merriment at the witches' Sabbath. What would Liszt have done here and in certain other works if Berlioz had not preceded him? What would Wagner have done had not Berlioz and Liszt lived and composed? And what would Goethe have said to the overture and symphony performed yesterday? He told Eckermann that music was "not in his sphere"; he wrote to Schiller that the kingdom of music was not very familiar to him. In his day he was musically ultra-conservative, and so the grandfather in this art of some concert-goers today. Did he not once say in his best Olympian manner: "It is a strange state to which the great improvements in the technical and mechanical part of the art have brought our newest composers. Their productions are no longer music; they go beyond the level of human feelings and no response can be given them from the mind and heart. I hear with my ears only."

But Goethe would undoubtedly have been moved by Liszt's "Gretchen," by its deep, pure emotion without the taint of sentimentalism or raging passion. Is there any more beautiful music than this section "Gretchen" in the whole literature of the art? This music is comparable to the second section in the slow movement of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony; and as a musical characterization to Marguerite's song "in the Gothic manner" in "The Damnation of Faust." But in "Gretchen," the mood of perfect beauty is long sustained; and in the second theme there is the expression of sensuous chastity, if the seeming paradox may be allowed; seeming, for the two words are not incompatible. It is music too lovely to admit of prying impertinent commentators finding antiphonal phrases depicting Gretchen plucking the flower — "He loves me, loves me not." Such commentators would botanize on their mother's grave.

If Liszt gives a tone picture of the inquiring, restless, disappointed philosopher, Goethe would have found also in Liszt's music the Mephistopheles of the poem, for here is something more than the red-flanneled fiend rising on a vampire trap to the shriek of piccolo and clash of cymbals.

And the reassurance, the consolation, the peacefulness of the final measures sung effectively yesterday by the chorus.

Liszt's symphony is now seventy-five years old. It is still one of the great achievements in the art. The superb performance by the orchestra, led with a remarkable sense of interpretation by Dr. Koussevitzky, is beyond all praise. The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week, Ernest Toch will play his piano concerto, which was introduced here by Mr. Sanroma. Toch's "Bunte" suite for orchestra and Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, No. 5, E minor, will also be on the program.

Globe Mar. 19

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The program of this week's Symphony concerts is announced as in memory of Goethe, who died March 22, 1832. It consists of Wagner's "A Faust Overture," and Liszt's "Faust Symphony." The Harvard Glee Club and Rulon Y. Robison, tenor, assisted ably in the finale of Liszt's symphony.

Dr Koussevitzky's fondness for anniversary and commemorative programs has been amply shown. All of last season was devoted to marking the 50th year of Boston Symphony concerts. This year, besides the special memorial concert for Judge Cabot, whom the orchestra could not decently have avoided honoring by some unusual tribute, we have had commemorations of the death of Edison, the anniversary of Lewis Carroll, and now of Goethe, with Haydn in prospect two weeks hence, on the 200th anniversary of his birth. No doubt diligent study of the World Almanac would furnish an anniversary for each week of every season of some personage quite as important in the history of music as Edison, Lewis Carroll and Goethe.

Goethe's "Faust" has inspired other composers besides Liszt and Wagner. Gounod's opera offers a vulgarized version adapted to the comprehension of the opera audience in Paris under the Second Empire. Boito's "Mefistofele," partly because the libretto adequately represents Goethe's play, has never had any great popularity. Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust" is still given occasionally.

Tone Poem

Wagner's overture, an early work, by 1848 failed to please the composer. He revised it in the 1850s, but apparently only consented to publish it because, as usual, he was in want of money. He explained that the music had been written originally as the first part of a "Faust" symphony, so that the overture is a kind of tone poem representing "Faust in Solitude." It is turgid, ineffective music, representing the weakest side of Wagner's talent, his propensity for bombast long drawn out.

Liszt's "Faust Symphony" is really a series of three tone poems, representing Faust, Gretchen and Mephstopheles, to which an "andante mistico," with tenor solo and male chorus singing the famous passage of Goethe that ends "Das Ewig-Weibliche zieht uns hinan" was added as an afterthought. The most effective section is the Mephistopheles, where the unduly sentimental and pompous themes of the earlier portion are amusingly parodied. Did Liszt have his tongue in his cheek? Or was all this rhodomontade proferred in deadly earnest?

Dr Karl Muck, when conductor here, gave several performances of this symphony, in a slightly revised manuscript version he had discovered at Bayreuth. One can recall no greater triumph than that he scored with audiences and reviewers in this work. Memory of music heard 15 and more years ago is obviously fallible. But the written record of the triumph remains in the files of the newspapers.

Yesterday it seemed, as it has at other performances since Dr Muck departed, a miracle that this "Faust Symphony" could ever have sounded thrilling and genuine. The change may be partly in the listener, of course. Yet even in 1915 this particular listener was prejudiced against the music of Liszt and convinced, in spite of himself, by the Muck performances that in the "Faust Symphony" the genius had for once displaced the charlatan.

Muck Memories

The absolute precision of the playing of the orchestra under Muck, the magnificently molded melodies, the avoidance of extremes of tempi and dynamics, the perfect Wagnerian style, in short, that one recalls, and that one may still hear in the recent phonograph records made in Germany by Dr Muck probably in part explain how Muck succeeded where Dr Koussevitzky, like almost everyone else, has failed.

Yesterday's, to be frank, seemed the dullest Symphony Concert one has listened to since Dr Koussevitzky came to Boston. Dullness is happily rare when he conducts, but his best efforts yesterday could not breathe any fire into Liszt's tedious symphony.

Next week Ernst Toch will play the piano part in his own concerto. There will also be a new suite by Toch, and Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony. P. R.

RDAY, MARCH 19,

SYMPHONY IN HONOR TO GOETHE

Wagner's and Liszt's "Faust" Comprise Concert List

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Next Tuesday brings the 100th anniversary of the passing of Germany's greatest man of letters, Johann Wolfgang von Goethe. To the world-wide observance of this centenary the Symphony Orchestra is adding its portion in the memorial programme of the concerts of yesterday afternoon and of this evening.

WAGNER AND LISZT

More than one composer has found inspiration in Goethe's masterpiece. Berlioz, Schumann, Liszt, Wagner, Mahler and, in the opera house, Gounod and Boito, have put "Faust," or rather a part of it, into music. With varying success have they expressed in tone the spirit of the poem, but of them all none has succeeded better than did Franz Liszt in the three character-pieces that make his "Faust Symphony," while the youthful Wagner fell not so very far below him in the "Faust" overture that was itself to have been the first part of a Faust symphony, never completed.

Overture and symphony made Dr. Koussevitzky's programme of yesterday, and if one or two might have regretted a lost opportunity for the hearing of Schumann's generally neglected "Scenes from Faust" it cannot be denied that the conductor's choice was a happy one.

Revised by Him Later

It was in this overture, composed when the ink of the score of "Rienzi" was barely dry, that Wagner gave the first real indication of the stuff that was in him. Despite an occasional reliance upon the more stereotyped formulas of the period, this picture of "Faust in Solitude" is music of penetrating psychological insight and of dramatic power. At least it so seems when a conductor of genius reads the music, transmutes and transforms it, as did Dr. Koussevitzky yesterday, his orchestra seconding him nobly.

Yet even though a maturer Wagner revised it, the "Faust" Overture is but a tentative effort when brought into comparison with the "Faust Symphony," that with each passing season seems more surely and decisively Liszt's orchestral monument. Year by year those of the symphonic poems that remain in the repertory become more hollow and trumpery, while the "Dante Symphony" seems to have disappeared for good and all. But the "Faust Symphony" prevails and, in view of its authorship, even strikes us as a sort of miracle.

Only in one of the themes of the "Faust" movement is there a hint of the theatrical Liszt; the rest is a masterpiece of musical character-drawing. The "Gretchen" movement is a lovely and tender page, unmarred by Lisztian saccharinities; the "Mephistopheles" section, another masterpiece, in this case of musical irony, not to mention musical skill. The final Andante Mistico, with its male chorus and its tenor soloist hymning the Eternal Feminine, reaches a plane of serene exaltation quite different from that attained by the usual Lisztian apotheosis.

Like that of the Overture, the performance of the Symphony yesterday was an act of the highest interpretative art, reflected by a readily responsive orchestra. No less did the chorus from the Harvard Glee Club feel the spell of the occasion, while Rulon Robison, who sang the tenor solo, achieved the rightful note of mystical ecstasy. At the end an audience deeply impressed bestowed its plaudits on conductor and soloist, orchestra and chorus.

156

Liszt, Wagner and Goethe

Written for The Christian Science Monitor Mar 19

TO MARK the centennial of Goethe, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky ordained for the Boston Symphony concerts of March 18 and 19 a program which consisted of Wagner's "Faust-Overture" and Liszt's "Faust" Symphony.

Wagner's Overture is of interest chiefly for its forecasts of the later master of music-drama. Liszt's symphony is of interest for the same reason; but also for others. It would be difficult to overestimate the extent or the importance of Wagner's debt to Liszt. This debt included not only moral and material assistance, the influence of a great name in getting works performed and in spreading the Wagnerian gospel; it included also actual musical material and methods. In the "Faust" Symphony you may discover motifs of the "Ring" and even of "Parsifal." The generosity of Liszt was paralleled only by the ingratitude of Wagner.

It is true that Wagner did more with the material. But this "Faust" Symphony is surely the strongest evidence that can be adduced in support of the contention that Liszt is among the great composers not only historically, as a sort of artistic "angel" to Wagner, but actually by virtue of his own output. You may prefer Wagner's characterization of Faust to Liszt's, if only because it is so much shorter; you may grow restive under the bombast of the first movement of the symphony and the garrulousness of this and of the third. But you can hardly deny that Liszt has succeeded, with the simplest means, in establishing a mood in those preluding measures of the "Faust" section; that Mephistopheles's mocking is cleverer and more amusing than that of Strauss's critics; that there is dramatic value in the return of the Gretchen idea in the third movement, and that the concluding measures of the symphony are impressive, or, above all, that the tender love music of the second movement stands isolated and unapproached.

Is not Liszt's career a tragedy? He was so much more than a virtuoso of the piano; though his showmanship in this field perhaps contains the key to a weakness in his character. One of the most gifted original native artists in the history of music, he failed to bring his possibilities to full realization. Partly, perhaps, because of his generosity; he was always busy doing things for other people. But more, we feel, because he lacked two qualities—sincerity and taste. He could not resist the temptation to show off, to astonish, to take the easy way. This easy way led him astray from the path of his highest achievement.

Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra did themselves honor in thus doing honor to Goethe. It was keenness for the task, no doubt, that betrayed them here and there into raggedness. For on the whole, it would de difficult to imagine a more eloquent or virtuosic proclamation of Goethe's greatness. In the "Faust" Symphony, devoted and efficient assistance was rendered by a chorus from the Harvard Glee Club, Dr. A. T. Davison, conductor, and by Mr. Rulon Y. Robison, tenor. The success was conspicuous.

L. A. S.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 13, 1932 Post

in Marching Rhythms Secret rch King John Philip Sousa's Magic

Noted Conductor of Boston Symphony, in Tribute to Band Master

Folks Cried, Shouted And Pounded Tables When He Played in Vienna 20 Years Ago

By Leo Rabbette

"The greatest master of the band, a cordial friend, a lover of the finest music, a composer whose influence has been inspiring to all European composers of march music since his advent," thus did Serge Koussevitzky pay tribute to John Philip Sousa, familiarly known as the march king of America, whose sudden passing the country mourns.

The modest but most notable conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra graciously received me in the study of his charming home in Brookline, to tell me something of his friend, Sousa.

"The first American music by Americans players that I ever heard was that of John Philip Sousa and his band," said Conductor Koussevitzky. "I will tell you about it. In 1902, after my season in Russia, I was on my way from Moscow to Berlin, and, to break the journey, decided to stop over at Varsovie, that ancient Polish city, for a few hours.

"I arrived at 4 in the afternoon and there, on all the hoardings, was a great poster. I read, 'American Band, Sousa Conducting.' Very interesting. I must go, I said. I stayed over to hear him. He played his marches.

Something New from America

"The effect was very curious," went on Koussevitzky. "The pulsation from this simple march form was so extraordinary. It impressed me very deeply. I was a long time wondering over it. I did not remember the marches as marches, but the pulsation was entirely new to me; it stayed with me; it was exciting."

"How does the pulsation differ from the rhythm?" I asked, feeling that here was the secret of Sousa's magic, and that the conductor, Koussevitzky, was touching it.

"The pulsation," he replied, "is the life in the rhythm, the impetus, the vital urge, you might say."

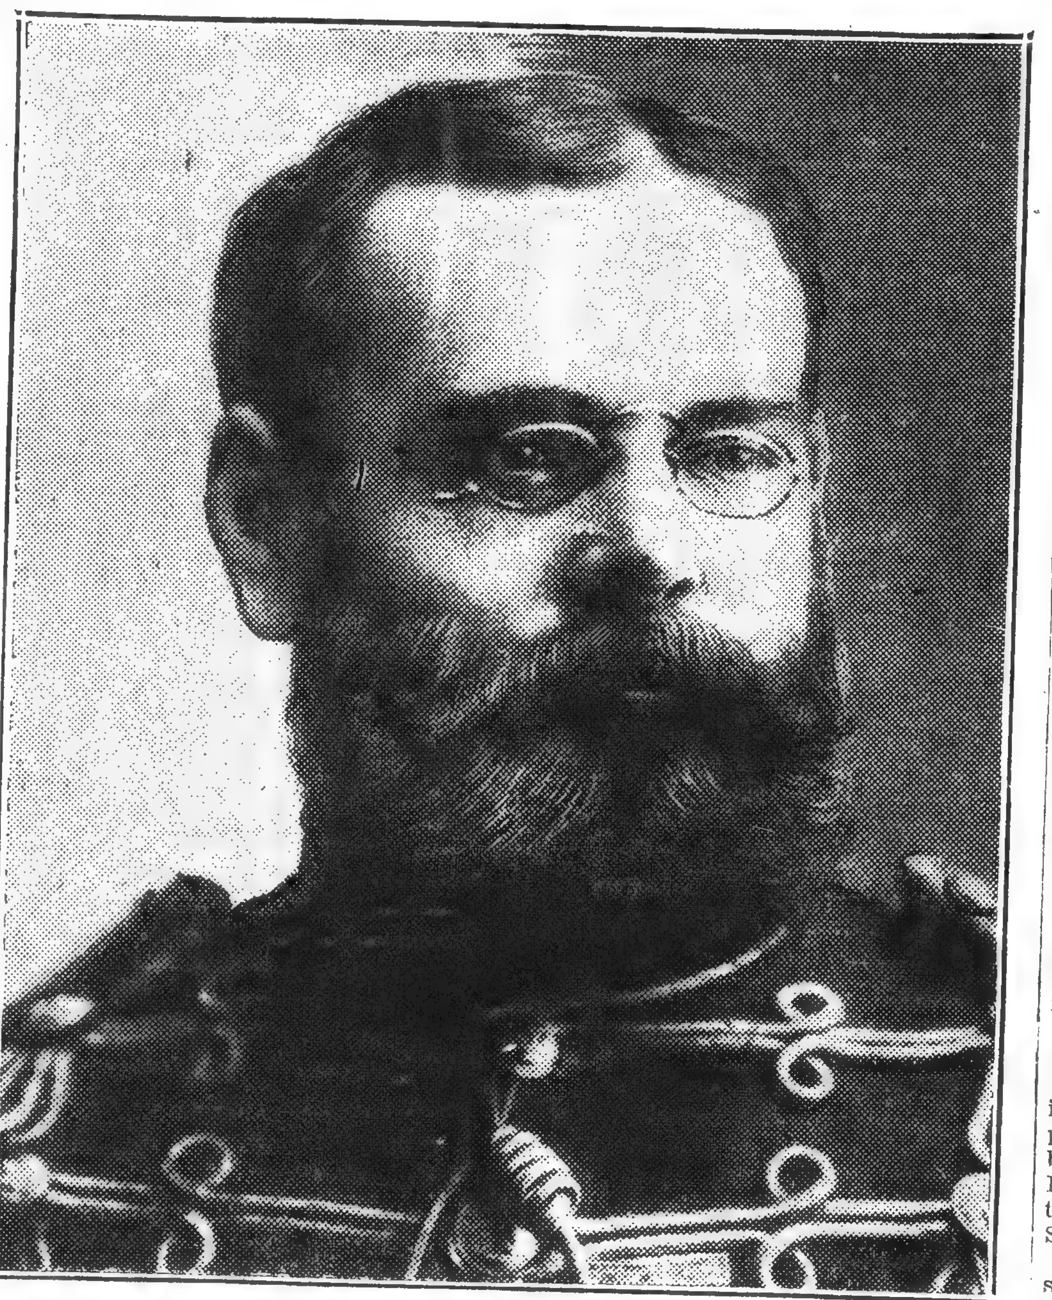
Extraordinary Success!

"I had a chance later, that summer, to be in Vienna at the same time Sousa was there with his band. He directed in the grand park there, the Prater, and was such a success, a tremendous, extraordinary success!" Koussevitsky threw up his most sensitive and expressive hands, and glowed in the remembrance.

"It must have been like the American doughboy band I heard playing in the park at Nice, in Southern France," I said. "The French were fairly drunken on this American military music. Even as in the early Greek mysteries, the Initiate would cry, 'I have eaten of the drum, I have drunken of the cymbals,' they danced and laughed till they cried."

"Exactly," smiled Koussevitsky. "Sousa had undoubtedly trained them, for it was the same so long ago in Vienna. People cried and cheered and pounded the tables. And Sousa led, with his great black beard and black mustache and his magistral manner. You might say the success of the greatest prima donna.

"After more than 20 years I had the pleasure and the opportunity of receiving Mr. Sousa in Boston, here. I recalled the old nights of his triumph in Varsovie and Vienna and he was very happy. I saw him two or three times in America after that and he was always very congenial.



John Philip Sousa as he looked at the height of his career as bandmaster of the famous United States Marine Band.

A Master in His Way

"He was always a very youthful man, he showed great admiration for great music; he was naturally a fine musician. And the virtue in his rhythm was not just evoked himself from his band, though his power was very great, it is in his music. After that moment in Varsovie I often heard his music, his marches played by continental bands; he was very well known throughout Europe, and in South American countries, too. In his way he was a very great master.

"Sousa was very American. This impelling pulsation of his had never appeared in military music before. In that sense he was truly unique.

"After Sousa's marches became current, composers of Europe began to write better music, that is military music, though they never quite reached his mastery, his triumphant plangency."

"Do you think the brass bands, of which John Philip Sousa was the preeminent leader, have been important to America?" I asked.

"They are indeed very fine for gardens and for popular public places. So many people are enabled to hear good music. Beside Sousa's band, which was one of the outstanding of the world's bands, I know two other very excellent bands, the Garde Republicaine, in Paris, and that very fine band in Barcelona, in Spain; they both are splendidly conducted."

Joyful Plangency

"The march is, of course, music for the military and not for symphonic rendition," Mr. Koussevitzky replied in answer to my innocent question as to whether the symphony had ever played any of Sousa's works.

"But," he smiled, "this is interesting. I do recall that one time the Boston Symphony players did play one of his pieces. It was quite impromptu. One day, we were going to have our picture taken, a group picture, and we had some time to while away, waiting for the photographers to get the lights ready.

"So to amuse ourselves—one has one's fun now and then, even in a symphony orchestra—I suggested they play 'The Blue Danube' of Johann Strauss, which they all knew, of course. They had so much pleasure in that I said, 'Now play "The Stars and Stripes Forever"'!'

"And how they played it. With the greatest verve. It filled the orchestra with enthusiasm. They delighted in it. It is a joyful, stimulating thing.

"Yes," concluded Conductor Serge Koussevitzky, "great is the inner vigor and life in the music of John Philip Sousa, and though he be, as they say, dead, in his marches he will go on triumphantly forever.

"Sousa will be a name to remember in the history of American music."

Sousa Competed with Symphony

There was a time when Sousa was in competition with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, however. Ben Macomber tells the story in his book on the Panama-Pacific International Exposition in 1915, "The Jewel City," meaning San Francisco, of course;—

"John Philip Sousa had spent a long season at the Exposition. A blunder was made somewhere in dating the arrival of the March King and his splendid instrumentalists, who came while yet the Boston Symphonists were playing in Festival Hall.

"As a result the finest of bands were placed in competition with the finest of orchestras. But nothing disastrous happened. Those who desired, to the number of 15,000, heard Sousa at his opening concert in the Court of the Universe. Those who desired heard Dr. Muck's instrumentalists to the seating capacity of Festival Hall."

One of the most extraordinary and interesting feats ever performed by John Philip Sousa was the scoring of George M. Cohan's World war song, "Over There," for an 1800-piece brass band, with auxiliary bugle and drum corps. That was at the Great Lakes Naval Training Station where Sousa was recruiting and training musicians for the Expeditionary Forces in France. All the battle songs of the world wove in and out and thundered through this marvelous tour de force of improvising. They played it, 1800 strong, as they marched up the avenue at Washington, Sousa leading. And it will probably never be played again, till we have another war, for it would take a war to get that many musicians together.

In 1892 John Philip Sousa played with Theodore Thomas' orchestra at the dedication of the last World's Fair at Chicago. He was to open the next World's Fair in Chicago, next year, 1933. His spirit will be there, conducting, his own march, "Hundred Years of Progress," yes, the spirit of Sousa, in the resistless march of Sousa will be there, capturing all hearts, "Marching On."

MUSIC, MUSICIANS AND THEIR P

ERNST TOCH, among the foremost of modern German composers, is guest composer-soloist with the Boston Symphony next Friday and Saturday. He will play with the orchestra his piano concerto, which was given its first performance in this country in 1928 under the baton of Dr. Koussevitzky. At the same concerts the orchestra will play Toch's "Bunte" Suite. The concert will conclude with a performance of Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony. Of the six symphonies that Tchaikovcky wrote only three have stood the test of time. And of those three, the Fifth Symphony is the finest in the opinion of most musicians. Dr. Koussevitzky has a way with Tchaikovsky, a way that reveals a Tchaikovsky of kindling imagination and soaring emotions.

* * *

THE superb event of last year's music season was the second performance of Bach's magnificent B-minor Mass by the Boston Symphony, the choral part sung by the Harvard and Radcliffe Glee Clubs and the solo roles taken by Amy Evans, soprano, Margarete Matzenauer, contralto, Richard Crooks, tenor, Fraser Gange, bass—all animated by the inspired direction of Dr. Koussevitzky. The same participants will appear in a repetition of this noble work next Sunday afternoon and evening in Symphony Hall for the benefit of the orchestra's Pension Fund. It may be, as some maintain, that many musicians—notably English musicians — over-emphasize their worship of Bach; and yet as we hear the master-craftsman Bach giving voice to his sturdy faith in this Mass, most of us fall wholeheartedly into the English way of thinking and become ardent votaries at the Bach shrine.

* * *

winning composition is selected. The "Quintet for Piano and Strings" was first played in public in May, 1931, at Town Hall. Other compositions by Mr. Giannini that have had successful public performances include a String Quartet; a Sonata for Piano and Violin; a Madrigal for Four Voices and String Quartet; and a Prelude and Fugue for String Orchestra. Mr. Giannini was born in Philadelphia, and while quite young he studied for

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony, is here caught in a characteristic and charming mood. He presents the Bach B-minor Mass next Sunday.

1156

Poplars and weeping willows grow into small trees by just putting the switches in the ground and in the third year Normandy poplars are reaching for the sky and the willows grow just as readily the other way.

We have lived here only 11 years and in that time some of the plantings of trees have had to be removed as they want to make it too shady.

Well, it's lots of fun, anyway.

Wagner's Overture is of interest chiefly for its forecasts of the later master of music-drama. Liszt's symphony is of interest for the same reason; but also for others. It would be difficult to overestimate the extent or the importance of Wagner's debt to Liszt. This debt included not only moral and material assistance, the influence of a great name in getting works performed and in spreading the Wagnerian gospel; it included also actual musical material and methods. In the "Faust" Symphony you may discover motifs of the "Ring" and even of "Parsifal." The generosity of Liszt was paralleled only by the ingratitude of Wagner.

It is true that Wagner did more with the material. But this "Faust" Symphony is surely the strongest evidence that can be adduced in support of the contention that Liszt is among the great composers not only historically, as a sort of artistic "angel" to Wagner, but actually by virtue of his own output. You may prefer Wagner's characterization of Faust to Liszt's, if only because it is so much shorter; you may grow restive under the bombast of the first movement of the symphony and the garrulousness of this and of the third. But you can hardly deny that Liszt has succeeded, with the simplest means, in establishing a mood in those preluding measures of the "Faust" section; that Mephistopheles's mocking is cleverer and more amusing than that of Strauss's critics; that there is dramatic value in the return of the Gretchen idea in the third movement, and that the concluding measures of the symphony are impressive, or, above all, that the tender love music of the second movement stands isolated and unapproached.

Is not Liszt's career a tragedy? He was so much more than a virtuoso of the piano; though his showmanship in this field perhaps contains the key to a weakness in his character. One of the most gift d originative artists in the history of music, he failed to bring his possibilities to full realization. Partly, perhaps, because of his generosity; he was always busy doing things for other people. But more, we feel, because he lacked two qualities—sincerity and taste. He could not resist the temptation to show off, to astonish, to take the easy way. This easy way led him astray from the path of his highest achievement.

Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra did themselves honor in thus doing honor to Goethe. It was keenness for the task, no doubt, that betrayed them here and there into raggedness. For on the whole, it would de difficult to imagine a more eloquent or virtuosic proclamation of Goethe's

---

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 13, 1932 Post

Pulsation in Marching Rhythms Secret of March King John Philip Sousa's Magic

Serge Koussevitzky, Noted Conductor of Boston Symphony, in Tribute to Band Master

Folks Cried, Shouted And Pounded Tables When He Played in Vienna 20 Years Ago

John Philip Sousa as he looked at the height of his career as band-master of the famous United States Marine Band.

By Leo Rabbette

"The greatest master of the band, a cordial friend, a lover of the finest music, a composer whose influence has been inspiring to all European composers of march music since his advent," thus did Serge Koussevitzky pay tribute to John Philip Sousa, familiarly known as the march king of America, whose sudden passing the country mourns.

The modest but most notable conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra graciously received me in the study of his charming home in Brookline, to tell me something of his friend, Sousa.

"The first American music by Americans players that I ever heard was that of John Philip Sousa and his band," said Conductor Koussevitzky. "I will tell you about it. In 1902, after my season in Russia, I was on my way from Moscow to Berlin, and, to break the journey, decided to stop over at Varsovie, that ancient Polish city, for a few hours.

"I arrived at 4 in the afternoon and there, on all the hoardings, was a great poster. I read, 'American Band, Sousa Conducting.' Very interesting. I must go, I said. I stayed over to hear him. He played his marches.

Something New from America

"The effect was very curious," went on Koussevitzky. "The pulsation from this simple march form was so extraordinary. It impressed me very deeply. I was a long time wondering over it. I did not remember the marches as marches, but the pulsation was entirely new to me; it stayed with me; it was exciting."

"How does the pulsation differ from the rhythm?" I asked, feeling that here was the secret of Sousa's magic, and that the conductor, Koussevitzky, was touching it.

"The pulsation," he replied, "is the life in the rhythm, the impetus, the vital urge, you might say."

Extraordinary Success!

"I had a chance later, that summer, to be in Vienna at the same time Sousa was there with his band. He directed in the grand park there, the Prater, and was such a success, a tremendous, extraordinary success!" Koussevitsky threw up his most sensitive and expressive hands, and glowed in the remembrance.

"It must have been like the American doughboy band I heard playing in the park at Nice, in Southern France," I said. "The French were fairly drunken on this American military music. Even as in the early Greek mysteries, the Initiate would cry, 'I have eaten of the drum, I have drunken of the cymbals,' they danced and laughed till they cried."

"Exactly," smiled Koussevitsky. "Sousa had undoubtedly trained them, for it was the same so long ago in Vienna. People cried and cheered and pounded the tables. And Sousa led, with his great black beard and black mustache and his magistral manner. You might say the success of the greatest prima donna.

"After more than 20 years I had the pleasure and the opportunity of receiving Mr. Sousa in Boston, here. I recalled the old nights of his triumph in Varsovie and Vienna and he was very happy. I saw him two or three times in America after that and he was always very congenial.

A Master in His Way

"He was always a very youthful man, he showed great admiration for great music; he was naturally a fine musician. And the virtue in his rhythm was not just evoked himself from his band, though his power was very great, it is in his music. After that moment in Varsovie I often heard his music, his marches played by continental bands; he was very well known throughout Europe, and in South American countries, too. In his way he was a very great master.

"Sousa was very American. This impelling pulsation of his had never appeared in military music before. In that sense he was truly unique.

"After Sousa's marches became current, composers of Europe began to write better music, that is military music, though they never quite reached his mastery, his triumphant plangency."

"Do you think the brass bands, of which John Philip Sousa was the pre-eminent leader, have been important to America?" I asked.

"They are indeed very fine for gardens and for popular public places. So many people are enabled to hear good music. Beside Sousa's band, which was one of the outstanding of the world's bands, I know two other very excellent bands, the Garde Republicaine, in Paris, and that very fine band in Barcelona, in Spain; they both are splendidly conducted."

Joyful Plangency

"The march is, of course, music for the military and not for symphonic rendition," Mr. Koussevitzky replied in answer to my innocent question as to whether the symphony had ever played any of Sousa's works.

"But," he smiled, "this is interesting. I do recall that one time the Boston Symphony players did play one of his pieces. It was quite impromptu. One day, we were going to have our picture taken, a group picture, and we had some time to while away, waiting for the photographers to get the lights ready.

"So to amuse ourselves—one has one's fun now and then, even in a symphony orchestra—I suggested they play 'The Blue Danube' of Johann Strauss, which they all knew, of course. They had so much pleasure in that I said, 'Now play "The Stars and Stripes Forever"!'

"And how they played it. With the greatest verve. It filled the orchestra with enthusiasm. They delighted in it. It is a joyful, stimulating thing.

"Yes," concluded Conductor Serge Koussevitzky, "great is the inner vigor and life in the music of John Philip Sousa, and though he be, as they say, dead, in his marches he will go on triumphantly forever.

"Sousa will be a name to remember in the history of American music."

Sousa Competed with Symphony

There was a time when Sousa was in competition with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, however. Ben Macomber tells the story in his book on the Panama-Pacific International Exposition in 1915, "The Jewel City," meaning San Francisco, of course;—

"John Philip Sousa had spent a long season at the Exposition. A blunder was made somewhere in dating the arrival of the March King and his splendid instrumentalists, who came while yet the Boston Symphonists were playing in Festival Hall.

"As a result the finest of bands were placed in competition with the finest of orchestras. But nothing disastrous happened. Those who desired, to the number of 15,000, heard Sousa at his opening concert in the Court of the Universe. Those who desired heard Dr. Muck's instrumentalists to the seating capacity of Festival Hall."

One of the most extraordinary and interesting feats ever performed by John Philip Sousa was the scoring of George M. Cohan's World war song, "Over There," for an 1800-piece brass band, with auxiliary bugle and drum corps. That was at the Great Lakes Naval Training Station where Sousa was recruiting and training musicians for the Expeditionary Forces in France. All the battle songs of the world wove in and out and thundered through this marvelous tour de force of improvising. They played it, 1800 strong, as they marched up the avenue at Washington, Sousa leading. And it will probably never be played again, till we have another war, for it would take a war to get that many musicians together.

In 1892 John Philip Sousa played with Theodore Thomas' orchestra at the dedication of the last World's Fair at Chicago. He was to open the next World's Fair in Chicago, next year, 1933. His spirit will be there, conducting, his own march, "Hundred Years of Progress," yes, the spirit of Sousa, in the resistless march of Sousa will be there, capturing all hearts, "Marching On."

MUSIC, MUSICIANS AND THEIR P

ERNST TOCH, among the foremost of modern German composers, is guest composer-soloist with the Boston Symphony next Friday and Saturday. He will play with the orchestra his piano concerto, which was given its first performance in this country in 1928 under the baton of Dr. Koussevitzky. At the same concerts the orchestra will play Toch's "Bunte" Suite. The concert will conclude with a performance of Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony. Of the six symphonies that Tchaikovcky wrote only three have stood the test of time. And of those three, the Fifth Symphony is the finest in the opinion of most musicians. Dr. Koussevitzky has a way with Tchaikovsky, a way that reveals a Tchaikovsky of kindling imagination and soaring emotions.

* * *

THE superb event of last year's music season was the second performance of Bach's magnificent B-minor Mass by the Boston Symphony, the choral part sung by the Harvard and Radcliffe Glee Clubs and the solo roles taken by Amy Evans, soprano, Margarete Matzenauer, contralto, Richard Crooks, tenor, Fraser Gange, bass—all animated by the inspired direction of Dr. Koussevitzky. The same participants will appear in a repetition of this noble work next Sunday afternoon and evening in Symphony Hall for the benefit of the orchestra's Pension Fund. It may be, as some maintain, that many musicians—notably English musicians — over-emphasize their worship of Bach; and yet as we hear the master-craftsman Bach giving voice to his sturdy faith in this Mass, most of us fall wholeheartedly into the English way of thinking and become ardent votaries at the Bach shrine.

* * *

winning composition is selected. The "Quintet for Piano and Strings" was first played in public in May, 1931, at Town Hall. Other compositions by Mr. Giannini that have had successful public performances include a String Quartet; a Sonata for Piano and Violin; a Madrigal for Four Voices and String Quartet; and a Prelude and Fugue for String Orchestra. Mr. Giannini was born in Philadelphia, and while quite young he studied for

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony, is here caught in a characteristic and charming mood. He presents the Bach B-minor Mass next Sunday.

Bost. Adv. Mar 20

THIS CLIPPING FROM NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
GAZETTE

MAR 1 1932

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN BRILLIANT CONCERT

Orchestra, Under Direction of Koussevitzky, Maintains Usual High Level

The concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra is usually the most brilliant of the year, and that given Monday evening in John M. Greene hall was no exception. Under the direction of Mr. Koussevitzky the orchestra has never failed to maintain the high level of excellence for which for many decades now it has been famous; and Mr. Koussevitzky's interest in modern music, which so often depends upon unusual orchestral effects, has given to the orchestra a virtuosity and veritable splendor beyond equal. A large part of the program presented here was made up of modern music, and the playing of the orchestra has never shown to better advantage.

The first two numbers afforded an interesting comparison, for both Prokofieff in his Classical Symphony and Mr. Josten in his Concerto Sacro set their essentially modern technique to the recreation of a more or less archaic mood. Brilliant and attractive as is the Prokofieff symphony—and the Gavotte and the last movement were especially charming—Mr. Josten was more successful in accomplishing what he set out to do. The outlines of the Symphony are, to be sure, classical, and even the themes have the savor of classical themes. But the modern and conscious gesture is evident in every phrase; whereas Mr. Josten in his music speaks with a tone and accent of sixteenth century Germany. While the melodic line, as Mr. Koussevitzky drew it from the strings, was long and suave, the imitations and the contrapuntal weavings expressed in sound as clearly as the artist in design a certain religious positiveness deeply moving by its angularity and starkness. By an amazingly fine tonal sense. Mr. Josten has given to his music even the sound of a distant time. His Concerto is outstanding among modern works not alone by the skill with which it is written, but by a genuine beauty.

The glowing orchestral color of the Ravel music, its verve, its swift and delicious changes, completely captivated the audience. After such lavish and joyous display the Brahms Symphony fell sombrely on the ear, and Mr. Koussevitzky did nothing in his interpretation to lighten it. The tempi were a little lagging, so that the intricacies of structure with which the music is crowded stood out too distinctly, and none of the movements swung along as a whole. Nevertheless there were moments of exceptional beauty, especially among the changes rung on the passacaglia theme of the last movement.

L. H.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
OMAHA, NEB.
EVE. WORLD-HERALD

MAR 4 - 1932

Koussevitzky Panics New York with His Baton

BY LEMUEL F. PARTON.

New York, March 4 (C. P. A.)—Fourteen years ago, Serge Koussevitzky was conducting an orchestra wearing mittens on the banks of the frozen Volga. It is hastily explained that the mittens had so many holes in them that the musicians could finger the strings. "We must keep up with our music," said Kerensky, in the midst of the fighting, and Koussevitzky did the best he could.

With his finger still half frozen he went to Paris and climbed swiftly to the leadership of the Boston Symphony orchestra, rebuilding it after Dr. Karl Muck went to Fort Oglethorpe. His great acclaim and his distinguished presence as he conducted the Bostonians at Carnegie hall Thursday night made all this seem "far away and long ago."

He is the only great virtuoso of the bull fiddle—the only artist to make it a solo instrument. Landing, unheralded in Berlin, from Paris, he hired a large room and filled it with empty chairs. Then he conducted to an invisible orchestra. Thus he rehearsed, and when he was ready he hired the best manager in Berlin to advertise his first concert—incidentally, he also had hired an orchestra. The fates swung a kindly baton and quick-timed him up the heights. He boycotts both Russia and Italy—the latter country for what Mussolini's bravos did to Toscanini. He is 58.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

MAR 5 - 1932

WHO IS NEWS TO-DAY

"Scotty" Gow
Serge Koussevitzky
Senator Daniel O. Hastings

BY LEMUEL F. PARTON.

(Special Correspondent of The Hartford Times.)

New York, March 5.—Scotland yard traces the antecedents of Betty Gow. American and Canadian police search for "Scotty" Gow, Detroit gangster. Betty Gow is the name of the English maid now in the Lindbergh household. A London cable refers to the search for Betty Gow, "identified as a former maid in the home of Col. and Mrs. Charles A. Lindbergh." The police want to know if "Scotty" Gow has a sister.

"Scotty" Gow is said to be a member of the "Purple Gang" of Detroit, which picked up kidnaping exploits where the notorious Legs Lamon gang left off two years ago. A long distance telephone call to Detroit this morning revealed that information about him is meager, and that he is a minor gangster. He was known around the Hamtramick dives and was loosely identified as engaging in both the rum-running and kidnaping rackets, which somewhat overlap in Detroit. His Scotch burr gave him his nickname.

His probable associates, although nothing definite is obtainable, were Doc Brady, Lefty Clark, Johnny Hyan and George Bloomfeld, sent to prison in 1930 for kidnaping gamblers. The Legs Lamon gang was broken up when it kidnaped Charles Kaier, wealthy real estate man, and Dr. Frank L. McPhail, who escaped. It was understood a few months ago that Gow slipped into Canada.

Serge Koussevitzky

Fourteen years ago, Serge Koussevitzky was conducting an orchestra wearing mittens on the banks of the frozen Volga. It is hastily explained that the mittens had so many holes in them that the musicians could finger the strings. "We must keep up with our music," said Kerensky, in the midst of the fighting, and Koussevitzky did the best he could. With his fingers still half frozen, he went to Paris and climbed swiftly to the leadership of the Boston Symphony orchestra, re-building it after Dr. Karl Muck went to Fort Oglethorpe. His great acclaim and his distinguished presence as he conducted the Bostonians at Carnegie hall Thursday night made all this seem "far away and long ago."

He is the only great virtuoso of the bull fiddle—the only artist to make it a solo instrument. Landing, unheralded in Berlin, from Paris, he hired a large room and filled it with empty chairs. Then he conducted to an invisible orchestra. Thus he rehearsed, and when he was ready, he hired the best manager in Berlin to advertise his first concert—incidentally, he also had hired an orchestra. The fates swung a kindly baton and quick-timed him up the heights. He boycotts both Russia and Italy—the latter country for what Mussolini's bravos did to Toscanini. He is 58.

Senator Daniel O. Hastings.

Senator Daniel O. Hastings of Delaware double-shot the headlines yesterday. It was his fifty-sixth birthday, and it was he and no other who stirred up the congressional move against Wall Street shorts. On Oct. 2 of last year, he wrote Richard S. Whitney, urging that he chain up his bears. On Dec. 14. he introduced a resolution to investigate the stock exchange, and the resolution just adopted by the senate banking and currency committee is a modification of his original draft.

Senator Hastings went to congress in 1920 and moved obscurely in the social hinterland until a clever little vaudeville skit made him a blazing success, late in 1929. At a dinner company, he put on an imitation of Tom Heflin denouncing the pope. From then the S. R. O. sign was up at all dinners attended by the senator. The act was so successful that he dressed the part, statesman's uniform and all. He is short, fat and humorous, with a mischievous eye—bored by senate debates and rarely participating. He was secretary of state, associate justice of the supreme court and deputy attorney-general of Delaware.

(Copyright, 1932, by C. P. A.)

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND, ORE.
OREGON JOURNAL

MAR 5 - 1932

FOURTEEN years ago, Serge Koussevitzky was conducting an orchestra wearing mittens on the banks of the frozen Volga. It is hastily explained that the mittens had so many holes in them that the musicians could finger the strings. "We must keep up with our music," said Kerensky, in the midst of the fighting, and Koussevitzky did the best he could. With his fingers still half frozen he went to Paris and climbed swiftly to the leadership of the Boston Symphony orchestra, rebuilding it after Dr. Karl Muck went to Fort Oglethorpe. His great acclaim and his distinguished presence as he conducted the Bostonians at Carnegie Hall, Thursday night made all this seem "far away and long ago."

He is the only great virtuoso of the bull fiddle—the only artist to make it a solo instrument. Landing, unheralded in Berlin, from Paris, he hired a large room and filled it with empty chairs. Then he conducted to an invisible orchestra. Thus he rehearsed, and when he was ready he hired the best manager in Berlin to advertise his first concert—incidentally, he also had hired an orchestra. The fates swung a kindly baton and quick-timed him in the heights. He boycotts both Russia and Italy—the latter country for what Mussolini's bravos did to Toscanini. He is 58.

Continued From Page One

Music and Musicians

By W. J. HENDERSON

Mar 5

BERNARDINO MOLINARI conducted Ravel's "Bolero" in Philadelphia last week. Doubtless many young music lovers will bewail his omission of this exciting composition from his New York program. But the season is not yet at an end; there may be a performance of the "Bolero." The writer of these Saturday reflections will endeavor to avoid hearing that piece of music when it again shatters the peace of the art domain. From some public reactions discovered lately this recorder derives a suspicion that he is not alone in his feeling of fatigue under the incessant steam hammerings of some contemporaneous music. May it not be possible that the gradual return of Mozart into general favor is a sign not to be overlooked? First Bach and then Mozart. Does it not mean something?

There was a demonstration of extraordinary warmth when Bruno Walter recently played the solo part of Mozart's A major piano concerto, acting as conductor at the same time. It could not be that the feat alone sufficed to evoke such vigorous approval. There must have been something in the music itself and in the truly Mozartean performance. It is no news that Mozart was opposed to all exaggerations, and that he demanded a smooth, flowing style, always tasteful and elegant. Mr. Walter gave us that. We enjoyed it. We were not conscious of any irresistible driving force, nor of any irritation of nerves. All was reposeful, serene, beautiful—in the sense attributed to that abused adjective by the Greeks.

When the "Bolero" was produced in London one of the newspaper writers said:

> "By the time a solo trombone gets hold of the second tune the orchestra is waking up. The audience is now smiling—but rather nervously, for there is something slightly sinister about the effect on one's nerves of that inexorable rhythm. The climax of the piece approaches. The trumpets are screaming the tunes; and the orchestra, which at the beginning of the dance had seemed almost lethargic, now seems like a horde of dervishes, and the end is a frenzy. The audience welcomes the end—there is a feeling in the air that if the thing had gone on another five minutes, some one might have become hysterical."

In Paris in 1793 a frenzied mob of revolutionists danced a dance even more hysterical than the bolero. Drunk with brandy stolen from chalices, wrapped in the robes of priests, and laden with spoils from sanctuaries, the people stormed into the convention. Several members sprang from their chairs, and, taking the hands of flaunting girls of the Paris streets, danced with them the mad dance of that time, the carmagnole. Nothing could stop that dance but a Corsican megalomaniac and a "whiff of grape shot."

* * *

Puts and Calls in Beauty.

IT MUST be clear to most music lovers that the time has not arrived for the formation of a correct judgment about contemporaneous music. The late Henry Edward Krehbiel wrote long ago about a symphony of Bruckner, "It may be beautiful twenty years hence; it is not beautiful now." That pronouncement can be made about much of the music produced in this troubled period. Those of us who grew up with Bach and Beethoven, Brahms, Wagner and Strauss, may not be ready to assimilate new formulae and new conceptions of fundamental materials for musical composition. Many of the young men and women now in the conservatories will undoubtedly find little difficulty in adjusting their receptivity to that which is not uncommon in their day.

Some of the oldest music lovers mourn bitterly the advent of every modernist work. Some have been heard to say that if that is what music is going to be they will be forced to feed their appetite for beauty with some other art. For their comfort it may be pointed out that the modernists themselves do not desire to see the creations of the old masters relegated to desuetude. They are among the most earnest students of Bach and Beethoven. One might note that Serge Koussevitzky, the dis-

Symphony Orchestra, swings with rom Hindmith to Brahms and from ıad the benefit of an extended resibefore coming to this country and center of intellectual curiosity to e of signs and wonders.
one in urging the world to listen to nd there are far more performances

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE, MD.
EVE. SUN

MAR 5 - 1932

Who's News Today

By Lemuel F. Parton

[Special Dispatch to The Evening Sun]

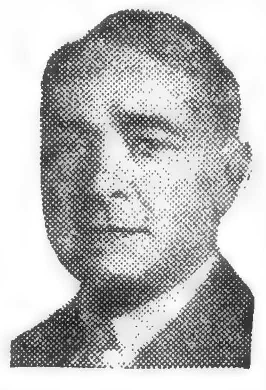
NEW YORK, March 5.

SENATOR Daniel O. Hastings, of Delaware, double-shoots the headlines. Yesterday was his fifty-sixth birthday, and it was he and no other who stirred up the Congressional move against Wall Street shorts. On October 2 of last year he wrote Richard S. Whitney urging that he chain up his bears. On December 14 he introduced a resolution to investigate the Stock Exchange, and the resolution just adopted by the Senate Banking and Currency Committee is a modification of his original draft.

Sen. Daniel O. Hastings

Senator Hastings went to Congress in 1920 and moved obscurely in the social hinterland until a clever little vaudeville skit made him a blazing success, late in 1929. At a dinner company, he put on an imitation of Tom Heflin denouncing the Pope. From then the S. R. O. sign was up at all dinners attended by the Senator. The act was so successful that he dressed the part, statesman's uniform and all. He is short, fat and humorous, with a mischievous eye—bored by Senate debates and rarely participating. He was Secretary of State, associate justice of the Supreme Court and Deputy Attorney-General of Delaware.

FOURTEEN years ago Serge Koussevitzky was conducting an orchestra wearing mittens on the banks of the frozen Volga. It is hastily explained that the mittens had so many holes in them that the musicians could finger the strings. "We must keep up with our music," said Kerensky, in the midst of the fighting, and Koussevitzky did the best he could With his fingers still half frozen he went to Paris and climbed swiftly to the leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, rebuilding it after Dr. Karl Muck went to Fort Oglethorpe. His great acclaim and his distinguished presence as he conducted the Bostonians at Carnegie Hall Thursday night made all this seem "far away and long ago."



Serge Koussevitzky

He is the only great virtuoso of the bull fiddle—the only artist to make it a solo instrument. Landing, unheralded in Berlin, from Paris, he hired a large room and filled it with empty chairs. Then he conducted to an invisible orchestra. Thus he rehearsed, and when he was ready he hired the best manager in Berlin to advertise his first concert—incidentally, he also had hired an orchestra. The fates swung a kindly baton and quick-timed him up the heights. He boycotts both Russia and Italy—the latter country for what Mussolini's bravos did to Toscanini. He is 58.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
GAZETTE

MAR 1 1932

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN BRILLIANT CONCERT

Orchestra, Under Direction of Koussevitzky, Maintains Usual High Level

The concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra is usually the most brilliant of the year, and that given Monday evening in John M. Greene hall was no exception. Under the direction of Mr. Koussevitzky the orchestra has never failed to maintain the high level of excellence for which for many decades now it has been famous; and Mr. Koussevitzky's interest in modern music, which so often depends upon unusual orchestral effects, has given to the orchestra a virtuosity and veritable splendor beyond equal. A large part of the program presented here was made up of modern music, and the playing of the orchestra has never shown to better advantage.

The first two numbers afforded an interesting comparison, for both Prokofieff in his Classical Symphony and Mr. Josten in his Concerto Sacro set their essentially modern technique to the recreation of a more or less archaic mood. Brilliant and attractive as is the Prokofieff symphony—and the Gavotte and the last movement were especially charming—Mr. Josten was more successful in accomplishing what he set out to do. The outlines of the Symphony are, to be sure, classical, and even the themes have the savor of classical themes. But the modern and conscious gesture is evident in every phrase; whereas Mr. Josten in his music speaks with a tone and accent of sixteenth century Germany. While the melodic line, as Mr. Koussevitzky drew it from the strings, was long and suave, the imitations and the contrapuntal weavings expressed in sound as clearly as the artist in design a certain religious positiveness deeply moving by its angularity and starkness. By an amazingly fine tonal sense. Mr. Josten has given to his music even the sound of a distant time. His Concerto is outstanding among modern works not alone by the skill with which it is written, but by a genuine beauty.

The glowing orchestral color of the Ravel music, its verve, its swift and delicious changes, completely captivated the audience. After such lavish and joyous display the Brahms Symphony fell sombrely on the ear, and Mr. Koussevitzky did nothing in his interpretation to lighten it. The tempi were a little lagging, so that the intricacies of structure with which the music is crowded stood out too distinctly, and none of the movements swung along as a whole. Nevertheless there were moments of exceptional beauty, especially among the changes rung on the passacaglia theme of the last movement. L. H.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
OMAHA, NEB.
EVE. WORLD-HERALD

MAR 4 - 1932

Koussevitzky Panics New York with His Baton

BY LEMUEL F. PARTON.

New York, March 4 (C. P. A.)—Fourteen years ago, Serge Koussevitzky was conducting an orchestra wearing mittens on the banks of the frozen Volga. It is hastily explained that the mittens had so many holes in them that the musicians could finger the strings. "We must keep up with our music," said Kerensky, in the midst of the fighting, and Koussevitsky did the best he could.

With his finger still half frozen he went to Paris and climbed swiftly to the leadership of the Boston Symphony orchestra, rebuilding it after Dr. Karl Muck went to Fort Oglethorpe. His great acclaim and his distinguished presence as he conducted the Bostonians at Carnegie hall Thursday night made all this seem "far away and long ago."

He is the only great virtuoso of the bull fiddle—the only artist to make it a solo instrument. Landing, unheralded in Berlin, from Paris, he hired a large room and filled it with empty chairs. Then he conducted to an invisible orchestra. Thus he rehearsed, and when he was ready he hired the best manager in Berlin to advertise his first concert—incidentally, he also had hired an orchestra. The fates swung a kindly baton and quick-timed him up the heights. He boycotts both Russia and Italy—the latter country for what Mussolini's bravos did to Toscanini. He is 58.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

MAR 5 - 1932

WHO IS NEWS TO-DAY

"Scotty" Gow
Serge Koussevitzky
Senator ~~Daniel~~ O. Hastings

BY LEMUEL F. PARTON.
(Special Correspondent of The Hartford Times.)

New York, March 5.—Scotland yard traces the antecedents of Betty Gow. American and Canadian police search for "Scotty" Gow, Detroit gangster. Betty Gow is the name of the English maid now in the Lindbergh household. A London cable refers to the search for Betty Gow, "identified as a former maid in the home of Col. and Mrs. Charles A. Lindbergh." The police want to know if "Scotty" Gow has a sister.

"Scotty" Gow is said to be a member of the "Purple Gang" of Detroit, which picked up kidnaping exploits where the notorious Legs Lamon gang left off two years ago. A long distance telephone call to Detroit this morning revealed that information about him is meager, and that he is a minor gangster. He was known around the Hamtramick dives and was loosely identified as engaging in both the rum-running and kidnaping rackets, which somewhat overlap in Detroit. His Scotch burr gave him his nickname.

His probable associates, although nothing definite is obtainable, were Doc Brady, Lefty Clark, Johnny Hyan and George Bloomfeld, sent to prison in 1930 for kidnaping gamblers. The Legs Lamon gang was broken up when it kidnaped Charles Kaier, wealthy real estate man, and Dr. Frank L. McPhail, who escaped. It was understood a few months ago that Gow slipped into Canada.

Serge Koussevitzky

Fourteen years ago, Serge Koussevitzky was conducting an orchestra wearing mittens on the banks of the frozen Volga. It is hastily explained that the mittens had so many holes in them that the musicians could finger the strings. "We must keep up with our music," said Kerensky, in the midst of the fighting, and Koussevitzky did the best he could. With his fingers still half frozen, he went to Paris and climbed swiftly to the leadership of the Boston Symphony orchestra, re-building it after Dr. Karl Muck went to Fort Oglethorpe. His great acclaim and his distinguished presence as he conducted the Bostonians at Carnegie hall Thursday night made all this seem "far away and long ago."

He is the only great virtuoso of the bull fiddle—the only artist to make it a solo instrument. Landing, unheralded in Berlin, from Paris, he hired a large room and filled it with empty chairs. Then he conducted to an invisible orchestra. Thus he rehearsed, and when he was ready, he hired the best manager in Berlin to advertise his first concert—incidentally, he also had hired an orchestra. The fates swung a kindly baton and quick-timed him up the heights. He boycotts both Russia and Italy—the latter country for what Mussolini's bravos did to Toscanini. He is 58.

Senator Daniel O. Hastings.

Senator Daniel O. Hastings of Delaware double-shot the headlines yesterday. It was his fifty-sixth birthday, and it was he and no other who stirred up the congressional move against Wall Street shorts. On Oct. 2 of last year, he wrote Richard S. Whitney, urging that he chain up his bears. On Dec. 14, he introduced a resolution to investigate the stock exchange, and the resolution just adopted by the senate banking and currency committee is a modification of his original draft.

Senator Hastings went to congress in 1920 and moved obscurely in the social hinterland until a clever little vaudeville skit made him a blazing success, late in 1929. At a dinner company, he put on an imitation of Tom Heflin denouncing the pope. From then the S. R. O. sign was up at all dinners attended by the senator. The act was so successful that he dressed the part, statesman's uniform and all. He is short, fat and humorous, with a mischievous eye—bored by senate debates and rarely participating. He was secretary of state, associate justice of the supreme court and deputy attorney-general of Delaware.

(Copyright, 1932, by C. P. A.)

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND, ORE.
OREGON JOURNAL

MAR 5 - 1932

FOURTEEN years ago, Serge Koussevitzky was conducting an orchestra wearing mittens on the banks of the frozen Volga. It is hastily explained that the mittens had so many holes in them that the musicians could finger the strings. "We must keep up with our music," said Kerensky, in the midst of the fighting, and Koussevitzky did the best he could. With his fingers still half frozen he went to Paris and climbed swiftly to the leadership of the Boston Symphony orchestra, rebuilding it after Dr. Karl Muck went to Fort Oglethorpe. His great acclaim and his distinguished presence as he conducted the Bostonians at Carnegie Hall, Thursday night made all this seem "far away and long ago."

He is the only great virtuoso of the bull fiddle—the only artist to make it a solo instrument. Landing, unheralded in Berlin, from Paris, he hired a large room and filled it with empty chairs. Then he conducted to an invisible orchestra. Thus he rehearsed, and when he was ready he hired the best manager in Berlin to advertise his first concert—incidentally, he also had hired an orchestra. The fates swung a kindly baton and quick-timed him in the heights. He boycotts both Russia and Italy—the latter country for what Mussolini's bravos did to Toscanini. He is 58.

Continued From Page One

Music and Musicians

By W. J. HENDERSON

Mar 5

BERNARDINO MOLINARI conducted Ravel's "Bolero" in Philadelphia last week. Doubtless many young music lovers will bewail his omission of this exciting composition from his New York program. But the season is not yet at an end; there may be a performance of the "Bolero." The writer of these Saturday reflections will endeavor to avoid hearing that piece of music when it again shatters the peace of the art domain. From some public reactions discovered lately this recorder derives a suspicion that he is not alone in his feeling of fatigue under the incessant steam hammerings of some contemporaneous music. May it not be possible that the gradual return of Mozart into general favor is a sign not to be overlooked? First Bach and then Mozart. Does it not mean something?

There was a demonstration of extraordinary warmth when Bruno Walter recently played the solo part of Mozart's A major piano concerto, acting as conductor at the same time. It could not be that the feat alone sufficed to evoke such vigorous approval. There must have been something in the music itself and in the truly Mozartean performance. It is no news that Mozart was opposed to all exaggerations, and that he demanded a smooth, flowing style, always tasteful and elegant. Mr. Walter gave us that. We enjoyed it. We were not conscious of any irresistible driving force, nor of any irritation of nerves. All was reposeful, serene, beautiful—in the sense attributed to that abused adjective by the Greeks.

When the "Bolero" was produced in London one of the newspaper writers said:

> "By the time a solo trombone gets hold of the second tune the orchestra is waking up. The audience is now smiling—but rather nervously, for there is something slightly sinister about the effect on one's nerves of that inexorable rhythm. The climax of the piece approaches. The trumpets are screaming the tunes; and the orchestra, which at the beginning of the dance had seemed almost lethargic, now seems like a horde of dervishes, and the end is a frenzy. The audience welcomes the end—there is a feeling in the air that if the thing had gone on another five minutes, some one might have become hysterical."

In Paris in 1793 a frenzied mob of revolutionists danced a dance even more hysterical than the bolero. Drunk with brandy stolen from chalices, wrapped in the robes of priests, and laden with spoils from sanctuaries, the people stormed into the convention. Several members sprang from their chairs, and, taking the hands of flaunting girls of the Paris streets, danced with them the mad dance of that time, the carmagnole. Nothing could stop that dance but a Corsican megalomaniac and a "whiff of grape shot."

* * *

Puts and Calls in Beauty.

IT MUST be clear to most music lovers that the time has not arrived for the formation of a correct judgment about contemporaneous music. The late Henry Edward Krehbiel wrote long ago about a symphony of Bruckner, "It may be beautiful twenty years hence; it is not beautiful now." That pronouncement can be made about much of the music produced in this troubled period. Those of us who grew up with Bach and Beethoven, Brahms, Wagner and Strauss, may not be ready to assimilate new formulae and new conceptions of fundamental materials for musical composition. Many of the young men and women now in the conservatories will undoubtedly find little difficulty in adjusting their receptivity to that which is not uncommon in their day.

Some of the oldest music lovers mourn bitterly the advent of every modernist work. Some have been heard to say that if that is what music is going to be they will be forced to feed their appetite for beauty with some other art. For their comfort it may be pointed out that the modernists themselves do not desire to see the creations of the old masters relegated to desuetude. They are among the most earnest students of Bach and Beethoven. One might note that Serge Koussevitzky, the distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, swings with the ease and grace of a pendulum from Hindmith to Brahms and from Beethoven to Aaron Copland. He had the benefit of an extended residence in the modern Athens, Paris, before coming to this country and he returns every summer to that center of intellectual curiosity to refresh his soul in the market place of signs and wonders.

In spite of all that has been done in urging the world to listen to the gospel of Schoenberg and his kind, there are far more performances of the ancients than of the moderns. In our own land Philadelpia evidently aspires to the position of leader in experimental musical art and Leopold Stokowski is one of the high priests of modernism. Yet this same Mr. Stokowski is one of the foremost interpreters of Brahms, whose music lies light years away from the ideals and achievements of the new adventurers.

It is altogether likely that the art of music will continue to make its development untouched by the theories of young gentlemen desiring to subject it to exploratory operations. Men are pretty much the same sort of beings now that they were in the days of the Cæsars, although they clothe themselves differently, wear their hair differently, and do not speak Latin.

* * *

He is short, fat and humorous, with a mischievous eye—bored by Senate debates and rarely participating. He was Secretary of State, associate justice of the Supreme Court and Deputy Attorney-General of Delaware.

FOURTEEN years ago Serge Koussevitzky was conducting an orchestra wearing mittens on the banks of

He is the only great virtuoso of the bull fiddle—the only artist to make it a solo instrument. Landing, unheralded in Berlin, from Paris, he hired a large room and filled it with empty chairs. Then he conducted to an invisible orchestra. Thus he rehearsed, and when he was ready he hired the best manager in Berlin to advertise his first concert—incidentally, he also had hired an orchestra. The fates swung a kindly baton and quick-timed him up the heights. He boycotts both Russia and Italy—the latter country for what Mussolini's bravos did to Toscanini. He is 58.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
OMAHA, NEB.
WORLD-HERALD

MAR 5 - 1932

Koussevitzky Panics New York with His Baton

BY LEMUEL F. PARTON.

New York, March 4 (C. P. A.)—Fourteen years ago, Serge Koussevitzky was conducting an orchestra wearing mittens on the banks of the frozen Volga. It is hastily explained that the mittens had so many holes in them that the musicians could finger the strings. "We must keep up with our music," said Kerensky, in the midst of the fighting, and Koussevitzky did the best he could.

With his finger still half frozen he went to Paris and climbed swiftly to the leadership of the Boston Symphony orchestra, rebuilding it after Dr. Karl Muck went to Fort Oglethorpe. His great acclaim and his distinguished presence as he conducted the Bostonians at Carnegie hall Thursday night made all this seem "far away and long ago."

He is the only great virtuoso of the bull fiddle—the only artist to make it a solo instrument. Landing, unheralded in Berlin, from Paris, he hired a large room and filled it with empty chairs. Then he conducted to an invisible orchestra. Thus he rehearsed, and when he was ready he hired the best manager in Berlin to advertise his first concert—incidentally, he also had hired an orchestra. The fates swung a kindly baton and quick-timed him up the heights. He boycotts both and Italy—the latter coun

what Mussolini's bravos
Toscanini. He is 58.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
CHRONICLE

MAR 6 - 1932

Gustav Holst, British composer, was guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra recently in a program of his own music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SCRANTON, PA.
TIMES

MAR 7 1932

Serge Koussevitzky.

Fourteen years ago, Serge Koussevitzky was conducting an orchestra wearing mittens on the banks of the frozen Volga. It is hastily explained that the mittens had so many holes in them that the musicians could find the sctrings. "We must keep up with our music," said Kerensky, in the midst of the fighting, and Koussevitsky did the best he could. With his fingers still half frozen he went to Paris and climbed swiftly to the leadership of the Boston Symphony orchestra, rebuilding it after Dr. Karl Muck went to Fort Oglethorpe. His great acclaim and his distinguished presence as he conducted the Bostonians at Carnegie hall Thursday night made all this seem "far away and long ago."

He is the only great virtuoso of the bull fiddle—the only artist to make it a solo instrument. Landing, unheralded in Berlin, from Paris, he hired a large room and filled it with empty chairs. Then he conducted to an invisible orchestra. Thus he rehearsed, and when he was ready he hired the best manager in Berlin to advertise his first concert—incidentally, he also had hired an orchestra. The fates swung a kindly baton and quick-timed him up the heights. He boycotts both Russia and Italy—the latter country for what Mussolini's bravos did to Toscanini. He is fifty-eight.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEWS & HERALD
NEWBURYPORT, MASS.

MAR 11 1932

We are always surprised whe
something unexpectedly reveals ho many of our friends and acquaintances attend regularly or occasionally the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The music ther takes a certain technical training. I is perhaps to most of us an acquire taste. But we envy those who hav acquired it their anticipations an pleasure in the Symphony, now, under Dr. Koussevitsky, apparently its highest mark.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST

MAR 7 - 1932

Music : By Oscar Thompson

Beecham and Koussevitzky Provide Orchestral Contrasts in Week-End Concerts—Sibelius and a Hindemith Novelty

STILL limping from a fall off the podium at a rehearsal before his first concert on Wednesday, Sir Thomas Beecham discoursed Boccherini, Brahms and Richard Strauss in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, to the obvious pleasure of Philharmonic-Symphony Society subscribers. Boccherini never was accorded a place among the three B's, though he was a composer of parts before Beethoven's star arose, and died a quarter of a century before Brahms was born. This priority, however, remains entirely chronological. It was Boccherini's destiny to write a minuet everybody knows. 'Cellists will continue to regard him as a public benefactor because he bequeathed to them a concerto they all can play. Museums and collectors of antiquities find him useful as a source for original manuscripts to put beneath the glass of their exhibitions rooms.

But the industrious Luigi is not so dead as all that. The symphony in C major played by Sir Thomas yesterday afternoon, and by Serge Koussevitzky some years ago, as edited by Dr. Sondheimer of Berlin, is still a pleasurable experience in the concert room, because of its unabashed melody, its ingenuity, its structural grace and its tender, resourceful scoring; even though it says little or nothing that Haydn and Mozart did not say with more saliency and distinction in stronger works of similar character. Literature does not despise its minor poets. Boccherini, when disclosed with the affection that characterized the playing yesterday, is of their order, a poet, if a minor one.

The eighteenth century singing of the prolific Italian sounded a suitable prelude for the autumnal splendors of the Brahms Third Symphony. We were not always one with the "reading." The redoubtable Ernest Newman has spoken of Sir Thomas as the foremost melodist among symphony conductors. Yesterday we felt an overzealous quest of melody in this music. The second movement was of haunting charm, but the first lost something of breadth for the sake of tune. Sir Thomas again made clear his grasp. The symphony was transparent, euphonious, well proportioned, and it moved.

The Strauss "Don Quixote" was played warmly and with the sensibility that is necessary if its handful of programmatic absurdities is not to take an undue place of prominence at the expense of its wealth of tenderness and charm. Alfred Wallenstein and Rene Pollain characterized the addled knight and his loyal squire in 'cello and viola playing of the high quality to be expected of two such fine artists. For the audience, the afternoon was one of tempered but apparently unforced enthusiasms.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY and his Boston Symphony contributed to the New York season one of its more momentous concerts Saturday afternoon, not only by reason of the generally high character of the playing but because the program was one of strength and variety, unhackneyed in its conformation. The concert began with a skillful arrangement by Maximilian Steinberg of a Concerto in D major, originally for a small group of strings, written by the "Berlin" Bach, Carl Philipp Emanuel, he whose duty it was to accompany the flute solos of Frederick the Great. This is engaging, stimulating music and in the slow movement much more than that. The Andante sings of ineffable things, recalling the noble lyric gravity of Father Johann Sebastian and glancing down the years toward the Wagner of Hans Sachs and Amfortas.

Thereafter came a first performance in New York of another of the numerous works written for the fiftieth anniversary celebration of this orchestra a year ago. Paul Hindemith's Konzertmusik for Strings and Brass, as thus disclosed, is one of the sturdiest and most convincing works that have come out of Central Europe in the post-war years. It avoids the romantic and the frankly emotional, but the effect is not merely that of ingenious writing in an advanced idiom. It is liberally dissonant but by no means continuously so. There is material that stands muster for its own sake and it is used, polytonally and otherwise, with a sure hand. Each of the two movements proceeds inexorably toward its goal. The brass writing is bold, the strings bite deep. This may not be music to build affections, but it is music to silence the scoffer and provoke thought.

PERHAPS for contrast's sake the Boston conductor then gave a brilliant performance of a Ravel colorsplurge, the "Rhapsodie Espagnole," before passing on to the supreme music of the afternoon, Sibelius's Second Symphony (D major, Op. 43). Written thirty years ago, here is a symphony that does not need to fear the devastating maw of time. In a sense, it

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION

MAR 11 1932

Easter Sunday will probably find a number of Springfield music lovers going to Boston for on that day Bach's "B Minor Mass" will be sung by the combined Radcliffe College and Harvard Glee Clubs under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky in Symphony Hall. With the Boston Symphony Orchestra accompanying and such soloists as Margaret Matzenauer and Richard Crooks it should be a magnificent performance, as it was when we heard it last spring.

This colossal work was written between 1733 and 1738, the Kyrie and the Gloria having been completed in 1733 and the rest in 1738. The work was conceived on stupendous lines outclassing anything Bach had written before or any other masses of the time. Each portion of the work has the dimensions of a cantata. Unimportant texts are developed into large arias or complicated fugal choruses and the variety of musical material used is incredible. The Kyrie alone consists of three elaborate parts, the first of which ends in an elaborate five-part fugal chorus.

The Gloria and Credo consists of eight musically complete parts and the Crucifixus is one of the most amazing portions of the work. The Sanctus is a massive six-part chorus, the Osanna is an eight-part chorus, the Benedictus is a tenor solo with violin obbligato and the Agnus Dei a contralto solo.

The great difficulty of the work has caused it to be infrequently performed. It was first given in Berlin in 1835. Its first American performance was given in Bethlehem, Pa., in 1900 at the Bach Festival under the direction of J. Frederick Wolle.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
LOWELL, MASS.
EVE. LEADER

MAR 11 1932

Music Ancient and Modern.

Writing to the Boston Herald, a visitor to Boston from Maine expresses her disappointment at the inclusion on a recent program by the Boston Symphony orchestra of Mr. Aaron Copland's symphonic "Ode." But we are inclined to agree with another correspondent, who feels that Dr. Koussevitzky was amply warranted in giving this composition a hearing.

The composer is an American of admitted musical attainments. He is still young enough to suggest that his musical ideas are not permanently fixed. Being a modern, he naturally seeks to express himself in that idiom. But there is not going to be any development in American musical composition if the efforts of our young composers are to be relegated to the shelf. Our musicians will progress as the merits or defects of their works are revealed in actual performance.

The conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, as is evident from the general character of his programs, still gives chief place to acknowledged masterpieces. But very properly, while paying high tribute to the past, he deems it the duty of a broad-minded musician to explore current musical achievements.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. AMERICAN

MAR 11 1932

Words and Music

By Deems Taylor

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra celebrated its fiftieth anniversary two years ago with a composition shower. From all over the world came works from eminent composers, written in honor of the Bostonians' birthday party. So many were there, in fact, that Mr. Koussevitzky and his men must have been sitting up nights ever since, trying to get them all played off. Only a week or so ago did the band complete the list with a Symphonic Ode by Aaron Copland.

At least Mr. Koussevitzky is not selfish. He lets other conductors play with his birthday presents. Tuesday night, for instance, Mr. Molinari and the Philadelphia Orchestra presented a work by Ottorino Respighi that had been custom-made for the Back Bay Hemicentennial.

It is called Metamorphoseon modi XII—a super-elegant way of saying "theme with twelve variations." The main theme, stated almost without preliminaries, and curiously akin to the Shepherd's tune at the opening of the last act of Tristan, pursues a stormy and adventurous career that taxes the resources of an augmented modern orchestra, including a pipe organ.

* * *

THE trouble with variations is that they are, unless heavily disguised, too small a form for the use to which they are usually put. Played on a piano, or by a chamber ensemble, a set of variations may be absorbingly interesting; the comparative monotony of tone color is relieved by the variety of shapes in which the main theme appears. But when a set of ten, twelve, or fourteen variations is assigned to a symphony orchestra, the constant shifting of color, as well as the permutations and transmutations of the material, is too much. The variations have got to be short, unless the piece is to last all night; and the result is an inevitable impression of scrappiness. The composer is made to sound short-breathed and tentative.

One has the impression of hearing a salesman offering samples of his wares: "Now here's something you might like; simple, but good (24 bars; full stop). Or perhaps you'd like something a trifle more elaborate (32 bars; full stop). No? Well, try this one (28 bars; full stop); or this (16 bars; full stop)"—and so on. No sooner has the musical thought begun to develop than it is cut off, in the bloom of its youth, to make room for another idea.

* * *

STRAUSS solves the problem most successfully in Don Quixote, where he avoids jerkiness by leaving out the full stops—a simple device, but an effective one. His variations take their place as parts of what is practically a continuous and carefully structured development of a single theme.

Respighi tries another plan. His first two variations are enough alike, in mood and development, to correspond roughly to the first movement of a symphony. The next two form, approximately, a slow movement, and the fifth and sixth are equivalent to a scherzo. After that, however, he lets nature take its course, sometimes running one variation into another so that it is hard to tell when one leaves off and the other begins. Except to those in whose veins runs a strain of detective blood this is, of course, of no consequence.

Even so, the Metamorphoseon lack something of the cohesiveness that one instinctively expects in a major work for grand orchestra. Which did not prevent my enjoying them exceedingly, and looking forward to hearing them again.

* * *

THIS heretical pleasure derives, I suppose, from the fact that I like Respighi's ideas. In music, as in people, one may love what one does not unreservedly admire. A may be a fine fellow and a credit to his country, deserving of respect and veneration—and may, none the less, bore you to death; while B, who is a bit of a wastrel and a scofflaw, and whose family life is deplorable, may be one of the joys of your life.

So with Respighi, so far as I am concerned. I admit all his faults—his tendency to long-windedness, his fondness for climaxes more notable for decibels than for eloquence, the occasional literalness and lack of imagination with which he develops his material. None the less, I like his music. It has a speaking quality, a sort of aliveness, that is not frequent in modern musical utterance. Whatever use he may make of his themes, they have dignity, and plasticity, and, at their best, a mournful beauty that I find immensely moving.

His harmony has warmth and color, and is neither hackneyed nor consciously bizarre; and his orchestration is distinctive and always effective. He may, upon occasion, make one wish that he could have said his say somewhat otherwise; but his fundamental ideas are almost invariably worth hearing. He is every inch a composer.

* * *

MR. RESPIGHI was present to hear his piece played, acknowledging the applause it occasioned by bowing from his place in a first tier box on the right (thereby causing numerous persons in the dress circle and balcony seats on the right to come perilously near to breaking their necks). He had to bow three times. I suspect New York of liking him as well as his music.

For the other offerings of the evening Mr. Molinari went to not too conventional sources. There was no symphony, the Respighi work taking its place. The concert began with a lovely Corelli suite, transcribed for strings by Pinelli, and ended with Debussy's La Mer and Strauss' Til Eulenspiegel. A good program.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

THIS CLIPPING FROM
OMAHA, NEB.
WORLD-HERALD

MAR 5 - 1932

Koussevitzky Panics New York with His Baton

BY LEMUEL F. PARTON.

New York, March 4 (C. P. A.)—Fourteen years ago, Serge Koussevitzky was conducting an orchestra wearing mittens on the banks of the frozen Volga. It is hastily explained that the mittens had so many holes in them that the musicians could finger the strings. "We must keep up with our music," said Kerensky, in the midst of the fighting, and Koussevitsky did the best he could.

With his finger still half frozen he went to Paris and climbed swiftly to the leadership of the Boston Symphony orchestra, rebuilding it after Dr. Karl Muck went to Fort Oglethorpe. His great acclaim and his distinguished presence as he conducted the Bostonians at Carnegie hall Thursday night made all this seem "far away and long ago."

He is the only great virtuoso of the bull fiddle—the only artist to make it a solo instrument. Landing, unheralded in Berlin, from Paris, he hired a large room and filled it with empty chairs. Then he conducted to an invisible orchestra. Thus he rehearsed, and when he was ready he hired the best manager in Berlin to advertise his first concert—incidentally, he also had hired an orchestra. The fates swung a kindly baton and quick-timed him up the heights. He boycotts both and Italy—the latter coun

what Mussolini's bravos
Toscanini. He is 58.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
CHRONICLE

MAR 6 -1932

Gustav Holst, British composer, was guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra recently in a program of his own music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SCRANTON, PA.
TIMES

MAR 7 1932

Serge Koussevitzky.

Fourteen years ago, Serge Koussevitzky was conducting an orchestra wearing mittens on the banks of the frozen Volga. It is hastily explained that the mittens had so many holes in them that the musicians could find the sctrings. "We must keep up with our music," said Kerensky, in the midst of the fighting, and Koussevitsky did the best he could. With his fingers still half frozen he went to Paris and climbed swiftly to the leadership of the Boston Symphony orchestra, rebuilding it after Dr. Karl Muck went to Fort Oglethorpe. His great acclaim and his distinguished presence as he conducted the Bostonians at Carnegie hall Thursday night made all this seem "far away and long ago."

He is the only great virtuoso of the bull fiddle—the only artist to make it a solo instrument. Landing, unheralded in Berlin, from Paris, he hired a large room and filled it with empty chairs. Then he conducted to an invisible orchestra. Thus he rehearsed, and when he was ready he hired the best manager in Berlin to advertise his first concert—incidentally, he also had hired an orchestra. The fates swung a kindly baton and quick-timed him up the heights. He boycotts both Russia and Italy—the latter country for what Mussolini's bravos did to Toscanini. He is fifty-eight.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEWS & HERALD
NEWBURYPORT, MASS.

MAR 11 1932

We are always surprised whe
something unexpectedly reveals ho many of our friends and acquain tances attend regularly or occasional ly the concerts of the Boston Sym phony Orchestra. The music the takes a certain technical training. I is perhaps to most of us an acquire taste. But we envy those who hav acquired it their anticipations an pleasure in the Symphony, now, u der Dr. Koussevitsky, apparently its highest mark.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST

MAR 7 - 1932

Music : By Oscar Thompson

Beecham and Koussevitzky Provide Orchestral Contrasts in Week-End Concerts—Sibelius and a Hindemith Novelty

STILL limping from a fall off the podium at a rehearsal before his first concert on Wednesday, Sir Thomas Beecham discoursed Boccherini, Brahms and Richard Strauss in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, to the obvious pleasure of Philharmonic-Symphony Society subscribers. Boccherini never was accorded a place among the three B's, though he was a composer of parts before Beethoven's star arose, and died a quarter of a century before Brahms was born. This priority, however, remains entirely chronological. It was Boccherini's destiny to write a minuet everybody knows. 'Cellists will continue to regard him as a public benefactor because he bequeathed to them a concerto they all can play. Museums and collectors of antiquities find him useful as a source for original manuscripts to put beneath the glass of their exhibitions rooms.

But the industrious Luigi is not so dead as all that. The symphony in C major played by Sir Thomas yesterday afternoon, and by Serge Koussevitzky some years ago, as edited by Dr. Sondheimer of Berlin, is still a pleasurable experience in the concert room, because of its unabashed melody, its ingenuity, its structural grace and its tender, resourceful scoring; even though it says little or nothing that Haydn and Mozart did not say with more saliency and distinction in stronger works of similar character. Literature does not despise its minor poets. Boccherini, when disclosed with the affection that characterized the playing yesterday, is of their order, a poet, if a minor one.

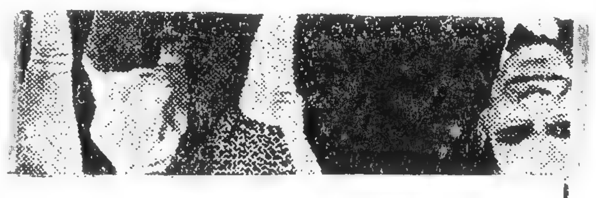
The eighteenth century singing of the prolific Italian sounded a suitable prelude for the autumnal splendors of the Brahms Third Symphony. We were not always one with the "reading." The redoubtable Ernest Newman has spoken of Sir Thomas as the foremost melodist among symphony conductors. Yesterday we felt an overzealous quest of melody in this music. The second movement was of haunting charm, but the first lost something of breadth for the sake of tune. Sir Thomas again made clear his grasp. The symphony was transparent, euphonious, well proportioned, and it moved.

The Strauss "Don Quixote" was played warmly and with the sensibility that is necessary if its handful of programmatic absurdities is not to take an undue place of prominence at the expense of its wealth of tenderness and charm. Alfred Wallenstein and Rene Pollain characterized the addled knight and his loyal squire in 'cello and viola playing of the high quality to be expected of two such fine artists. For the audience, the afternoon was one of tempered but apparently unforced enthusiasms.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY and his Boston Symphony contributed to the New York season one of its more momentous concerts Saturday afternoon, not only by reason of the generally high character of the playing but because the program was one of strength and variety, unhackneyed in its conformation. The concert began with a skillful arrangement by Maximilian Steinberg of a Concerto in D major, originally for a small group of strings, written by the "Berlin" Bach, Carl Philipp Emanuel, he whose duty it was to accompany the flute solos of Frederick the Great. This is engaging, stimulating music and in the slow movement much more than that. The Andante sings of ineffable things, recalling the noble lyric gravity of Father Johann Sebastian and glancing down the years toward the Wagner of Hans Sachs and Amfortas.

Thereafter came a first performance in New York of another of the numerous works written for the fiftieth anniversary celebration of this orchestra a year ago. Paul Hindemith's Konzertmusik for Strings and Brass, as thus disclosed, is one of the sturdiest and most convincing works that have come out of Central Europe in the post-war years. It avoids the romantic and the frankly emotional, but the effect is not merely that of ingenious writing in an advanced idiom. It is liberally dissonant but by no means continuously so. There is material that stands muster for its own sake and it is used, polytonally and otherwise, with a sure hand. Each of the two movements proceeds inexorably toward its goal. The brass writing is bold, the strings bite deep. This may not be music to build affections, but it is music to silence the scoffer and provoke thought.

PERHAPS for contrast's sake the Boston conductor then gave a brilliant performance of a Ravel color-splurge, the "Rhapsodie Espagnole," before passing on to the supreme music of the afternoon, Sibelius's Second Symphony (D major, Op. 43). Written thirty years ago, here is a symphony that does not need to fear the devastating maw of time. In a sense, it is early Sibelius, but it is true Sibelius, with much less that can be regarded as derivative than is discoverable in the First Symphony. It sings nobly and tenderly, with perhaps less of darkness of spirit than was formerly found in it. The conclusion is on a plane of high heroism, scarcely to be experienced unmoved. This is "he-man" music, vital, strong, winning, filled with personality and humanity.



the Agnus Dei a contralto solo.

The great difficulty of the work has caused it to be infrequently performed. It was first given in Berlin in 1835. Its first American performance was given in Bethlehem, Pa., in 1900 at the Bach Festival under the direction of J. Frederick Wolle.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
LOWELL, MASS.
EVE. LEADER

MAR 11 1932

Music Ancient and Modern.

Writing to the Boston Herald, a visitor to Boston from Maine expresses her disappointment at the inclusion on a recent program by the Boston Symphony orchestra of Mr. Aaron Copland's symphonic "Ode." But we are inclined to agree with another correspondent, who feels that Dr. Koussevitzky was amply warranted in giving this composition a hearing.

The composer is an American of admitted musical attainments. He is still young enough to suggest that his musical ideas are not permanently fixed. Being a modern, he naturally seeks to express himself in that idiom. But there is not going to be any development in American musical composition if the efforts of our young composers are to be relegated to the shelf. Our musicians will progress as the merits or defects of their works are revealed in actual performance.

The conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, as is evident from the general character of his programs, still gives chief place to acknowledged masterpieces. But very properly, while paying high tribute to the past, he deems it the duty of a broad-minded musician to explore current musical achievements.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. AMERICAN

MAR 11 1932

Words and Music

By Deems Taylor

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra celebrated its fiftieth anniversary two years ago with a composition shower. From all over the world came works from eminent composers, written in honor of the Bostonians' birthday party. So many were there, in fact, that Mr. Koussevitzky and his men must have been sitting up nights ever since, trying to get them all played off. Only a week or so ago did the band complete the list with a Symphonic Ode by Aaron Copland.

At least Mr. Koussevitzky is not selfish. He lets other conductors play with his birthday presents. Tuesday night, for instance, Mr. Molinari and the Philadelphia Orchestra presented a work by Ottorino Respighi that had been custom-made for the Back Bay Hemicentennial.

It is called Metamorphoseon modi XII—a super-elegant way of saying "theme with twelve variations." The main theme, stated almost without preliminaries, and curiously akin to the Shepherd's tune at the opening of the last act of Tristan, pursues a stormy and adventurous career that taxes the resources of an augmented modern orchestra, including a pipe organ.

* * *

THE trouble with variations is that they are, unless heavily disguised, too small a form for the use to which they are usually put. Played on a piano, or by a chamber ensemble, a set of variations may be absorbingly interesting; the comparative monotony of tone color is relieved by the variety of shapes in which the main theme appears. But when a set of ten, twelve, or fourteen variations is assigned to a symphony orchestra, the constant shifting of color, as well as the permutations and transmutations of the material, is too much. The variations have got to be short, unless the piece is to last all night; and the result is an inevitable impression of scrappiness. The composer is made to sound short-breathed and tentative.

One has the impression of hearing a salesman offering samples of his wares: "Now here's something you might like; simple, but good (24 bars; full stop). Or perhaps you'd like something a trifle more elaborate (32 bars; full stop). No? Well, try this one (28 bars; full stop); or this (16 bars; full stop)"—and so on. No sooner has the musical thought begun to develop than it is cut off, in the bloom of its youth, to make room for another idea.

* * *

STRAUSS solves the problem most successfully in Don Quixote, where he avoids jerkiness by leaving out the full stops—a simple device, but an effective one. His variations take their place as parts of what is practically a continuous and carefully structured development of a single theme.

Respighi tries another plan. His first two variations are enough alike, in mood and development, to correspond roughly to the first movement of a symphony. The next two form, approximately, a slow movement, and the fifth and sixth are equivalent to a scherzo. After that, however, he lets nature take its course, sometimes running one variation into another so that it is hard to tell when one leaves off and the other begins. Except to those in whose veins runs a strain of detective blood this is, of course, of no consequence.

Even so, the Metamorphoseon lack something of the cohesiveness that one instinctively expects in a major work for grand orchestra. Which did not prevent my enjoying them exceedingly, and looking forward to hearing them again.

* * *

THIS heretical pleasure derives, I suppose, from the fact that I like Respighi's ideas. In music, as in people, one may love what one does not unreservedly admire. A may be a fine fellow and a credit to his country, deserving of respect and veneration—and may, none the less, bore you to death; while B, who is a bit of a wastrel and a scofflaw, and whose family life is deplorable, may be one of the joys of your life.

So with Respighi, so far as I am concerned. I admit all his faults—his tendency to long-windedness, his fondness for climaxes more notable for decibels than for eloquence, the occasional literalness and lack of imagination with which he develops his material. None the less, I like his music. It has a speaking quality, a sort of aliveness, that is not frequent in modern musical utterance. Whatever use he may make of his themes, they have dignity, and plasticity, and, at their best, a mournful beauty that I find immensely moving.

His harmony has warmth and color, and is neither hackneyed nor consciously bizarre; and his orchestration is distinctive and always effective. He may, upon occasion, make one wish that he could have said his say somewhat otherwise; but his fundamental ideas are almost invariably worth hearing. He is every inch a composer.

* * *

MR. RESPIGHI was present to hear his piece played, acknowledging the applause it occasioned by bowing from his place in a first tier box on the right (thereby causing numerous persons in the dress circle and balcony seats on the right to come perilously near to breaking their necks). He had to bow three times. I suspect New York of liking him as well as his music.

For the other offerings of the evening Mr. Molinari went to not too conventional sources. There was no symphony, the Respighi work taking its place. The concert began with a lovely Corelli suite, transcribed for strings by Pinelli, and ended with Debussy's La Mer and Strauss' Til Eulenspiegel. A good program.

159

THIS CLIPPING FROM LOWELL, MASS.
LEADER

MAR 11 1932

Music Ancient and Modern.

Writing to the Boston Herald, a visitor to Boston from Maine expresses her disappointment at the inclusion on a recent program by the Boston Symphony orchestra of Mr. Aaron Copland's symphonic "Ode." But we are inclined to agree with another correspondent, who feels that Dr. Koussevitzky was amply warranted in giving this composition a hearing.

The composer is an American of admitted musical attainments. He is still young enough to suggest that his musical ideas are not permanently fixed. Being a modern, he naturally seeks to express himself in that idiom. But there is not going to be any development in American musical composition if the efforts of our young composers are to be relegated to the shelf. Our musicians will progress as the merits or defects of their works are revealed in actual performance.

The conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, as is evident from the general character of his programs, still gives chief place to acknowledged masterpieces. But very properly, while paying high tribute to the past, he deems it the duty of a broad-minded musician to explore current musical achievements.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

12 1932

CHOICE PROGRAM FOR CONCERT BY BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

As the date for the appearance of the Boston Symphony orchestra in the Auditorium draws near the management is having many inquiries as to the program the great orchestra under Dr Koussevitzky will play on Apri. 6. From lovers of modern music there has been an insistent demand for the works of present day composers while the devotees of the old school have not been backward in suggesting their likes for the classical compositions. Dr Koussevitzky has been advised of these preferences and he has shown his masterly ability in program-making by choosing works that will delight the modernists and combining with them one of the greatest classical symphonies.

The program will open with the ancient and meloudius suite of Corelli, followed by a poem for orchestra, "Prairie" from the American composer, Leo Sowerby. This work is being introduced by Dr Koussevitzky extensively in the East and he has great faith in its merit. Following this the orchestra will play Ravel's second suite "Daphnis et Chloe," a rarely beautiful modern work and considered one of the most brilliant pieces of the Boston Symphony orchestra under Dr Koussevitzky.

Following the intermission the orchestra will render Beethoven's magnificent "Eroica" Symphony No. 3 in E flat major; considered one of the greatest of all symphonies and one tha. will show this incomparable organization at its very best.

The directors of the Springfield Symphony orchestra are delighted with Dr Koussevitzky's choice of the Springfield program and agree that it will prove one of the greatest concerts Springfield has ever had. The program:—

Corelli .... Suite
Sarabande-Gigue-Badinerie
Sowerby .... "Prairie"
Poem for orchestra
Ravel .... "Daphnis et Chloe"
Ballet: Second suite
Lever du Jour-Pantomime-Danse Generale
Beethoven Symphony No. 3 in E flat major, "Eroica," Op. 55.
1. Allegro con brio
2. Maracia funebre: adagio assai
3. Scherzo: allegro vivace: trio
4. Finale: allegro molto

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION

12 1932

SYMPHONY WILL PLAY BOTH OLD AND NEW WORKS

Moderns to Have Prominent Place on Forthcoming Concert Here on Public Demand.

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes here April 6 under the auspices of the Springfield Symphony Orchestra a fine program of old and modern works will be presented. There has been considerable demand that the orchestra play modern works, for Dr. Serge Koussevitzky is justly famous for his interpretation of the moderns.

Thus the program is divided into two parts, the first part opening with a "Suite" by Corelli and including one of Sowerby's latest works "Prairie." Mr. Sowerby is one of the best known American composers. Ravel will be represented by his "Daphnis et Chloe" ballet, second suite. This was played by the orchestra in Northampton a few weeks ago.

The second half of the program will be devoted to the Beethoven "Symphony No. 3 in E flat major, Eroica, Op. 55." When this symphony was played in Hartford by the orchestra a few weeks ago it aroused unusual enthusiasm.

The program in detail:

Suite. Corelli
Sarabande, Gigue, Badinerie.
Prairie, poem for orchestra. Sowerby
Daphnis et Chloe, ballet, second suite. Ravel
Lever du Jour, Pantomine, Danse Generale.
Symphony No. 3 in E flat major, Eroica, Op. 55, Beethoven
Allegro con brio.
Marcia funebre: Adagio assai
Scherzo: Allegro vivace: Trio.
Finale: Allegro molto.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
TIMES
GLOUCESTER, MASS.

(4) MAR 12 1932

We are always surprised when something unexpectedly reveals how many of our friends, and acquaintances attend, regularly or occasionally, the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The music there takes a certain technical training. It is perhaps to most of us an acquired taste. But we envy those who have acquired it, their anticipations and pleasure in the Symphony now, under Dr. Koussevitzky, apparently at its highest mark.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS

MAR 13 1932

Music Notes

JEAN SIBELIUS, Finnish composer, has just completed his new symphony. The score is beinf forwarded to Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will conduct the premiere, in the spring.

* * *

N. Y. SUN

MAR 12 1932

Music and Musicians

By W. J. HENDERSON

THERE have been many observances of anniversaries, but music has enjoyed none of such prolonged delight as that of the fiftieth year of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The date of the semicentennial fell in 1931; we are still listening to the compositions prepared for the festival. Three of them have fallen upon our ears within a week. These were Aaron Copland's "Symphonic Ode," Paul Hindemith's "Concert Music" for strings and brass, both presented by the Boston musicians, and Ottorino Respighi's "Metamorphosen," performed by the Philadelphia Orchestra last Tuesday evening. The audiences responded to the revelations with uncertain demonstrations.

All three of the compositions proved to be well worth hearing, but it can hardly be doubted that the palm must be awarded to Mr. Copland. The music of the gifted German was perhaps more disputable in its proclamation, while the Italian master's score gave the impression of hard work and a grand marshaling of methods with a modicum of spontaneity. However, it may sound better the next time we hear it. And there will be a next time, for so long as Italian conductors visit our orchestral platforms we shall surely enjoy repetitions of Italian novelties.

Glad news comes from Italy by way of Mr. Respighi, who has arrived to superintend the production of his mystery, "Maria Egiziaca." That will come upon us next week. Mr. Respighi has said that atonality is dead among Italian composers and that they are returning to old ways. Now there ought not to be any solid objection to atonality, which is a term made to signify the freedom of music from the domination of a ruling tonality. There can be no reasonable ground for declaring that a composer must not rove around from key to key with complete disregard of the classic relationships. The cold truth is that not more than one lay hearer in a thousand will know that he is doing it. Beginning a composition in one key and ending in another is not new, nor is it imperative.

But when the musician introduces his principal theme and we find that it lacks all melodic unity because it does not stay in any one key for more than half a measure, we find our ears unequal to the task of following it. Perhaps it is that kind of atonality that Mr. Respighi means. At any rate, we may be sure that, if it is shunned, Italian music will recover its native idiom, which it has striven to set aside in favor of northern brain products. No nation can make healthy or logical progress with its arts by trying to reconstruct them according to the models of some other nation. The fundamental difference between German and French Gothic cannot be obliterated without destroying finely drawn character. It is futile for Italians to try to make music of the rarified Parisian type or the rude and aggressive German type of today. Such efforts serve only to blurr the outlines of Italian sensuous expression and replace them with the stiff drawings of the copyist. And all the Europeans become silly when they try to write jazz.

* * *

Is Musical Material Exhausted?

SOME interesting conversations followed the productions of the Copland and Hindemith works. One gentleman, who contemplates with regret, indeed, one might say even views with alarm, the propaganda for modernistic music, voiced his sorrow that such music was performed at all. He hoped that its day was nearly over, and he will without doubt rejoice greatly when he reads what Respighi has said about the death of atonality in Italy. The distinguished Italian did not tell us whether polytonality has also met its doom. But possibly it will have to go into the silence since it is distinctly hostile to the Italian sense of beauty.

Another gentleman unhesitatingly condemned the Hindemith composition as commonplace and vulgar. That commentator was a determined modernist, and, although he went into no details, one suspected that his objection to the "Concert Music" was derived from its liberal employment of old tonalities and key relationships and its introduction of such time-worn devices as a fugue. You see, it would take an almost superhuman ingenuity to write a fugue in atonal music; in canonic composition the rule of the key is tyrannical.

This traveler along the musical highways found the Hindemuth composition interesting and in moments even beautiful. Possibly the modernist who condemned it was offended by the composer's proclamation of a sustained lyric melody of the sort originated by the early fathers who dwelt in the country of the olive and the grape. Well, "de gustibus non est disputandum." Wars have been started by a difference in tastes. The modernist has theories and the basic one is that it is impossible to compose any more worthwhile music in the old manner and that therefore we must invent new methods.

This recalls an experience of John Stuart Mill set forth in his autobiography. Enjoying rapturously Weber's "Oberon," he began to be tormented about the future of music. He reflected that there were only five tones and two semi-tones in an octave and that they could be put together only in a limited number of ways of which only a few were beautiful. Most of these must have been already discovered and hence there could be no future Mozarts or Webers. "This source of anxiety," he concluded, in comforting meditation, "may perhaps be thought to resemble that of the philosophers of Laputa, who feared lest the sun should be burnt out."

* * *

Mr. Copland's Orchestral Ode.

THE writer of these rambling reflections came out of the glare of new ideas with the suspicion that the New York composer had the best of the argument. Perhaps Mr. Copland's music lacked the technical expertness and professional routine of the other music, but it had much more of the adventurous spirit of the voyager into new territory and of the irresponsibility of unbridled enthusiasms. Or shall we descend to the speech of the byways and assert that Mr. Copland recklessly said what chanced to come into his mind and did not give a continental whether it was high art or not?

The score had juice in it, sometimes bitter, sometimes sweet, but at any rate, liquid. One gets a bit impatient with the sawdust stuff that comes out of the mills of the present gods of music. The worthlessness of the bulk of this music is the result of the inability of most of the modernists to perceive that they are impoverishing their own art by refusing to mingle the old materials with the new. They labor under the delusion that they can create an entirely new art. This something that has not yet been done in any of the fields in which man has sought for expression of his ideals of beauty. Even the modern novel has its roots in the works of Publius Ovidius Naso, and architecture owes its vitality at this moment to the Egyptians and Babylonians.

In the end, the writer confesses to a certain pleasure in discovering force in a composition written by a resident of this monstrosity of a town. Conductors live habitually with their eyes toward the East and see signs and wonders beyond the stormy waters of the North Atlantic. It is difficult for most of them to discern anything excellent in this land. To be sure, most of them come from abroad and have been brought up in the belief there is no art in the United States. Mr. Koussevitzky has been here long enough to learn at least that it is wise to be politic, and so he bestowes his august attention from time to time on American music. Thus Mr. Copland's ode obtained a performance by the Boston orchestra, and it was a good performance. That, at any rate, the work deserved. This music lover expects to hear the composition again, perhaps under the commanding direction of Leopold Stokowski.

* * *

The Unappreciated Saxophone.

AT the Schola Cantorium concert on Wednesday evening Mr. Ross presented a quatuor by Villa-Lobos for harp, celesta, flute, saxophone, piano and women's voices. Several things impressed this writer while listening to the work and one of them was that the Brazilian gentleman did not know what to do with his saxophone after he got it. We grieved that he had not been able to submit his score to one Ferdinand Grofe, who knows more about saxophones than old Sax himself.

Many music lovers of Puritan mind believe that the saxophone is a bawdy instrument fit only for dark and secret night clubs, or at best for ribald festivities attended by crooning and tap dancing. The truth is that it is a perfectly respectable member of the wind band and has been used by high-minded composers in scores of impeccable behavior. Bizet found employment for it in "L'Arlesienne" and Catalani in "Lorelei." But it is not necessary to ramble through scores extracting examples of its use. The point to be made here is that in the work heard Wednesday night the saxophone was unduly obtrusive and refused to fit itself proportionately into the body of music.

Perhaps the composer did not select the most suitable one of the twelve varieties of the instrument, or maybe he did not plan its part with correct view of its possibilities in the small ensemble. But as far as this writer can see it is a pity to ostracize so good an instrument because it is now a standard element in the jazz band. Used with knowledge and artistic judgment, it can find a place in symphonic works when its peculiar tone quality is desired. There is no other instrument or combination of instruments which can furnish just that quality, and in itself the quality is neither blatant nor vulgar.

The music of Villa-Lobus? Not important. Portuguese and Indian themes rather clumsily handled. The most significant applause of the evening was for Bernard Wagenaar's Chinese songs. A very industrious musician is Mr. Wagenaar. He had another work on another program the same night.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

MAR 13 1932

Gotham Hears Novelties of Musical World

Bravos and Hisses Greet Presentation of Copeland's Symphonic Ode

By Joan King.

NEW YORK.—[Special.]—Novelty has provided the keynote for Gotham's musical doings, of late. Serge Koussevitzky set the pace when he brought his orchestra to town for the fourth of its evening series of the season. In addition to Bach and Brahms, Mr. Koussevitzky offered New York its first hearing of the "Symphonic Ode" by Aaron Copeland. This is the piece which Mr. Copeland wrote in honor of the fiftieth anniversary, last year, of the Boston orchestra. Its dedication is—"To the Boston Symphony orchestra—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor—on the occasion of its fiftieth anniversary." The work, however, did not have its world première during the anniversary year owing to the extreme difficulty of execution. It requires a large orchestra.

"Symphonic Ode," in one movement, requires twenty minutes for performance. Its title, according to notes by Philip Hale, program annotator for the Bostonians, is not meant to imply any connection with a literary idea. It is not an ode to anything other than the particular spirit to be found in the music itself.

* *

Borrows Explanation from Gide.

Mr. Copeland, in relation to his work, quotes Andre Gide:

"Before explaining my book to others, I wait for them to explain it to me. To wish to explain it first would be to restrain its meaning prematurely, because even if we know what we wish to say we cannot know if we have said only that. And what interests me especially is what I have put into my book without my own knowledge—that part of the unconscious that I should like to name 'la part de Dieu.'"

The New York audience which was large, as always for the visits of Bostonians, received this "first hearing" with a polite degree of applause, some hissing, and shouts of "Bravo!" From some highly demonstrative enthusiasts. The performance which Mr. Koussevitzky gave the work was magnificent.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

N. Y. AMERICAN

MAR 13 1932

U. S. Leaders Behind

Country Willing to Buy the Best, But Does Not Aid In Producing the Best.

By DEEMS TAYLOR.

There has never been any State aid for music in this country, and the chances are that there will continue to be none, at least for some time. On the whole, this is probably a good thing. Theoretically the Government of a country should take just as much interest in promoting culture among its citizens as it does in promoting their literacy, attending to their morals and safeguarding their health. Practically the results of that interest in European countries are not quite as ideal as they may look from a distance.

DEEMS TAYLOR.

Politicians are much the same the world over. The essence of their philosophy of life is "compromise." As a result, their State-subsidized conservatories, opera houses, theatres and orchestras are likely to be run by persons to whom there is no particular objection, while their prize-winning painters and composers tend to be those whose work is distinguished largely by a safe and nonirritating mediocrity.

Our own system, precarious though it is, has something to recommend it. Our orchestras are subsidized by persons really interested in music, sufficiently so to give their own—rather than the taxpayers'—money toward its support. So are our opera companies. Our conservatories are either self-supporting or elese endowed by private capital. In general, our patrons of music are people who know the best and want it.

In one respect, however, our system falls down. It has no policy, and looks no further ahead than next season. The typical European ministry of fine arts is concerned not only with its country's present musical needs but with the future. It honors its contemporary composers, conductors and instrumentalists, but it likewise concerns itself with training and encouraging the younger ones who will one day take their places.

* * *

We do no such thing. We like the best and we are willing to pay for it, but it rarely occurs to us to do anything but buy it. We fill our halls of music with gorgeous, fragrant, exotic blooms, pay the bill and, when they have faded somewhat, order fresh ones. The possibility that we might grow our own and that they might have a new and equally pleasant fragrance has not yet entered into our consciousness.

Consider our method of obtaining conductors for our symphony orchestras. For long years our patrons of symphonic music have combed the concert halls of Europe, hired the finest maestri available and imported them to dispense our rations of orchestral pabulum. If, occasionally, someone has risen to ask mildly, "Why no Americans?" they have had a ready answer for him. American conductors have not been skilled enough or experienced enough to compete artistically with their European confreres.

Now this is a good answer and a true one, generally speaking. But it is not a particularly satisfying one. Why are American conductors not as good as European ones? Why have we no rising equivalent of Arturo Toscanini, Bruno Walter, Bernardino Molinari and Serge Koussevitzky?

* * *

The answer to that question must be obvious to anyone who will stop to take thought: Because they have had no chance to develop skill and experience. If they have not, the reason is equally obvious—the backers and directors of our orchestras have shirked an obligation.

It is not, of course, a particularly easy obligation to meet. I do not believe, for example, that much good would be accomplished by placing Sir Thomas Beecham, Vittorino Respigh Mr. Toscanini, Mr. Walter, Mr. Reiner, Mr. Koussevtzky and Mr. Molinari on a raft, setting them adrift in the Atlantic, and replacing them with Native Sons. In fact, I would not care to see any of those gentlemen other than where he is. They are first-rank conductors and we need them.

What I am concerned with is, not who are to conduct our orchestras today but who are to conduct them tomorrow. It so happens that we are able to import a generous supply of eminent conductors from present-day Europe. But as things are now, we should continue importing them (we have, upon occasion, done so in the past) if they happened to be merely second-raters. This is absurd and humiliating.

It is not a question of one hundred per centism, but of simple justice. The typical European conductor arrives here at the height of his career, with his apprenticeship and his mistakes far behind him. Beside him the average American is uncertain, clumsy and rather naive. If he is so, however, the reason may be, not that he lacks talent, but because his country offers him not the slightest chance of serving an apprenticeship, of acquiring technique and experience.

* * *

As a matter of fact, the situation is not without analogy to the story of the old gentleman who, having taken his wife to a vaudeville show on their golden wedding anniversary, was thunderstruck to have her volunteer as an assistant in a snake-charming act. He demanded:

"Why didn't you ever tell me you were a snake-charmer?"

She replied:

"You never asked me."

How do we know that we have not in our midst the equivalent of a youthful Toscanini or Muck or Nikisch? When an American does get half a chance at conducting, he does very well. Chalmers Clifton did a good job with the American Orchestral Society. Henry Hadley, Albert Stoessel, Arthur Shepherd and Eric Delamarter have long been recognized as excellent conductors. And much good it has done them.

In recent years the despised radio has developed into a brilliantly successful training school for young American conductors. Listen, if you get the chance, to Nathaniel Shilkret, over the N. B. C. and Columbia stations; to William Merrigan Daly and Graham Harris on the N. B. C. network; to Philip James, over WOR, and to Howard Barlow over WABC. Here are five young conductors, any one of whom is capable of conducting a symphony concert before a music-wise audience, and every one of them is American-born. If we were to add naturalized Americans to the list, it would include David Mendoza, Hugo Riesenfeld and Erno Rapee.

This time last year the list would have included Eugene Ormondy, who began in the movies and moved over to N. B. C. But Ormondy has gone. He did get a chance—first at a guest performance with the Philadelphia Orchestra and then in Minneapolis. He is now full conductor of the latter organization.

There are not many such chances. The jump from the broadcasting studio and the conservatory orchestra to the concert hall is not an easy one to make in our country. It ought to be easier. It is the plain duty of our symphony orchestras to do something toward making it other than impossible for a rising American conductor to have—at least—a chance to fail.

What that something should be, it is not for me to say. Perhaps the Americans could be enrolled as associates, with a guaranteed number of guest performances to conduct; perhaps they could enter the fold via Summer pop concerts. By whatever means, they should have the opportunity they so richly deserve.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

COLUMBUS, OHIO

STATE JOURNAL

MAR 13 1932

In the Wor

By OLEY SPEAKS, Sunda

NEW YORK.—This past week has been one great feast of orchestral music; within that time three of the major orchestras of the country and, at the same time, three of the greatest orchestras in all the world have been heard here; these were the Philharmonic-Symphony of New York, the Boston Symphony and the Philadelphia Orchestra. It is hard for one listener, at least, to decide which is the best of these three orchestras.

The playing of each was of such high virtuosity that all seem to be on an equal plane; in any event it is pretty hard to decide between them, so let it be considered a draw as far as this writer is concerned. The programs of the three orchestras were so diversified the conductors of so different temperaments (perhaps methods is the better word) that hearing these three organizations within a few days was an interesting experience at least.

First was the Boston Symphony concert directed by Serge Koussevitzky. The program presented follows:

C. P. E. Bach's concerto in D-major (this composer, by the way was the third son of John Sebastian Bach), Paul Hindemith's "Konzertumsik" for string orchestras and brass instruments, Maurice Ravel's "Rhapsodies Espagnole" and Jean Sibelius' Symphony No. 2.

Here was a program of great interest and one that disclosed the magnetic powers of the conductor and the virtuosity of the performers to the full. It is a far cry from Bach to Hindemith; personally we prefer the music of the former. Hindemith's music, by the way, was composed especially for the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Orchestra and was heard for the first time anywhere in Boston last April. There is no question of the great creative powers of this young modernist; the thing is, does one like this modern style of music expression (and many there are who say this modernistic tendency is not music).

It may be said that this latest music of Hindemith's is far more interesting than many of his former writings for the orchestra. The Ravel music proved to be what one would expect from this talented French composer; music of originality and scored in Ravel's most ingratiating manner. The Sibelius symphony was the high light of this program; music of tremendous power is this, the kind that fairly grips the listener; here is music that will live for many a year, long after much of the music being written in these days is forgotten. Of course, the Boston orchestra performed this program in superlative fashion and there was a great deal of enthusiasm showered upon conductor and players.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

REPUBLICAN

MAR 13 1932

Boston Symphony Presents Several New Compositions

Works By Hindemith, Lc Varied Impressions— Ravel and Mozart—(

PROGRAMS of the Boston Symphony orchestra have been the principal source of musical interest during the past weeks, a period which has been otherwise unusually dull, reports the Boston correspondent og Musical Courier.

Charles Martin Loeffler's dramatic poem, "La Mort de Tintagiles" and Hindemith's "Konzertmusik" for strings and brass, a work written for the orchestra's jubilee celebration last year, and on which the Boston Symphony still has exclusive rights of performance, were among important offerings. On second hearing, the work was even more impressive than last year. The rapid sections have great rhythmic power; the slower-moving parts, despite all Hindemith's protestations to the contrary, are romantic, almost sentimental, in flavor. And they disclose the composer as one of the great—and few—melody makers of our time. Loeffler's work, unheard here in almost a decade, made a profound impression, due partly to the excellent orchestral performance under Serge Koussevitsky, in which the solo viola d'amore (Jean Lefranc) plays a great part. But the score itself is a fine work, one of Loeffler's great contributions to American music.

Beethoven's Eroica rounded out the program, but it had already been given eloquent voice earlier in the week on a Tuesday matinee program, at which another American work, John Alden Carpenter's "Song of Faith," had been played for the first time in Boston. With the Cecilia society chorus (Arthur Fiedler, conductor) and Clifton Joseph Furness, reader, assisting, the presentation of this patriotic hymn was enthusiastically received. It was preceded by two movements of Deems Taylor's suite, "Through the Looking Glass."

The program given the previous week featured the premier of Aaron Copland's "Symphonic Ode" (originally intended for the jubilee) and the playing of Yelly d'Aranyi, Hungarian violinist. Copland's work, in a single movement requiring some 18 minutes to play, was coldly received by most of the reviewers, while the audience applauded. This writer, though handiby distaste for Copland's compositions previously played here, was of the opinion that the new opus has many powerfully written pages, and that the composer has made great strides. As far as may be judged from a single hearing, it seemed to be structurally united and integrated; but the composer does not eschew entirely sentimentality and bombast.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

REPUBLICAN

MAR 13 1932

Koussevitzky to Conduct Classic - Modern Program Here April 6

The Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Dr Serge Koussevitzky, will present at the Auditorium Wednesday night, April 6, a varied program of classic and modern music. The Boston orchestra will appear in this city under the auspices of the Springfield Symphony, whose fourth and final concert of the season was given Tuesday night. Season subscribers to the local orchestra already have tickets for the event, but separate tickets will soon be placed on sale at Steinert's music store for non-subscribers.

The following letter was received during the week from John N. Burk, manager of the Boston orchestra, by Edward H. Marsh, secretary of the Springfield Symphony:—

"Following my promise to you, I have urged Dr Koussevitzky to decide upon the program for the Boston Symphony concert at Springfield and this program I now inclose.

"The poem by Leo Sowerby, a new work by this American composer, is being introduced by Koussevitzky in the East. He has great belief in its worth and in its success. Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe' suite, is one of the most brilliant interpretations of the Boston Symphony orchestra under Koussevitzky. To us this seems an especially beautiful program, and we hope you will agree with us."

The program follows:—

Suite .... Corelli
Sarabande
Gigue
"Badinerie"
"Prairie," poem for orchestra...... Sowerby
"Daphnis et Chloe" ballet, second suite
Ravel
"Lever du Jour"
"Pantomime"
"Danse Generale"

Intermission

Symphony No 3 in E flat, "Eroica," Op 55
Beethoven
Allegro con brio
Marcia funebre: Adagio assai
Scherzo: Allegro vivace; trio
Finale: Allegro molto

THIS CLIPPING FROM

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

EVE. UNION

MAR 15 1932

INCLUDES RUSSIAN WORK

Dr. Koussevitsky Makes Announcement Relative to Coming Concert.

Because of the fondness of local music lovers for Russian music as interpreted by the famous conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and as a compliment to the local Russians who idolize their compatriot, Dr. Koussevitzky has been asked to make one change in the program as originally announced for the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Auditorium Wednesday evening, April 6, under the auspices of the Springfield Symphony Orchestra by including one typical Russian number.

Dr. Koussevitsky has graciously complied with the request and will include a modern Russian work in the place of the American composition "Prairie" by Sowerby. The work chosen is a suite of tone pictures by Tcherepnin which Dr. Koussevitzky is playing for the first time in this country this season and with great success.

With an old Italian overture, a typical Russian number and the brilliant Ravel composition, concluding with the superb Beethoven symphony "Eroica" the directors of the local orchestra believe this concert will be one of the greatest concerts the famous Boston orchestra has ever given in Springfield.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.

MERCURY

MAR 15 1932

There have been many observances of anniversaries, but music has enjoyed none of such prolonged delight as that of the 50th year of the Boston Symphony orchestra, writes ~~W. J. Henderson~~ in the Sun. The date of the semi-centennial fell in 1931; we are still listening to the compositions prepared for the festival. Three of them have fallen upon our ears within a week. These were Aaron Copland's "Symphonic Ode," Paul Hindemith's "Concert Music" for strings and brass, both presented by the Boston musicians, and Ottorino Respighi's "Metamorphosen," performed by the Philadelphia orchestra last Tuesday evening. The audiences responded to the revelations with uncertain demonstrations.

All three of the compositions proved to be well worth hearing, but it can hardly be doubted that the palm must be awarded to Mr. Copland. The music of the gifted German was perhaps more disputable in its proclamation, while the Italian master's score gave the impression of hard work and a grand marshaling of methods with a modicum of spontaneity. However, it may sound better the next time we hear it. And there will be a next time, for so long as Italian conductors visit our orchestral platforms we shall surely enjoy repetitions of Italian novelties.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. AMERICAN
MAR 13 1932

U. S. Leaders Behind

Country Willing to Buy the Best, But Does Not Aid In Producing the Best.

By DEEMS TAYLOR.

There has never been any State aid for music in this country, and the chances are that there will continue to be none, at least for some time. On the whole, this is probably a good thing. Theoretically the Government of a country should take just as much interest in promoting culture among its citizens as it does in promoting their literacy, attending to their morals and safeguarding their health. Practically the results of that interest in European countries are not quite as ideal as they may look from a distance.

DEEMS TAYLOR.

Politicians are much the same the world over. The essence of their philosophy of life is "compromise." As a result, their State-subsidized conservatories, opera houses, theatres and orchestras are likely to be run by persons to whom there is no particular objection, while their prize-winning painters and composers tend to be those whose work is distinguished largely by a safe and non-irritating mediocrity.

Our own system, precarious though it is, has something to recommend it. Our orchestras are subsidized by persons really interested in music, sufficiently so to give their own—rather than the taxpayers'—money toward its support. So are our opera companies. Our conservatories are either self-supporting or elese endowed by private capital. In general, our patrons of music are people who know the best and want it.

In one respect, however, our system falls down. It has no policy, and looks no further ahead than next season. The typical European ministry of fine arts is concerned not only with its country's present musical needs but with the future. It honors its contemporary composers, conductors and instrumentalists, but it likewise concerns itself with training and encouraging the younger ones who will one day take their places.

* * *

We do no such thing. We like the best and we are willing to pay for it, but it rarely occurs to us to do anything but buy it. We fill our halls of music with gorgeous, fragrant, exotic blooms, pay the bill and, when they have faded somewhat, order fresh ones. The possibility that we might grow our own and that they might have a new and equally pleasant fragrance has not yet entered into our consciousness.

Consider our method of obtaining conductors for our symphony orchestras. For long years our patrons of symphonic music have combed the concert halls of Europe, hired the finest maestri available and imported them to dispense our rations of orchestral pabulum. If, occasionally, someone has risen to ask mildly, "Why no Americans?" they have had a ready answer for him. American conductors have not been skilled enough or experienced enough to compete artistically with their European confreres.

Now this is a good answer and a true one, generally speaking. But it is not a particularly satisfying one. Why are American conductors not as good as European ones? Why have we no rising equivalent of Arturo Toscanini, Bruno Walter, Bernardino Molinari and Serge Koussevitzky?

* * *

The answer to that question must be obvious to anyone who will stop to take thought: Because they have had no chance to develop skill and experience. If they have not, the reason is equally obvious—the backers and directors of our orchestras have shirked an obligation.

It is not, of course, a particularly easy obligation to meet. I do not believe, for example, that much good would be accomplished by placing Sir Thomas Beecham, Vittorino Respigh-

Mr. Toscanini, Mr. Walter, Mr. Reiner, Mr. Koussevtzky and Mr. Molinari on a raft, setting them adrift in the Atlantic, and replacing them with Native Sons. In fact, I would not care to see any of those gentlemen other than where he is. They are first-rank conductors and we need them.

What I am concerned with is, not who are to conduct our orchestras today but who are to conduct them tomorrow. It so happens that we are able to import a generous supply of eminent conductors from present-day Europe. But as things are now, we should continue importing them (we have, upon occasion, done so in the past) if they happened to be merely second-raters. This is absurd and humiliating.

It is not a question of one hundred per centism, but of simple justice. The typical European conductor arrives here at the height of his career, with his apprenticeship and his mistakes far behind him. Beside him the average American is uncertain, clumsy and rather naive. If he is so, however, the reason may be, not that he lacks talent, but because his country offers him not the slightest chance of serving an apprenticeship, of acquiring technique and experience.

* * *

As a matter of fact, the situation is not without analogy to the story of the old gentleman who, having taken his wife to a vaudeville show on their golden wedding anniversary, was thunderstruck to have her volunteer as an assistant in a snake-charming act. He demanded:

"Why didn't you ever tell me you were a snake-charmer?"

She replied:

"You never asked me."

How do we know that we have not in our midst the equivalent of a youthful Toscanini or Muck or Nikisch? When an American does get half a chance at conducting, he does very well. Chalmers Clifton did a good job with the American Orchestral Society. Henry Hadley, Albert Stoessel, Arthur Shepherd and Eric Delarmarter have long been recognized as excellent conductors. And much good it has done them.

In recent years the despised radio has developed into a brilliantly successful training school for young American conductors. Listen, if you get the chance, to Nathaniel Shilkret, over the N. B. C. and Columbia stations; to William Merrigan Daly and Graham Harris on the N. B. C. network; to Philip James, over WOR, and to Howard Barlow over WABC. Here are five young conductors, any one of whom is capable of conducting a symphony concert before a music-wise audience, and every one of them is American-born. If we were to add naturalized Americans to the list, it would include David Mendoza, Hugo Riesenfeld and Erno Rapee.

This time last year the list would have included Eugene Ormondy, who began in the movies and moved over to N. B. C. But Ormondy has gone. He did get a chance—first at a guest performance with the Philadelphia Orchestra and then in Minneapolis. He is now full conductor of the latter organization.

There are not many such chances. The jump from the broadcasting studio and the conservatory orchestra to the concert hall is not an easy one to make in our country. It ought to be easier. It is the plain duty of our symphony orchestras to do something toward making it other than impossible for a rising American conductor to have—at least—a chance to fail.

What that something should be, it is not for me to say. Perhaps the Americans could be enrolled as associates, with a guaranteed number of guest performances to conduct; perhaps they could enter the fold via Summer pop concerts. By whatever means, they should have the opportunity they so richly deserve.

THIS CLIPPING FROM COLUMBUS, OHIO
STATE JOURNAL
MAR 13 1932

In the Wor

By OLEY SPEAKS, Sund

NEW YORK.—This past week has been one great feast of orchestral music; within that time three of the major orchestras of the country and, at the same time, three of the greatest orchestras in all the world have been heard here; these were the Philharmonic-Symphony of New York, the Boston Symphony and the Philadelphia Orchestra. It is hard for one listener, at least, to decide which is the best of these three orchestras.

The playing of each was of such high virtuosity that all seem to be on an equal plane; in any event it is pretty hard to decide between them, so let it be considered a draw as far as this writer is concerned. The programs of the three orchestras were so diversified the conductors of so different temperaments (perhaps methods is the better word) that hearing these three organizations within a few days was an interesting experience at least.

First was the Boston Symphony concert directed by Serge Koussevitzky. The program ~~presented~~ follows:

C. P. E. Bach's concerto in D-major (this composer, by the way was the third son of John Sebastian Bach), Paul Hindemith's "Konzertumsik" for string orchestras and brass instruments, Maurice Ravel's "Rhapsodies Espagnole" and Jean Sibelius' Symphony No. 2.

Here was a program of great interest and one that disclosed the magnetic powers of the conductor and the virtuosity of the performers to the full. It is a far cry from Bach to Hindemith; personally we prefer the music of the former. Hindemith's music, by the way, was composed especially for the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Orchestra and was heard for the first time anywhere in Boston last April. There is no question of the great creative powers of this young modernist; the thing is, does one like this modern style of music expression (and many there are who say this modernistic tendency is not music).

It may be said that this latest music of Hindemith's is far more interesting than many of his former writings for the orchestra. The Ravel music proved to be what one would expect from this talented French composer; music of originality and scored in Ravel's most ingratiating manner. The Sibelius symphony was the high light of this program; music of tremendous power is this, the kind that fairly grips the listener; here is music that will live for many a year, long after much of the music being written in these days is forgotten. Of course, the Boston orchestra performed this program in superlative fashion and there was a great deal of enthusiasm showered upon conductor and players.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
MAR 13 1932

Each Music Lover Pres Bailiff and Cheer Le Neighbors and Ap

Se

Works By Hindemith, Lc Varied Impressions— Ravel and Mozart—(

PROGRAMS of the Boston Symphony orchestra have been the principal source of musical interest during the past weeks, a period which has been otherwise unusually dull, reports the Boston correspondent og Musical Courier.

Charles Martin Loeffler's dramatic poem, "La Mort de Tintagiles" and Hindemith's "Konzertmusik" for strings and brass, a work written for the orchestra's jubilee celebration last year, and on which the Boston Symphony still has exclusive rights of performance, were among important offerings. On second hearing, the work was even more impressive than last year. The rapid sections have great rhythmic power; the slower-moving parts, despite all Hindemith's protestations to the contrary, are romantic, almost sentimental, in flavor. And they disclose the composer as one of the great—and few—melody makers of our time. Loeffler's work, unheard here in almost a decade, made a profound impression, due partly to the excellent orchestral performance under Serge Koussevitsky, in which the solo viola d'amore (Jean Lefranc) plays a great part. But the score itself is a fine work, one of Loeffler's great contributions to American music.

Beethoven's Eroica rounded out the program, but it had already been given eloquent voice earlier in the week on a Tuesday matinee program, at which another American work, John Alden Carpenter's "Song of Faith," had been played for the first time in Boston. With the Cecilia society chorus (Arthur Fiedler, conductor) and Clifton Joseph Furness, reader, assisting, the presentation of this patriotic hymn was enthusiastically received. It was preceded by two movements of Deems Taylor's suite, "Through the Looking Glass."

The program given the previous week featured the premier of Aaron Copland's "Symphonic Ode" (originally intended for the jubilee) and the playing of Yelly d'Aranyi, Hungarian violinist. Copland's work, in a single movement requiring some 18 minutes to play, was coldly received by most of the reviewers, while the audience applauded. This writer, though handiby distaste for Copland's compositions previously played here, was of the opinion that the new opus has many powerfully written pages, and that the composer has made great strides. As far as may be judged from a single hearing, it seemed to be structurally united and integrated; but the composer does not eschew entirely sentimentality and bombast.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION
MAR [illegible] 1932

INCLUDES RUSSIAN WORK

Dr. Koussevitsky Makes Announcement Relative to Coming Concert.

Because of the fondness of local music lovers for Russian music as interpreted by the famous conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and as a compliment to the local Russians who idolize their compatriot, Dr. Koussevitzky has been asked to make one change in the program as originally announced for the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Auditorium Wednesday evening, April 6, under the auspices of the Springfield Symphony Orchestra by including one typical Russian number.

Dr. Koussevitsky has graciously complied with the request and will include a modern Russian work in the place of the American composition "Prairie" by Sowerby. The work chosen is a suite of tone pictures by Tcherepnin which Dr. Koussevitzky is playing for the first time in this country this season and with great success.

With an old Italian overture, a typical Russian number and the brilliant Ravel composition, concluding with the superb Beethoven symphony "Eroica" the directors of the local orchestra believe this concert will be one of the greatest concerts the famous Boston orchestra has ever given in Springfield.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
MAR 13 1932

BOSTON SYMPHONY ANNOUNCES PROGRAM

Koussevitzky to Conduct Classic - Modern Program Here April 6

The Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Dr Serge Koussevitzky, will present at the Auditorium Wednesday night, April 6, a varied program of classic and modern music. The Boston orchestra will appear in this city under the auspices of the Springfield Symphony, whose fourth and final concert of the season was given Tuesday night. Season subscribers to the local orchestra already have tickets for the event, but separate tickets will soon be placed on sale at Steinert's music store for non-subscribers.

The following letter was received during the week from John N. Burk, manager of the Boston orchestra, by Edward H. Marsh, secretary of the Springfield Symphony:—

"Following my promise to you, I have urged Dr Koussevitzky to decide upon the program for the Boston Symphony concert at Springfield and this program I now inclose.

"The poem by Leo Sowerby, a new work by this American composer, is being introduced by Koussevitzky in the East. He has great belief in its worth and in its success. Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe' suite, is one of the most brilliant interpretations of the Boston Symphony orchestra under Koussevitzky. To us this seems an especially beautiful program, and we hope you will agree with us."

The program follows:—

Suite .... Corelli
  Sarabande
  Gigue
  "Badinerie"
"Prairie," poem for orchestra......Sowerby
"Daphnis et Chloe" ballet, second suite
Ravel
  "Lever du Jour"
  "Pantomime"
  "Danse Generale"

Intermission

Symphony No 3 in E flat, "Eroica," Op 55
Beethoven
  Allegro con brio
  Marcia funebre: Adagio assai
  Scherzo: Allegro vivace; trio
  Finale: Allegro molto

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY
MAR 15 1932

There have been many observances of anniversaries, but music has enjoyed none of such prolonged delight as that of the 50th year of the Boston Symphony orchestra, writes ~~W. J. Henderson~~ in the Sun. The date of the semi-centennial fell in 1931; we are still listening to the compositions prepared for the festival. Three of them have fallen upon our ears within a week. These were Aaron Copland's "Symphonic Ode," Paul Hindemith's "Concert Music" for strings and brass, both presented by the Boston musicians, and Ottorino Respighi's "Metamorphosen," performed by the Philadelphia orchestra last Tuesday evening. The audiences responded to the revelations with uncertain demonstrations.

All three of the compositions proved to be well worth hearing, but it can hardly be doubted that the palm must be awarded to Mr. Copland. The music of the gifted German was perhaps more disputable in its proclamation, while the Italian master's score gave the impression of hard work and a grand marshaling of methods with a modicum of spontaneity. However, it may sound better the next time we hear it. And there will be a next time, for so long as Italian conductors visit our orchestral platforms we shall surely enjoy repetitions of Italian novelties.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
HERALD-EXAMINER

MAR 16 1932

Words and Music

By Deems Taylor

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra celebrated ~~its fiftieth anniversary~~ two years ago with a composition shower. From all over the world came works from eminent composers, written in honor of the Bostonians' birthday party. So many were there, in fact, that Mr. Koussevitzky and his men must have been sitting up nights ever since trying to get them all played off. Only a week or so ago did the band complete the list with a Symphonic Ode by Aaron Copland.

At least Mr. Koussevitzky is not selfish. He lets other conductors play with his birthday presents. For instance, Mr. Molinari and the Philadelphia Orchestra recently presented a work by Ottorino Respighi that had been custom-made for the Back Bay Semicentennial.

It is called Metamorphoseon modi XII—a super-elegant way of saying "theme with twelve variations." The main theme, stated almost without preliminaries, and curiously akin to the Shepherd's tune at the opening of the last act of Tristan, pursues a stormy and adventurous career that taxes the resources of an augmented modern orchestra, including a pipe organ.

* * *

THE trouble with variations is that they are, unless heavily disguised, too small a form for the use to which they are usually put. Played on a piano, or by a chamber ensemble, a set of variations may be absorbingly interesting; the comparative monotony of one color is relieved by the variety of shapes in which the main theme appears. But when a set of ten, twelve, or fourteen variations is assigned to a symphony orchestra, the constant shifting of color, as well as the permutations and transmutations of the material, is too much. The variations have got to be short, unless the piece is to last all night; and the result is an inevitable impression of scrappiness. The composer is made to sound short-breathed and tentative.

One has the impression of hearing a salesman offering samples of his wares: "Now, here's something you might like; simple, but good (24 bars; full stop). Or perhaps you'd like something a trifle more elaborate (32 bars; full stop). No? Well, try this one (28 bars: full stop): or this (16 bars; full stop)—and so on. No sooner has the musical thought begun to develop than it is cut off, in the bloom of its youth, to make room for another idea.

* * *

STRAUSS solves the problem most successfully in Don Quixote, where he avoids jerkiness by leaving out the full stops—a simple device, but an effective one. His variations take their place as parts of what is practically a continuous and carefully structured development of a single theme.

Respighi tries another plan. His first two variations are enough alike, in mood and development, to correspond roughly to the first movement of a symphony. The next two form, approximately, a slow movement, and the fifth and sixth are equivalent to a scherzo. After that, however, he lets nature take its course, sometimes running one variation into another so that it is hard to tell when the one leaves off and the other begins. Except to those in whose veins runs a strain of detective blood this is, of course, of no consequence.

Even so, the Metamorphoseon lack something of the cohesiveness that one instinctively expects in a major work for grand orchestra. Which did not prevent my enjoying them exceedingly, and looking forward to hearing them again.

* * *

THIS heretical pleasure derives, I suppose, from the fact that I like Respighi's ideas. In music, as in people, one may love what one does not unreservedly admire. A may be a fine fellow and a credit to his country, deserving of respect and veneration—and may, none the less, bore you to death; while B, who is a bit of a wastrel and a scofflaw, and whose family life is deplorable, may be one of the joys of your life.

So with Respighi, so far as I am concerned. I admit all his faults—his tendency to long-windedness, his fondness for climaxes more notable for decibels than for eloquence, the occasional literalness and lack of imagination with which he develops his material. None the less, I like his music. It has a speaking quality, a sort of aliveness, that is not frequent in modern musical utterance. Whatever use he may make of his themes, they have dignity, and plasticity, and, at their best, a mournful beauty that I find immensely moving.

His harmony has warmth and color, and is neither hackneyed nor consciously bizarre; and his orchestration is distinctive and always effective. He may, upon occasion, make one wish that he could have said his say somewhat otherwise; but his fundamental ideas are almost invariably worth hearing. He is every inch a composer.

* * *

MR. RESPIGHI was present to hear his piece played, acknowledging the applause it occasioned by bowing from his place in a first-tier box on the right (thereby causing numerous persons in the dress circle and balcony seats on the right to come perilously near to breaking their necks). He had to bow three times. I suspect New York of liking him as well as his music.

For the other offerings of the evening Mr. Molinari went to not too conventional sources. There was no symphony, the Respighi work taking its place. The concert began with a lovely Corelli suite, transcribed for strings by Pinelli, and ended with Debussy's La Mer and Strauss' Til Eulenspiegel. A good program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
UNION

MAR 16 1932

Will Include Russian Work

Dr. Kussevitsky Makes Announcement Relative to Boston Symphony Concert.

Because of the fondness of local music lovers for Russian music as interpreted by the famous conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and as a compliment to the local Russians who idolize their compatriot, Dr. Koussevitzky has been asked to make one change in the program as originally announced for the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Auditorium Wednesday evening, April 6, under the auspices of the Springfield Symphony Orchestra by including one typical Russian number.

Dr. Koussevitsky has graciously complied with the request and will include a modern Russian work in the place of the American composition "Prairie" by Sowerby. The work chosen is a suite of tone pictures by Tcherepnin which Dr. Koussevitzky is playing for the first time in this country this season and with great success.

With an old Italian overture, a typical Russian number and the brilliant Ravel composition, concluding with the superb Beethoven symphony "Eroica" the directors of the local orchestra believe this concert will be one of the greatest concerts the famous Boston orchestra has ever given in Springfield. The revised program is as follows:

Suite, Corelli
Saraband—Gigue—Badinerie
Eight Miniatures, N. Tcherepnin
"After a Russian Illustrated Alphabet."
1. Arab Boy
2. Egypt
3. Baba-jaga
4. Stars
5. "Mama"
6. General
7. The Forest
8. The Tsarina
"Daphnis et Chloe," Ravel
Ballet, Second Suite.
Lever du Jour—Pantomime—Danse Generale
Symphony No. 3 in E flat major, Beethoven
"Eroica," Op. 55.
1. Allegro con brio,
2. Marcia funebre: Adagio assai,
3. Scherzo: Allegro vivace; Trio,
4. Finale: Allegro molto.

The sale of single tickets for this notable concert will open at Steinert's Music House Monday, March 28, and orders are now being filled by Edward H. Marsh, secretary, 422 Besse Building.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

MAR 19 1932

CHOICE PROGRAM FOR CONCERT BY BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The great concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in the Auditorium, April 6, will bring to a brilliant close the present successful season of the Springfield Symphony orchestra. The Boston orchestra was engaged to celebrate the 10th season of the local orchestra and the directors feel that the experiment has been amply justified for they attribute to the inclusion of the Boston orchestra in the series the largely increased subscriptions of this season, and they already have assurance that the concert, April 6 will be greeted by one of the largest audiences of the season.

It is so long since Springfield has heard the Boston orchestra that symphony patrons have been keen to know what program Dr Koussevitzky would choose. From lovers ~~of modern~~ music there has been an insistent demand for the works of present-day composers and the lovers of the classics have been equally insistent that the program include time-honored works of the composers of the past. Dr Koussevitzky was advised of these requests and he submitted a program aimed to delight everyone. It was an ideal program but it disappointed some of the orchestra directors because it included no Russian works and local admirers of Dr Koussevitzky think his rendering of modern Russian works among the most brilliant interpretations of his great orchestra. Contrary to all Symphony hall traditions Dr Koussevitzky was asked to change the Springfield program and include one typical Russian number.

The distinguished conductor of the Boston orchestra graciously acquiesced and in the place of a little known American composition he has put a brilliant Russian number which will not only delight the lovers of modern Russian music but afford a remarkably representative program including old Italian, modern Russian and French compositions, as well as a great classic symphony.

The program will open with a lovely old Italian suite by Corelli. Then will come the brilliant Russian number, Eight Miniatures, "After a Russian Illustrated Alphabet" by Tcherepnin, said to be a wonderfully colorful number. Then the beautiful ballet "Daphnis et Chloe," by Ravel will be given, considered one of the most brilliant interpretations of this famous French composer by Dr Koussevitzky and his orchestra. The symphony will be the magnificent Beethoven "Eroica" generally conceded to be one of the greatest symphonies ever written. The program is as follows:—

Suite ....Corelli
Saraband
Gigue
Badinerie
Eight miniatures:
"After a Russian illustrated Alphabet" ....N. Tcherepnin
"Arab-bou," "Egypt," "Baba-jaga," "Stars," "Mama," "General," "The Forest," "The Tsarina"
"Daphnis et Chloe" ....Ravel
Ballet. Second suite:
Lever du Jour,
Pantomime,
Danse Generale
Intermission
Symphony No 3 in E flat major,
"Eroica," opus 55:
Allegro con brio,
Marcia funebre, adagio assai,
Scherzo, Allegro vivace; trio
Finale, Allegro molto

Many out-of-town orders for tickets have already been received and there is evidence of more interest in the appearance of the Boston Symphony orchestra than has been shown in any musical attraction in years. The tickets will go on sale at Steinert's music house, Monday, March 28, and advance orders are now being filled by the secretary, Edward H. Marsh, 42 Besse building.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
THE OUTLOOK
MAR - 1932

▸▸ Notable Music ◂◂

Gershwin's "Second Rhapsody" and "Robin Hood"

